sponds with the beginning of the reign of Darius I (522-486 BC). After the death of Cambyses, civil war erupted in the empire, and eventually Darius secured the throne, perhaps as a usurper (Briant, 107-14). Darius was forced to respond to revolts that broke out across the empire, and these events resulted in significant changes in the imperial structure and operations. Sometime after securing the throne, Darius reorganized the empire into twenty satrapies and developed systems of roads, currency and communication (Leith, 292-93). He also sponsored the creation of a notable inscription at Behistun, offering a biased account of his early years and perhaps indicating the promulgation of law codes as a means of local control. The completion of the work on the Jerusalem temple accomplished by Zerubbabel and Joshua in 515 BC should be viewed against the context of Darius's more direct interest in the local affairs of his territories. Moreover, the widespread unrest and significant changes in the empire likely provide the backdrop for Haggai and Zechariah, especially some of their more apocalyptic predictions and imagery (Berquist, 65-73). Against this background, the laudatory language about Zerubbabel in Haggai and Zechariah (e.g. Hag 2:20-23) perhaps reflects a growing messianic expectation that was attached to him as a member of the Davidic line, possibly expressing local hopes that he might reestablish an independent kingdom in Judah. Zerubbabel, however, suddenly disappears without explanation from the biblical account. Perhaps these two elements are related and Darius removed Zerubbabel from power sometime after the completion of the temple to stem the growing tide of messianism in the Jerusalem community.

5.3. The Late Persian Period (450-333 BC). Neither the OT nor extrabiblical literature provides any direct information on events in Yehud between the rebuilding of the temple in 515 BC and the work of Ezra and Nehemiah after 458 BC—the rest of the Persian I period (for potential incidental data, see Ezra 4:6-23; 6:7). In Persian imperial history this era overlapped the reigns of Darius I (522-486 BC), Xerxes (486-465 BC) and Artaxerxes I (465-424 BC). The lack of source material may suggest a period of relative stability in the region, but archaeological data indicates that sites in Yehud were more limited and less prosperous than those elsewhere in the area (Leith, 303). This situation provides the likely background for the prophetic material in Isaiah 56—66 and Malachi. These prophets allude to social and economic struggles of the Jerusalem community in the years immediately after the completion of the temple (c. 515–500 BC). They interpret hardships such as drought, community division and lack of resources (e.g., Mal 3:10–11) as results of the people's unfaithfulness to Yahweh and as motivations for the community to aspire to a new level of ritual and ethical diligence.

As noted above, the strategic and material importance of the area of Syria-Palestine changed significantly from the Persian I to Persian II periods. The impetus for change began around 460 BC with the outbreak of a major revolt in Egypt during the early years of Artaxerxes I, a rebellion that featured hostile Greek activity in Egypt and elsewhere (see Leith, 304–5). As a result, the area of Syria-Palestine and the province of Yehud became vital to Persian security, which in turn led to increased imperial involvement and administration. Since the time of Isaiah 56—66 and Malachi (c. 500 BC) is the last period that is directly relevant for the prophetic literature until the mid-second century BC (the oracles in Zech 9—14 may date to later periods, but their apocalyptic nature makes them cryptic), the course of Israelite history in the remainder of the Persian period (c. 450–333 BC) will not be discussed here. However, the new material situation and increased strategic significance for Yehud in the Persian II period likely provide the context for interpreting the Bible's depictions of Ezra and Nehemiah, traditionally dated to 458 BC and 445 BC, respectively. The activities of Ezra and Nehemiah perhaps should be understood from the Persian perspective as part of the renewed imperial efforts to establish secure administration and refortify important cities in the areas close to Egypt. The scholarly study of this era continues to flourish (see Moore and Kelle), and reconstructions must deal with a host of complicated issues, such as the historical reliability and proper sequence of Ezra and Nehemiah and their roles as priest and governor, the socioeconomic composition and conditions of Yehud at this time and its relationship to the empire and other regional entities, and the ethnic and religious concerns addressed in the biblical texts (see Miller and Hayes, 529; Grabbe 1992; 2004).

Subsequent to these years, virtually no historical information has survived on the history of the Jerusalem community from the time after Nehemiah's second term as governor to the rise of the Greeks under Alexander the Great in the mid-300s BC, even though the general contours of Persian history are well known in this era. By 333 BC, Alexander and his Greek and Macedonian forces had achieved successes against the last Persian emperor, Darius III (336–330 BC), winning a decisive victory at Issus, and by 332 BC the region of Judea had come under Alexander's control (Leith, 314; Levine, 231).

6. The Hellenistic Period (333–64 BC).

The period of Greek dominance over the ancient world lasted nearly three centuries, but only one era of that period constitutes the probable background of an OT prophetic book. Although the happenings described in the book of Daniel are set against the ostensible backdrop of the sixth-century BC Babylonian exile in the courts of Babylonian, Median and Persian kings, scholars since at least the eighteenth century have widely recognized that the visions in Daniel 7—12 relate most closely to circumstances under the Seleucid kings who controlled Syria-Palestine in the years after 190 BC. More specifically, the visions seem to focus on the time of the Maccabean Revolt in Jerusalem, relating explicitly, even if symbolically, to the period between the decrees concerning Jerusalem by Antiochus IV Epiphanes in 167 BC and the reclaiming of the temple by the Maccabees in 164 BC (Greenspoon, 341). For many modern interpreters, the dramatic circumstances involved in this era provide the best context for understanding the production of the whole book of *Daniel as well, at least in its present form (see Collins). While the stories in Daniel 1—6 may be older, and perhaps formed a collection even before the Maccabean period, the book's apparent lack of familiarity with some historical details of the Babylonian period and overwhelming preoccupation with the significance of events under the Greek emperors are most easily explained if the author (or final editor) was living in the mid-second century BC.

The Greek dominance that reached a flash-point in Jerusalem in the mid-second centure BC had begun when Alexander the Great (356-323 BC) arrived in the east in 333 BC after consolidating power in Greece over the preceding two decades (see Greenspoon; Hayes and Mandell). He conquered Judea in 332 BC, but he died suddenly about a decade later (323 BC). Upon Alexander's death, his generals struggled over succession and territory, and the area of Judea initially came under the rule of Ptolemy and his successors, whose government center was at Alexandria in Egypt. While under the control of the Ptolemies, Judea and other territories north of Egypt seemingly enjoyed a period of relative self-rule under the leadership of local high priests and officials, with little Greek intervention (Greenspoon, 319). In time, however, Judea's geographical location between the Ptolemies and the Seleucids—the other major Hellenistic power that had succeeded Alexander and was centered in Antioch in Syria—made the area an important site of conflict (Levine, 232). The territories of Syria-Palestine passed from Ptolemaic to Seleucid control during the reign of the Seleucid emperor Antiochus III (c. 200 BC), a ruler who initially continued the generally positive relations with Jerusalem's local leadership.

The series of dramatic events commonly associated with the book of Daniel began about twenty-five years later when Antiochus IV Epiphanes came to the Seleucid throne (c. 175 BC). Already during the preceding years, several factors had set the stage for the conflicts that would occur in Jerusalem. First, at nearly the same time that the Seleucids gained control of Syria-Palestine (c. 200 BC), the Romans began to extend their power into the Mediterranean and soon scored a decisive victory over Greek forces in Asia Minor (190 BC) (Hayes and Mandell, 46). As a result, Seleucid emperors, even while exerting their own power over local populations in Syria-Palestine, had to exist under Roman hegemony, a situation that they may not have willingly acknowledged or accepted. This hegemony included Roman demands for significant payment from the Seleucid kings, which often exceeded their normal resources and drove them to extract funds from local temples in their territories (Greenspoon, 324).

A second, perhaps even more significant, factor in the years leading up to hostilities under Antiochus IV was the cultural aspect of Greek ascendancy. The expansion of Greek dominance brought with it the spread of "Hellenism," a "complex of cultural, economic, philosophical, and social factors" that represented the dissemination of the Greek way of life throughout the Mediterranean region (Greenspoon, 317). The area of Judea, once relatively isolated, began to encounter cultural and religious institutions, ideas and practices that offered assimilation into the dominant culture of the Hellenistic world. Predictably, these cultural developments elicited differing, even conflicting, reactions among groups within Judaism, divisions that produced an increasingly fractious and polarized Jewish society during the first part of the second century BC. The third factor that set the stage for the conflicts that would emerge in Jerusalem was, to some extent, an outgrowth of these varied reactions to the assimilative pressures of Hellenism. The early decades of the second century BC were characterized by ever-increasing rivalry and discord among prominent families in Jerusalem's religious leadership, especially the two main families, the Tobiads and Oniads, who often vied for control of the high priestly office in the Jerusalem temple (see Hayes and Mandell, 1-2, 47). Conflicts among such families, as well as numerous other groups and factions, were not only political and religious but also socioeconomic, as upper-class, elite families struggled to secure power over the resources represented by the city of Jerusalem and its temple (Kessler, 162).

The general course of events under Antiochus IV Epiphanes between 175 and 164 BC is well established, although many of the details remain obscure (see Kessler, 159). In the years leading up to and including Antiochus's accession, various figures in Jerusalem vied for the high priesthood, often representing different reactions to the pressures of assimilation to Hellenism and frequently bribing their way into office by promising to make increased funds available to the Seleucid emperor. Around 175 BC, Jason, the brother of the current high priest Onias III, bribed Antiochus IV for the high priesthood, marking the turning point after which the Greek emperor would often intervene directly in the city's religious and political leadership (Greenspoon, 326). Jason embraced Jewish assimilation into Hellenism and established in Jerusalem a Greek-style "gymnasium," a social institution for the physical and intellectual training of Greek citizens (Levine, 237). Just a few years later (c. 170 bc), Jason was deposed when Menelaus bribed Antiochus IV for appointment to the high priesthood. At home, Menelaus, who did not come from the traditional Oniad family of Jerusalem high priests, may have been a polarizing figure, as the Jewish population became increasingly divided between those who embraced Seleucid rule and Jerusalem's increasing Hellenism and those who remained more traditional in the face of such cultural modernizations. The former high priest Onias III, perhaps a figurehead for resistance, was murdered in these years, apparently at Menelaus's direction (see Dan 9:26). Menelaus also experienced increased economic conflict with both his Seleucid overlords and his own population, as his promises of significant payments to the emperor led to increased use of temple resources and local taxation (Greenspoon, 327).

In the broader geopolitical context, the turning point for Jerusalem came in 169 bc, when Antiochus IV came to Jerusalem and took large amounts of gold and silver from the temple on his way home from a victorious campaign against the Ptolemies in Egypt. About a year later (c. 168 bc), Antiochus again invaded Egypt. On the brink of victory, however, the Romans exerted their hegemony, ordering Antiochus to leave Egypt, perhaps in a state of humiliation at the sudden reminder of his ultimate subservience. Although the connections, if any, between the events remain unclear, chaos broke out in Jerusalem around this same time, as the former high priest Jason led a small force into the city in an attempt to displace Menelaus. These occurrences touched off a series of events over the next year that resulted in Menelaus's power being secured in Jerusalem but led to direct hostility between the Jews and their Seleucid rulers (see Greenspoon, 328). Sources such as Daniel 7–12 and 1–2 Maccabees allow for a secure reconstruction of only the general outline of events, which included the removal of Jerusalem's defensive walls, the establishment of a citadel in the city that housed soldiers and officials loyal to the Seleucids, and an increase in taxation. Most importantly, at some point Antiochus IV effectively outlawed, perhaps through a royal edict (see 1 Macc 1:41–51; 2 Macc 6:1–11; but see Hayes and Mandell, 66– 67), Jewish religious practices and traditions such as Sabbath and circumcision. The Jerusalem temple became a worship site for the Greek god Zeus Olympius, complete with an altar to Zeus and statues of Greek gods (Greenspoon, 328). According to ancient Jewish sources (1 Macc 1:54–57; Josephus, Ant. 12.253), these events reached their negative climax in the month of Kislev (December) 167 bc, when a pig was sacrificed on the altar of burnt offerings in the temple, an act described in Daniel as the “abomination that desolates” (Dan 9:27; see also Dan 11:31; 12:11; 1 Macc 1:54).

Within this general course of events, however, much remains unclear, including who primarily initiated these developments and how various Jewish groups in Jerusalem and elsewhere responded to them. Jewish participation and reactions resist simplification, as some Jews probably supported Antiochus and Menelaus, embracing Hellenism and adapting religious practices in ways perhaps seen by them as faithful to Judaism (see Levine, 239; Greenspoon, 328–29). Scholars especially grapple with the possible motives for Antiochus's hostile actions against Jerusalem and the Jewish religion (see Gruen). Although some ancient legends preserve stories of the king's madness, most interpreters suggest a political and economic motive whereby Antiochus sought to extend his influence after his humiliation in Egypt and, especially, to gather the money and resources demanded by the Romans (Bringmann). In this scenario, the Seleucid king precipitated the turmoil in Jerusalem, and the Jews reacted violently to this oppression. Equally plausible, however, is that the motive for Antiochus's actions lies with the Hellenizing Jewish leaders themselves, especially in the conflict between Menelaus and Jason, who perhaps sought out the king's aggressive intervention for their own purposes (cf. Bickerman; Tcherikover). The hostilities in Jerusalem, then, were not a reaction to the king's actions but rather the catalyst for them, actions that should be understood as a response to the chaos already unfolding in Judea.

Whatever the details, the events in Jerusalem around 167 bc generated an opposition movement that took root in the town of Modein under the leadership of the priest Mattathias and his five sons (see 1 Macc 2:1–68; 3:1–9:22; 2 Macc 8:1–13:26) (Greenspoon, 331). By 164 bc, this Maccabean Revolt, later led by one of Mattathias's sons, Judah or Judas, also called "Maccabeus" (perhaps meaning "hammer" [but see Levine, 239]), drove the Seleucids to a partial compromise (the so-called Peace of Lysias) that allowed the resumption of some Jewish practices but maintained Menelaus's authority and Greek control of the temple. The revolt scored its most significant victory when the Maccabeans regained control of the Jerusalem temple and purified it for renewed ritual use. Jewish tradition dates this event, which became the basis for the Hanukkah ("rededication") holiday, to 25 Kislev 164 BC, exactly three years to the month after the sacrifice of a pig on the temple's altar (1 Macc 4:52) (Greenspoon, 332). Although the conflict between Jews and Greeks would continue, the events of the Maccabean Revolt constitute the last era of Israelite history that is directly relevant to the OT Prophetic Books. Antiochus IV died in battle in the east in November or early December 164 BC (see Hayes and Mandell, 73), not long after the rededication of the temple by the Maccabeans. Neither of these significant events appears explicitly in the book of Daniel (cf. Dan 11:40-45), however, perhaps indicating that the book was completed in the fall of 164 BC, as the writer sought guidance through the political, social, and religious confusion of his day.

JEREMIAH: BOOK OF

This major book of classical prophecy gives an edited presentation of the message and import of the prophet Jeremiah. To this end, it uses poetic and prose oracles, accounts of *visions and symbolic actions (see Sign Acts), prophetic *laments and providentially interpreted historical narratives. It evidently originated among Judean exiles in Babylon by employing texts and traditions relating to Jeremiah's prophetic ministry. It was intended as a theological explanation of the downfall of Judah and subsequent *exile and also as an encouragement to maintain hope for restoration to God's favor and to the *land.

1. Literary Survey.

This long and complex book calls for an initial overview before it is examined in detail.

1.1. A Horizontal Perspective. The double thrust of imminent doom and eventual hope that runs through the book gives the impression of a rollercoaster ride. In an uneven succession of contrasting vantage points, readers are alarmingly taken down long tracks of despair, but at times they are lifted up to heights of hope.

1.1.1. Jeremiah 1; 52. The first and last chapters, which function as prologue and epilogue for the book, cogently embody this double feature of despair and hope. Jeremiah 1:10, in an account of the prophet's call and commissioning, summarizes his messages with a lengthy series of verbs of destruction and a pair of verbs of reconstruction. Jeremiah 52 uses the different exilic experiences of the last two kings of Judah as long and short enacted parables of the nation's past and present doom and future restoration.

1.1.2. Jeremiah 2—10. The book in its present form has been roughly divided into thirds. Jeremiah 10 marks the close of the first part. Its dominant portion, Jeremiah 10:1-16, consists of a triumphant hymn that contrasts omnipotent Yahweh with the ineffectual images of the Babylonian gods, who ultimately must perish. The preceding material in Jeremiah 2—9 is largely a series of oracles of judgment looking ahead to the fall of Jerusalem and subsequent exile. However, it also contains anticipations of post-judgment hope, in Jeremiah 3:12-18 and in the reassuring postscripts in Jeremiah 4:27; 5:10, 18 that judgment will not be total.

1.1.3. Jeremiah 11—33. The hopeful notes struck in the closing four chapters follow a long run of negative material. Yet, its negativity is interrupted by messages of a positive aftermath, notably in Jeremiah 12:14-17; 16:14-21; 23:5-8; 27:10-14.

1.1.4. Jeremiah 34—51. The oracles against the nations in Jeremiah 46—51 amount to virtual oracles of salvation for God's own people, and four of them conclude with brief affirmations of restoration for the nations. Long as this collection of oracles is, it caps the even longer series of grim narratives in Jeremiah 34—45. Once more the book looks round the corner of military defeat, interpreted in terms of divine judgment, toward prospects of eventual hope.

1.2. A Vertical Perspective. Readers of the English text of Jeremiah must appreciate that the present book of Jeremiah is like a stately home that has been added to and updated. The evidence lies in the old Greek version, the Septuagint (LXX), and in the fragments of Hebrew manuscripts found at Qumran that match it. They jointly attest an earlier, shorter Hebrew edition of the book than the standard Hebrew text, the Masoretic Text (MT), which is also represented at Qumran in a proto-Masoretic form and has become the canonical text (see Text and Textual Criticism).

1.2.1. The Structure of the Earlier Text. This text already reflects to a large extent the shape it would eventually take in the later development. It does, however, predominantly display a bipartite, negative structure in which poetic messages of doom and Jeremiah's laments over his persecution in Jeremiah 2–25 are paralleled by prose narratives of Jeremiah's persecution and increasing disaster for Jerusalem and Judah in Jeremiah 26–45. Understandably, the poetic oracles of doom for the nations were squeezed into Jeremiah 25, in accord with that chapter's international flavor. Yet, the earlier text already contains the poetic and positive Jeremiah 30–31 in the second part of the book, appropriately placed next to the story of Jeremiah's symbolic action of territorial hope in Jeremiah 32. In fact, a minor focus on hope is a pervading feature of this text.

1.2.2. The Structure of the Later Text. The text perpetuated in the MT has created a structural shape for the book that gives a larger role to its positive content. It mainly does so by moving the oracles against the nations to the close of the book, before the epilogue, thus establishing a literary parallel to Jeremiah 10 and Jeremiah 30–33. Other new features develop this change. The positive ending to the Elam oracle in Jeremiah 49:39 has been complemented with similar additions to three other oracles at Jeremiah 46:26b; 48:47; 49:6. Moreover, the parallel structuring has been enhanced by repeating in Jeremiah 30:10–11 the oracle of salvation for Israel at Jeremiah 46:27–28. Already in the earlier text the hymn of Jeremiah 10:12–16 had been reused in Jeremiah 51:15–19. The later text has built upon the positive pointers present in its predecessor and given them a greater role.

2. Historical Framework.

There are a number of pathways and recurring landmarks that must be explored to explain the book of Jeremiah adequately in its own terms. The book urges us to begin with history.

2.1. The Superscription. The superscription in Jeremiah 1:1–3 summarizes Jeremiah's ministry as extending from the thirteenth year of Josiah's reign over Judah via Jehoiakim's reign as far as the eleventh year of Zedekiah's (i.e., from 627 to 586 BC). There is obvious shorthand here that presupposes that readers can expand it with some basic historical knowledge of their own. This long period encompasses the downfall of the Assyrian Empire, in which Judah was a vassal kingdom, and its replacement by the Babylonian Empire (see Israelite History). The sole mention of the climactic event of "the captivity of Jerusalem" evokes the momentous end of a nation clustered round the twin nuclei of Yahwistic worship and Davidic monarchy that were located in the capital.

2.2. Historical Sequencing. The initial superscription launches a loose chronological framework, largely by means of a series of references to Judean kings. These are lacking from Jeremiah 1:4 to Jeremiah 20, apart from the reference in Jeremiah 3:6 to Josiah's reign, though Jeremiah 2–6 contains material that belongs to the early period of Jeremiah's prophesying. Although Jeremiah 21:1–2 jumps to the attack on Jerusalem late in Zedekiah's reign by the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar, the following series of royal oracles progresses in order from Josiah's short-lived successor Jehoahaz ("Shallum" [Jer 22:11]) to Jehoiakim (Jer 22:18) and his brief successor Jehoiachin ("Coniah" [Jer 22:24]), while Jeremiah 23:6 alludes to Zedekiah by the name "The LORD is my righteousness." Jeremiah 24 also relates to Zedekiah's reign in referring to Jehoiachin's exile in 597 BC as having already occurred (Jer 24:1; cf. Jer 24:8). Jeremiah 25 steps back to the fourth year of Jehoiakim's reign in its review of Jeremiah's twenty-three years of prophesying since 627 BC. Jeremiah 26 stays in Jehoiakim's reign but moves back to his accession year (Jer 26:1). Jeremiah 28 goes on to Zedekiah's accession year (Jer 28:1; the chronological reference in the MT's addition at Jer 27:1 is dubious). Jeremiah 32 progresses to his tenth year (Jer 32:1), where Jeremiah 34 also seems to belong (Jer 34:1). The next two chapters revert to Jehoiakim's reign, to an unspecified portion (Jer 35:1) and then to his fourth and fifth years (Jer 36:1, 9). From Jeremiah 37 to Jeremiah 39 incidents in Zedekiah's fateful last years of Babylonian siege and conquest are narrated (see Jer 37:5; 39:1). Jeremiah 40–44 recounts postwar events, probably up to 582 bc, though Jeremiah 45 briefly reverts to Jehoiakim's fourth year (Jer 45:1). The relatively independent section of oracles against the nations in Jeremiah 46–51 has comparatively few royal references. It does mention in sequence Jehoiakim's fourth year (Jer 46:2) and Zedekiah's accession year (Jer 49:34) and fourth year (Jer 51:59). The historical appendix to the book in Jeremiah 52 singles out the siege of Jerusalem from Zedekiah's ninth to eleventh years (Jer 52:4–5) and its immediate aftermath and then leaps ahead to the exiled King Jehoiachin's thirty-fifth regnal year (i.e., 561 bc). Despite its deviations, the book exhibits substantial evidence of chronological progression as a structural element.

2.3. Two Significant Periods. In both its chronological unfolding and tangential deviations, the book highlights two periods. The more important of the two is the siege and fall of Jerusalem in 588–586 bc. Although Jeremiah 40–44 extend Jeremiah's prophesying beyond that period, there is good reason for the superscription to stop at 586 bc: much of the book's concern belongs to that period both by prediction and in actuality. The other period is Jehoiakim's fourth year. In Jeremiah 25; (35–)36; 45 this time marker is dramatically allowed to disturb the sequencing. Jeremiah 46:2 explains it in terms of Nebuchadnezzar's defeat of the Egyptian army at Carchemish in north Syria (605 bc). It was a watershed event, spelling the final downfall of the old Assyrian Empire by the defeat of Assyria's recent ally Egypt and so the passing of Syria-Palestine into the new Babylonian Empire (cf. 2 Kings 24:7). It meant validating identification for Jeremiah's anonymous premonitions in his earlier, doom-laden "foe from the north" oracles (Jer 4:5–8; 6:1–8, 22–23; 15:12; cf. Jer 1:13–15; 4:15–17; 5:15–17) and so marked the beginning of the end for Judah. In fact, while "the king of Babylon" is first mentioned as the future conqueror of Judah in the literary ordering at Jeremiah 20:4 in an undated passage, the earliest chronological mention of him is at Jeremiah 36:29 in Jehoiakim's fifth year (the references to him in Jer 25, set in Jehoiakim's fourth year, have been introduced in the MT). The focus on two reigns parallels the highlighting of the reigns of Ahaz and Hezekiah in Isaiah 1–39 at Isaiah 7–8; 36–39. However, the book of Jeremiah gives much more coverage to the historical role of the prophet, tracing both reactions of rejection to his message of doom and the outworking of that message.

3. Basic Structure.

Although the book of Jeremiah in its present form reflects a subsequent editorial history that must take the evidence of the LXX and the MT into account (see 7 and 8 below), the eventual additions and other changes have not upset the main presentation in a radical way. For the most part, its basic structure, along with superscriptions, assignments of historical settings and arrangements of material, features early elements of the book. If the chapters of Jeremiah 46–51, which are variously placed in the LXX and the MT, are left out of consideration for now, the book falls into two halves, Jeremiah 2–25 and Jeremiah 26–45, with a prophetic prologue in Jeremiah 1 and a historical epilogue in Jeremiah 52. The first half largely consists of oracles and laments about the coming destruction of Judah and Jerusalem and is mostly undated. The second half mainly features a series of dated biographical narratives relating to Jeremiah in which that destruction is gradually worked out in a historical context of rejection of the prophet and his prophetic messages.

4. Smaller Divisions.

4.1. Literary Blocks. A largely systematic effort has been made in the book to demarcate blocks of material by means of initial oracle reception headings, "A message that Jeremiah received from Yahweh" or, less often, "What Jeremiah received as Yahweh's message" (see Neumann). The headings appear in this role at Jeremiah 1:2; 11:1; 14:1; 18:1; 21:1; 25:1; 30:1; 32:1; 34:1; 40:1. One might have expected such signals elsewhere: at Jeremiah 7:1, where the MT has added it; Jeremiah 26:1, where an oracle reception statement, "this message came from Yahweh," appears instead; Jeremiah 37:1; and Jeremiah 46:1, where the MT has constructed a heading out of the earlier relative clause in Jeremiah 25:13. On the other hand, headings also occur at times within evident blocks, at Jeremiah 34:8; 35:1; 44:1; 45:1 and erratically within Jeremiah 46–51.

4.2. Compositions. Blocks of material appear to fall into groups of compositions, which in turn are arrangements of units, either oracular units set together in a batch or episodes in a larger narrative. For example, the block made up of Jeremiah 21–24 has combined two separate collections of oracular units, a royal collection (Jer 21:11–23:8) and one attacking Jeremiah’s prophetic rivals (Jer 23:9–40). They have been editorially set in a frame, Jeremiah 21:1–10 and Jeremiah 24:1–10. The consequent block has been split into six compositions: Jeremiah 21:1–22:9, which has a key word “fire”; Jeremiah 22:10–30, which features three consecutive reigns; Jeremiah 23:1–8, which gives a positive perspective after earlier negative ones; Jeremiah 23:9–40, a series of poetic denunciations of false prophets; Jeremiah 23:25–40, a pair of prose denunciations; and Jeremiah 24:1–10, a closing oracle vision report. In Jeremiah 22:6 a separate unit has been stitched to the previous one by the conjunction “for.” This editorial device for continuity in terms of elucidation is often used (e.g., Jer 2:20; 4:3, 15; 10:21; 25:15; 30:12). In the narrative block of Jeremiah 34–36, the three chapters represent compositions that incriminatingly demonstrate step by step the rejection of the whole range of divine revelation, given first in an old Torah tradition, then in the legitimate, long-standing prophetic movement that Jeremiah inherited (cf. Jer 28:8), and finally in his own oracles of disaster. The next narrative block, Jeremiah 37–39, reverts to the historical context of Jeremiah 34 with which the previous block commenced. It announces the general rejection of Yahweh’s messages through Jeremiah at the beginning (Jer 37:1–2) and the catastrophe entailed by that rejection at the end (Jer 39:1–10). In between, narratives intertwine the mistreatment of Yahweh’s messenger and the rejection of the messages; the so-called confessions of Jeremiah earlier in the book have a similar function (see 5.7 below). The pace of the block is set by Jeremiah’s loss of freedom. Broached in Jeremiah 37:4, it is used as a structural marker at the close of episodes (Jer 37:16, 21; 38:13, 28; cf. Jer 39:14). The recurring motif serves as a “code”: “The prophet, the word of God, was put away and not heard” (Holt, 164). The imprisonment of Jeremiah, like Herod’s incarceration of John the Baptist (Lk 3:19–20), was the final proof of opposition to God. One can agree with much of W. McKane’s elaboration of a rolling corpus underlying the book (McKane 1986, l-lxxxiii), but D. Jones has fairly criticized his cardinal view of uncontrolled, haphazard growth on the grounds that it “overlooks the design in the putting together and assembly of originally independent oral units” (Jones, 27).

4.3. Prose Sermons. Organically linked with the arrangement in literary blocks is the presence of so-called prose sermons, which are regularly used to inaugurate blocks, though they also appear elsewhere in the book. L. Stulman has analyzed them, carefully differentiating between the evidence for them in the LXX and the later MT (Stulman 1986). They have solidly literary features: the use of stereotyped formulations, often but by no means always taken from Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomistic History, and quotations from these and other OT books. The sermons appear in Jeremiah 7:1–8:3; 11:1–14; 14:11–16; 18:7–12; 21:5–9; 22:1–5; 25:3–12; 26:3–6; 30:3, 8–9; 32:29–41; 34:8–22; 40:2–3; 44:2–10, 20–23. Prose sermonic language is also a sporadic mark of prose oracles elsewhere (e.g., within Jer 17:19–27; 32:17–25; 35:13–17). In some cases a prose sermon evidently has been constructed out of a particular earlier oracle, while in other cases it summarizes Jeremiah’s perspectives in an adjacent text or elsewhere in the book. In Jeremiah 44 this literary form is employed to give a final summary of his message. The prose sermons appear to be versions of his message written for a later generation. They are “not the firsthand voice of the prophet, but a voice filtered through memory and tradition” (Rosenberg, 188). Their use of distinctive vocabulary outside the main Deuteronomistic tradition (see Bright, 25–27) seems to indicate that they stand on the fringe of that tradition, though strongly influenced by its style and perspectives.

5. Dominant Genres.

The book of Jeremiah has used a variety of genres to communicate its message. Recognition of these cultural conventions in a particular text helps readers to engage with it by fostering expectations about its particular function and flow.

5.1. Oracles of Disaster. Such oracles, both in poetry and prose, make up most of the book. Many of them preface the announcement of disaster with a reason for it, while the announcement usually appears in the double form of a divine intervention in the human situation and the dire repercussions of that intervention. A simple example occurs in the mixed prose and poetry of Jeremiah 11:21-23: "Concerning the men from Anathoth who have designs on your life. . . . Look, I am going to deal with them. Their young men will die by the sword, their sons and daughters will die of famine, and they will have no survivors." The reason sometimes has its blameworthiness accentuated by a contrast motif, as in Jeremiah 2:21: "Yet it was I who planted you as a red grape vine, wholly from true seed." In Jeremiah 2:1-3 a whole unit is devoted to a contrast motif, as a preface to subsequent descriptions of the degeneration of God's people and consequent divine reprisals. The beginning of the oracle of disaster may be expanded by attention-grabbing features, such as questions, as in Jeremiah 2:23; 5:7; 8:4-5; 18:13-14, or imperatives, as in Jeremiah 3:2; 5:10, 20-21; 7:21; 22:20.

The whole oracle or only its announcement is frequently introduced by a quotation formula of the type "Here is what Yahweh said," indicating that the prophet is proclaiming the divine word. At times these formulas are used in what appears on other grounds to be editorial contexts, so that they represent not Jeremiah's speaking to his constituency but literary elaboration for the book's hearers or readers, legitimating what follows as divinely inspired and treating its textual nature as a means of public transmission (Jer 3:16; 12:14; 24:5, 8; 26:2; 30:2; 32:36; 33:10, 12). The formulas similarly appear in material added in the MT, at Jeremiah 33:14, 17, 20, 25. Unless this phenomenon is to be regarded as purely literary, readers are meant to consider the editors either as prophets in their own right or citing later prophetic oracles. Another type of quotation formula, "declared Yahweh," can also mark the opening of divine speech, though it follows the first phrase or clause. More often it is used to signal the end of a unit or section. The MT frequently adds it for delimitation purposes.

Other, more general introductory formulas are the oracle reception heading and the oracle reception statement (see 4.1 above). A recurring peculiarity of the book, one that has perplexed readers and commentators alike in their failure to recognize it, is that introductory oracular formulas of various kinds can have an advance, anticipatory role, alerting the reader to a divine oracle to be cited later in the passage (Allen 2008a, 5). They occur at Jeremiah 9:17; 14:1, 17; 17:5; 25:1; 30:5; 31:2, 10, 15; 32:1, 14; 40:1; 45:2; 48:40; 50:33. For instance, the heading for the composition of Jeremiah 14:1-16 announces the oracle in Jeremiah 14:10, while the heading to the next composition in Jeremiah 14:17 looks beyond the first unit of Jeremiah 14:17-22 to the oracular units in Jeremiah 15:1-4 and 15:4-9.

5.2. Disputations. A disputation with the basic elements of a thesis, dispute and counterthesis has been discovered in other prophetic books (Murray). There are a strikingly large number of them in Jeremiah, and recognition of them yields exegetical insights. They appear in Jeremiah 2:23-25; 3:1-5; 8:8-9; 18:6; 28:2-4, 6-9, 14; 33:23-26; 37:9-10; 42:13-18; 44:1-30; 45:3-5a; 48:14-17 (Allen 2008b). They are combined with oracles of disaster, widening their perspective by citing an opposing viewpoint and arguing against it. In Jeremiah 8:8-9, for instance, the disputation acts as a bridge, underscoring reasons for coming disaster and already moving over to announce a form the disaster was to take: "How can you say, 'We are wise because we have in our possession Yahweh's torah'? In fact, look, it has been transformed into a falsehood by the false pen of scribes. The 'wise' will be humiliated, defeated and captured. Look, Yahweh's message they have rejected—so what kind of wisdom can they have?" The disputation is over wisdom. The people's attitude cited at the outset is a thesis that is incorporated into the dispute, while the final line is the counterthesis. The disputed thesis and the counterthesis match in their contemptuous questions and echo of "wise" by "wisdom." The two-pronged development of the dispute is marked by the repetition of "look."

In Jeremiah 28 the narrative of the confrontation between Hananiah and Jeremiah as rival prophets of Yahweh is enhanced by proceeding on the lines of a disputation that moves from speech to speech in a developing plot. Hananiah engages in a symbolic action, which Jeremiah opposes by launching another genre, a disputation. His interruption of Hananiah's attempt to move from interpretation to action in Jeremiah 28:6-9 represents a dispute that downgrades his rival's divinely attributed speech in Jeremiah 28:2-4 to a thesis that must be challenged. The counterthesis appears within a divine speech, at Jeremiah

28:14. The direct speech before and after Jeremiah 28:14 rounds off the dispute. The MT has recognized the symmetry of thesis and counterthesis in Jeremiah 28:2-4 and Jeremiah 28:14 by adding “Almighty, Israel’s God” to “Yahweh” in their initial quotation formulas, while leaving the other formulas in Jeremiah 28:13 and Jeremiah 28:16 unexpanded.

5.3. Proclamations of Salvation. Hananiah’s prophetic speech in Jeremiah 28:2-4 is actually a proclamation of salvation. In principle, this genre is a happy counterpart to the announcement of punishment in the oracle of disaster, but it occurs much less often in the book. It follows the same pattern of divine intention and human consequences, but now in positive terms. Examples are especially abundant in the block of Jeremiah 30—31, including Jeremiah 30:18-22; 31:4-6, 8-9, 31-34.

5.4. Symbolic Actions. Hananiah’s speech was meant to introduce the performance of his symbolic action in Jeremiah 28:10. The rest of the symbolic actions (see Sign Acts) in the book are performed by Jeremiah or under his auspices (see Friebe). Reports of symbolic actions typically are written in the first person and generally consist of three parts: divine command, prophetic performance in public, and divine interpretation, which takes the form of an announcement of disaster or a proclamation of salvation. Such actions were carried out by prophets as a dramatic means of reinforcing the divine message.

5.4.1. Jeremiah 13:1-11. This action, which involves the spoiling of a linen sash, lacks a public performance, so that the communication lies solely in the written report. It warns of coming ruin for Judah and Jerusalem, despite their prestigious tradition.

5.4.2. Jeremiah 16:1-9. This report, which also lacks the element of prophetic performance, relates to a series of symbolic actions that represent a refraining from normal activities: marriage, funeral observances and attending the marriages of others. By these means Jeremiah was to be a witness to the coming disaster that would sweep aside such cultural norms.

5.4.3. Jeremiah 19:1-13. The breaking of a jug basically enacts before a selected group of witnesses the imminent destruction of Jerusalem because of the pagan worship carried on there. The performance of the action is not reported, though Jeremiah 19:14 assumes it.

5.4.4. Jeremiah 27—28. The prophetic conflict between Jeremiah and his prophetic rivals involves symbolic actions. He is commanded to make six wooden yokes, wear one, and distribute the rest to foreign delegates who had come to Jerusalem to plan secession from Babylonian hegemony. The message was that under God, Babylonian control of the west would end no time soon, and so submission was the only constructive option. A statement of the performance of the action is lacking, but Jeremiah 28:10 presupposes that Jeremiah was wearing his yoke. Hananiah’s counteraction of breaking the yoke has a positive purpose, and so the divine interpretation features a proclamation of salvation. The rare lack of the element of a precise divine command to engage in it, for which the specially formulated Jeremiah 51:59-64 provides the only parallel in the book, appears to sound a warning to readers, who earlier have read in Jeremiah 27:2-3 such an instruction for Jeremiah’s own action, not to take it at face value.

5.4.5. Jeremiah 32:6-15. This positive symbolic action is discussed in 6.4 below. The initial element of a divine command is rhetorically delayed until it is reported in Jeremiah 32:25.

5.4.6. Jeremiah 35:1-19. The symbolic action of offering wine to the teetotal Rechabites, who predictably refuse it as contrary to their traditional principles, is used to contrast the failure of Judah to comply with God’s long-term prophetic revelation.

5.4.7. Jeremiah 43:8-13. In Tahpanhes, an Egyptian frontier town, Jeremiah receives a divine command to engage in a symbolic action in the presence of some of the Judean refugees who have brought him there, and to proclaim its meaning in an announcement of disaster. The report of its performance is not given, presumably to keep the focus on the interpretation. The action predicted the extension of Babylon’s power to Egypt. Unfortunately, the role of the stones in the action is not clear. Were the stones to be buried to mark the spot where Nebuchadnezzar’s throne was to be set (NRSV, NIV)? Or, covered with a mortar skim, were they to form a dais for the throne (REB, NJPS)?

5.4.8. Jeremiah 51:59-64. Elsewhere in the book Yahweh has commissioned Jeremiah to perform a symbolic action. In this case, however, Jeremiah delegates somebody else, who will be present at the place designated for the action. Nevertheless, the assignment of the task of sinking in the Euphrates a scroll containing oracles against Babylon as a forecast of Babylon's own doom evidently goes back to Yahweh's own command, as the divine "I" in Jeremiah 51:64 intimates. In this commissioning report, Jeremiah functions as the intermediary of the divine command, and there is no room for mention of the performance.

5.5. Visions. A prophetic *vision is one of the vehicles of communication between Yahweh and the prophet. There are seven reports of visions in the book, all of them autobiographical, as personal reports of private experiences. Most of them are oracle visions, in which a visionary experience provides the occasion for an oracular utterance. Most of them also involve natural sights to which Yahweh draws Jeremiah's attention and attaches symbolic meanings.

5.5.1 Jeremiah 1:11-12. This report supplements the call and commissioning report in Jeremiah 1:4-10 and functions as a confirmatory sign. The attention-drawing question-and-answer format is a standard one in vision reports (cf. Jer 24:1-3; Amos 7:7-9). Here it involves word play in that the Hebrew for "almond" sounds like the verb "to be alert" (cf. Amos 8:1-2), so that the point of the question is to make Jeremiah pronounce the word as a clue to the meaning. Yahweh promises ("I am going to be alert"; cf. kjv: "I will hasten") providential alertness over fulfilling the messages given now in principle to the prophet and to be individually given in the future.

5.5.2 Jeremiah 1:13-19. This vision report has the more usual role in prophetic literature of leading into an explanatory oracle. It appears to launch a fresh commissioning that presupposes a period of prophetic ministry. The overlap of Jeremiah 1:18-19 with Yahweh's answer to the prophet's lament in Jeremiah 15:20, along with the repetition of "from the north" in Jeremiah 15:12, suggests that a later situation is in view (see Lundbom 1995). Now the imagery features a metaphor that uses a key word, as in Amos 7:7. Yahweh calls Jeremiah's attention to a cooking pot happening to slip in a particular direction on the stones round the fire and interprets the incident in terms of military invasion from the north against the apostate people of Judah. Jeremiah is given reassuring and challenging exhortations to maintain his ministry. This report of catastrophe for Judah introduces the main theme of the book.

5.5.3. Jeremiah 4:19-31. Three reports of visions are clustered in Jeremiah 4:19-22, 23-28, 31. All of these visions feature Jeremiah's psychic perception of dramatic scenes of future destruction. The first two conclude with divine oracles and involve the whole country (Jer 5:20, 27). The initial report has both auditory and visual aspects of battle scenes, for which the closing oracle supplies the reason. The second one gives a vivid description of total devastation, which an oracle explains that Yahweh is to bring about. The third report, at the end of the unit of Jeremiah 4:29-31, is both auditory and visual like the first, but it envisions Jerusalem's coming destruction as a woman in her death throes.

5.5.4. Jeremiah 24. This vision report, like the ones in Jeremiah 1:11-19, features Yahweh's drawing attention to a scene, an answered question, and a closing oracle in Jeremiah 24:4-10, which from Jeremiah 24:6 onwards is pervaded with prose sermonic language that elaborates its importance. Because two opposing entities are involved, the oracle combines a proclamation of salvation and an announcement of disaster. The reported scene features two baskets of figs placed as firstfruits in the temple area and awaiting a priestly decisions about their acceptability. They are interpreted in terms of good or bad prospects for the deported Jehoiachin and the reigning Zedekiah and their associates respectively (see 6.3 below).

5.5.5. Jeremiah 38:21-23. This report lacks an oracle. Divine agency is indicated by the introductory "this is the message Yahweh caused me to see," so that the report itself conveys the message. The visionary and auditory vision report is part of a longer speech that the prophet addresses to Zedekiah. It communicates a potential preview of the royal harem being captured and singing a taunt song about the king's desertion.

5.6. Dirges. One would expect to find expressions of grief in a book largely devoted to the downfall of Jerusalem and Judah. One way it is expressed in the OT is in terms of a dirge or lamentation that, along with nonvocal mourning rituals, was primarily associated with death but could be extended to other experiences of disaster. In the brief form of a cry "Alas!" a dirge features literally in the divine denial of a proper funeral for Jehoiakim (Jer 22:18-19) and forecast of an honorable one for Zedekiah (Jer 34:5). But mainly in the book such lamentation is associated more widely with the great disaster to come. Whereas prayer *laments brought a crisis to Yahweh for help, as in the communal and individual laments in the Psalter, the dirge accepted the inevitability of a crisis as a lost cause. However, in Jeremiah 30:15, Rachel's postjudgment dirge over her exiled children receives a positive divine answer in Jeremiah 30:16-17, as if to a lament—something that the matriarch never imagined to be possible. Occasionally a form or tone of a dirge is employed simply to convey the magnitude of the disaster in view. This appears to be the case in Jeremiah 30:7, with its initial "Alas" and in Jeremiah 47:2 (cf. Jer 47:5), where wailing is described as a reaction to coming invasion. In Jeremiah 48:31-32, 36, in the course of a passage borrowed from Isaiah 16:7-11, the intense sympathy of the speaker similarly appears to be an emotional means of registering the overwhelming nature of Moab's fate.

5.6.1. Anticipatory Dirges. In the place of oracles of disaster or in order to reinforce them, Jeremiah sometimes announces future calamity by calling on the Judean community to anticipate it by engaging in national mourning. Thus, in Jeremiah 4:5-8 there is a summons to mourn coming enemy invasion, which is despairingly interpreted in terms of Yahweh's inevitable wrath. A similar call is issued in Jeremiah 6:26, to mourn "as if for an only son," in reaction to the invading foe from the north. The prose sermon in Jeremiah 7 picks up this summons in a snatch of poetry and explains it in terms of Yahweh's rejection of "a generation that deserves his wrath" (Jer 7:29). On a broader canvas, the kings of foreign nations are urged to mourn in advance over inevitable invasion (Jer 25:34-35). A particular example occurs in Jeremiah 49:3, where in Rabbah, the capital of Ammon, its womenfolk or satellite villages are summoned to engage in mourning for the coming exile of their god and priests.

5.6.2. Dirges and Laments Polarized. The genre of prayer lament stays in the field of grief but goes a giant step further by turning to God for help. In Jeremiah 8:18—9:1 the people's lament is strikingly mingled with Jeremiah's own heartfelt mourning in the mood of a funeral lamentation that grieves hopelessly over inexorable coming disaster. His tone is like Jesus' weeping over Jerusalem's inevitable fall in Luke 19:41-44. The prophet was tragically aware that the people's prayer would go unanswered. This bitter truth is made clear in a pair of similar passages within the compositions of Jeremiah 14:1-16; 14:17—15:9. In Jeremiah 14:7-9 a communal lament over a drought features such psalm lament elements as acknowledgment of sins, petitions to Yahweh for help, and also accusing quotations that turn the lament into a strident complaint (see 5.7.6 below), accusing Yahweh of lack of covenant commitment and of failing to intervene in power. The sequel in Jeremiah 14:10, 11-12 reports divine rejections of the community's appeal. Jeremiah 14:17-18 records Jeremiah's acute reaction to a military disaster in the tones of a dirge. Over against his despairing reaction is set the people's optimistic prayer lament, which contains the proper elements of a description of the crisis, acknowledgment of sins, petitions and a backing affirmation of faith. Of the two parties, the prophet had read the divine mind correctly. His response anticipates the divine no of Jeremiah 15:1-4, which Jeremiah 15:5-9 reinforces. Mention may also be made of Jeremiah 10:19-20, 23-25, where only portions of a prayer lament appear, but they are set in a context of disaster that no such lament can avert. A collective first-person speaker engages in a lament that moves with formal propriety from description of crisis to affirmation of faith and petition. But the lament is spoken in vain and receives no answer. Jeremiah himself was a theological realist who knew that judgment had to come, and so only a dirge was appropriate as an expression of anticipatory grief. Likewise, in response to the recital of Jeremiah's oracles of doom, the narrator was disappointed that the hearers did not resort to the dirge-related behavior of tearing their clothes (Jer 36:24).

5.6.3. Mocking Dirges. A dirge can be used in a tone of mockery to celebrate the justice of well-deserved punishment. In Jeremiah 38:22 a dirge functions as a taunt song that describes the desertion of Zedekiah's erstwhile supporters. It uses the 3 + 2 meter often associated with a poetic dirge. All the other examples in the book occur in Jeremiah 48; 50, in the oracles against Moab and Babylon. In Jeremiah 48:1-2 the cry "Alas" is combined with a report of the loss of Moab's glorious past. Such reversal is typical of a dirge. In a call to lamentation in Jeremiah 48:17 an even more typical usage occurs, the combination of “How” and a note of reversal (cf. 2 Sam 1:19, 25, 27). Some of these elements recur in the lamentation of Jeremiah 48:39. In Jeremiah 48:46, a passage added in the MT from Numbers 21:29, an ironical use of “Alas” turns Moab’s downfall into a matter of exultation. Jeremiah 50:23 features the same combination of “How” and reversal of fortunes that appeared in Jeremiah 48:17, while in Jeremiah 50:27b “Alas” launches a mock lamentation over Babylon’s leaders.

5.7. Jeremiah’s Laments. Interspersed in Jeremiah 11—20 is a series of eight laments, cries for God’s help that Jeremiah utters in anguish. “There is no compelling reason not to place them within the prophet’s ministry” (Smith, xviii). They are traditionally known as “confessions,” though neither confession of sinning nor confession of divine praise characterizes them. They are in one respect like Augustine’s spiritual biography, called Confessions, in that they feature the inner life of the prophet, and so the label has stuck. However, they reveal little biographical information about the prophet, only specifying a home village setting for the first lament (Jer 11:21, 23) and family conflict for the second (Jer 12:6). The narrative of Jeremiah’s public punishment in Jeremiah 20:1-6 that precedes the seventh lament is intended merely as a typical example of how the prophet was persecuted rather than as the actual background of the lament. The other five laments lack any biographical context. What, then, is their purpose? Jeremiah functions in these laments as “the paradigmatic illustration of the degree of total national rejection of the message of the prophets” (Clements, 114). So they are meant to show the lengths to which Judah’s rejection of Yahweh, who had commissioned Jeremiah, went and to be a measure of that rejection. God’s people rejected both the divine messages given through Jeremiah and the prophetic messenger. As the poster boy for the people’s rejection of God, the prophet went through gut-wrenching experiences that he could not stand. The laments are his cries of pain, his garden of Gethsemane experience, corresponding to the anguished prayer of Jesus, “Abba, Father, for you all things are possible. Remove this cup from me” (Mk 14:36). They also parallel Jesus’ cry of dereliction on the cross, “My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?” (Mk 15:34).

His laments reflect the tradition of individual laments in the Psalter, adapted to express the prophetic aspect of Jeremiah’s own suffering (Baumgartner).

It is important to perceive the literary contexts in which the laments have been placed. Presumably, they once formed a distinct collection, but now they have been dovetailed in pairs or singly into Jeremiah 11—20. The first four make up two pairs and have divine answers appended (Jer 11:18-23; 12:1-6; 15:10-14, 15-21), while the last two (Jer 20:7-13, 14-18) are also placed together. The fifth and sixth (Jer 17:14-18; 18:19-23) stand by themselves. The laments form constituent parts of three blocks of material, Jeremiah 11—13; 14—17; 18—20. They have been positioned with care. The first pair appears near the beginning of the first block, the second pair and the fifth lament come at the close of the first and second halves of the second block, while the sixth and the last two similarly close the twin compositions of the third block. These arrangements indicate the compositional importance of the laments.

5.7.1. Jeremiah 11:18-12:6. In the first block of five compositions, the initial pair of laments makes up a second composition that follows the first, Jeremiah 11:1-17. While the first composition deplores the breaking of the Torah covenant, this second one features Jeremiah as exemplar of the rejection of prophecy. The slighting of the double divine revelation of Torah and prophecy, which develops a joint motif of Jeremiah’s prophesying in Jeremiah 6:16-17 and of the prose sermon of Jeremiah 7 at Jeremiah 7:22-27, constitutes a powerful indictment of Judah.

5.7.2. Jeremiah 15:10-21. Relatively early in the second block, Jeremiah 14—17, this pair of answered laments forms a third composition that presents the people’s rejection of the prophet as Yahweh’s agent (“for your sake” [Jer 15:15]). Jeremiah’s own laments have been woven into the block’s issue of the prophet’s dirges versus the people’s laments (see 5.6.2 above). His answered prayers contrast with the people’s unanswered prayers in the first two compositions, Jeremiah 14:1-16; 14:17—15:5. Yahweh had in turn “rejected” the people, as they feared (Jer 14:19). Prophet and people stood respectively on either side of a great divide, for or against Yahweh and headed for deliverance or doom.

5.7.3. Jeremiah 17:14-18. The lament near the close of the block is the first unit of a two-unit composition, Jeremiah 17:14-27. The two units share the phrase “the word of the LORD” (Jer 17:15, 20). The lament bemoans the belittling of the prophetic message, while the next unit, Jeremiah 17:19-27, supplies an illustration of that message, which features neglect of the Torah principle of Sabbath observance. Once more, both Torah and prophecy were rejected.

5.7.4. Jeremiah 18:19-23. In the third block, Jeremiah 18—20, the sixth lament closes the first of two compositions, Jeremiah 18:1-23; 19:1-20:18. It makes up most of its third unit, Jeremiah 18:18-23, and reflects the community’s rejection of Yahweh via the prophet’s rejection. Ironically, Jeremiah is demonized, from the community’s warped perspective, as the enemy of not only priestly Torah but also prophetic revelation and sapiential instruction, and so needing to be silenced (Jer 18:18). At the center of the overall block, in Jeremiah 19:15, stands an interpretive divine statement that sheds light back onto this lament and forward to the final pair in Jeremiah 20:7-18. It grounds coming national punishment in the refusal to listen to Yahweh’s prophetic messages. The statement follows an indictment of pagan worship, the worship of “other gods” (Jer 19:4), implicitly in defiance of the Torah. Again Yahweh’s double revelation had been ominously rejected.

5.7.5. Jeremiah 20:7-18. This final pair of laments comes on the heels of a narrative that illustrates refusal to listen to Yahweh’s prophetic messages by persecuting Jeremiah as Yahweh’s messenger (Jer 20:1-6). The former of the pair, in Jeremiah 20:7-13, mirrors in graphic and emotional terms the personal anguish such rejection brought to Jeremiah, while it also broaches the vindication that the eventual fulfillment of his message would bring. The second of the two, in Jeremiah 20:14-18, underlines the overall theme of rejection by portraying the nadir of suffering to which the prophet descended. So it also constitutes further justification for the overall message of divine retribution.

5.7.6. Complaint Elements. A striking feature of Jeremiah’s laments is that they adopt at times the shriller form of a complaint against Yahweh. Scholars often use lament and complaint interchangeably in Psalms study, but a good case can be made for reserving the latter term for a subtype of prayer lament in the psalms that combines its appeals for help with charges against God (see Broyles). It goes beyond the persuasive arguments for help used in an ordinary lament and employs accusatory arguments against God. Grief and anger are attested psychological companions; accordingly, at times the prophet’s laments turn not merely against his human opponents but against Yahweh. Complaint elements appear in four of the eight prayer laments of Jeremiah: the bewildered and challenging questions “Why?” in Jeremiah 12:1; 15:18a; 20:18, the question “How long?” in Jeremiah 12:4 that presupposes endurance strained beyond reasonable limits, and direct accusations of God in Jeremiah 15:18b for failing to help Jeremiah and in Jeremiah 20:7 for actively siding with his persecutors. Such elements stay within the bounds of traditional faith according to the OT. They are an honest measure of the horrendous stress that the prophet suffered.

6. Some Elements of Hope.

The dominant message of the book is the interpretation of Judah’s downfall through military defeat and exile in terms of a theology of *retribution for religious and moral failings. There is a replay of this scenario in Jeremiah 40—44, where survivors in the homeland waste their opportunity to claim the prophet’s positive offer to live in Judah subject to Babylonian rule (Jer 27:11), for which Jeremiah himself became a role model (Jer 40:2b-3; cf. Jer 40:9, 15, which echo Jer 27:15; 42:10-12). Nevertheless, hope beyond judgment does play a minor but real part in the overall book, grounded in the prophet’s own divinely guided expectations.

6.1. “To Build and to Plant.” This element in the account of the prophetic call and first commissioning of Jeremiah at Jeremiah 1:10 within Jeremiah 1:4-12 posits from the start a post-judgment promise for Judah and for other nations. The promise aligns with material in Jeremiah 2—6, in which Hosea’s influence on the prophet is evident. Hosea’s message looked beyond the northern kingdom’s destruction to expectations of eventual renewal and restoration. Jeremiah became the heir of this positive tradition, though readers are not told when this privately revealed element was promulgated. The phrase “to build and to plant” is a programmatic fanfare for two themes of the book. First, it is echoed in postjudgment promises to God's people in Jeremiah 24:6; 31:28; 42:10, and more generally announces the positive future for Judah or for Israel and Judah developed later in the book. Second, it is applied to the nations, tentatively in Jeremiah 12:17; 18:9. More generally, again, it prepares for their eventual worship in Jerusalem in Jeremiah 3:17, potential blessing in Jeremiah 4:2, and their own categorical affirmation of faith in Jeremiah 16:19-21, as well as the individual restoration of Elam's fortunes in Jeremiah 49:39 and, in the MT, of those of Egypt, Moab and Ammon in Jeremiah 46:26; 48:47; 49:6.

6.2. Jeremiah 3:12-14. Even more closely attuned to Hosea's precedent is a pair of oracles in Jeremiah 3:12-14 addressed by Jeremiah to nondeported members of the former northern kingdom. In the former oracle the invitation to them to return to Yahweh's favor, denied to Judah in Jeremiah 3:1-5, serves contextually as a snub to reinforce Judah's guilt. The latter oracle has been blended with a wider positive invitation to Judah in Jeremiah 3:15-18, evidently at an editorial stage that presupposes the experience of judgment as lying in the past, but it carries its own prophetic authority ("says the LORD" [Jer 3:16]).

6.3. "Seventy Years." In the block of Jeremiah 26—29 the issue of true versus false prophecy comes to the fore. The crucial issue was whether Judah's final downfall, prophesied by Jeremiah but denied by his optimistic rivals, would occur, and accordingly how long the deportation of King Jehoiakim and leading citizens after the Babylonian attack on Jerusalem in 597 BC would last. The issue had already been broached in Jeremiah 24 by means of the vision of good and bad figs, whereby bad prospects for the post-597 BC regime in Judah are declared and reinforced by the promise of good prospects for those already deported. The only path to eventual salvation was an experience of judgment. In Jeremiah 26—29 the issue is raised again in a context of prophetic dispute. It comes to a head in the claim of Jeremiah's archrival that restoration would occur by two years' time (Jer 28:3-4, 11; cf. Jer 27:16, which the MT has clarified by adding "soon"). In Jeremiah's letter to the deportees in Jeremiah 29, his denial takes the impressionistic form of a premonition of "seventy years" of exile (Jer 29:10); the denial is now presented as a hopeful feature for those who are prepared to accept the divine sentence of judgment. In the summarizing prose sermon in Jeremiah 25, the double-edged nature of this premonition concerning the future of God's people is spelled out, negatively (Jer 25:11) and positively (Jer 25:12).

6.4. Purchase of Ancestral Land. Jeremiah 32:6-15 contains an account of the only positive symbolic action in the book, apart from Haniah's in Jeremiah 28. At an earlier stage of the book's development, the chapter, which encompasses Jeremiah's prayer and Yahweh's response, probably capped the intimations of hope in Jeremiah 26—29. During the final siege of Jerusalem, Jeremiah, under detention in the palace grounds, is approached by a relative with a request that he act as a redeemer, the next of kin responsible for buying back land sold outside the family as a result of personal financial stringency (cf. Lev 25:25-28, 48-49). In this case, a preemptive intervention is requested to avoid such a sale. The incident and the drawing up of legal documents are given prophetic value by means of divine revelations reported in Jeremiah 32:6-7, 15. It all becomes a striking expression of eventual hope for the future of God's people in the land.

6.5. Jeremiah 30—31. This literary block picks up and amplifies the intimations of hope in recent chapters and paves the way for Jeremiah's positive symbolic declaration in Jeremiah 32. Probably its position reflects the insertion of the contents of a separate scroll that was part of the Jeremianic tradition. Its nucleus is a series of Jeremiah's early oracles envisioning the return of exiles of the northern kingdom of Israel (Jer 31:2-6, 15-17, 18-20), which are supplemented with a medley of prophetic oracles of hope that appear to be later than Jeremiah's time. In its present setting the block now defines what was to happen after the seventy years of Jeremiah 29:10. The first of the block's compositions, in Jeremiah 30:1—31:1, blatantly matches three times Yahweh's past punishment of the covenant people (Jer 30:5-7, 12-15, 23-24) with their future restoration (Jer 30:8-9 [the MT has added Jer 30:10-11 from Jer 46:27-28], 16-17, 18-21 [supplemented in the MT with Jer 30:22]; 31:1). The God who treated them negatively in the past was as surely to do so positively in the future. Jeremiah 30:23-24 has reused an oracle of the prophet that appears in Jeremiah 23:19-20, and the two earlier negative oracles are evidently his also. The second composition, in Jeremiah 31:2-26, is concerned with resettlement in the land, while the block's third and final composition, in Jeremiah 31:27-40, offers a series of assurances about the future security of the reunited peoples of Judah and Israel, including the promise of a new covenant in Jeremiah 31:31-34 (see 9.5 below).

6.6. The Oracles Against the Nations. These are placed in Jeremiah 46—51 in the MT and in the middle of Jeremiah 25 in the LXX (Jer 25:14—31:33 in LXX editions). Aspects of them will require discussion later (see 7 and 8 below); here their positive role is in view. Collections of oracles against foreign nations are not uncommon in the Prophetic Books, notably in Isaiah 13—23; Ezekiel 25—32. They are a rhetorical mode of communicating to God's own people, even when they address other nations. They have this role in the book of Jeremiah despite the prophet's direct contact with foreign delegates in Jerusalem in Zedekiah's accession year, according to Jeremiah 27. This collection celebrates Yahweh as the Lord of the nations who uses for divine ends the imperial power of Babylon, which is unwittingly subservient to Israel's God. Most of the foreign oracles in Jeremiah 46—49 can be attributed to Jeremiah. Individual oracles have been blended into a collection intended for Judeans living late in the exilic period. An opportunity has been taken to enlarge an earlier collection. Notably, material from elsewhere in the OT has been added in the Moabite anthology of Jeremiah 48:28-47. The Babylonian material in Jeremiah 50:1—51:58 reflects a late exilic setting in its present form, though a nucleus feasibly goes back to Jeremiah, including the pro-Babylonian poem in Jeremiah 51:20-23 (see Bellis, 148-49). The foreign oracles, which are a series of proclamations of disaster, are ultimately vehicles of hope for Judah. They function as a red traffic light that means a green light for Judah in the cross street. Their role as implicit pronouncements of salvation for Yahweh's own people is intermittently confirmed by featuring Israel as a counterpart to the other nations. An oracle of salvation for Israel is appended to the Egyptian material (Jer 46:27-28 [LXX 26:27-28]). Moab's destruction was to be a reprisal for mocking Israel (Jer 48:27 [LXX 31:27]). Ammon's seizing Israelite territory would result in Israel's regaining it (Jer 49:1-2 [LXX 30:17-18]). In the first of the two Babylonian compositions, its disaster is set alongside repatriation for Israel and Judah (Jer 50:4-5, 19, 28 [LXX 27:4-5, 19, 28]), and in the second composition alongside the vindication of God's people (Jer 51:24, 35-36, 50-51 [LXX 28:24, 35-36, 50-51]). Nor is God's people to be the only beneficiary. In the LXX the negative oracle against Elam, which is listed first in that edition, is concluded with a sudden note of reversal, a postjudgment promise of restoration (Jer 25:19 [MT 49:39]). The MT appears to assume that the promise is paradigmatic for other nations, since in its different ordering it not only keeps it at the end of the Elam oracle but also adds such promises to the key oracles against Egypt, Moab and Ammon (Jer 46:26b; 48:47a; 49:6).

7. The Septuagint of Jeremiah.

The complexity of the book of Jeremiah may be gauged from the phenomenon of the LXX. It has a vital role in this book beyond its usual function of being a text-critical witness to an early form of the Hebrew text current in Egypt, from which it was translated between 250 and 150 BC. It represents a literary edition of the book, in the sense of a distinct redactional stage, from which the later edition attested in the MT was developed (see Tov 1985). It has a shorter text than that of the MT by about one-eighth. It lacks certain passages and a large number of individual words and phrases that appear in the later edition. It also places the oracles against the nations (Jer 46—51 in the MT) in the middle of Jeremiah 25 and lists the oracles in a different order.

7.1. The Diversity of Qumran Discoveries. Both editions are represented in Hebrew texts found at Qumran. Fragments of scrolls found in Cave 4, 4Q71 and 4Q72a (both from the first half of the second century BC), attest, though in a scanty way, a short text closely related to that underlying the LXX. Examples of a proto-Masoretic, longer text form of the text have also surfaced, mostly from the same cave: 2Q13 (early first century AD), 4Q70 (early second century BC) and 4Q72 (end of first century BC) (see Baillet 1962; Tov 1997; 2001, 319-27). So the issue is "not a veritas graeca over against a veritas hebraica, but two veritates hebraicae" (de Waard, xxii).

7.2. The Placing of the Oracles Against the Nations. The most striking feature of the edition of the Hebrew text that underlies the LXX is that the oracles in Jeremiah 46—51 of the MT are placed in the middle of Jeremiah 25. The new location is secondary because it interferes with the system of compositional units that is integral to the book. This system has been restored in the MT by its closely related three units of Jeremiah 25:1-14, 15-29, 30-38. The location in the LXX is to be explained by the insertion of an independent scroll of foreign oracles that belonged to the Jeremian tradition. Jeremiah 25:13 was added to prepare for the insertion by introducing “this book” or scroll. The editor reasonably judged that the best place for this important material was within the only part of the overall book that dealt with the nations, Jeremiah 25, and alongside the listing of nations that appears in Jeremiah 25:18-26, which itself was an insertion, made separately and retained in the MT, that breaks the connection between Jeremiah 25:17 and Jeremiah 25:27.

7.3. The Order of the Nations. In the LXX the order is Elam, Egypt, Babylon, Philistines, Edom, Ammon, Arab tribes, Aramaeans and Moab. The MT order is Egypt, Philistines, Moab, Ammon, Edom, Aramaeans, Arab tribes, Elam and Babylon. The priority of Elam is enhanced in the LXX by paradigmatically attaching to it a promise of restoration that the MT has retained and extended (see 6.6 above). Logical justification for the LXX ordering is difficult to find, apart from the placing of Babylon next to Egypt, its fellow world power. The Babylonian material (LXX Jer 27—28; MT Jer 50—51) was originally written on its own scroll, according to Jeremiah 51:60. It is nearly as large as the size of the oracles against the other nations put together. The decision to incorporate it relatively early in the listing of the other scroll was doubtless influenced by another factor, that the editorial value of the combined oracles stated in the preparatory Jeremiah 25:13 was to corroborate the fall of Babylon, to which it makes an oblique reference, and this is what the Babylonian material is all about.

8. The Masoretic Text.

The MT of Jeremiah represents further editing of the text represented in the LXX and in most of the Hebrew texts found at Qumran. It places the oracles against the nations near the end of the book and has made a great number of mainly small, but occasionally larger, additions

(the translation in L. Allen’s 2008 commentary has italicized the evident additions so that they are easily recognizable). This later edition clearly treated the earlier one as a work in progress and sought to improve it in a number of ways. Because the Masoretes adopted this later edition, it received official recognition as canonical. Christian circles, apart from the Greek Orthodox Church, also have so recognized it. E. Tov has classified the changes found in the MT under six categories: text arrangement, additions of headings to oracles, repetitions of sections, additions of new verses and sections, additions of new details, and changes in content (Tov 1985). He has also characterized these features in terms of exegetical clarification. They make a significant contribution to the book, often demonstrating insight into the text. The LXX edition appears to be an adaptation of an earlier one, as the insertion of the oracles against the nations in Jeremiah 25 indicates, so that the MT represents a third edition, if it was carried out as a single piece of work. Enough time must have elapsed between the second and third editions for the second to become established. By the turn of the era, both were known, as the Qumran evidence indicates, although their respective origins were obviously earlier than the earliest extant texts. The dating of the proto-Masoretic edition cannot be ascertained, though the addition of Jeremiah 33:14-26 in the MT has affinity in its pairing of royal and priestly rulers with an early postexilic convention (cf. Hag 1:1; Zech 4). Moreover, its addition of patronymics in Jeremiah 29:21 and of Baruch’s job description in Jeremiah 36:26, 32 indicates knowledge of old traditions. The additions continue to use prose sermon language, borrowing it from sermons already found in the book (Tov 2008, 413-14, 416).

8.1. The Oracles Against the Nations. In the edition adopted by the MT, these oracles have been moved to the back of the book. Evidence is not lacking that the LXX placement, editorial though it was, was an intermediate stage that the MT presupposes. First, Jeremiah 25:13, with its reference to the following scroll of oracles, was left awkwardly isolated. Second, the relative clause that closes Jeremiah 25:13 was made to do double duty by also adapting it as a heading for Jeremiah 46:1, which the MT has added. Third, it also added Jeremiah 25:14 as a stopgap statement that loosely summed up the oracles and specifically alluded to the fall of Babylon by echoing Jeremiah 50:29, 41; it also added “wrongdoing” to Jeremiah 25:12 from Jeremiah 51:6.

8.1.1. The Placement of the Oracles. The oracles have a positive value, primarily by contrasting the nations’ fate explicitly and implicitly with Judah’s fortune and secondarily by the addition of promises of postjudgment restoration to three more of the nations (see 6.6 above). As such, the oracles were placed at the close of the book to form an exuberant expression of future hope as part of the structural pattern reflected in the MT edition (see 8.2 below).

8.1.2. The Order of the Oracles. The ordering in the MT is quite different from that in the LXX (see 7.3 above). If the LXX order is taken as the primary one, it is not difficult to explain most of the differences. Although an early placement of Babylon suited the immediate context, as Jeremiah 25:13 testifies, it was no longer applicable in its new context. In fact, from the standpoint of future expectation, Jeremiah 25:12, vague though it is in its LXX form, indicates that the fall of Babylon celebrated in the Babylonian material was to come after Babylon’s conquest of the other nations attested both in Jeremiah 25:8, 11 and in the oracles pertaining to those nations. After Babylon was duly put at the end, Elam was set before it for both geographical and chronological reasons. Chronology also appears to have played a role in the overall ordering. The Elam oracle belonged to Zedekiah’s accession year (LXX Jer 25:20; MT Jer 49:34). Egypt was associated with Jehoiakim’s fourth year (LXX Jer 26:2; MT Jer 46:2), and Babylon with Zedekiah’s fourth year (LXX Jer 28:59; MT Jer 51:59). Respect for the historical framework of the book in terms of Judean reigns (see 2.2 above) probably constrained the editor behind the MT to reorder the oracles accordingly, so that Elam preceded Babylon and both had to come after Egypt. Then the definition of Jehoiakim’s fourth year in terms of the capture of Carchemish (LXX Jer 26:2; MT Jer 46:2)—one of the two historical events most significant for the book (see 2.3 above)—guaranteed Egypt its pride of place. Moreover, beginning with Egypt now dovetails with the focus on Egypt in Jeremiah 42–44 (LXX 49–51), while the dating in Jeremiah 46:2 nicely coincides with that in Jeremiah 45:1

(LXX 51:31). Philistia was left as Egypt’s minor neighbor in an overall block of Jeremiah 46:1–47:7. The Moabite material was feasibly put next as a second block (Jer 48) because it was the largest of the remaining oracular pieces. Why was Ammon put at the head of a third block, which it formed with the remaining four oracles that now included Elam? Special importance seems to have been attached to Ammon and also to Egypt and Moab. Only in their cases has the MT added promises of restoration at the close of their oracles, to match the preexisting one attached to the Elam oracle (see 6.6 above). Furthermore, only in the oracles of Egypt, Moab and Ammon does Yahweh’s own people feature as a counterweight to these punishable nations (see 6.6 above).

8.2. The Masoretic Macrostructure. The Prophetic Books attest a pattern of moving beyond a major theme of divine judgment to a minor but very significant theme of *salvation that was to follow that judgment (Clements, 191–202). This pattern can sometimes take the form of a structural series, as in the book of Hosea, where each of three literary complexes, Hosea 1–3; 4–11; 12–14, ends on a positive note. There is evidence of sequential patterning in the book of Jeremiah at an early stage. The historical epilogue, Jeremiah 52, in both the LXX and the MT uses 2 Kings 24–25 to cap a long account of Zedekiah’s fate with a short account of the rise in Jehoiachin’s fortunes as a token of hope. On a small scale, Jeremiah’s threefold negative role “to uproot and tear down and destroy” in the prologue of Jeremiah 1 has been matched with a hopeful pair, “to build and plant” (Jer 1:10). Jeremiah 10, in the shorter version attested in the LXX, contains a hymn to Yahweh that maintains Yahweh’s superiority to Babylon’s images and so predicts their downfall (Jer 10:12–16, especially Jer 10:15). It is significant that in the common text of the LXX and the MT Jeremiah 10:12–16 reappears (MT Jer 51:15–19; LXX Jer 28:15–19) as an expression of hope. The insertion of Jeremiah 30–31 in the common text has developed the sketches of a postjudgment positive future in Jeremiah 26–29 and earlier, bolstered Jeremiah’s positive symbolic action in Jeremiah 32 and encouraged its sequel in Jeremiah 33:1–13.

The edition of the book in the MT has made consistent efforts to boost this positive perspective. At times it is done with subtlety. In the epilogue Zedekiah's "bad" behavior is added in the MT at Jeremiah 52:2-3 to contrast with the "good" treatment of Jehoiachin in Jeremiah 52:32 and so suggest the good and bad prospects of the two kings presented in Jeremiah 24. In the prologue the addition of "and demolish" in Jeremiah 1:10 draws further attention to the contrasted long and short series of verbs. More blatantly, the movement of the oracles against the nations to Jeremiah 46—51 has brought a hopeful finale to the book, both explicit and implicit. The addition of Jeremiah 33:14-26 has magnified the salvific complex of Jeremiah 30-33; so too did the copying of the oracle of salvation of Jeremiah 46:27-28 in Jeremiah 30:10-11. As for Jeremiah 10, the hymn to Yahweh's power in Jeremiah 10:12-16 was enlarged by supplementing it with Jeremiah 10:4-8, 10, which spelled doom for other "nations," the key word of the new section. All these changes indicate a refinement of the book's structure. Destruction and eventual reconstruction are now clearly celebrated three times over, in Jeremiah 2—9; 10, in Jeremiah 11—29; 30—33, and in Jeremiah 34—45; 46—51. The duplication of Jeremiah 10:12-16 in Jeremiah 51:15-19, noted above, now enhances the sectional parallelism. The whole book in its present form echoes the pattern of Jeremiah 1:10 and of Jeremiah 52. The earlier arrangement in blocks, compositions and units has been retained, but it has been overlaid with a new focus that, as in the book of Hosea, crowns each third of the book with a message of hope that transcends its relative brevity with a climactic force. What has been lost is the clear-cut division of the book into two halves, the oracular Jeremiah 2—25 and the narrative Jeremiah 26—45, which in the LXX edition had been preserved by incorporating the oracles against the nations near the close of the oracular material. In the new configuration, each of the three conclusions gathers up earlier anticipations in a crescendo of future triumph. The MT form of the text has completed an earlier process by adding to, repeating and rearranging what it inherited.

9. Theology.

The canonical Prophetic Books cluster around a political crisis: the threat and reality of Assyrian and Babylonian domination, resistance to which led to increasing loss of national independence and eventual exile for the divided kingdoms. The books, including Jeremiah (cf. Jer 28:8), reflect an antiestablishment tradition that gave a theological interpretation to the crisis. Five components of the tradition are Israel's initial receipt of covenant grace, its obligation of an appropriate lifestyle and worship, its irresponsibility, its consequent rejection at God's hands, and yet the promise of renewal from God (Allen 1992). What follows here is a sketch of how the book of Jeremiah displays and develops these theological components.

9.1. Israel's Receipt of Covenant Grace. Yahweh's fundamental commitment to Israel as a *covenant nation is summed up in the traditional complex of saving events, from the exodus from Egypt to the occupation of the land (Jer 2:2-3, 6-7; 11:4-5; 16:14; 23:7; 31:2, 32).

9.2. Israel's Obligation. A corresponding commitment for Israel is presented in "the terms of the covenant" at Jeremiah 11:3-5, with reference to the Torah. The Torah tradition is virtually defined as a series of ethical sanctions in Jeremiah 22:3, to which religious ones are added in Jeremiah 7:9. The sanctions are summed up as "the age-old paths" (Jer 6:16; 18:15) and as the moral principles of *"justice" (Jer 5:1; 7:5) and "trustworthiness" (Jer 5:1, 3; 7:28; 9:3).

9.3. Israel's Irresponsibility. Failure to live up to the covenant standards is portrayed as chronic (Jer 2:20; 3:25; 22:21; 32:30-31), deep-seated (Jer 5:3; 13:23; 17:1) and coming to a head in Jeremiah's period (Jer 3:11; 7:26; 16:12). Both social injustice (Jer 9:2-8; 22:13-17) and pagan worship (Jer 2:6-32; 7:30-31) were rife. Supremely, the Davidic monarchy failed in its mandate as a responsible divine agency (Jer 13:18; 21:11—23:2). The situation was exacerbated by popular complacency caused by "false" prophets who insisted on God's unconditional blessing and positive intervention (Jer 6:12-14; 23:9-32; 27:14-18; 28:1-4; 29:24-32). The people's regular rejection of God's true prophets, after rejection of the divine Torah, only increased their guilt (Jer 6:16-19; 7:22-26). Their rejection of Jeremiah, the last of Judah's preexilic prophets, was their crowning *sin (Jer 25:3-7). Jeremiah 34—36 sets out this threefold rejection in sequence (see 4.2 above). In turn, Jeremiah's maltreatment as prophetic messenger is elaborated in his series of laments and in the persecution narratives as the most incriminating evidence of Judah's opposition to its God (see 4.2 and 5.7 above).

9.4. Israel's Rejection by God. Jeremiah was expressly forbidden to engage in the normal prophetic task of interceding on the people's behalf (Jer 7:16; 11:14; cf. 15:1). Moreover, Yahweh removed the covenantal "peace, steadfast love, and compassion" that usually protected them (Jer 16:5). Jeremiah's premonitions of a foe from the north eventually crystallized into Nebuchadnezzar's devastating campaigns and deportations (see 2.3 above), as his prophesying turned inexorably into fulfillment. Such vehement *warfare was a measure of divine anger, in a radical reprisal provoked by Judah's aberrations (Jer 4:5-8; 7:18-20; 21:3-7; 32:28-32, 37; 52:3). The fire of such anger would last "forever" (Jer 17:4). From another perspective, Israel incurred the curse envisioned in the Torah (Jer 11:1-8).

9.5. Israel's Coming Renewal. Jeremiah stands in the tradition of *Hosea that embraced post-judgment hope, and so the merited "forever" of Jeremiah 17:4 is transcended. "Everlasting love" (Jer 31:3) will trump the divine hatred in Jeremiah 12:8 (cf. Hos 9:15; 11:8-9). The prophet's early oracles were positive ones addressed to residents of the old northern kingdom (see 6.2 and 6.5 above), while his symbolic action of redeeming land in Benjamin gloriously challenged the southern kingdom's crisis (see 6.4 above). His very commissioning incorporates a positive future for both Judah and other nations that becomes programmatic for the book (see 6.1 above). That future embraces the revival of Israel's traditional institutions, the Davidic monarchy (Jer 23:5-6) and, alongside it, the Levitical priesthood in the MT's addition at Jeremiah 33:14-22.

This subsection (complementing 6 above) will focus on the proclamation of salvation in Jeremiah 31:31-34, which, beyond its intrinsic significance, has an important role in the NT, notably at 1 Corinthians 11:25 and in the discussion of the quotations at Hebrews 8:8-12; 10:16-17. The NT claims the inauguration of this new covenant and looks forward to its consummation.

9.5.1. A Promise for Israel and Judah. "The house of Israel and the house of Judah" (Jer 31:31) refer to the old political entities, which together make up the theocratic entity of "the house of Israel" in Jeremiah 31:33. The breadth of the promise, embraced also by Ezekiel (Ezek 37:15-23), is consonant with Jeremiah's early oracles and with the literary context (Jer 30:3, 31:1, 18, 27).

9.5.2. Old and New Covenants. The newness develops the "new thing" in Jeremiah 31:22 concerning Israel's spiritual commitment to Yahweh. From a larger perspective, the passage provides a God-given solution to the problems of a broken covenant and a rejected Torah expressed in the prose sermon of Jeremiah 11:1-14. So it complements the promise in Jeremiah 16:14-15; 23:7-8 of a fresh exodus from exile and the Diaspora to a renewed occupation of the land. The proclamation draws a formal contrast between the old covenant and its human breakdown and divine judgment, on the one hand, and its new counterpart and divine undergirding, on the other hand. Despite God's fatherly care, Israel broke the old covenant, and so "I had to show myself their master, says the LORD" (Jer 31:32 NAB). The proclamation looks beyond the completion of that period of reprisal, the radical judgment that occupies most of the book ("after those days" [Jer 31:33; cf. Jer 30:24]).

9.5.3. New Obedience to God's Torah. Here is the essentially new element of the promise. Covenant and Torah are intimately related, as in Jeremiah 11, where "the terms of the covenant" refer to the Torah. Yahweh will do a work of spiritual engineering whereby the Torah is internalized (cf. the "new heart" in Ezek 36:26). The human "heart," as seat of the will, is no longer to be beset by stubbornness, as in Jeremiah 11:8 (and seven other times in Jeremiah). The Torah's requirements will be met by an instinctive response to internal cues rather than to merely external ones. Accordingly, the mutuality of the divine-human covenant will be assured, while at the human level both priestly teaching and family instruction will be rendered obsolete.

9.5.4. Divine Forgiveness. The book of Jeremiah refers to *forgiveness more than any other prophetic book. Here God promises to formally wipe the moral slate clean (cf. Jer 33:8; 50:20). Amnesty is to be the precursor to the new covenantal relationship, once the punishment stated in Jeremiah 31:32 has run its course (cf. Is 40:2; 55:6-7). Formerly, forgiveness was not possible, since reprisal for sinning was regularly deemed necessary (Jer 5:1, 7, 9). In Jeremiah 36:3, as in Isaiah 55:6-7, repentance is a precondition of God's forgiveness. However, in Jeremiah 31:34, as in Jeremiah 31:33, focus is placed on the divine initiative.

10. Purpose.

The book of Jeremiah is like the four Gospels, each of which addresses the particular needs of its constituency and is the product of a generation later than the scenes that it narrates, taking over and faithfully developing oral and written records. Jeremiah still looks forward to the downfall of the Babylonian Empire in 539 BC, while its later oracles read like those of Second Isaiah. The perspective of the book encourages a search for some guiding statements that take a general look back at Jeremiah's period and/or appear to belong to the later time frame of the book's constituency.

10.1. Telling Why. Four similar passages punctuate the first half of the book. They occur with some regularity, in Jeremiah 5:19; 9:12-16; 16:10-13; 22:8-9. They have the same question-and-answer format that looks back to Jeremiah's oracles of disaster as already fulfilled. They ask why the disaster, including the exile in three cases, has happened and supply the same reason: divine retribution for pagan worship. All of them are written in prose sermon style; indeed, the same format occurs in Deuteronomy 29:24-28 and 1 Kings 9:8-9. The prose passages are interspersed among the long series of poetic oracles of disaster and patiently explain to the book's readers the necessity of such drastic measures. In the second half of the book there is a counterpart in Jeremiah 32:21-23, 29b-35, a pair of editorial passages designed to answer Zedekiah's own question "Why?" in Jeremiah 32:3 (see Fretheim, 454).

10.2. Hermeneutical Asides. A short aside seems to occur in the course of Jeremiah 2:31, the appeal "You members of this generation, consider Yahweh's message." The prose appeal set in a poetic context sounds like a homiletical call for hearers of the text to take Jeremiah 2:29-30 seriously, in case they too repudiated divine authority. The Hebrew verb rendered "consider" has been borrowed from appeals in Jeremiah 2:10, 19, 23, which suggests that those too should find contemporary listening ears. A longer call occurs in Jeremiah 9:23-24 in the form of a general exhortation. The call to "know" Yahweh follows Jeremiah's accusation in Jeremiah 9:3, 6 that preexilic Judah's propensity to falsehood, untrustworthiness and deception revealed that they neither knew nor acknowledged their God. From the accusation, which has occurred earlier in the book (Jer 4:22; 5:4; 8:7), is extrapolated a positive spirituality of knowing God that probably has Jeremiah 22:15-16 also in view and certainly echoes virtues valued earlier in the book (Jer 2:2; 4:2; 5:1-5; 7:5; 8:7).

10.3. Babylonian Religion Decried. Not far from the previous example, the direct exhortations in Jeremiah 10:2, 5b not to be intimidated by astrological divination or pagan worship of *idols seem to be addressed to Judean exiles in Babylon, implicitly urging them not to abandon their ancestral faith. The exhortations are accompanied in the intervening verses by a satirical polemic in the Second Isaiah tradition. It is not surprising that the following hymn in Jeremiah 10:12-16, which explicitly contrasts Yahweh and divine images, is reused at Jeremiah 51:15-19 in a Babylonian context, as that seems to be the setting of both passages in Jeremiah 10.

10.4. Contemporary Warnings. The proverb-like generalities that mark most of Jeremiah 17:5-13 leave behind the description of preexilic sinning and its punishment in Jeremiah 17:1-4 and speak of sinning in different terms. The alternatives of curse and blessing in Jeremiah 17:5-8 counsel trust in Yahweh instead of humans. Their reference to the "heart" echoes Jeremiah 17:1 and updates the message. So does the next saying in Jeremiah 17:9-10, which warns of divine punishment for the heart so prone to wickedness. Jeremiah 17:11 names ill-gotten wealth as an example of such sin, while Jeremiah 17:12-13 reiterates the punishment awaiting all those who currently forsake the true God, Yahweh.

10.5. A Trajectory of Hope. Despite the prevalence of messages of doom in the book of Jeremiah, an insistence on postjudgment hope is an essential element. It is difficult to discern at what developmental stage expressions of hope have been grafted into the book when they appear in the common text of the LXX and the MT, since the book itself was written from a post-586 BC perspective. A staccato note can afford a clue to literary adaptation, such as Elam's sudden, unelaborated restoration, extended to three other nations in the MT (see 6.6 above). Another case is the flagrant interruption of announcements of disaster with postjudgment cries of “No, not complete disaster” in Jeremiah 4:27; 5:10, 18, cries that receive their warrant from the late exilic oracle in Jeremiah 46:27-28, to which the MT gives greater prominence by adding it in Jeremiah 30:10-11. As indicated earlier, the common text contains a number of editorial intimations of hope that faithfully develop Jeremiah’s own vision of Yahweh’s will to build and plant after the necessary work of destruction, while the MT has fostered the process further. The completed book never fails to look ahead to the joy that will come in the morning, after the weeping of the night (cf. Ps 30:5). Its readers are meant both to take its grim history to heart and to hold on to its hope.

JEREMIAH: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION

The book of *Jeremiah's extensive biographical sections, the prophet's lamentations over persecution and rejection, his accusations regarding systemic failure, the tragic circumstances of the fall of Jerusalem, the *exile of Judah to *Babylon, and the prophecy of a new *covenant—all of these mark the book's impact on history. Its extensive protests against *idolatry and injustice eventually gave rise in Western society to the term jeremiad, which refers to a sustained complaint or bitter lament against perceived unrighteousness.

6. Modern Interpretations

1. Postexilic Judaism.

There are two aspects of Jeremiah reflected in the Chronicler's presentation of Judah's final decades before the exile. These are perhaps the earliest explicit interpretations of Jeremiah outside the book bearing his name, depending on the dating of the reference in Daniel 9:2. Jeremiah is credited with composing laments for Josiah, compositions that later were taken up and performed by singers in remembrance of the king (2 Chron 35:25; cf. 1 Esdr 1:32; Josephus, Ant. 10.5). In the final chapter (2 Chron 36:17-23; cf. Ezra 1:1) he is named as a representative of prophets sent by God to warn Judah of impending doom. This picks up a strand in the canonical book (e.g., Jer 7:25; 25:4; 28:8). Judah's exile in Babylon, a resulting Sabbath rest for the land, and the subsequent Persian decree allowing a return to Jerusalem are described as fulfilling Jeremiah's prophecies. These latter items do interpret major claims in the book about exile and future restoration, although there is nothing explicit in Jeremiah about the land of Judah enjoying Sabbath rest. Perhaps the prediction of seventy years for the exile, a multiple of a seven-year Sabbatical cycle, is interpreted by the Chronicler in light of the Sabbath instructions in Leviticus 25 and, more particularly, the explicit statement in Leviticus 26:34-35 that the land would have a Sabbath rest during the period of exile. Laments for Josiah are not part of the book of Jeremiah either, and while curious, the report nevertheless reflects a part of the book's impact: lamentation was a constituent part of the prophet's testimony (e.g., Jer 15:15-21; 20:7-12). The canonical book of Lamentations, which should not be confused with the laments for Josiah, was widely associated with Jeremiah in antiquity and is explicitly attributed to him in Greek translation (LXX Lam 1:1). From at least the Hellenistic period onward, Jeremiah's prophetic work has been linked to the lamentations offered for Josiah, Jerusalem and the people of Israel.

In Daniel 9 there is a prayer confessing Israel's sins and acknowledging the judgment that fell upon Jerusalem. Daniel's prayer is prompted in part by the prophecy of Jeremiah that a seventy-year period of judgment (Jer 25:11)—that is, exile—must be fulfilled for the devastation of the city and is set at the beginning of Persian rule over Babylon.

Some interpreters have proposed that the figure of the Suffering *Servant in Isaiah 52:13—53:12 is modeled on Jeremiah's persecution as a prophet and the tradition of his public rejection. Both figures, for example, are compared to a lamb led to slaughter (Jer 11:19; Is 53:7). If the portrait in Deutero-Isaiah is drawn with the Jeremiah tradition in mind, it is likely the earliest interpretation of Jeremiah outside of the prophetic book bearing his name. From a slightly later period, Jeremiah is likely one of the instructive models for the prophecy of *Zechariah (see Zech 1:1-6; 7:1-11) and a source for some innerbiblical allusions in Zechariah 9—14.

There are compositions in Greek and other languages that interpret Jeremiah for Judaism (and early Christianity). Sirach, a book widely read among Jews and Christians in antiquity, associates Jeremiah's prophecies with Judah's last kings and Jerusalem's destruction (Sir 49:4-7). The prophet's persecution and his themes of tearing down and building up are noted, citing elements announced in Jeremiah 1 and developed elsewhere in the prophetic book. His association with Josiah, a relatively minor element in the book of Jeremiah, is described in 1 Esdras (1 Esdr 1:28-33), following the tradition of the Chronicler. The Letter of Jeremiah takes its cue from Jeremiah 29 and presents the prophet writing to those soon to be taken into exile. A later Greek collection entitled Paraleipomena of Jeremiah (= 4 Baruch) contains a number of things circulating about Jeremiah and Baruch, including the tradition that both men were in Babylon for a time. Also among its (late) traditions is the claim that Jeremiah was stoned to death (4 Bar. 9:31; cf. Liv. Pro. 2:1). Its redaction extended into the second century AD and shows evidence of a Christian hand at work.

The book of 2 Maccabees cites three traditions about Jeremiah from otherwise unknown "records" (2 Macc 2:1-8; 15:12-16). The first is that Jeremiah exhorted those about to be deported to take some of the sacred fire from Jerusalem with them and not to forget God's commandments. The second is that Jeremiah received a divine oracle to hide the tent (tabernacle), the ark of the covenant, and the altar of incense in a cave at the mountain where Moses ascended to see God's "inheritance," so that these things would not fall into the hands of the Babylonians. In the third, the high priest Onias sees a vision of a venerable Jeremiah, who is described as someone who loved Israel and prays for the people. This last item has Jeremiah in a postmortem role of prayer—a most interesting role in itself and a reversal of one aspect of his earthly ministry, where he was forbidden to pray for his contemporaries (Jer 7:16; 11:14).

There are also texts associated with Jeremiah's secretary. The most widely known is the book of Baruch, which also has the prophet's companion writing from Babylon. And there are others testifying to his impact: 2 Baruch is preserved in Syriac; 3 Baruch is in Greek; in its Greek form 4 Baruch is also part of the Paraleipomena of Jeremiah (the Ethiopic version has the heading "The rest of the words of Baruch").

The DSS contain Hebrew fragments of several scrolls of Jeremiah (see 6.6. below), as well as other small fragments that are collected together because they mention Jeremiah or Baruch. These latter fragments could be evidence of an otherwise unknown document in Judaism interpreting the life of Jeremiah or additional evidence for the expanding Jeremiah tradition reflected in texts such as 2 Maccabees, Baruch, and Paraleipomena of Jeremiah. Some interpreters (see Brooke) have hypothesized a "Jeremiah Apocryphon" to account for them. Such a document, if it can be shown to exist, should not be confused with the Coptic Apocryphon of Jeremiah (Kuhn), which contains several (late) stories about the prophet.

The six centuries after Jeremiah's death saw the development of a large variety of texts and traditions about him and Baruch, all in addition to the formation of two primary forms of a prophetic book (Hebrew, Greek). These things are evidence for both the resilience and the significance of Jeremiah for Judaism (and early Christianity). Nothing similar developed for either Isaiah or Ezekiel, the two prophetic scrolls comparable in size to Jeremiah. The expanding literary traditions about Jeremiah have more in common with those that developed around *Daniel and Ezra.

2. Rabbinic Judaism.

The Hebrew text of Jeremiah was a constituent source for rabbinic Judaism and its construction of Jewish life. J. Neusner has collected most of the talmudic and midrashic references for comparison. Biographical traditions, for example, hold that Jeremiah was a descendant of Rahab, the prostitute from Jericho, as was Baruch, and that he was also related to Huldah the prophetess (b. Meg. 14b; Pesiq. Rab Kah. 13:5, 12). Josiah consulted Huldah about the scroll discovered in temple repair (see 2 Kings 22:8-20) because Jeremiah was gone for a time to bring back the ten tribes of Israel.

Jeremiah's prophetic credentials were such that he predicted the destruction of the first as well as the second temple (y. Naz. 5:3). Not only did Jeremiah predict the Babylonian exile, but also his book provides evidence that God went into exile with his people to Elam (cf. Jer 49:38; Lam. Rab. 53:1). The Babylonian Talmud also preserves a tradition that Jeremiah was the first in order of the “latter prophets” (b. B. Bat. 14b), to be followed by Ezekiel and Isaiah. The rabbis knew that Jeremiah does not come first chronologically, but they argue the principle that Jeremiah speaks throughout of destruction and should go after 2 Kings, the last of the Former Prophets, which also ends with the destruction of Jerusalem. Destruction is thereby joined to destruction. They posit, furthermore, that Ezekiel starts with destruction and ends with consolation, and Isaiah, which comes next, is all about consolation. Likely such an explanation of Jeremiah’s place among prophetic scrolls tries to make sense of an inherited tradition among the rabbis; if so, the tradition did not prevail, as Isaiah became first among the Latter Prophets in medieval codices and in printed versions of the Hebrew Bible. Nevertheless, the tradition is a precursor to modern questions regarding the placement and sequencing of biblical books. It also represents a fundamental impact of the book. Jeremiah predicted the destruction of Jerusalem, and that came to pass. He became the prophet of destruction, even though the book of Ezekiel is every bit as uncompromising on Judah and Jerusalem’s demise at the hands of the Babylonians.

The rabbis also inherited the tradition that Jeremiah was the author of several types of lamentations, and they developed their own perspectives on it. For example, Jehoiakim was told that Jeremiah had composed a book of lamentations, which the king promptly rejected (y. Mo’ed Qat. 3:1-2). This offers a distinct take on the account in Jeremiah 36, where the king cuts off pieces of a scroll of the prophet’s oracles. Some also took this to mean that Jeremiah had composed the book of Lamentations before the fall of Jerusalem, making Jehoiakim even more culpable for rejecting it. According to another tradition, not only did Jeremiah lament and weep, but also God wept at the failures of his people and the destruction of Jerusalem (Lam. Rab. 24:2; 50:2).

The book of Jeremiah played a role in determining Jewish halakah. One example comes in the discussions regarding divorce and remarriage, where Jeremiah 3:1-2 is cited in the application of Deuteronomy 24:1-4 (Sipre Deut. 213:1).

3. New Testament.

The influence of Jeremiah can be seen in several places in the NT. Matthew, for example, cites the book or refers to the prophet three times (Mt 2:17; 16:14; 27:9), though the last reference actually quotes Zechariah 11:12-13 and only alludes to texts in Jeremiah. The first reference comes in the context of Herod’s murder of children in Bethlehem. “Rachel weeping” (cf. Jer 31:15) is understood as a prophecy fulfilled in the people’s lamenting for the slain children. A later Jewish tradition identifies a tomb for Rachel near Bethlehem. The Gospel writer may have known such a tradition; however, the biblical account of Rachel’s death on the way to Ephrath is explicated with a reference to Bethlehem (Gen 35:19-20), and this alone may have prompted his typological connection with Rachel’s sorrow for her children.

The reference in Matthew 16:14 proposes “Jeremiah” as one of several prophetic models for Jesus. The Synoptic parallels to this text (Mk 8:28; Luke 9:19) do not refer explicitly to Jeremiah, which raises the question whether Jeremiah was of special significance for the writer of Matthew. M. Knowles has proposed a number of allusions to Jeremiah in Matthew, and that the traditions of Jeremiah as a rejected prophet and his announcement of Jerusalem’s destruction have influenced the Matthean portrayal of Jesus. Similarly, reflecting on the reference in Matthew 16:14, D. Law concludes, “It is precisely the richness of the theological ideas associated with Jeremiah—new covenant, suffering, rejection by Israel, prophecies of judgement—that make Jeremiah such a useful tool for conveying insights concerning the meaning and significance of Jesus, the messiah” (Law, 301).

Jeremiah is the only book in the OT to refer to a “new covenant” (Jer 31:31) that God will make with Israel and Judah, although there are other prophetic texts that approximate the term and what it represents (Ezek 37:26; Hos 2:18-20; perhaps also Is 55:3). The text in Jeremiah 31:31-34 contrasts the Mosaic covenant mediated at Mount Sinai, which Israel and Judah broke, with a new covenant that God will institute in the future, a covenant that will internalize divine instruction and be based on God’s resolve to forgive his people and remember their sin no more. The Sinai covenant had been ratified with blood sacrifice (Ex 24:3-8). Thus, references to the “blood of the new covenant” in Luke 22:20 and 1 Corinthians 11:25 and the combining of “new covenant” and “sprinkled blood” in Hebrews 12:24 (cf. Heb 8:8, 13; 9:15) link Jeremiah’s prophecy of a new covenant with the foundational events of Christianity. The Pauline contrast in 2 Corinthians 3:4-18 between ministries of death and life, represented by Moses and Christ respectively, also equates the Christian faith with a “new covenant” (2 Cor 3:6) derived from the Holy Spirit.

4. Church Fathers.

The church fathers used the term “new covenant” initially as a reference to the Christian faith as prefigured in prophecy. Correspondingly, the “old covenant” could refer to a collection of authoritative writings preserved by Jews (cf. Melito of Sardis) or to Judaism bereft of the proper interpretation of those documents (Epistle of Barnabas; Justin Martyr). Jeremiah thus was seen as a prophet of righteousness under the old covenant and a herald of the Gospel that he predicted in the new covenant. At the end of the second century AD the term “new covenant” (Lat novum testamentum) begins to be used not only to describe what Christ instituted, but also to indicate authoritative texts written by apostles and their disciples giving expression to the Christian message. Eventually the term “New Testament,” mediated through early Christian writings and church councils, is the heading for the Christian texts collected with the OT to form a Christian Bible. Even so, Jeremiah is not extensively quoted in the post-Nicene fathers. Isaiah, for example, is more popular. Nevertheless, the Greek, Latin and Syriac versions of Jeremiah were a resource for expositors (Wenthe), and the medieval European tradition included Jeremiah in its glossing of texts for ecclesiastical usage. Jerome was the one Christian commentator of his day to make comments on the Hebrew text (Graves).

5. Reformation and Renaissance.

With the Reformation and Renaissance in Europe came renewed attention to the historical sense of OT texts and, in varying degrees, to the Hebrew version. Martin Luther’s assessment of Jeremiah is an early example. He interpreted the harsh language against Judah and Jerusalem as God’s historical judgment on a stiff-necked people when left to their own devices. In his treatise “The Jews and Their Lies” he quotes the judgmental language of Jeremiah as if it could apply to the Jews of his day. Jeremiah’s prophecies of future transformation (Jer 30—33) prefigured the grace brought by Christ. John Calvin begins his lectures on Jeremiah with a survey of the historical events that led to the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem, and he follows Luther and others in presenting Jeremiah as a preacher of righteousness and one who announced the gospel of Christ in the form of a new covenant.

Perhaps the two best-known visual interpretations of Jeremiah in Western civilization are those of Michelangelo and Rembrandt. Michelangelo’s fresco (c. 1512) in the Sistine Chapel has a seated, somber Jeremiah holding his head in his right hand, perhaps in response to Jerusalem’s destruction. Rembrandt’s portrayal of Jeremiah is one of his early works (1630). It has the prophet sitting forlornly outside of Jerusalem, with his head propped up by his left hand, grieving that his prophecy of the city’s destruction came true. His elbow rests on a bound Bibbel, an anachronistic touch but symbolic of the prophet’s task of proclaiming the word of the Lord. Light plays off the stones behind Jeremiah, reflecting the light of the city burning from the Babylonian torch. On the left margin, quite small and backgrounded, is King Zedekiah, hands to his eyes. Zedekiah is also grieving the fulfillment of Jeremiah’s prophecy, and the covering of his eyes reminds the viewer that the king was blinded by the Babylonians.

6. Modern Interpretations.

Modern interpretations of Jeremiah have been influenced by the confessional lines of interpretation from the past, by historical questions that emerged in the Reformation and Renaissance, and by subsequent critical theories of knowledge emerging from the Enlightenment. The genesis and production of the Jeremiah book were tasks to be reconstructed by historical and literary analysis.

6.1. Bernhard Duhm. Building on the conclusion that the law in Israel developed later than the early prophets, Duhm produced a critical study of the book in 1901 that attributed some 280 verses of poetry to Jeremiah, an innovative individualist, and the rest of the book, including all the prose portions, to Baruch and later redactors. It is a watershed in the modern study of the book. Duhm reacted strongly against the redactors, concluding that they were theological legalists, and that they combined poetry and prose materials in a haphazard way. The structure of the book as a whole remains a topic under discussion among interpreters, and no consensus has yet developed to account for it. This may be because the compilers followed what can be described as an additive style, being more concerned to collect oracles and accounts and paying less attention to an overall structure for the completed task.

6.2. Sigmund Mowinckel. Mowinckel built on the work of Duhm and others, proposing in 1914 that editors used three major sources in compiling the book. Source A is poetic oracles. Source B is a narrative source containing mostly biographical material, of which there is more in Jeremiah than in any other prophetic text. Source C is also prose material, mostly speeches in Deuteronomic style. His basic categories have been widely used ever since, even when modified in particulars. In the last four decades, studies of the book's composition have given more attention to redactional matters and the concerns that drove editorial activity (see Editorial/Redaction Criticism).

6.3. John Skinner and George Adam Smith. Two influential works in English were first published a year apart from one another, the first by John Skinner (1922) and the second by George Adam Smith (1923). Both follow Duhm's general lead in seeing the prophet as a poet and individualist, though neither denigrated the book's editors as did Duhm. Both books also expand on earlier public lectures, presenting a historically reconstructed figure of Jeremiah that might then be understood in modern terms and religious sensibilities. The emphasis is on the figure of the prophet and his experience of God in times of crisis, using particularly the psychological clues discerned from his laments. Smith's seventh chapter is "The Story of His Soul," while Skinner's eleventh chapter is "The Prophet and His Inner Life." The figure that they reconstruct and then interpret is Jeremiah the individualist, drawn to God in spite of being rejected by his contemporaries, who in his direct dependence on God revealed the dangers of nationalism inherent in temple and state. Skinner finds that Jeremiah possessed an "instinctive and universal sense of the divine in which he recognized the permanent essence of religion" (Skinner, 219). The "cradle of individual religion" came to birth in his person (Skinner, 224). Smith, for his part, describes Jeremiah as the "likeliest to Christ of all the prophets" (G. Smith, 7), the "first in Israel to realize the independence of the single self in religion," and the "supreme example under the Old Covenant of the sacrifice of that self for others" (G. Smith, 341). Both authors interpret the proclamation of the "new covenant" as the high-water mark of the prophet's work. Skinner writes, "It is the announcement of a new and final stage in the manifestation of God's purpose of redemption. . . . It must have been written by Jeremiah, and is rightly regarded as his most noteworthy contribution to the ideal religion of the future" (Skinner, 332-33). Elsewhere he describes the new covenant as "one of the profoundest anticipations of the perfect religion that the Old Testament contains" (Skinner, 330). Smith says simply that it is "a prophecy of Christianity which has hardly its equal in the Old Testament" (G. Smith, 380).

6.4. Poetry, Laments and Form Criticism. The poetic oracles were the foundation for reconstructing Jeremiah's individual religious experience by such scholars as Duhm, Smith and Skinner, but the developing form-critical analysis of texts pioneered by H. Gunkel questioned this approach (see Form Criticism). Poetry and prose employed recognized genres of speech, and thus the emphasis fell on their setting in life and public role rather than, in the first instance, their being a clue to the experience of the author. An early example of this approach applied to Jeremiah was W. Baumgartner's 1916 study of the prophet's laments, which demonstrated formal characteristics in common with laments in the Psalter. Baumgartner himself did not deny that Jeremiah's laments were his own, but eventually form-critical analysis would lead some scholars away from an analysis of the personal life of Jeremiah (and other prophetic figures) to an investigation of representative forms of expression in the book, even those employing "first person" speech (see Reventlow). One direction of this research is to discard the historical figure altogether in favor of a literarily constructed "persona" (Polk).

The connection between Jeremiah's personal or inner life and the formulaic expressions of complaint in the book is an issue that remains under debate in modern scholarship. G. von Rad, for example, stood in the tradition that the laments or "confessions" were central to the interpretation of the prophet, seeing in them the combination of inherited poetic forms of lament and the prophet's own struggle with the press of the prophetic office and the rejection of his message by contemporaries. In theological terms, von Rad sees the prophet confronting an abyss where God seems hidden and where the prophet walks a "via dolorosa" and "stations of the cross" (von Rad, 36, 206-7) and finally casts himself into the hands of a mysterious God without a resolution of his predicament. Here one sees von Rad's typological hermeneutic at work, as the tradition of a suffering prophet is reframed in light of Christ's "passion" (von Rad, 274). In recent scholarship, the interpretive task has dealt not just with the formal properties of the laments themselves, but also with the literary and redactional questions of their role in the book (Ittmann; Diamond; M. Smith; Kiss). Recent interpreters have reopened a line of approach from the classical rabbis, asking whether Jeremiah's book represents God as well as the prophet in pain over the failure of the people (Bak; Fretheim). There is interest also in reading the lamentations as a form of protest against perceived injustice and putting the book of Lamentations in dialogue with the prophetic critique of people and city in the prophets, including Jeremiah (Lee and Mandolfo; Mandolfo).

6.5. Deuteronomy and Jeremiah. The third quarter of the twentieth century brought to the foreground the question of the relationship between Deuteronomy and the book of Jeremiah. At one level, it is a classical question, given the similarity of expressions between them. It was commonly recognized that portions of the prose tradition in Jeremiah had terminology similar to what was commonly called "Deuteronomistic vocabulary." Scholars such as Duhm, Skinner and Smith had raised the question of Jeremiah's relationship to the reform efforts of Josiah, with its impetus in the discovery of a Book of the Law (2 Kings 22–23), a book that many concluded was an early form of Deuteronomy produced by a reforming element. The greater the emphasis on Jeremiah the individualist, however, the less some of his interpreters felt that the prophet could have supported the encapsulation of divine revelation in the legal form of a book such as Deuteronomy. If certain passages in the book of Jeremiah suggested otherwise (e.g., Jer 11:1-8), it was the work of editors or a phase that Jeremiah outgrew. The new element in relating the two books came in response to M. Noth's influential 1943 study of what he called the "Deuteronomistic History," with Deuteronomy understood as the initial work in a literary scheme that continued in Joshua, Judges, 1-2 Samuel and 1-2 Kings, all of which were edited during the Babylonian exile. The question then became this: were Jeremiah and Baruch influenced by the language of the Deuteronomistic editor(s) responsible for compiling this history from Moses to Judah's exile, or did members of a Deuteronomistic school also pull together disparate materials to then compose a book of Jeremiah? On the one hand, H. Weippert and W. Holladay gave primacy in varying degrees to the figures of Jeremiah and Baruch, even if certain forms of expressions were similar to Deuteronomistic vocabulary. On the other hand, P. Hyatt, W. Thiel and E. Nicholson gave primacy to Deuteronomistic editing or authorship in the prose speeches and significant parts of the biographical narratives. This meant that the redacted book of Jeremiah and the Deuteronomistic History were produced in similar circles. The theological rationale for their production was a response to the experience of exile.

Among modern scholars, one still sees the historical question raised regarding Jeremiah's relationship to Josiah's reform and the production of the book of Deuteronomy. The work of M. Leuchter links Jeremiah to scribal circles like the family of Shaphan and to the reforming work that they undertook in Judah.

In another recent study, C. Maier has proposed that a major thrust of the redacted book is to present Jeremiah as a teacher of Torah. She distinguishes that presentation from what might be discerned about the historical Jeremiah. There is a sense that segments of modern interpretation have come almost full circle from Duhm, who recognized the importance of Torah piety in the editorial layers of the book but essentially dismissed it as the work of legalists. Maier follows scholars who seek to identify the concerns of those who compiled the portrait of the prophet and to pay attention to that portrait in its final form.

6.6. The Texts of Jeremiah. Textual analysis of Jeremiah entered a new phase with the discovery of the DSS in 1947 (Tov 1985; 1997; Barthélemy). It has been recognized at least since Jerome that there were differences between the Greek and Hebrew manuscript traditions of Jeremiah. There is difference in the order of subsections, and the LXX is approximately one-eighth shorter overall. It is essentially the prose texts in the Hebrew that are longer than their Greek counterparts, particularly with introductory and concluding formulas (Janzen; Parke-Taylor). The fragments from six different scrolls, dating approximately 125 BC-AD 50, are evidence for a prolonged period of transmission in Hebrew of more than one textual tradition. A fragment from Cave 4 (4Q71) preserves a Hebrew text more in line with its LXX counterpart, while two other fragments from the same cave (4Q70; 4Q72) are closer to what became the MT. On the one hand, the fragments provide evidence for a Hebrew tradition underlying at least parts of the LXX tradition, even when it departs from the MT; on the other hand, they provide evidence that written forms of the Jeremiah book were in editorial development well into the postexilic period. This last matter has made the dating of redactional layers in the book an extremely complicated matter (Stipp).

6.7. Recent Scholarship. In recent decades, large commentaries and surveys of research provide inviting fare for the student of Jeremiah. One set (the three-volume Word Biblical Commentary) has multiple authors. W. McKane, W. Holladay and J. Lundbom, have each produced multivolume commentaries on their own. McKane sees the production of the book of Jeremiah as a long, complicated process, which at one point he characterizes as a "rolling corpus" (McKane, 1:1). Holladay, on the other hand, places much of the book's production in the lifetime of the prophet and Baruch. He is one of several modern scholars who prefer to see the beginning of Jeremiah's public ministry at a date later than the thirteenth year of Josiah (Jer 1:1). Lundbom's work is sensitive to poetic and rhetorical analysis of the text, and he is more sanguine than McKane at identifying settings in Jeremiah's own lifetime. These authors interact with a wide range of scholarship in presenting their views. R. Carroll's large, one-volume commentary takes an agnostic approach to questions of historical connection between the book and the prophetic figure. Carroll sees the book as comprising various traditions seeking to come to grips with the impact of the exile.

S. Herrmann authored a volume that rehearses scholarship devoted to the book and concentrates on nineteenth- and twentieth-century interpretations. Essays edited by L. Perdue and B. Kovacs and by A. Curtis and T. Römer, and survey articles by R. Carroll and C. Carroll provide good cross-sections of studies related to the book.

There are trends underway in scholarship whose influence will be determined by the future. Commentaries, particularly in English, currently give less attention to matters of source analysis or the genetic stages of the book's production than was done earlier in the twentieth century. Some of this is due to the emphasis of B. Childs and others on the final form of a book as the object of theological analysis (see Canonical Criticism), and some of it to the literary conviction that a book's present form has its own integrity. One also sees employment of reading strategies that use a more dialogic approach and/or one that emphasizes the response of readers to the text (cf. surveys by R. Carroll and C. Carroll). Theories of *intertextuality, theme and metaphor (Lallemande Winkel, Bourguet; Shields) also contribute to the emphasis on literary analysis.

Archaeological research on ancient Israel has illumined several aspects of Jeremiah (King). One aspect is the connection between public figures (officials) in the book and the still-growing corpus of Semitic inscriptions from the seventh and sixth centuries BC (Mykitiuk). There are now probable connections with such figures as Gemariah (Jer 36:10), Gedaliah (Jer 40:7), Baalis (Jer 40:14), Seriah (Jer 51:59) and Jerahmeel (Jer 36:26). Clay bullae with the name of Baruch son of Neriah have also come to light, but their authenticity is questionable.

JOEL, BOOK OF

Joel is the second book in the *Book of the Twelve, the Minor Prophets. The occasion for this book was a locust plague that so severely devastated the land and its crops that the survival of the people, their livestock and even of local wildlife seemed in doubt. The date of the book's composition is disputed. Few scholars claim an elaborate compositional or redactional history for Joel; it is widely regarded as single, unified work. The chapter and verse division of the Hebrew text differs slightly from that of the English. The English of Joel 2:28-32 corresponds to Joel 3:1-5 in the Hebrew, and the English Joel 3:1-21 corresponds to the Hebrew Joel 4:1-21. There is one important problem in the interpretation of the text. Although it is widely agreed that Joel 1 describes the great locust plague, the meaning of Joel 2:1-11 is a matter of debate. Interpreters are divided over whether this passage continues the description of the locusts from Joel 1 or, instead, it predicts an invasion by a human army. In addition, the account of the pouring out of the Spirit (Joel 2:28-32 [מַט 3:1-5]) is of particular interest to Christian readers because Peter cites it in full at Acts 2:17-21.

5. Issues in Interpretation

1. Author and Composition History.

1.1. Author. Joel son of Pethuel, the stated author of the book (Joel 1:1), is not mentioned in any other biblical text, and the book of Joel itself lacks any meaningful biographical information about the man. Everything about him (the era in which he lived, his social status, his tribal membership and ancestral home, specific details of his life story) is either lost or must be inferred from his book. The dates to which one assigns his life depend upon the date one assigns to the composition of the book (see 3.2 below).

One distinctive interpretation, however, combines interpretation of the book with specific inferences about the prophet. It claims that he was a cultic prophet; that is, he was attached to the Jerusalem temple and participated in its ritual by means of ceremonially acted out prophecies. A. Kapelrud, for example, compares the prophecy of the Spirit (Joel 2:28-32 [מַט 3:1-5]) to Zechariah 12:10, where Yahweh promises to pour out a spirit of grace on the people when they look upon "the one whom they pierced." He argues that the *Zechariah text refers to a cultic object called the "pierced one," and that the people performed ritual dirges before it. He concludes that in Joel, similarly, the promise of the coming of the Spirit is associated with ecstatic ritual. G. Ahlström argues that Joel used his position as a temple prophet to resist a revival of Baalism there, while G. Ogden claims that Joel led the nation in a liturgy of *lament over foreign invasions.

Against these interpretations, it is true that Joel calls upon the people to mourn at the temple (Joel 2:15), but this is hardly distinctive and by no means marks him as a member of the temple personnel. Kapelrud's interpretation depends on a dubious analysis of Zechariah 12:10, and Ahlström's interpretation is seriously undermined by the fact that Joel never refers to Baal. Ogden, quite eccentrically, concludes that the locusts of Joel 1 are a metaphor only.

1.2. Unity. A number of scholars have attempted to discern various sources behind Joel. An older view is that Joel 1:1—2:27 (MT 1—2) is a work distinct from Joel 2:28—3:21 (MT 3—4). J. Bewer detects a number of interpolations and argues that references to the Day of Yahweh are secondary. On the other hand, scholars such as R. Pfeiffer and W. Prinsloo are impressed with marks of the unity of the book, and this remains the most common position. The most significant argument against the unity of the book is that the locusts of Joel 1:1—2:27 disappear in Joel 2:28—3:21, but this argument is considerably weakened if one recognizes that the northern army in Joel 2:1-11, 20 is composed of soldiers and not locusts (see 4.1 below); so interpreted, these passages represent a strong conceptual link to the judgment on the armies of the *nations in Joel 3 (MT 4). Also, the interlocking structure of the book (see 4.2 below) suggests that it is a unity.

2. The Text.

2.1. Stylistic and Rhetorical Issues. Joel is written in standard biblical Hebrew. It is not marked by linguistic anomalies, and, as Ahlström has shown, it does not have Aramaisms that would indicate a late date of composition. It employs rhetorical devices that are common to biblical Hebrew, including hendiadys (“great and dreadful” at Joel 2:31 [MT 3:4]), merism (“sons and daughters” at Joel 2:28 [MT 3:1]), rhetorical questions (Joel 3:4 [MT 4:4]), repetition for emphasis (hāmōnīm hāmōnīm, “Throngs! Throngs!” at Joel 3:14 [MT 4:14]), consonance (ûkēšōd mišadday, “like destruction from Shaddai,” at Joel 1:15) and assonance (hōbîš tîrôš, “grain has dried up,” at Joel 1:10). (For further examples, see Crenshaw; Thompson; Myers; Marcus.)

2.2. Text-critical Issues. The MT of Joel is very clean, and with few exceptions there is little evidence of textual corruption. The LXX reading of Joel 3:11 (MT 4:11) is preferred by L. Allen over the MT. The Hebrew text of Joel 1:17 is extraordinarily difficult, and Joel 3:21 (MT 4:21) probably should be emended in agreement with the LXX (see Text and Textual Criticism).

3. Place and Date of Composition.

3.1. The Location of the Events of Joel. The book evidently was written in Jerusalem. Joel calls for the trumpet to sound in *Zion (Joel

2:1, 15) and speaks of reviving Jerusalem and Judah (Joel 3:1 [MT 4:1]; see also Joel 3:16 [MT 4:16]). There is no indication that the book comes from any other location.

3.2. The Date of Joel: Evaluating the Data and Arguments. Many scholars date Joel to the postexilic period, although some interpreters set it in the ninth century BC, treating it as the earliest book of prophecy (see Israelite History). Arguments regarding this issue are as follows.

1. Some argue that the book refers to no kings (contrast, e.g., Is 1:1; Jer 1:2; Hos 1:1), and therefore it was written during the postexilic era. But even postexilic books often date themselves by reference to kings—Persian kings (e.g., Ezra 1:1; Hag 1:1; Zech 1:1). As such, the lack of any synchronism to the reign of a king is insignificant.

2. Some argue that priests and elders are the authorities in the city, and therefore the book is postexilic. But the priests are not addressed as men with governing authority; they are mentioned only with respect to their ritual duties (Joel 1:9; 2:17). The “elders” of Joel 1:2 are, literally, old men; they are not governing elders. Therefore, these references are inconsequential for the date of the book.

3. The book several times mentions Jerusalem (e.g., Joel 2:32) but never alludes to the northern kingdom. Joel speaks of “Israel” at Joel 3:2 (MT 4:2), not as a separate state but as part of a unity that includes Judah (Joel 3:1 [MT 4:1]), analogous to what one sees in late preexilic texts (Jer 31:31) and in postexilic texts (Neh 12:47). This implies that Joel was written after the fall of Samaria (722 BC).

4. Jerusalem has walls at the time of writing (Joel 2:7), and therefore the book is either preexilic or was written after the reforms of Nehemiah. It is doubtful that Joel would have spoken of walls had they been the rubble of the early postexilic period (Neh 2:13).

5. The temple exists and has a functioning priesthood (Joel 1:9; 2:17). If the temple were a burned-out ruin, as it was in the exilic period, the lack of grain for a grain offering (Joel 1:9) would have been the least of its problems. Therefore, the book is either preexilic or written after the rebuilding of the temple.

6. In the order of the Book of the Twelve (the Minor Prophets), Joel falls between Hosea and Amos, two of the earliest writing prophets. This could imply that Joel is very early, but while it is generally true that earlier prophets are near the head of the list in the Twelve (Hosea, Amos, Jonah, Micah) and that later prophets are at the end (Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi), this is not invariable. Obadiah stands between Amos and Jonah in the Hebrew canon, but it is almost certainly exilic in origin. In the LXX, represented by Codices Vaticanus and Alexandrinus, Joel is between Micah and Obadiah. Furthermore, the scribes who placed the books of the Twelve in their current MT order may have been motivated by considerations other than chronology. In particular, Joel may be in its present position because the similarity between Joel 3:16 (MT 4:16) and Amos 1:2 creates a link between the two books. Both verses speak of Yahweh roaring from Zion. Perhaps the framers of the canon had no idea when Joel was written, and thus they used this catchphrase as the best basis for positioning the book in the canon.

7. Joel 3:1-2 (MT 4:1-2) speaks of a restoration of Jerusalem and Israel and also refers to a regathering of exiles. This does not contradict evidence indicating that Jerusalem had walls and a functioning temple, but it does imply that the city's fortunes were at a low point relative to other nations. This could apply equally either to the late preexilic or to the postexilic period. The exiles appear to be more closely linked to "Israel" (Joel 3:2) than to Judah (Joel 3:1), suggesting that the prophecy dates from the period after the fall of Samaria to Assyria but before the fall of Jerusalem to Babylon.

8. Joel 1:14 calls upon "all the inhabitants of the land" to gather at the temple. This indicates that the population is small and concentrated around Jerusalem. This could apply either to the late preexilic period or the postexilic period.

9. Some, such as M. Treves, argue that Joel cites other OT books and is therefore later than the books that it cites. But it is difficult to prove that one book is citing another; both may be using a common expression. Also, even if direct citation appears to be present, it is not necessarily obvious which book came first. For example, Joel 3:18 (MT 4:18) is similar to Amos 9:13, but it is not clear that one is citing the other, or if so, who is citing whom. Two texts in Joel, however, are especially worthy of note. First, Joel 2:32 (MT 3:5) is almost identical to Obadiah 17 ("but in Mount Zion there shall be a group of survivors"), except that Joel, apart from also having "in Jerusalem," has the words "as Yahweh has said." This could indicate that Joel is citing Obadiah. On the other hand, Joel could be rephrasing Isaiah 37:31-32. Second, Joel 3:10 (MT 4:10) has "beat your plowshares into swords." This is the reverse of Isaiah 4:2 (and Mic 4:3), "and they shall beat their swords into plowshares." Our familiarity with Isaiah's version causes us to assume that it is the original, but this is actually unlikely. It is more probable that "beat your plowshares into swords" is an ancient rallying cry meant to mobilize a community for war. This is precisely how it is used in Joel. It appears that Isaiah and Micah reverse this common idiom in order to illustrate the peacefulness of the eschatological age. Joel, by contrast, seems to preserve the original idiom. But the language has no bearing on the date of Joel.

10. Joel 3:6 (MT 4:6) assails the Phoenicians and Philistines for selling Israelites as slaves to the Greeks. For some, this alone is enough to show that Joel is postexilic. However, the notion that the Greeks were unknown to peoples throughout the Near East in the eighth or seventh century BC is absurd. What is significant, however, is that in Joel Greece is perceived to be far from Israel. Perception of distance is, to a great degree, psychological. After the failed Persian invasion of Greece, Greek mercenaries and colonists became a familiar sight in Egypt and the Near East, and after Alexander's conquests they were ubiquitous. In such a situation, familiarity with Greeks and frequent interchange with the Greek homeland would have made Greece seem fairly near. Prior to that, when encounters with Greeks were more limited, Greece would have seemed far away. Also, J. Myers points out that the Greeks underwent a major economic expansion from the eighth to sixth centuries BC when they imported numerous slaves. Joel 3:6 (MT 4:6), implying that Greece was in the market for slaves but was perceived to be distant, suggests a late preexilic date.

11. Joel 3:4 (MT 4:4) refers to conflicts with the Phoenicians and Philistines, and Joel 3:19 (MT 4:19) implies enmity with Egypt and Edom. A number of scholars have tried to use this information to date Joel, but with widely conflicting results. Bewer takes Joel 3:4 (MT 4:4) to be evidence that Joel was written in the reign of Artaxerxes III Ochus and between the years 352 and 348 BC. By contrast, G. Archer indicates that the combination of enemies described in Joel requires for the book a date no later than around 800 BC, the end of the reign of Joash of Judah. Both claims are unfounded; there is not nearly enough evidence from the passing references to these enemies in Joel to create a synchronism. The conflicts that Joel describes seem to be relatively small incidents now lost to us. Joel gives us an accumulation of grievances, not a particular moment in history. In short, the list of enemies is of no value in dating the book.

12. Joel 3:11 (MT 4:11) calls on Yahweh to send down his warriors, and this could reflect the advanced angelology of the postexilic era. But the language hardly implies the extravagant theology of angels that we see in the pseudepigraphal texts. Angelic armies are already implied in the ancient title “Yahweh of hosts,” making Joel 3:11 (MT 4:11) unexceptional. In addition, the Targum, Syriac, LXX and Vulgate have a variety of readings here, but they have no reference to angels.

In light of all the evidence taken together, Joel could come from Jerusalem after Nehemiah. But based on the implication that Israel (not Judah) is scattered and on the perception of Greece as a distant land, a late preexilic date, perhaps in the seventh century BC, is preferable.

4. Structure.

Joel is best understood to be composed of two interlocking chiasmic structures. The first chiasmus, as the following interpretation of Joel 2:1-11 implies, is based upon the typological linkage between the locust plague and the northern invader. Both cause great destruction, and in the end both are destroyed. A middle, transitional element is at Joel 2:11-19, a call to repentance. This act of turning back to God is thus structurally the pivot point that leads into the reversal of the earlier calamities.

- (A) Punishment: locusts (Joel 1:2-20)
- (B) Punishment: northern army
(Joel 2:1-11)
- (C) Transition: repentance
(Joel 2:12-19)
- (B') Grace: northern army destroyed
(Joel 2:20)
- (A') Grace: rain poured out to heal land
(Joel 2:21-27)

The second chiasmus contains the destruction of the northern army (Joel 2:20) and the healing of the land (Joel 2:21-27) from the first chiasmus, creating the interlocking structure.

- (A) Northern army destroyed (Joel 2:20)
- (B) Rain poured out to heal land
(Joel 2:21-27)
- (B') Spirit poured out to heal people
(Joel 2:28-32 [MT 3:1-5])
- (A') Judgment on Gentile armies
(Joel 3:1-21 [MT 4:1-21])

The theological significance to this structure is that the gift of the Spirit and the final judgment on the nations are anticipated respectively by the healing of the land and destruction of the northern army.

5. Issues in Interpretation.

5.1. Joel 2:1-11: Locusts or Soldiers? Joel 1 self-evidently concerns a locust plague, notwithstanding the opinion of some that the locusts are a metaphorical representation of the Babylonian army (Stuart). But the topic of Joel 2:1-11 is debated. Some take it to be a continuation from Joel 1 of the lament over the locusts, while others argue that it is a prophetic announcement of a future (human) army that will invade the land. This issue, moreover, is critically important for coming to terms with the structure and message of the book.

Since we have an account of a locust plague in Joel 1, and since Joel 2:21-27 describes the healing of the land after a locust plague, context appears to favor the locust interpretation for all of Joel 1:1—2:27. Specific details of Joel 2:1-11 that can be read as metaphoric references to locusts include that they leave the land looking as though it had been scorched in a fire (Joel 2:3), that they seem to look like horses (Joel 2:4 [interpreters note the similarity between a locust and a horse's head]), and that they sound like cavalry or a raging fire (Joel 2:5). Also, the point that the invaders in Joel 2 are said to be “like” soldiers (Joel 2:7) suggests that in fact they are not soldiers.

As persuasive as this may appear, however, it is better to see the enemy of Joel 2:1-11 as a human army and not as locusts. First, the fact that the language is reminiscent of a locust plague is not surprising; the locusts are a type for the human army that is to come. Thus, the way they denude the land, the similarity between locusts and horses, and the terrible noise they make are intentionally included. What was true of the locusts will be true of the coming army, albeit in a manner more terrible. The reader is supposed to catch the sensible connection between the sight and sound of the coming enemy army and of the recent locust plague. In addition, the fact that the invaders in Joel 2:1-11 are “like” soldiers does not mean that they are actually something other than soldiers. The particle here translated as “like” (Heb kē) sometimes means more than that; it describes the fulfillment of an ideal. It is analogous to an English expression such as “He always acts like a man.” Here the speaker does not mean that the subject only seems like a man and is not really one; rather, the subject is an actual man who fulfills the ideal of a man. A close parallel is in Ezekiel 26:10, which says of a future invader that he will “enter your gates like [kē] men entering a breached city,” when what they will be is in fact men entering a breached city. So also in Joel 2:4 the invading force is not locusts that are “like” cavalry; they are mounted soldiers who spread panic as only a well-trained cavalry can. But there are several other compelling reasons for taking Joel 2:1-11 to refer to a human army.

First, Joel 1 is dominated by verbs in the perfect (qatal) form, but Joel 2:1-11 is dominated by verbs in the imperfect (yiqtol) form. While it is true that we cannot simply equate the Hebrew perfect with past tense and the imperfect with the future tense, those are the default meanings of the inflections, and the shift from the one to the other cannot be accidental. There are some perfect verbs in Joel 2:1-11, but these are descriptive (Joel 2:3 “before him, fire consumes [ʾākēlā]”). But the perfect verbs of Joel 1 plainly refer to the past (Joel 1:19: “fire has consumed [ʾākēlā] the pastures of the wilderness”). Similarly, the imperfect verbs that appear in Joel 1 describe a response to what has just come (Joel 1:19: “to you, Yahweh, I will make my cry [ʾeqrāʾ]”), but the imperfects of Joel 2:1-11 speak of the future deeds of the enemy (Joel 2:7: “like warriors they shall run [yērušūn]; like men of war they shall climb [yaʿālū] the wall”). The implication is that Joel 1 is in the past, but Joel 2:1-11 is in the future.

Second, the people fight the invaders in Joel 2:1-11 in a manner not appropriate to dealing with locusts. Joel 2:8b can be translated, “Through weapons they plunge; they do not break off [the attack].” People try to fight back this invader with spears, arrows and swords; this is something no one would do with locusts. The Hebrew word used here (šelah) means “weapons” and especially “projectiles” (as at Neh 4:17 [MT 4:11]; 4:23 [MT 4:17]; 2 Chron 23:10; 32:5). Contrary to J. Crenshaw, who bizarrely imagines a swarm of locusts entering Jerusalem via the Siloam Tunnel, it does not refer to the Pool of Siloam.

Third, the goal of the invaders in Joel 2:1-11 is incompatible with a locust plague. They scale the city walls and run along them, and at the climactic moment they burst into the private homes inside the city (Joel 2:9). While there is no doubt that in a locust plague some locusts would get upon the walls and some would enter houses, that is a fairly inconsequential matter. A locust plague does its damage out in the fields, not inside the city. But when an army has taken the walls and has entered houses where women and children have taken shelter, the city has fallen and all is lost.

Fourth, the invader in Joel 2:1-11 is called “northerner” at Joel 2:20. This designation is not possible for a locust plague. In ancient times, as now, locust plagues formed in the horn of Africa and flew north across the Red Sea and toward the Arabian Peninsula, but if wind currents were from the east, they made their way northward toward Israel. That is, locusts always came up from the south and never from the north. By contrast, the great enemies of Israel and Judah (Syria, Assyria, Babylon) entered the land from the north (see Jer 1:14-15; 4:6; 6:1, 22; 10:22; Ezek 23:24; 38:6).

Fifth, the reversal of the locust plague in Joel 2:21-27 is concerned only with the events of Joel 1 and not with Joel 2:1-11. The healing of the land is introduced in Joel 2:21, with a sequence of specific acts of restoration taking up Joel 2:22-27. Table 1 demonstrates how the disasters from Joel 1 are reversed when God restores the land. The sequence in Joel 2:21-27 is also in the reverse order from what we see in Joel 1. But the important point is this: in Joel 2:22-27 the whole description of the locust event comes from Joel 1, with nothing from Joel 2:1-11. This indicates that the prophet does not regard the material from the latter text as an account of a locust plague.

Tell people about locusts for generations (Joel 1:2-3)	People never again so shamed (Joel 2:26-27)
Four locust swarms eat everything (Joel 1:4)	Restoration from the four locust swarms (Joel 2:25)
Wine and oil fail (Joel 1:5, 10)	Wine and oil restored (Joel 2:24)
Grain depleted; granaries ruined (Joel 1:10-11, 17)	Grain restored and threshing floors full (Joel 2:24)
Land is parched (Joel 1:12, 17)	Rains come upon land (Joel 2:23)
Trees stripped bare (Joel 1:12, 19)	Trees bear fruit (Joel 2:22)
Animals dying (Joel 1:18, 20)	Animals have pasture (Joel 2:22)

Table 1. Disaster and Restoration in Joel 1—2

In conclusion, context favors seeing the invader in Joel 2:1-11 as a human army, not as locusts. The invader in Joel 2:1-11 is the northerner, a human enemy that is the typological counterpart of the locusts and whose destruction is anticipated in Joel 2:20. The locust devastation that is reversed in Joel 2:21-27 relates only to Joel 1.

5.2. The Day of Yahweh in Joel. The common thread that links the whole of Joel together is the theme of the Day of Yahweh (see Day of the Lord). While lamenting the locust plague, Joel 1:15 says, “The day of Yahweh is upon us!” Describing the invasion by the northern army, Joel 2:11 says, “For the day of Yahweh is great and very frightening.” In the aftermath of the people’s repentance, Joel 2:18 speaks of Yahweh as “jealous” for his land and “compassionate” for his people, and he moves to give them salvation and to show that he is among them (Joel 2:27). In Joel 2:28-32 (MT 3:1-5) the pouring out of the Spirit is declared to be “the day of Yahweh,” replete with signs in heaven, such as the moon turning to blood (Joel 2:31 [MT 3:4]). Finally, the great judgment on all the nations in the valley of Jehoshaphat is also described in terms of the Day of Yahweh: the sun, moon and stars are darkened (Joel 3:15 [MT 4:15]). In short, every major event of Joel, whether it be for Israel’s punishment or deliverance, either is explicitly called “the day of Yahweh” or is described in terms befitting that day.

The interpretation of so many and varied events as the Day of Yahweh in Joel is of consequence. First, it warns us that we must be careful about supposing that the Day of Yahweh is strictly an aspect of the divine *warfare ideology. In Joel, the event with the strongest and most explicit use of Day of Yahweh language is the pouring out of the Spirit, and it is difficult to see Yahweh as a warrior in that event. In addition, we tend to conceive of the Day of Yahweh as an act of judgment, but plainly it is an act of salvation in the healing of the land in Joel 2:21-27 as well as in the gift of the Spirit in Joel 2:28-32 (MT 3:1-5). Even the judgment on the nations in Joel 3 (MT 4) is also salvation for *Zion, where “Yahweh is a fortress for his people” (Joel 3:16).

Joel’s use of the Day of Yahweh motif is most important, however, for demonstrating how the prophets conceived of their messages. For Joel, the Day of Yahweh is not a single event in the future; that is, in contrast to how we may perceive it, that day is not simply the last judgment. The Day of Yahweh may be something as localized as a locust plague affecting the hill country of Judah, or it may be an eschatological event of grace, such as the pouring out of the Spirit. It may be a judgment upon Israel—even an event as calamitous as the fall of Jerusalem—or it may be a saving event for Israel. For Joel, the Day of Yahweh is a moment at which God decisively acts to judge or to save, perhaps after a long period of apparent inactivity. Every event, from the locust plague to the last judgment, is a milestone in the history of salvation. As a model of prophetic hermeneutics, this tells us that the prophets did not simply issue discrete predictions about things to come. Rather, they spoke of an ideal or type, such as the Day of Yahweh, and saw all the individual manifestations of that ideal as integrally tied together by the common type that they fulfilled. Great events of the distant or eschatological future are anticipated by smaller, more localized fulfillments of the same ideal within the historical present. The prophets rarely spoke of the great events of the future without at the same time speaking of events of their own time that fulfilled the same typological theme.

5.3. Joel 2:28-32 and the Day of Pentecost. Joel raises a number of theological issues of importance to the church. The locust plague in Joel 1 invites the reader to consider matters related to theodicy; in particular, one may reflect upon this passage against the backdrop of the tsunami, earthquakes and storms that continue to cause massive destruction and loss of life in our time. Also, the passages of woe and disaster for Israel (Joel 1:1—2:11) shift to promises of salvation after the call for repentance at Joel 2:12-19. This suggests the pivotal role of repentance in bringing about redemption. Above all, however, Christians naturally want to understand Peter's claim in Acts 2:14-21 that the events of Pentecost fulfilled Joel 2:28-32 (MT 3:1-5).

Several points may help us to understand how Joel relates to Acts 2. First, as detailed above, the gift of the Spirit is understood in Joel to be a great fulfillment of the ideal of the Day of Yahweh. Second, Acts goes out of its way to inform us that the people in the temple area who saw that event were from many different nations and spoke many languages (Acts 2:6-11). Although almost all of these people were Jewish, they foreshadow the movement of the gospel to the nations, a theme that dominates Acts and fulfills the promise that the nations would stream to Zion (Is 2:1-4). These considerations indicate that at Pentecost the eschatological age had begun.

In addition, Joel describes the coming of the Spirit as a "pouring out" (Joel 2:28 [MT 3:1]), as though the Spirit were a liquid. This peculiar language links the gift of the Spirit to the healing rains of Joel 2:23. Furthermore, the occasion for prophecy of Joel was a locust plague that devoured all of Judah's crops, and because of that catastrophe Joel urged the people to come to the temple and lament (Joel 2:12-17). Pentecost, we must remember, was an agricultural thanksgiving holiday; it came at the end of the spring grain harvest that officially began with Passover. How appropriate, then, that the Spirit should be "poured out" in the temple, where lamentation over famine had once rang out. The spiritual antitype to the healing rains of Joel 2:23 came on a day of harvest celebration, Pentecost Sunday (see Prophets in the New Testament).

JONAH, BOOK OF

The book of Jonah is unusual among the prophets because it recounts a story about the prophet himself rather than mainly preserving the words that he preached. Typically, the OT Prophetic Books do the latter; they provide little or no biographical information about the prophet whose name they bear, but they do preserve the text of the message that he was inspired to preach. In the case of Jonah, only five Hebrew words that he preached to the people of Assyria are preserved, those that are translate as "Forty days from now Nineveh will be overthrown" (Jon 3:4). The remainder of the book records a story about Jonah, in which he speaks often but not mainly as a prophet preaching to the audience to whom God sends him. Rather, the book describes his actions and words in connection with an assignment that he found difficult to accept from the Lord: to preach to an enemy nation (Assyria) with the attendant possibility that they would respond in such a way as to be shown mercy by God, an outcome that Jonah was determined to resist.

Other biblical stories tell about prophets who also took on difficult assignments. For example, Exodus 3—5 (and much of Ex 3—15) details Moses' challenge to serve God in a hostile Egypt, and parts of Jeremiah describe that prophet's woes encountered trying to convince the Israelites to accede to Babylonian conquest as God's will. To cite another example, several portions of Daniel contain accounts of Daniel's trials at the hands of the Babylonians and Persians. Jonah is thus not unique in containing biography of a prophet and his trials, but of the Prophetic Books, none other is so dominantly biographical and so minimally reflective of a prophet's preached words. Accordingly, the reader gets the message of the book mainly by evaluating what happened to Jonah and what he did in response rather than by analyzing what God told Jonah to say.

Jonah is one of the Bible's best-known characters. Even strangers to most biblical content have heard about Jonah and the "whale." Yet outside of the short book that bears his name, Jonah is mentioned in the OT only once (2 Kings 14:25), relative to his prophetic role in the reclaiming of traditional lands by northern Israel in the reign of Jeroboam II (793-753 BC). He is identified there as being from Gath-Hepher, a small city in Zebulun (probably modern Khirbet ez-Zurra, about three miles northeast of Nazareth).

Jonah's name means "dove" or "pigeon" in Hebrew, one of many biblical names taken from animals and not symbolic in any way of Jonah's character (Stuart, ISBE 3:483-88). The book of Jonah indicates that Jonah was, like many Israelites in his day, an ardent nationalist, pro-Israel, antiforeign, and particularly anti-Assyrian (cf. Nahum, esp. Nah 3:19). The book also describes him as a dedicated, disciplined, strong-willed prophet, a poet, and a person capable of being peevish and stubborn, even against God's will.

But these personal traits of the prophet Jonah are learned only as the book progresses. At the outset, nothing is known to the reader or revealed by the introductory words of the book other than the barest facts: he is the son of someone named "Amittai" (of whom nothing otherwise is known); he is a prophet; God has called him to preach to Nineveh. The reader is not required to know much about Jonah's background to appreciate the story. His age, marital status, family size, upbringing, past career, friendships, special skills and prior prophecies (without 2 Kings 14:25 we would not even know that there were any) are not mentioned. Thus, his past and future are not essential to the book's development. His story, for a period of time that took just a few weeks of his life, is the focus.

1. Structure and Content.

Jonah tells about a northern Israelite prophet, the story containing descriptions of his and others' actions, conversations that he had with others and with God, a poem of thanksgiving that he prayed after being delivered from drowning by a divinely appointed fish, the response to his message by the king and people of Nineveh, and an object lesson about caring for others taught to him by God via the growth and death of a plant. There are some slight differences between the Hebrew text and the English versions in verse numbering and boundaries in the first two chapters, but the content is the same.

The book begins with a brief superscription identifying Jonah, followed by the account of his attempt to run from an assignment from God to preach God's grace to the people of Nineveh, a task that he finds odious (Jon 1). But he cannot outrun an omnipresent, omnipotent God, and he ends up being thrown out of a ship and facing death by drowning in the Mediterranean Sea. But God has other plans for him and appoints a fish to swallow Jonah, who then eloquently thanks God for deliverance via a psalm of thanksgiving: he is in a fish, but he is alive (Jon 2)! After being disgorged by the fish and reaching Nineveh, he preaches a chance to repent, and the king and people of Nineveh respond with genuine *repentance, not to be confused with conversion to Judaism, which is not what his message is about (Jon 3). The final chapter of the book describes Jonah's vigil to see if, as he hoped, Nineveh would be destroyed for its *sins, and his bitter disappointment that it was not. The book ends with God's comparing Jonah's concern for a plant that gave him shade with God's concern for people and animals—life forms far more important than plants. It is not clear that Jonah gets the point that he too should be concerned for everyone, even his enemies, but the alert reader cannot miss that point and will learn an important lesson from Jonah's error (Jon 4).

2. Date and Setting.

Opinions as to the composition of the book fall within wide boundaries (ca. 750-250 BC) because there are no clear indicators within the book of the date of its writing. Four considerations are sometimes advanced as relevant to the dating: (1) the supposed Aramaisms in the language, such as bēšellēmî ("on whose account?" [Jon 1:7]) and bēšellî ("on my account" [Jon 1:12]); (2) the supposed dependence of certain motifs or theological considerations on the book of Jeremiah; (3) some putative verbal connections with Joel 2; (4) the supposedly erroneous identification of Nineveh as the actual royal capital of Assyria in Jonah's time.

With regard to Aramaisms, these have increasingly disappeared from scholarly debate, being replaced by Northwest Semitisms because many words previously identified as Aramaisms have turned up in early Northwest Semitic texts and Ugaritic texts, which cannot be later than 1200 BC, and the questionable arguments from silence on which such identifications were once made can now be dismissed as spurious. Indeed, none of the total of seven Aramaisms variously identified in the book fits for certain the criteria necessary to constitute a genuine Aramaism (so Loretz).

As to the possible dependence of Jonah on Jeremiah, the evidence is both minimal and ambiguous. The book of Jonah reminds its audience that God is willing to adjust his plans for a nation according to that nation's attitudes and actions before him, a concept expressed propositionally in Jeremiah 18:7-8. But similarity of concepts is not dependency of concepts, and it is more cogently attributable to the univocal nature of divine revelation throughout the Scripture than to a borrowing from Jeremiah on the part of the book of Jonah. For that matter, if Jonah actually prophesied during the first half of the eighth century BC, as 2 Kings 14:25 taken at face value affirms, and Jeremiah during the last third of the seventh century BC and beginning of the sixth, it would be historically more probable that if any sort of borrowing occurred, it was by Jeremiah from Jonah, not the other way around.

The connections of Jonah and Joel must be evaluated in much the same way, though here the issue centers only on the sharing of two virtually exact wordings (part of Jon 3:9 and Joel 2:14; part of Jon 4:2 and Joel 2:13), and it is not clear which prophet would be quoting from which, if any quoting in fact occurs (for the argument that Joel quotes from Jonah, see Magonet, 77-79). Both could have drawn upon a common source for their similar wordings.

Regarding the fourth consideration, Nineveh as the capital of Assyria during Jonah's time, see 6 below.

3. Canonization.

K. Budde suggested that Jonah was included among the Minor Prophets mainly to bring their number to twelve (see Twelve, Book of the). Some have speculated that Jonah is a midrash on one or another of the prophets. E. König opined that Jonah is a midrash on Obadiah 1; R. Coote, on Amos; and others, on Joel 2:13-14. But the degree to which Jonah functions as a midrash to any of these three books has not been easy for scholars to perceive, hence the wide disagreements among them.

It can be just as cogently argued that the placement of Jonah among the prophets resulted from a simple combination of its length, date and subject. Self-contained and brief, it fit easily with the so-called Latter Prophets in a way that the similar Elisha-Elijah stories, except if they were somehow stripped from their context and perhaps condensed, could not easily do. Early in date, at least in Jewish tradition, and quite defensibly in fact, it was sufficiently early that it was not relegated to the Writings (as was, for example, Daniel, a book later joined with the prophets in the Septuagintal, Latin and subsequent canonical orderings but not in Jewish tradition). Its subject matter was in part the call and preaching of a prophet, a concern not entirely removed in some aspects from a book such as Haggai or even Amos (see Amos 7). It is useful to remember that Jonah is atypical of the Prophetic Books primarily in regard to quantity; in regard to quality (i.e., categories rather than percentages), there is little in Jonah that is not represented to some degree elsewhere in the prophetic corpus. Its size, of course, is what makes it a minor (from the Latin for “smaller”) prophetic book.

4. Form and Style.

4.1. Form. Jonah is a prophetic narrative, paralleling in some ways the prophetic narratives in the books of Kings, but with the prophet portrayed in a distinctly negative light as one whose approach to fulfilling God’s call is incorrect. Whereas Elijah, for example, was a prophet who powerfully proclaimed the word of God against great odds (1 Kings 18–19), Jonah was a prophet who ran from God’s word when its implications were unpleasant to him.

All biblical narratives are didactic to one degree or another, but in the case of Jonah the narrator has carefully shaped the story for an obviously didactic purpose. There is, in fact, a flashback (Jon 4:5–11) and even a brief “flash forward” (Jon 1:16) in the book. Large blocks of time are passed over rapidly (the long trip from Palestine to Nineveh), while brief moments (Jonah’s *prayer in Jon 2; the conversation between God and Jonah in Jon 4) are given detailed attention. The focus can shift from Jonah onto others (to the sailors in Jon 1; to the Ninevites, including the king, in Jon 3) and back to Jonah again, and so on. Such narrative techniques build to the didactic purpose of the book, which is fully unveiled in the divine speeches in Jonah 4 (see Jon 4:4, 10–11). Thus, the book of Jonah may be described not simply as a prophetic narrative, but as a didactic prophetic narrative.

Additionally, Jonah is sensational literature. The book intends to arouse the imagination and emotion of the audience (the storm at sea, the fish story, the plant story, etc). In this sense, Jonah resembles the accounts in the early chapters of Daniel and the miracle stories in the accounts of Elisha’s ministry (mainly in 2 Kings 2–7). This does not mean, however, that it is less than fully historical.

As sensational, didactic, prophetic narrative, the book shares features with those genres of literature known as parable and allegory, but it is neither of these. Parables are brief (not four chapters long), normally containing a single scene or two, make comparison to people or things outside the story who are the real focus, and end with a punch line that draws the hearer up short as it teaches a lesson, the reader hopefully seeing a personally relevant truth in the story. And parables have anonymous figures as their characters. The book of Jonah borders on some of these characteristics but manifests none of them exactly. Moreover, parables are obviously fictional. That is, they are illustrative narrative rather than historical narrative. Jonah is by no means obviously fictional.

Nor is Jonah an allegory. An allegory is an extended analogy, sometimes including extended metaphors, in which the meaning of the story is found in concepts and actions outside the story to which the story points analogically. It would be an unusual allegory indeed that waited to the end (the fourth chapter in the case of Jonah) to reveal the point of its hero’s actions. Allegories are distinctly constructed so as to point beyond themselves at each stage. The figures in an allegory are patently symbolic and fictional, and the audience must realize this at once if the allegory is to be effective. Jonah does not fit this pattern either.

Jonah is also not midrash, even though, as noted above, some scholars have suggested that it should be understood this way. Midrash functions as commentary upon particular biblical texts and may include illustration as well as propositional explanation. Midrash is didactic, but by no means is all didactic literature, including narrative, to be identified as midrashic. For Jonah to be convincingly identified as a midrash, it would need to be demonstrated that the story was composed to serve as an illustrative explanation of something taught elsewhere in the OT. Not only can this never be done convincingly in light of the lack of data relevant to the task, but also it would be virtually the reverse of a typical late Jewish midrash. The early midrashim that we do know about are characterized by analytical discussion of stories, laws or other “primary” material. By its nature, Jonah appears far more likely to be not a midrash but rather primary material itself.

4.2. Style. Relatively simple vocabulary prevails throughout the book, something to be expected if the narrator did not wish the didactic impact of the story to be missed at any point owing to an overly complex style. Two vocabulary words have been selected by the narrator and used at various points in the story, each according to two aspects of their wide ranges of meaning: gādōl (“great,” etc.) and raʿ (“bad,” etc.). Capitalizing upon two nuances of each of these words is an effective unifying device, providing diversity (in meaning) while at the same time maintaining consistency (in form).

The adjective gādōl (“great”) appears fourteen times. It has the meaning “great” or “large” (in size or extent) eight times (Jon 1:4 [2x], 10, 12, 16, 17 [2:1 MT]; 4:1, 6). In addition, it has the meaning “important” (or, according to one’s translation preference, “key, chief, major”) six times (Jon 1:2; 3:2, 3, 5, 7; 4:11) either in reference to the “important” city of Nineveh or the “important” people in the city (i.e., its nobles or leaders). It is significant for the understanding of the story to see that the emphasis placed on Nineveh is not primarily in terms of its physical size but rather its importance to God. The reference to Nineveh’s population in Jonah 4:11 notwithstanding, the basic issue goes beyond Nineveh’s sheer bulk to its intrinsic value to God.

This value becomes evident partly in the usage of raʿ in the book. The word is used, in connection with Nineveh, to describe the troubles the city is having, not merely its *evil ways. To fail to recognize this sense of raʿ is to fail to see, for example, an early (Jon 1:2) adumbration of God’s compassionate concern for the city. God is as concerned about Nineveh’s miseries as he is angry at its evils, and the book’s audience did not have to wait until the end of Jonah 3 to gain a sense of that fact.

In total, the word raʿ appears nine times in the book. In only two instances does it mean “evil,” as the adjective (Jon 3:8, 10). In the other seven occurrences it is a noun, and it means “trouble” or a close synonym—for example, “disaster, misery, difficulty, harm,” depending on translation preference (Jon 1:2, 7, 8; 3:10; 4:1, 2, 6). The problems of the Assyrians in Nineveh move God to commission Jonah to preach there. The divine names vary (“Yahweh,” “Elohim,” “ha-Elohim,” “Yahweh-Elohim”), for the most part according to who is addressing the deity (generally, the pagans use “Elohim,” and Jonah uses “Yahweh,” as might be expected), and the exceptions to this pattern are not easily explained according to any didactic motif (for a contrary view, see Magonet, 33-38).

As sensational didactic historical narrative, Jonah shares a certain style with the Elijah-Elisha stories, the stories in the early chapters of Daniel, parts of Ruth and Esther and other OT portions as well (e.g., Ex 4:24-26; Num 12; Judg 14—16). This style wins an audience’s attention by its vividness. In spite of its selectivity, the style does not represent exaggeration or literary degradation. Jonah is not a sentimental story, nor is it a humorous one. It is told without embellishment but with an emphasis on engaging the imagination. When a hearer or reader can visualize a scene at each point, the impact of a story is always strong. Jonah is quite “scenic” in this sense, so much so that J. Watts divides the story according to its shifting “scenes.”

5. Unity and Integrity Vis-à-Vis the Psalm of Jonah.

The psalm in Jonah 2:2-9 (2:3-10 MT) has been the only part of the book seriously considered an interpolation. From time to time the psalm has been judged a later addition, usually on one or more of the following three grounds: (1) it may be excised without disrupting the story; (2) it is inappropriate, being a thanksgiving psalm when a *lament is called for; (3) it does not relate smoothly to the rest of the story in style, vocabulary, theology or overall impact.

Each of these objections to the appropriateness of the psalm raises questions. The ability to excise part of a literary work without doing damage to the remainder depends entirely on how one analyzes both the excision and the remainder of the text. An ability to excise does not equal, at any rate, a warrant to excise. Few stories contain segments so essential to the flow of the whole that an excision would render the remainder incoherent. Excisability is, in fact, never a legitimate indication of actual lack of integrity in a literary work. In the case of the psalm of Jonah, the same principle applies. However, it applies more easily when the psalm is wrongly interpreted relative to its relationship to the rest of the book. Should not the psalm be a lament rather than an expression of thanksgiving? B. Anderson originally stated the case typically: “The psalm is obviously out of place in its present context. In the belly of a ‘fish’ a cry for help (i.e., a lament) would be appropriate, but not a thanksgiving for deliverance already experienced!” (Anderson, 105). The trouble with this view is, of course, that the fish is precisely a vehicle of rescue in the story. Once Jonah is inside the belly of the fish, he has been delivered from drowning, as his conversation with the sailors in Jonah 1 makes clear (he tells them how to kill him in order to get rid of the storm, and drowning at sea is the method of killing him). A lament psalm would have been appropriate only while he was still sinking down into the Mediterranean. But by the time Jonah 2 arrives in the book, he has already experienced deliverance via the fish that God appointed to save him from drowning, and a thanksgiving psalm is the only sort of psalm fully appropriate to his situation then.

It is in the area of theology and applicational impact that the psalm, upon careful examination, turns out to be genuinely integral—nonexcisable—within the context of the overall message of the book. The full case has been argued convincingly by G. Landes, whose lengthy argument may be summarized briefly as follows. First, divine deliverance is a central theme in Jonah, and the psalm vividly advances this theme. Second, without the psalm, Jonah's attitude of gratefulness for his own deliverance is nowhere noted explicitly. It cannot then later serve as a contrast to his resentment at the deliverance of Nineveh. Third, when the component parts of the psalm are analyzed in detail, it becomes clear that "the psalm as it now stands is in the proper position, of an appropriate type, and agrees quite harmoniously with the situation of Jonah in the narrative, both in terms of his physical and psychological portrayal" (Landes, 30). Without the psalm, the story would be impoverished, leaving the reader with the impression of a more consistent, principled Jonah than the inspired narrator intends to convey.

6. Historicity.

One can appreciate the story of Jonah whether or not it represents actual historical events. The answer to the key question "What right do you have to be angry?" (Jon 4:4, 9) would still be "None!" even if the account were fictional. But the issue of historicity has important implications. If the events in the book actually happened, then the audience's existential identification with the characters and circumstances is invariably heightened. People act more surely upon what they believe to be true in fact than upon what they merely consider likely in theory.

It is important to note that there is ample evidence to support the historicity of the book, and surprisingly little to undermine it. The style, as noted above, is neutral to the question of historical accuracy; sensationalism can never be equivocated with a lack of factuality. A true story may be told in a host of ways, from dull to sensational, as may a false story, as may a fictional story. As to the improbability of the general repentance in Nineveh described in Jonah 3, this must now be tempered by the recognition that our historical evidence preserves the fact that things were not going well for the Ninevites at approximately the time Jonah served as a prophet (toward the end of the first half of the eighth century BC). Military and diplomatic losses internationally were coupled with famine and popular uprisings domestically during the time of Ashur-dan III (773-756 BC), the king most likely to be the monarch described in Jonah 3. In addition, both an earthquake and an eclipse, dreaded major omens to the highly superstitious Assyrians, were experienced concurrently to other problems occurring at that time. A weak monarch reeling from domestic and international turmoil could well have welcomed the chance to solidify his acceptance among a suspicious populace, already set on edge by the prevailing problems, via the sort of royal proclamation preserved in Jonah 3:7-9.

The idea that Nineveh could not have had a "king" is a problem often raised against the historical accuracy of the book. The assumption that the phrase "king of Nineveh" (melek nînwe) in Jonah 3:6 reflects both a lack of understanding of the Assyrian Empire (so that it is analogous to speaking of "the king of London" [Neil, 966]) and a befuddled historical memory (since Nineveh could not have been the capital of Assyria in Jonah's time, according to the Assyrian records themselves) has been a central objection to the book's historicity. The reply to this objection requires an appreciation of two facts: (1) "king of Nineveh" is a simple, comprehensible phrase in the context of the book; (2) it is entirely possible that an Assyrian king would be present in Nineveh early in the eighth century BC whether or not Nineveh was technically the capital (the concept of a national capital being mainly a modern notion, at any rate) of the Assyrian Empire.

Regarding the first problem, it was common for a king to be designated by only one city within the region he ruled. For example, in Deuteronomy 1:4; 3:2; 4:46 Sihon is called "king of the Amorites,” but in Deuteronomy 2:24, 26, 30 Sihon is called “king of Heshbon.” Similarly, Jabin is called “king of Canaan/the Canaanites” in Judges 4:2, 23, 24, but “king of Hazor” in Judges 4:17. In other words, a king could be associated with a capital or main city within his empire, as well as with the empire itself (see, e.g., 2 Sam 8:5; 1 Kings 11:23, where Haddadzer’s kingship is associated with “Zobah” even though his control extended considerably further). An especially close parallel to “king of Nineveh” is found in 1 Kings 21:1, where Ahab is called “king of Samaria” (melek šōmērôn), in contrast to “king of Israel,” the title used for him routinely elsewhere. If Ahab can be called “king of Samaria,” surely there can be no valid objection to Ashur-dan III (or whoever was the king who responded to Jonah’s preaching) being called “king of Nineveh” in Jonah 3:6.

But, second, how could there be a king in Nineveh in Jonah’s time? Did not Nineveh become the actual capital of the Assyrian Empire only in the time of Sennacherib (705-682 BC), as is commonly alleged? In fact, Nineveh may well have been at least an alternate capital, if not the capital of Assyria throughout much of the first half of the eighth century BC. We know, for example, that Shalmaneser I (1275-1246 BC) began an expansion of the city, and that by the time of Tiglath-Pileser I (1114-1076 BC), Nineveh had become an alternative royal residence to both Ashur and Calah. Thereafter, a palace of some sort appears to have been established in the city and used by various kings, including Ashurnasirpal II (883-859 BC) before Jonah’s time, and Sargon II (722-705 BC) after Jonah’s time. It therefore is likely that Nineveh functioned as a royal residence, even if not the capital technically, during most of the eighth century BC (see Thompson and Hutchinson; Parrot). Our knowledge of the affairs of the weak kings of Assyria between the latter years of Adad-nirari III (811-784 BC) and Tiglath-Pileser III (745-728 BC) is spotty. It is probable, however, that each of these kings (Shalmaneser IV [783-774 BC], Ashur-dan III [773-756 BC] and Ashur-nirari V [755-746 BC]) ruled at least part of the time from Nineveh. Ashur-dan III shifted his residence at least once, and possibly more. Thus, regardless of whether the ancient Assyrians thought of capitals in the same way that moderns do, it is clear that Nineveh, because of its size and wealth, became de facto the chief city of the Neo-Assyrian Empire and host to royalty during much of that period. There is therefore nothing in the phrase “king of Nineveh” in Jonah 3:6 that can be falsified historically.

The actions of the king and of the people of Nineveh in response to Jonah’s preaching there as described in Jonah 3 can be appreciated in light of the relative weakness of the Assyrians during the first half of the eighth century BC. Prior to the accession to the throne by Tiglath-Pileser III in 745 BC, the Assyrian Empire was teetering politically, especially in international diplomatic-military influence. One reason for this was the fairly constant military encroachment by the neighboring nations of Aram (to the northeast) and Urartu (to the northwest, a kingdom centered around Lake Van in the Armenian highlands). The Assyrian Eponym Chronicle is an important source for understanding Assyrian weakness and the attendant problems experienced by the people of Assyria at this time. G. Roux describes the situation bluntly: “for thirty-six years (781-745 BC) Assyria was practically paralysed” (Roux, 274). After the death of the Assyrian king Adad-Nirari III (810-783 BC) and before the ascendancy of the empire builder Tiglath-Pileser III (745-727 BC), Assyria endured nearly four decades of turmoil. Kings were weak, the nation was disunited and provincial in its governance, and individual cities bore more significance as centers of economic and political power than did the country as a whole. During these years, as W. Hallo points out, “even the central provinces maintained only a tenuous loyalty to Assyria, for the various governors ruled in virtual independence” (Hallo and Simpson, 131). Thus, the wording of Jonah 3:7 (“By the decree of the king and his nobles”) is given attention by commentators such as F. Page, citing the work of P. Lawrence and A. Grayson, noting that “the precarious position of the king may have necessitated his acknowledging in his decree the power and influence of surrounding provincial governors” (Page, 205).

7. Sources and Authorship.

As a vehicle for divine revelation, the narrator of the book would hardly have been dependent exclusively on human sources for the details of the story. Yet from a human point of view, virtually all the data from which the story is constructed could have been supplied by two sources: Jonah and at least one of the sailors mentioned in Jonah 1. Any of the sailors, whose ship eventually returned to safety, would have been an adequate source for information on what happened while Jonah was asleep (Jon 1:5) and after he was thrown overboard (Jon 1:15, 16). Every other detail used in the book could have come from Jonah himself, who had ample opportunity to observe and inquire about, in and around Nineveh, those events that he himself may not have actually witnessed (e.g., the king's actions in Jon 3:6, if in fact Jonah did not appear in person before the king).

Jonah's travel to Nineveh is somewhat paralleled by the missions of Elijah to Sidon and Elisha to Syria. Jonah may have traveled farther than those prophets, but certainly he did not travel uniquely—except, of course, for his unusual mode of travel through part of the Mediterranean. Travel to deliver a divine message is also characteristic of the paradigm OT prophet, Moses, who went from Midian to Egypt on a comparably dangerous assignment to confront a royal enemy at the head of a great hostile nation. Further, all four of these prophets' stories include a rather large concentration of miracles, in light of which the story of Jonah is not so unusual as is sometimes thought.

From a technical point of view, the book of Jonah is sufficiently unified in theme and style (on the psalm in Jon 2, see 5 above and 9.2 below) in a manner suggesting a single narrator. Earlier attempts such to argue that Jonah had a history of composite authorship and/or editing (e.g., Böhme; Köhler; Winckler; Schmidt) relied almost exclusively on evolutionistic literary theories rather than hard data.

Of the narrator, however, we know little. On the basis of the use of hāyā ("to be") in the past tense in describing Nineveh in Jonah 3:3, the assumption sometimes has been made that the narrator wrote after 612 BC, after Nineveh fell to the Babylonians and was destroyed. This dating depends upon taking the sentence in question to read, in essence, "Nineveh was a city . . ."; that is, it is a city no longer from the perspective of the narrator and his or her audience. However, if the sentence is understood to describe Nineveh's importance to God's plan at that time—"Nineveh was a city important to God" (gēdōlā lē'lohīm)—then the relative distance of the narrator from the story is impossible to fix with certainty. Depending on how one takes one or two wordings, the book could be the product of a contemporary of Jonah (or Jonah himself [see below]), someone writing within a short time after the death of Jonah, or of a considerably later time when the importance of the story for its message was especially welcome and/or needed. Besides this, the Hebrew narrative style calls for the past tense generally in this sort of story about a prophet regardless of proximity to the events. Thus, the importance of the past tense of hāyā in Jonah 3:3 is easily overrated and potentially misleading.

Could the narrator have been Jonah himself? Though possible, this usually is thought unlikely in a story so critical of Jonah's hypocrisy, ending with a description of his almost childish stubbornness against the point that God makes via the object lesson of the plant. But time and God's influence on any person's outlook can change even a stubborn attitude. It is conceivable that a contrite Jonah might eventually admit that he had been entirely wrong in his former attitudes and actions. Does he not learn in the process of events that disobedience to God's commands is futile? If the events described in the book are true, could not Jonah have been changed into a more willing and humble vehicle for God's will, and have swallowed his pride and written the account that we now read in the little book that bears his name? By way of parallel, the NT Gospels display a variety of indicators that they are the product of eyewitnesses (Bauckham), yet they are remarkable for their blunt portrayal of the disciples as being well worthy of Jesus' frequent criticisms for their lack of faith and judgment and their seeming inability to "connect the dots" of the teachings that he gave them (e.g., Mt 8:26; 14:31; 16:8; Lk 24:44-45; Jn 14:19). Somewhat comparably, Paul in his own writings strongly bemoans his former status as a persecutor of the church and one who trusted in legal obedience for salvation. Similarly, Moses does not paint a glowing picture of himself, his popularity and his leadership skills at several key points in the Pentateuch, and Amos acknowledges the rejection of his preaching in the north via reporting highly critical comments of himself (Amos 7). Similarly, Jeremiah describes his personal discouragement and despondency as well as the frequent rejection of his preaching in various points in the book that bears his name.

By no means does this sort of argument prove that Jonah was the author of the book of Jonah. Nothing in the book demands that Jonah be the author; and nothing in Jonah's story would automatically be enhanced if Jonah could somehow be proved to have written it or to have been the informant for the person who did. However, the fact that he might have written it does serve to suggest that arguments that assume that the book must have been written long after the life of the prophet described therein, let alone arguments that assume that the book is merely fictional, are less cogent than has often been thought.

8. Text.

The text of Jonah is well preserved. Variants are few and do not display any sort of fixed pattern. Even the Targum is only mildly expansionistic, in contrast to its substantial tendency toward commentary and explanation in other books of the Minor Prophets. The quality of the text means that careful linguistic analysis can be undertaken with confidence in any wording under analysis. For example, the translation of the last few words of Jonah 1:2 should be "their trouble is of concern to me," a translation that gives a very different impression to the reader from the usual "their evil has come up before me" or the like, and that is essential for understanding why Jonah tried to escape his divine assignment to preach in Nineveh. It presumably was easier for ancient scribes to preserve the text of an easy-to-follow mostly prose story like that of Jonah more accurately over the centuries, as compared to poetry or more complex prose narratives.

9. Message and Purpose.

9.1. Basic Message. On one level, the message of Jonah is simply "Do not be like Jonah." Jonah gladly receives deliverance and blessing (via the fish, which is not a punishment but rather a means of rescue), yet he stubbornly refuses to see his enemies, the Assyrians, receive the same. But the story also emphasizes the character and power of God. God's servants can neither oppose him and succeed nor expect him to be unfaithful to his own character of patience, forgiveness and eagerness to forestay harm. The book, in other words, is about Jonah's hatred of his enemies, but it is especially also about God's compassion on his. What happens to Nineveh and to Jonah happens precisely because of what God is like. Thus, the audience of the book is invited implicitly to revise their understanding of what God is like, if indeed they have shared Jonah's selfish views about how God should want to handle the Assyrians.

In ancient Judaism the book served as a bulwark against the narrow particularism that allowed Jews to think that they alone were worthy of God's blessing. To a more modern reader, the message may be seen in light of Jesus' own teaching about forgiveness: it is the sinners, not the righteous, who most often may recognize their need for forgiveness and do something about it (Jon 3:5-10; Mt 12:41; cf. Lk 15:10). No one should oppose God's mercy in receiving sinners into the kingdom.

At one time it was popular to assume that Jonah was written as a kind of universalistic treatise against the supposedly rigid, narrow reformist views of Ezra and Nehemiah. This view rightly lost favor on two accounts. First, the book is hardly universalistic. The book nowhere implies that the Ninevites somehow became, as it were, God's chosen nation by reason of their occasion of repentance at Jonah's preaching, or even that their repentance was anything like an actual conversion to Yahwism and the Mosaic covenant. Second, the predominant concerns of Ezra and Nehemiah were the restoration of pentateuchal *worship practices, the security of Jerusalem, the elimination of foreign influences and the prevention of mixed marriages. The fact that Jonah addresses none of these topics, even indirectly, means that it probably would never have occurred to the ancient Jews of the mid-fifth century BC that Jonah somehow was an attack on Ezra and Nehemiah. The double question in Jonah 4:4, 9, "What right do you have to be angry?" (hahêlêb hârâ lāk), is a key to the book's central message. The climax of the story comes here, when God challenges Jonah to recognize how wrong he has been in his bitter nationalism, and how right God has been to show compassion toward the plight of the Assyrians in Nineveh. The person who resents the mercy of God to his or her enemies shows enmity to God's purposes and discontinuity with God's thinking. Every reader must reflect on the questions that God asks, including the final, specific, "Should I not spare Nineveh?" (Jon 4:11). Anyone who replies, "Why is that such an important question?" has not understood the message. Anyone who replies, "No!" has not believed it.

9.2. The Message of the Book Passage by Passage.

The first passage (Jon 1:1-3) describes Jonah's rebellion against God's call. He wants to avoid being part of the means by which God will show compassion to Israel's enemy, Assyria (specifically its capital, Nineveh), because he understands God's words, as best translated from the Hebrew, to mean "Speak against it because their trouble [not 'evil'] is of concern to me." In other words, God has announced that he intends to consider showing mercy to the Assyrians, and Jonah wants none of it. This frames Jonah's further actions in the book.

The next passage (Jon 1:4-16) shows that God, not Jonah, is in charge everywhere, and that Jonah cannot run from God in spite of his hope to do so. Jonah is a flawed prophet whose theology was not always correct. He seems to have believed, as many ancient pagans did, that a god's influence was limited mainly to the locale of the worshippers. But in fact, the book shows that the true God is omnipresent and omnipotent, controlling even the weather (which most ancients would have thought to be the province of a separate weather god). Jonah 1:16 is a sort of coda revealing a follow-up fact: even the pagan sailors got the point that Yahweh was to be feared and his word to be obeyed. Seeing Jonah prohibited from fleeing God by a severe storm gave them a very clear idea of who was in charge.

In the next passage (Jon 1:17—2:10) Jonah prays from inside a fish that God designates to swallow him. This is not punishment but rather rescue, as Jonah's psalm (Jon 2:2-9) shows, since as a psalm of thanksgiving it clearly indicates by its very nature his understanding that he has been spared, not condemned. His eloquent gratitude for God's mercy to him, a sinner, provides an unmistakable contrast to his later resentment at God's mercy to the people of Nineveh, also sinners.

A second beginning of sorts is described in the next passage (Jon 3:1-3a). Now Jonah obeyed and went to Nineveh, however reluctantly or resentfully. Then follows a passage describing the eager repentance of the people of Nineveh (Jon 3:3b-10), including the key words "on the first day." In the ancient world a visit by a dignitary to a foreign country normally required three days: the first to arrive and present one's credentials and purpose, the second to conduct business, and the third for a proper conclusion and send-off. But the people of Nineveh could not wait for the second and third days; they jumped at the chance to repent on the first day, as soon as they knew why Jonah had come to them. From king to animals, they formally displayed an attitude of mourning for their sins and asked Jonah's great God for forgiveness. This was not conversion to the God of the Bible, but it was real repentance by people whose problems (the Assyrians were economically in distress and under attack from enemies at this time in history) made them realize their need of divine help.

In the final passage (Jon 4:1-11) God teaches Jonah about anger and compassion. Jonah immediately becomes angry that Nineveh is spared, but God is slow to anger, as Jonah in fact knew all along (Jon 4:2-3). Jonah is so angry at the grace that his enemy, Nineveh/Assyria, has received that he wants to die. But he has no right to be angry (Jon 4:4). God, however, has every right to be slow to anger—that is, merciful and forgiving—as Jonah 4:5-11 illustrates: God controls nature once again, this time not a fish but a plant, in such a way that Jonah begins to love that plant because it gave him shade from the blazing sun of Mesopotamia. God then reminds Jonah, via appeal to the commonsense hierarchy of life (plants, animals, humans), that if Jonah loved a plant and wanted it spared, it should be obvious, a fortiori, that God loves animals and people and desires that they be spared. Such should always be the attitude of God's people: why seek the consequence of someone's sin if that person's repentance could instead result in God's favor?

9.3. The Special Importance of Jonah 4:2 and of Jonah 4 in General. By including in the story Jonah's admission of the fact that he had fled from God because he knew that God is compassionate, the narrator effectively silences all speculation about Jonah's motives. "What is God really like?" is thus a much more important question in this book than the question "What was Jonah really like?" God is a God of grace, of whom it is hopeless—indeed, hypocritical—to expect a display of grace only to his own people. It was God's grace that Jonah resented so violently—except, of course, when he was the recipient.

Jonah's famous confession (Jon 4:2) extols divine grace and does not restrict to any person or group God's forgiveness and willingness to reconsider bringing harm. Jonah, from the moment he first heard God's call to preach repentance to the Ninevites, had made up his mind that Nineveh ought to be destroyed. God had a better idea.

Prophetic books do not necessarily come to a climactic resolution in a final chapter. Some do not end with a resolution at all. For example, the final chapter in Jeremiah describes the desolation of Judah and Jerusalem and the exile of its leading people, and it concludes with the modestly positive but otherwise historically minor note that the last legitimate king of Judah, Jehoiachin (who reigned briefly in 598 BC), had been shown mercy by a relatively obscure Babylonian king, Evil-Merodach (Babylonian Awil-marduk).

Jonah, on the other hand, ends with the whole point of the story in Jonah 4: God wants to show mercy to all, if they will respond to his offer of grace. His special love for Israel does not mean that he has no plan for or interest in other *nations. The chapter vividly and dramatically shows Jonah arguing for his own interests (even for a plant that gave him shade) against God, who, from a much more authoritative position, of course, teaches Jonah that his attitude should include mercy toward the interests of other people, people such as the Ninevites, whom he should have been glad to see come to repentance at his preaching.

JUSTICE, RIGHTEOUSNESS

The interrelated concepts of justice and righteousness inform the exhortations and encouragement communicated by the biblical prophets as they act as intermediaries between God, king and covenant people. The terms mišpāt ("justice") and šedeq, šēdāqā, šaddīq ("righteousness," "righteous one") are found individually, as word pairs and as concatenations with other significant terms, such as ʿāśā ("to do"), throughout the prophetic literature of the OT. Although justice and righteousness often are characterized as legal terms, an overview of the terms as used within the Prophetic Books indicates that these concepts are indicative of God's expectations for his people with regard to every aspect of society. These terms are used with reference not only to legal matters, but also to the royal court, aspects of *worship, and community well-being.

1. The Vocabulary of Justice and Righteousness
2. Literary Use of "Justice" and "Righteousness" in the Old Testament Prophets
3. Rhetoric and Reality

1. The Vocabulary of Justice and Righteousness.

1.1. Definitions. The Hebrew term mišpāt ("justice") is found in all of the Major Prophets and several of the Minor Prophets, including Hosea, Joel, Amos, Micah, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Zechariah and Malachi. Most frequently mišpāt is translated as "justice," although the semantic range includes concepts of judging and judgment, rules and ruling, and being just and right. The term mišpāt is used to describe legal situations, particularly when found in parallel construction with the forensic root dyn ("to judge," "judgment") in verses such as Jeremiah 5:28; Isaiah 3:13-14. It is also used to evaluate and critique social and economic relationships within the *covenant community (Is 1:11-17; Jer 22:3, 15-16; Amos 5:21-24; Mic 6:6-8).

Hebrew terms derived from the root šdq are also found throughout the Prophetic Books. These terms include the noun forms šedeq and šēdāqā (“righteousness”) and the substantival adjective šaddiq (“righteous one”). The substantival form “righteous one” can refer to God (Is 24:16; Jer 12:1; Zeph 3:5), society (Is 53:11 [when the servant is understood to be Israel]) and individual humans (Is 26:7; Ezek 3:20; Amos 5:12; Hab 2:4). The use of this term to refer both to God and to his people highlights the relational nature of righteousness: even as God is righteous, so his people are to be righteous. Additionally, even as God is the arbiter of justice, so his people are to exhibit justice in their relationships with one another. This is especially important for kings and leaders because the consequences of their behavior devolve upon their subjects (Jer 22:3; Ezek 45:9) (see Leadership).

1.2. Syntax. In OT prophetic texts the terms mišpāt (“justice”) and šedeq, šēdāqā and šaddiq (“righteousness,” “righteous one”) appear individually, as word pairs and in concatenation with other terms. When mišpāt and šedeq/šēdāqā appear as a word pair, they form a particularly significant hendiadys pertaining to the right ordering of society within God’s covenant community (Weinfeld, 228). In texts such as Hosea 2:21-22; Isaiah 16:5; Jeremiah 9:24 “justice” and “righteousness” are grouped with other significant terms, creating still greater rhetorical impact. In Hosea 2:21 God’s promise of a future relationship with Israel is stated in a marital metaphor that contains the word pair “righteousness and justice” followed by the word pair “goodness and mercy” and the single term “faithfulness.” Isaiah 16:5 describes the characteristics of a future leader who will sit on a throne characterized by “goodness,” “faithfulness,” “justice” and “righteousness.” In Jeremiah 9:23-24 God discloses himself as one who acts with “kindness,” “justice” and “righteousness” in the world. In these verses “goodness” and “kindness” are used to translate the Hebrew term hesed, which is associated with covenant love and loyalty. The term acts as a linguistic echo of the covenant relationship between God and his people.

2. Literary Use of “Justice” and “Righteousness” in the Old Testament Prophets.

A literary-rhetorical approach to prophetic literature is effective because prophetic speech is persuasive speech: the message of the prophet is that of an intermediary between God and his people. Because prophetic speech and its literary presentation are intended to persuade a given audience, the speakers and writers use a variety of genres, such as prose, poetry and discursive speech, in crafting their message. They use various figures of speech, such as metaphor, simile and repetition. Conceptual metaphor is often present: ideas such as “God is judge,” which assigns an array of knowledge regarding the law court to the relationship between God and his people, run through the texts. These techniques are used in the prophetic text to highlight the importance of justice and righteousness for a community called by God.

2.1. Rhetorical Use of “Justice” and “Righteousness” in the Major Prophets. It is well recognized that the canonical texts of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Daniel exhibit a multilayered composition history (Carroll, 38) (see Formation of the Prophetic Books). The presence of multiple speech situations in each of these books adds complexity to interpreting the texts. A variety of voices resonate within each text, including those of the prophets themselves and those of subsequent editors. Those receiving the message of the prophets and editors include both the original audience and those to whom the texts were presented in later contexts. Voices cajole, criticize and comfort the hearers as the call to do justice and to be righteous echoes from situation to situation.

2.1.1. Justice and Righteousness in Isaiah. The interwoven themes of justice and righteousness are most prevalent in the book of Isaiah, as evidenced by the use of both terms throughout the book. In his discussion of the Isaiah text, J. Goldingay notes that “justice” and “right” (the same Hebrew term that is translated as “righteousness”) permeate the entire text (Goldingay, 9). The prophet’s call to “keep justice and do righteousness” at Isaiah 56:1 introduces the third major section of the book. It combines the interests of the first section (Is 1–39), which emphasizes Israel’s role in seeking and maintaining righteousness, and the second section (Is 40–55), which emphasizes God’s role as the just and righteous one. In Isaiah 41:2 the nominal term šedeq might also convey the sense of “victor” (so the NRSV): the one whom God calls to administer justice will surely be victorious. The conditional clause in Isaiah 56:1, “for soon my salvation will come, and my deliverance will be revealed,” highlights the relational nature of justice and righteousness for a people who are to seek after these qualities and their just and righteous God. For the book of Isaiah, justice and righteousness are rhetorically significant from the perspective of the text as a whole.

The book of Isaiah contains both poetry and prose, but references to justice and righteousness cluster in sections that scan as poetry. This is significant for those who see poetry as representative of the original words of the prophet, as it implies that doing justice and being righteous are important concerns both for the prophet and for the original audience. Because the themes run throughout the book, it follows that these issues were of continuing concern for later audiences as well. The subject matter of the references varies: there are accusations, such as the discussion of inappropriate worship at Isaiah 1:12-17 (cf. Is 1:21; 5:7; 59:8); descriptions of the identity and actions of God (Is 5:16; 30:18; 40:14; 51:4); and indications of future restoration (Is 1:27; 28:6-7; 32:1, 16; 33:5; 56:1). In Isaiah 9:7 there is a discussion of the distant future that includes a description of the one who will sit on the throne of David: “His authority shall grow continually, and there shall be endless peace for the throne of David and his kingdom. He will establish it and uphold it with justice and with righteousness from this time onward and forevermore” (see also Is 16:3, 5). There is an explanation of the role of the servant in Isaiah 42:1, 3-4 as one who is to “bring forth” justice to the nations and to “establish” justice on the earth. Isaiah’s confession on behalf of the people repeatedly mentions the failure to maintain justice and righteousness according to covenant expectations (Is 59:9-11, 15). The role of doing justice and being righteous within the themes of accusation, restoration and future faithful leadership through the line of David permeate the message of Isaiah.

The role of doing justice and being righteous finds its way from the book of Isaiah to the NT by way of direct quotations, allusions and echoes of some of these verses. In Matthew 12:18-21 the Gospel writer quotes Isaiah 42:1-4 to support the idea that Jesus’ retreat from confrontation with the Pharisees was done in fulfillment of this passage (Williamson, 143). In Luke 1:32-33 the words of the angel Gabriel to Mary, “the Lord God will give to him the throne of his ancestor David,” are an echo of Isaiah 9:7. Quotations, allusions and echoes are important for linking the theology of the OT with that of the NT.

Given the frequent references to justice and righteousness in the poetic texts of Isaiah, it is somewhat surprising to note the paucity of literary features such as metaphor, simile and repetition used to elaborate upon these concepts. Since the terms often are presented in a straightforward manner, conceptual metaphor (an understanding taken from cognitive linguistics) is a fruitful way to explore the use of these terms in prophetic text. While conceptual metaphor often underlies instances of literary metaphor, conceptual metaphor may also be observed in narrative text and ordinary speech as well. Simply stated, conceptual metaphor involves “understanding one conceptual domain in terms of another conceptual domain” (Kövecses, 4). Two conceptual domains are involved: the “source domain” provides metaphorical expressions that are used to understand information in the “target domain.” Conceptual metaphor comprises nonlinguistic concepts that underlie specific instances of linguistic expression. These may include concepts such as SOCIETY IS A PERSON and SOCIETY IS A PLANT (conventionally indicated by small capital letters). In each of these examples, “society” is the target domain, while “person” and “plant” are source domains. Conceptual metaphor plays upon the way things work in the world: plants are sown, they flourish, they bear fruit and they wither away; people grow, they behave in certain ways, and they have familiar characteristics.

The “society is a person” and “society is a plant” conceptual metaphors are at work in the Isaiah text. Isaiah 1:21 reads, “How the faithful city has become a harlot, she that was full of justice! Righteousness lodged in her, but now murderers (RSV). In this accusation the city is characterized as a harlot. The underlying conceptual metaphor, “society is a person,” encourages the reader to understand all of society in terms of a person of questionable and undesirable moral standing. Without naming names, the inhabitants of the city are critiqued and found wanting due to the lack of justice practiced therein. The conceptual metaphor “society is a plant” underlies the Song of the Vineyard in Isaiah 5:1-7. Here, the people are understood in terms of a carefully planted and tended vine (see Floral Imagery). It is only at the point of harvest that the owner of the vineyard discovers that the vine has produced an unexpected type of fruit. In the normal course of plant growth a given type of plant can be counted upon to produce a normal crop, hence the element of surprise when the grapes turn out to be wild rather than domesticated. God’s disappointment with the situation is clear in Isaiah 5:7: “For the vineyard of the LORD of hosts is the house of Israel, and the people of Judah are his pleasant planting; he expected justice, but saw bloodshed; righteousness, but heard a cry!” (NRSV). This verse also contains a notable word play with the Hebrew terms for “justice/bloodshed” and “righteousness/cry.” While the Hebrew word play tends to become muted in translation, the “society is a plant” conceptual metaphor works well cross-linguistically: something unexpected and undesirable has taken place.

2.1.2. Justice and Righteousness in Jeremiah.

The themes of justice and righteousness are prevalent in the book of Jeremiah. The book reflects the language and thought of Deuteronomy and is particularly concerned with the consequences of the broken covenant, which leads to God’s judgment upon the Judah and Jerusalem (Deut 28). While the call to turn from false worship and injustice and to return to right relationship with God is heard throughout the book, the specifics of what it means to do justice and to be righteous are more fully addressed in the first part of the book. The terms mišpāt (“justice”) and šedeq and šēdāqā (“righteousness”) are clustered in Jeremiah 2–25, the first of four major sections, which contains poems and sermons against Jerusalem and Judah. The details of what it means to do justice are elaborated upon in the prophet’s instructions to the king of Judah at Jeremiah 22:3, where he states, “Act with justice and righteousness, and deliver from the hand of the oppressor anyone who has been robbed. And do no wrong or violence to the alien, the orphan, and the widow, or shed innocent blood in this place” (NRSV). The terms are used more sparsely in the following three sections. The second section, Jeremiah 26–36, comprises narratives about Jeremiah and discussion of future restoration. In this section the term mišpāt is used to describe two legal matters concerning Jeremiah. At Jeremiah 26:10 the priests and prophets declare that Jeremiah deserves “the sentence of death” because he had prophesied against the temple. At Jeremiah 32:7-8 Jeremiah receives a request from his cousin Hanamel, who asks Jeremiah to use his right of redemption to buy the field at Anathoth. The term mišpāt is used only once in the third section, Jeremiah 37–45, when King Nebuchadnezzar passes sentence on King Zedekiah (Jer 39:5). In the fourth section, Jeremiah 46–51, the term mišpāt is translated as “judgment” at Jeremiah 48:21, 47; 51:9. Thus, although the themes of justice and righteousness are significant for a large portion of the book, they are not rhetorically significant for shaping the whole of the text.

The terms “justice” and “righteousness” are found across genres in the book of Jeremiah, evenly divided between prose and poetry. Some of the clearest statements regarding what doing justice entails are found in the prose of Jeremiah’s Temple Sermon in Jeremiah 7:1-15. In this section Jeremiah states, “If you truly amend your ways and your doings, if you truly act justly one with another, if you do not oppress the alien, the fatherless or the widow, or shed innocent blood in this place, and if you do not go after other gods . . .” (Jer 7:5-6 NRSV). Positively stated, these are the behaviors that God expects of his people.

As in the book of Isaiah, the references to justice and righteousness in Jeremiah are relatively unadorned with literary features such as metaphor, simile and repetition. The “people are plants” conceptual metaphor is present in the description of the righteous Branch in Jeremiah 23:5; 33:15, where a future king is described in terms of a flourishing plant or tree. In both verses this king “shall execute justice and righteousness in the land.” This is a particularly poignant in Jeremiah 23, where the first four verses contain a woe oracle directed against the sheep-scattering bad shepherds who have led the people into disaster.

2.1.3. Justice and Righteousness in Ezekiel. The themes of justice and righteousness are significant for the book of Ezekiel. T. Renz, who takes a rhetorical approach to the book, explains that the overarching aim of the book is “to establish a specific type of community by promoting certain values” (Renz, 59). In this book Ezekiel is speaking to an audience already in *exile. For this audience, the option of doing justice as a means of staving off God's judgment is no longer possible. Rather, it is imperative that the community discovers the means for addressing issues of *sin and judgment in a context that is bereft of *land, status, city, *temple and king (Joyce, 17). For the exiles, choosing righteousness is seen to be the correct response to fall of Jerusalem.

The terms "justice" and "righteousness" appear in rhetorically significant clusters in the various sections of Ezekiel. Ezekiel 1—24 is written in a forensic tone and seeks to explain the judgment on Judah and Jerusalem to the exilic community in Babylon. In this section the issue of righteousness first appears within Ezekiel's call account, where Ezekiel is given the somber task of warning the people. This is stated in life-and-death terms: "If the righteous turn from their righteousness and commit iniquity . . . , they shall die" (Ezek 3:20 NRSV). In Ezekiel 18 the prophet uses a case law format to explore what it means to "do what is lawful and right." The phrase is repeated at Ezekiel 18:5, 19, 21, 27. Ezekiel 18:5 begins, "If a man is righteous and does what is lawful and right. . . ." This is followed by a detailed list in Ezekiel 18:7-8: no idol worship, integrity regarding a neighbor's wife and ritual purity with regard to approaching a woman, not oppressing others, no robbery, taking care of the hungry and poor, not charging interest, not committing iniquity, executing justice in court, following God's statutes and ordinances. At Ezekiel 18:9 God declares that this man will live. An unrighteous son who does all of these things is introduced at Ezekiel 18:10. He will die because of his choices. His son, seeing his father's fate, chooses the righteous way and lives. This section often is seen as a statement of individual responsibility regarding sin and judgment, but P. Joyce rightly points out that the arguments appear in a corporate context, where the sin and punishment of the nation are in view (Joyce, 25). Ezekiel uses both repetition and the "God is judge" conceptual metaphor in Ezekiel 18. As a result, argumentation in this chapter is memorable and effective.

The theme of righteousness is also important for the last half of the book. The theme of righteousness is absent in the oracles against the *nations in Ezekiel 25—32, but it reappears in Ezekiel 33. This chapter acts as a hinge between the first part of the book and Ezekiel 34—48, which is written in a political tone and describes a future restoration of Jerusalem.

2.1.4. Justice and Righteousness in Daniel. The theme of righteousness is important to the book of Daniel, although sedeq is not a rhetorically overarching term in the text. There is a marked shift in genre between court legends in Daniel 1—6 and apocalyptic visions in Daniel 7—12. In the first section Daniel's position as an advisor in the royal court in Babylon is in view. At Daniel 4:27 Daniel interprets King Nebuchadnezzar's dream and urges him, "Break off your sins by practicing righteousness, and your iniquities by showing mercy to the oppressed" (RSV), in order to avoid the consequences of the king's ominous dream in Daniel 4:7-14. In the second section the issue of righteousness arises in the context of Daniel's prayer in Daniel 9:1-27, in which Daniel explores the seventy weeks of punishment first described in Jeremiah 25:11-12. Daniel's confession is based upon the presuppositions of covenant obligations, and the issue of righteousness is a thematic thread running through the whole section. In Daniel 9:4-14 he acknowledges that God is faithful even though the people have sinned and failed to keep the covenant (Dan 9:7, 9:18). Daniel's prayer is perhaps one of the clearest articulations within the prophetic corpus of the consequences of breach of covenant.

2.2. Rhetorical Use of "Justice" and "Righteousness" in the Minor Prophets. The themes of justice and righteousness are important to several of the Minor Prophets. The terms "righteousness" and "justice" appear in seven of the twelve books, including Hosea, Amos, Micah, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Zechariah and Malachi. With the exception of Zechariah, which contains only the term "righteousness" (Zech 8:8), the terms are used individually in each book at least once in each book. Hosea, Amos and Habakkuk each use the word pair "justice and righteousness," which emphasizes the right ordering of society within the covenant community. The most significant rhetorical units that utilize these terms are Hosea 2:19-20, which is an announcement of future restoration for Israel; Amos 5:1—6:14, which is an extended judgment oracle against Israel; and Micah 3:1-12, which is a reflection of failed leadership that led to the fall of Jerusalem. Thus, although the terms are not used as overarching ordering devices for the final form of these texts, they are rhetorically significant for smaller units of text.

Conceptual metaphor is a powerful way to highlight the issues of justice and righteousness in Hosea. The "society is a person" metaphor governs Hosea 2, where Israel is presented as a harlot. After a thorough discussion of "wife" Israel's unfaithfulness and a vivid description of her upcoming punishment in Hosea 2:2-15, there is an abrupt shift to an announcement of restoration in Hosea 2:16-23. Highlights of the restoration include God's promise of a new covenant and his intention to betroth himself to Israel "in righteousness and in justice, in steadfast love and mercy" (Hos 2:19-20). The "society is a plant" metaphor is evident in Hosea 10:12, where the people are instructed, "Sow for yourselves righteousness; reap steadfast love."

3. Rhetoric and Reality.

The preceding literary and rhetorical discussion demonstrates that the nature of justice and righteousness was seen as multifaceted, and the expectation for just and righteous behavior was rooted firmly in the realities of Israel's religious, political and social life. The prophets explore the multifaceted nature of justice and righteousness at the cosmological and human levels: in comparison to humankind, "the LORD of hosts is exalted by justice, and the Holy God shows himself holy by righteousness" (Is 5:16 NRSV [cf. Is 30:18]). The Creator, God himself, is the model and origination point both for being just and righteous and for acting with justice and righteousness. By extension, God's people, who were called to be holy as God is holy, were expected to conduct themselves with justice and righteousness in all spheres of life.

For the Israelites, proper worship and effective community leadership were the expected manifestations of a flourishing relationship between God and his people. However, this was not always the case. In many instances failure to uphold the standards set forth elsewhere in Scripture gave grounds for God's just judgment. In one of his earliest oracles Jeremiah details the interrelated nature of failures on the human level, with God stating, "The priests did not say, 'Where is the LORD?' Those who handle the law did not know me; the rulers transgressed against me; the prophets prophesied by Baal, and went after things that do not profit" (Jer 2:8 NRSV).

Oftentimes what is known from the prophets about justice in the social sphere is defined not in positive terms but rather by descriptions of social injustice: Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Amos decry those who would oppress the poor and neglect the widow and orphan (Is 1:17; Jer 22:3; Ezek 18; Amos 5:4-8). By implication, true *social justice would include speaking for the poor and caring for the widow and orphan. These actions were the purview of king and leader in the first instance. Failures on the part of king and leader would constitute grounds for God's judgment on king, leader and people alike. With the heavy losses of land, king and temple during the Babylonian period, these failures also gave rise to the hope of a future leader who would lead with righteousness and justice (Is 9:7; 42:1; Jer 23:5; 33:15). For Christians, this expectation was met in the life and ministry of Jesus Christ. With regard to Jesus, Luke 1:32 states, "He will be great, and will be called the Son of the Most High, and the Lord God will give to him the throne of his ancestor David" (NRSV). Matthew 12:18-20 identifies Jesus as the servant in Isaiah 42:1, part of whose task is to proclaim justice to the nations.

Justice and righteousness are highly important for the message of the biblical prophets. A just and righteous God asks nothing less than that his people do justice and be righteous, as Micah 6:8 states: "He has told you, O mortal, what is good; and what does the LORD require of you but to do justice, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with your God?"

LAMENT, MOURNING

The Prophetic Books are filled with language, imagery and forms related to the expression of lament and mourning. This is a reflection of the dominant negative tone of the prophets as they address a community threatened with or experiencing the discipline and judgment of Yahweh. On the one hand, these cries reflect the oral genesis of prophecy, evidence of the original interaction between prophet and people; on the other hand, these cries play a key role in the literary shaping of the prophetic material as books (see Sweeney and Ben Zvi; Ben Zvi and Floyd) (see Form Criticism). Both of these dimensions are highlighted in this article, which focuses on the role of lament within the prophets (for the Book of Lamentations, see Lamentations, Book of).

1. Lament and Mourning in the Prophets as Oral Artifact
2. Lament and Mourning in the Prophets as Literary Device
3. Comfort and Joy as Response to Lament

1. Lament and Mourning in the Prophets as Oral Artifact.

S. Olyan identified four distinct types of mourning activity represented in biblical texts: mourning for the dead, petitionary mourning, either penitential (e.g., Ezra 9—10; Joel 1—2) or non-penitential (e.g., 1 Sam 1; Ezra 8:21-23; 2 Chron 20:1-19), nonpetitionary mourning (2 Sam 13:19; Ezek 27:28-36; Esther 6:12), and mourning over a skin disease (Lev 13:45-46). Another type not mentioned by Olyan is mourning over the destruction of a city (see Dobbs-Allsopp). All of these types of mourning, except mourning over a skin disease, appear within the OT Prophetic Books. In some cases mourning forms and rituals inform the vocabulary and imagery of smaller sections of a prophetic pericope, and in other cases one can discern specific forms related to these purposes (for a list of vocabulary typically associated with these mourning forms and activity, see Ferris, 109; for broader ancient Near Eastern evidence, see Ferris; Anderson, 60-82; Pham, 16-24; Dobbs-Allsopp; Bouzard 1997; 2004).

The most common forms are related to mourning for the dead (funeral dirge), petitionary mourning (communal and individual lament), and mourning over the destruction of a city (city lament) (Westermann 1991, 202-3; 1994), although the distinction between these various forms is not always clear (Olyan, 19-25; Pham, 23). The dirge is a “composition whose verbal content indicates that it was composed in honor of a deceased person sometimes eulogizing the individual, sometimes merely bewailing the loss” (Ferris, 11). It can be uttered by either an individual or a community (2 Sam 1:17-27; 3:33-34). Mourning included visible rites such as loud weeping and wailing, tearing clothes, self-mutilation, shaving the head and beard, fasting, and placing dirt on the head, but it could be followed by a period of silence, and then by voices of comfort (Anderson; Pham, 16-35; Olyan). The ritual mourning period lasted for a portion of a day (2 Sam 1:12), a single day (2 Sam 3:35), seven days (Gen 50:10; 1 Sam 31:13) or thirty days (Num 20:20; Deut 34:8) (Olyan, 27). Some have suggested that the woe oracle may also have been associated at some point with mourning for the dead (Janzen; Ferris, 76), although this has been challenged (Roberts, 118; Shipp, 47). The lament is a “composition whose verbal content indicates that it was composed to be used by and/or on behalf of a community [/individual] to express both complaint, and sorrow and grief over some perceived calamity, physical or cultural, which had befallen or was about to befall them and to appeal to God for deliverance" (Ferris, 10). Laments appear in the Psalter, where they possess a regular pattern of elements (Westermann 1981, 165-213). Such laments can be expressed by an individual or a group of people, and in many cases they were accompanied by particular ritual acts similar to mourning rites, including fasting, shaving hair, tearing clothes, wounding oneself, weeping, throwing dirt on the head (e.g., Neh 1:4; 9:1-5; Jer 41:4-9). The city lament, which appears to have developed from the dirge, was a lament form used as part of ceremonies accompanying the refounding and restoration of sanctuaries destroyed by war throughout the ancient Near East (Ferris; Westermann 1994; Dobbs-Allsopp; Bouzard 1997; 2004).

The importance of these various mourning forms to prophetic revelation is showcased in the fact that the scroll that Ezekiel is commanded to consume at his commissioning had written on its front and back "lamentations, mourning and woe" (Ezek 2:10). Not surprisingly, then, dirge, lament and city lament forms appear throughout the OT prophetic corpus. At times the form of funeral dirges is used by prophets to declare judgment over a nation or leader (see Shipp, 47-66). Typical elements of prophetic judgment speeches that utilize dirges in the prophetic corpus include a call to hear, followed by the funeral song (dirge) proper, then a messenger formula followed a prediction of judgment (e.g., Is 14:13-21; Ezek 19:1-14; 26:17-18; 27:32; Amos 5:1-3). By introducing their predictions of judgment with a funeral dirge, the prophets were emphasizing the seriousness and even at times the hopelessness of the people's predicament. Evidence of more complex mourning rituals involving mourner and divine messenger has been identified in passages such as Isaiah 51:9—52:2 (Pham, 148-89). In Ezekiel 24:15-18 the prohibition of mourning (the death of Ezekiel's wife) is symbolic of the severity of the judgment about to befall Israel. In Zechariah 12:10-14 the prophet looks to a day when the people will mourn over the death of one they have killed, here most likely a reference to their penitential remorse over their past treatment of Yahweh.

In other cases the form of lament can be discerned in the prophetic literature. At times the prophet uses lament in order to express judgment (e.g., Mic 1:8-9). In other instances the prophet responds to the present lament of the people experiencing judgment (e.g., Mic 4:9) or describes the future lament of people as a response to judgment (e.g., Mic 2:4). In certain cases there is evidence of a structure that reflects a communal liturgy in which the prophet played a key role (Boda 2001). For instance, Jeremiah 14:1—15:4 contains a repeated *liturgical structure that entailed a prophetic description of the calamitous conditions, a communal lament, a prophet-deity dialogue (including a prophetic approach to the deity asking for an answer to the lament followed by an answer from the deity). A similar structure has been discerned in passages such as Isaiah 56:9—59:15a; 63:7—66:17; Hosea 14:2-9. While in Jeremiah 14:1—15:4 the answer from the deity is negative (declaring judgment on the nation), the answer in Joel 1—2 is positive. Individual laments also appear throughout the prophetic corpus. At times it is the prophets themselves who express their lament to God over the painful predicament in which they find themselves as they seek to express warning and judgment to their rebellious generation (see Is 6:11; Jer 4:10, 19-21; 8:18—9:1; 11:18-23; 12:1-6; 15:10-14, 15-21; 17:14-18; 18:18-23; 20:7-13, 14-18). The prophet Habakkuk expresses his lament to Yahweh as he questions divine justice (e.g., Hab 1:2-4, 12-17). At times, individuals representing the prophet's audience or within the prophet's audience express individual lament to Yahweh (e.g., Is 40:27b; 49:14b; Jer 31:15, 18-19).

While there is some controversy over the extent to which the book of *Lamentations reflects the Mesopotamian city lament form, F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp has identified the "city-lament mode" to greater and lesser degrees within both the OT oracles against the *nations (e.g., Is 15:1—16:14; 23:1-14; 47:1-15; Jer 48:1-47; 50:1—51:58; Zeph 2:13-15) and the OT oracles against Judah and Israel (e.g., Jer 4—6; 8—10; Mic 1:2-16). It is not surprising to find the influence of such a mourning form in the OT prophetic corpus, considering the greater focus placed in prophetic literature on warnings over impending judgment of *sin that would lead to destruction of the city and state.

These various form critical observations provide insight into the original oral character of biblical prophecy, evidence of God's word interacting with a community experiencing the disciplinary pain of Yahweh.

2. Lament and Mourning in the Prophets as Literary Device.

The forms of mourning identified above now function within the literary works of the OT Prophetic Books, where they play new roles in the final form of the text (Boda 2012). In a few cases these forms play key roles in the highest structural level of the texts. For instance, lament appears at two crucial junctures within Isaiah 40—55 (Westermann 1969, 28, 218-19; Baltzer, 82, 319; Oswalt, 303). After the initial prophetic commissioning in Isaiah 40:1-11 and a disputation series in Isaiah 40:12-26 that raises the major challenges to the exilic community's faith (the power of foreign nations and their deities), the prophet employs the *rhetorical device of apostrophe by citing the lament of his audience Jacob/Israel in Isaiah 40:27: "My way is concealed from Yahweh. The justice I deserve is ignored by my God." A second lament appears at Isaiah 49:14 as for the first time in Isaiah 40—55 the figure of *Zion/Jerusalem speaks: "Yahweh has abandoned me, Yahweh has forgotten me." These two figures who lament at these two junctures in this section of Isaiah (the male servant Jacob/Israel, the female daughter Zion/Jerusalem) are the same audiences addressed in the sections that follow their respective lament in Isaiah 40—55. Thus, Israel/Jacob is addressed in Isaiah 40:27; 41:8, 14; 43:1, 22; 44:1-2, 21; 45:4, 19; 46:3; 48:1, 12; 49:3, and Jerusalem/Zion in Isaiah 49:14; 51:16-17; 52:1-2, 7, 9. The prophetic address in Isaiah 40:27—49:13 is directed mainly at servant Jacob/Israel, who eventually emerges in Isaiah 49:1-13 from exile in Babylon (Is 47—48; see Is 48:20). The address shifts in Isaiah 49:14—54:17 to daughter Zion/Jerusalem, who in the concluding piece in Isaiah 54 breaks forth in joyful shouts in response to Yahweh's victory through the *servant (Is 52—53). This evidence highlights the key role that laments play in the literary structure of Isaiah 40—55, setting in motion the prophetic message by identifying the implicit audience of the various sections and introducing the foundational challenges that the prophet must address.

Another example of this literary role can be seen at the core of the book of Jeremiah, a book with the greatest concentration of lament forms among the prophets. At the center of Jeremiah 11—20 lies a double lament liturgy through which the community expresses its lament to Yahweh through the prophet with the hope of receiving a positive message of salvation (Jer 14:1—15:4). The people's cry appears in Jeremiah 14:7-9, 19-22, employing the classic elements of lament, including the question "Why?" (Jer 14:9, 19), the imperative request (Jer 14:9, 21) and motivations based on the severity of the situation (Jer 14:3-6, 19) as well as God's character and past action (Jer 14:8, 21-22). In both liturgies there are also penitential elements (admission of sin [Jer 14:7, 20]), a minor feature within the lament tradition. The prophetic response, however, is not what the community hoped for, as Yahweh points out the people's apostasy (Jer 14:10) and justifies his pronouncement of judgment, which includes prohibition of intercession by the people (Jer 14:12) and the prophet (Jer 14:11; 15:1) alike. Surrounding this tragic double lament liturgy in Jeremiah 14:1—15:4, however, is a series of laments expressed by the prophet appearing in Jeremiah 11:18-23; 12:1-6; 15:10-14, 15-21; 17:14-18; 18:18-23; 20:7-13, 14-18 (see Diamond, 24). The prophetic laments in the first half of Jeremiah 11—20 are distinct from those in second half, with each of the former (Jer 11:18-23; 12:1-6; 15:10-14, 15-21) followed by a response from God, but each of the latter (Jer 17:14-18; 18:18-23; 20:7-13, 14-18) lacking a divine response (von Rad, 88-99; Skinner, 208-14). In addition, there is a progression in the laments as the prophet moves from confident trust to frustrated concern over divine *justice. The key transition point in this sequence occurs in Jeremiah 15, showcased especially in the lament in Jeremiah 15:15-21, the final lament to which Yahweh responds and in which Yahweh calls the prophet to repent from uttering worthless words as the people do. After this point Yahweh no longer replies to the prophet's cries, and this occurs at the same point that Yahweh has rejected once and for all the people's lament to him (Jer 14:1—15:4) (see Diamond, 77-78).

The book of Joel begins with a complex invitation to the nation to assemble for a day of fasting and lament due to a natural disaster (Wolff, 9; Stuart, 239, 244). Various audiences are addressed in Joel 1:2-14, each invited to mourn over the present predicament of the nation. In Joel 1:13-14 the prophet exhorts the priests who were responsible for coordinating the day of fasting and lament to gird themselves, lament and spend the night in sackcloth as the first step toward consecrating a fast, proclaiming a solemn assembly and gathering those addressed throughout Joel 1:2-12. Joel 1:15-20 then cites the lament to be used to cry out to Yahweh for help in the present crisis. What follows in Joel 2, however, reveals the literary role played by invitation to lament in Joel 1 (on the literary character of Joel, see Ogden 1983, 97). After the invitation to Jerusalem for a day of fasting and lament, it is revealed in Joel 2:1-11 that the present predicament is but a harbinger of a greater disaster in which Yahweh threatens to destroy Israel. Thus, the invitation to lament turns into an invitation to repent in Joel 2:12-17. Once again a form related to lament is used strategically within the literary structure of one of the Prophetic Books.

These three examples highlight the way lament, either within a stock form-critical unit (the prophetic liturgy, invitation to lament) or a rhetorical device (apostrophe), functions rhetorically within the macrostructure of a prophetic section. The language of lament and dirge is also used to develop key metaphors within prophetic literature—for example, the depiction of the mourning earth (Hayes). The ubiquitous mourning forms, vocabulary and images throughout prophetic literature function in their own respective literary units to a lesser or greater degree.

3. Comfort and Joy as Response to Lament.

While the language of lament and mourning appears often in the forms and rhetoric of OT prophecy, at times contrasting expressions also appear. Thus, while the invitation to lament occurs throughout the Prophetic Books (e.g., Jer 9:17-22; Joel 1:8) (Westermann 1991, 7), the summons to joy also is found (e.g., Is 12:6; Zeph 3:14-15) (Crüsemann, 55-65). Both G. Anderson and X. Pham have noted the importance of comfort in mourning rituals within the OT, obtained by participating in visible mourning rites and by remaining silent for a period, and also given through speech to the mourner (Anderson, 84-85; Pham, 27-35). It therefore is not surprising that comfort is a common motif within the Prophetic Books, especially in relation to the announcement of salvation or a new era in redemptive history. Thus, the message of Isaiah to the exilic community opens with "Comfort, comfort my people" (Is 40:1), and the role of the servant figure at the heart of Isaiah 56—66 is "to comfort all those who mourn, to provide for those mourning over Zion, giving them a garland in place of ashes, the oil of gladness in place of mourning, the mantle of praise in place of a spirit of fainting" (Is 61:2-3). Similarly, Jeremiah looks to a day of comfort when mourning will be transformed into gladness, and sorrow into joy (Jer 31:13). Although the prophets are dominated by the forms, vocabulary and images of mourning and lament, comfort and joy remain as their ultimate hope.

LAMENTATIONS, BOOK OF

The book of Lamentations offers a window into the struggle of the people of God in the wake of the fall of Jerusalem and demise of the kingdom of Judah. The book presents a series of poems that express the grief of the community using language, imagery, forms and theology in line with Hebrew traditions of mourning and *suffering. The struggle expressed in these poems is communicated through contrasting voices: female and male, individual and corporate, bitter and penitent, suppliant and prophetic. The book attempts through the acrostic style in Lamentations 1–4 to articulate exhaustively the pain of the fall of Jerusalem and provides through the elaborate and copious third poem a way forward through a penitential response to Yahweh's grace. In the end, however, these goals are frustrated by the endurance of suffering, which in the final pericope leads to the abandonment of the acrostic pattern and to the erratic swings between confidence in Yahweh's sovereignty and uncertainty over Yahweh's grace.

1. Authorship and History.

1.1. Authorship. One of the oldest interpretations of the book of Lamentations is represented by the Jewish Greek translation of the book, and this translation identifies Jeremiah as the composer of at least the first of, if not all, the laments in the book with the addition of the preface: "And it was after Israel had gone into *exile and Jerusalem had been laid waste that Jeremiah sat weeping and composed this lament concerning Jerusalem, saying. . . ." This connection to Jeremiah may have been suggested by the Chronicler's note in 2 Chronicles 35:25 that Jeremiah composed laments for Josiah, but the note in Chronicles says nothing about laments related to the fall of Jerusalem. The connection between the prophet and the book of Lamentations usually is based on the number of literary connections that have been identified between books of Lamentations and Jeremiah (see 6.1 below). However, many have questioned this conclusion, noting that the perspective and ideology of some of the sections of Lamentations stand in tension with the message of a prophet who consistently predicted and justified God's punishment of Judah (cf. Lam 4:17-20 with Jer 2:18; 37:5-10; Lam 1:10 with Jer 26:4-6).

While there is plenty of evidence within the book of Jeremiah itself that the prophet could shift from one perspective to another (note the laments of Jeremiah throughout Jer 11–20), probably the greatest challenge to Jeremican authorship for Lamentations is found in the dominant structuring device throughout the book: the acrostic. Similar to Psalms 9–10 and Psalm 119, four of the five chapters in Lamentations are written as an acrostic, which means that each verse (Lam 1—2; 4), or series of verses (Lam 3), begins with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet (twenty-two letters). Lamentations 5 contains twenty-two verses but is not written in acrostic. The order of the alphabet in these poems, however, is not identical. Lamentations 1 contains the traditional order of the Hebrew alphabet, where the sixteenth and seventeenth letters are ordered ‘ayin/pê. In contrast, Lamentations 2—4 contains the order pê/‘ayin. Evidence from ancient abecedaries reveals that both arrangements of the alphabet were acceptable in Israel, but it is difficult to imagine a single person using two different orders of something as basic as an alphabet. This suggests that there is not a single genius behind these compositions, but rather they represent poems used in a common liturgical setting over a period of time.

1.2. Date. This, however, does not mean that the book is unrelated to the prophet Jeremiah and the period in which he lived. Despite the assertion of some (e.g., Provan 1990, 130-43; 1991, 11-12) that the book cannot be set accurately into a particular historical context, most scholars agree that the book reflects the conditions of the final years of the kingdom of Judah in the sixth century BC. In this period Judah experienced the destruction of its city and temple, the exile of its king and upper class, and the massacre of its population (see Israelite History). Although the vivid poetry in Lamentations may merely reflect the genius of an imaginative poet and probably shows that these poems were composed by trained liturgists, there is no reason to deny that this vividness arose from the personal observation of the poet(s) or that liturgists could compose authentic expressions of pain for the community (contra Westermann, 100-101). F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp places Lamentations in the period of 586-520 BC based on linguistic evidence as well as intertextual connections to Isaiah 40—55 (Dobbs-Allsopp 1998). Additionally, some discern within the book a voice that echoes the voice of Jeremiah or at least the book that bears his name (see 6.1 below), evidence that suggests that the connection of this book to the prophet Jeremiah in the Greek tradition may be legitimate.

Although most scholars place these compositions in the period immediately after the fall of the kingdom of Judah in 587/6 BC (see Westermann, 54-55, 104-5), there has been disagreement over the chronological order of the individual poems that now comprise Lamentations. For instance, S. Gurewicz argued for the order Lamentations 3; 2; 4; 1; 5; R. Gordis for the order Lamentations 2/4; 3; 1/5; and R. Brandscheidt for the order Lamentations 2; 1; 5; 4; 3. Many have argued that Lamentations 5 is the latest of the compositions (see Lee) because of its employment of temporal references such as “forever” (nēṣaḥ) and “so long” (lē’ōrek yāmim), but such evidence is not that helpful because expressions such as these are not only stereotypical in liturgical compositions (see Pss 9:19; 10:11; 23:6; 44:24; 93:5) but also relative to the composer’s perspective. Additionally, the reference to the “sins of the ancestors” in Lamentations 5:7, which to some suggests a later generation looking back on the generation at the fall of Jerusalem, is not a secure argument because such appeals are evident in compositions arising in the last decade before the fall of Judah (cf. Jer 31:29; Ezek 18:2). The dominant perspective of the poems is that of life in the land in the wake of the fall of Jerusalem rather than life in exile, suggesting that it arose among those who had remained in the land after the fall of the city (although there is some interest in the plight of exiles in Lam 4:15 and especially in Lam 4:22).

2. Genre and Setting.

The placement of Lamentations among the five Megillot (scrolls) secured its role at the enduring commemoration of the destruction of the Second Temple on the ninth day of Ab in AD 70. This connection to the destruction of the temple probably was seen as appropriate in a later era because of a much earlier precedent in the life of the Jewish community. The link between this book and the demise of the temple and state has informed scholarly discussion over the genre and liturgical setting of the poems in the book.

2.1. Genre. H. Gunkel saw the various poems as examples of either the funeral dirge (Lam 1; 2; 4), individual lament (Lam 3) or communal lament (Lam 5).

2.1.1. Funeral Dirge. After Gunkel, some focused on the funeral dirge as the key form that underlies the poems found in Lamentations (see Jahnou; Lee). Examples of actual funeral dirges are found in 2 Samuel 1:17-27; 3:33-34; Jeremiah 9:16-21; 38:22, with forms modified for poetic use as short prophetic sayings (Is 1:21-23; Jer 9:10, 17-22; Ezek 26:17-18; Amos 5:2) or as popular sayings (Is 14:4-21; 23:1-14; Ezek 19:1-9, 10-14; 27:2-36; 28:11-19; 32:12-16) (see Westermann, 6). The influence of the funeral dirge is usually associated with Lamentations 1; 2; 4.

The employment of female voices and female personification at various points in Lamentations also suggests the funeral dirge form, since in ancient cultures (including Israel) dirges and laments often were chanted by *women, some of whom engaged in mourning rites as a vocation (2 Chron 35:25; Is 22:12; Jer 7:9; 9:17; Ezek 32:16 [for ancient Near Eastern evidence, see Block, 210]). In ancient societies premature death was most often associated with males, especially in relation to *war. Furthermore, males were older than their female marriage partners and, as in modern societies, typically preceded their mates to the grave. This explains why widows and the fatherless were regularly identified as the most vulnerable within ancient cultures and why women were concerned to bear a son to protect their interests later in life (see Ruth 4; 1 Sam 1). Thus, the most common occasion for funeral dirges was defeat in war (e.g., 2 Sam 1:17-27). Its counterpart probably was the "call to joy" (Aufruf zur Freude), a form associated with victory in war and usually elicited from women (Is 12:4-6; 54:1; Hos 9:1; Joel 2:21-24; Zeph 3:14; Zech 2:10; 9:9 [see Crüsemann, 55-65]). Interestingly, this form is addressed to "Daughter Zion" in Zephaniah 3:14; Zechariah 2:10; 9:9 and to a female inhabitant of *Zion in Isaiah 12:6, and it is employed in a satirical way in Lamentations 4:21-22.

2.1.2. Lament. Others, however, have questioned the extent of the funeral dirge's influence on Lamentations (see Westermann, 6-11). For these scholars, the lament forms of the Psalter dominate the book, with elements from both individual and communal lament evident throughout Lamentations. As C. Westermann noted, these forms dominate Lamentations 3; 5, but they are also present throughout the other poems.

2.1.3. Mesopotamian City Dirge. Beginning with the suggestion by S. Kramer (see Dobbs-Allsopp 1993, 2-10; Lee, 37n163) that Mesopotamian laments over ruined cities and their sanctuaries were the foundation for the poems in Lamentations, the majority of scholars have highlighted close connections between these two forms (see, e.g., Kraus; Gwaltney; Gottwald 1962; Hillers; Ferris; Westermann; Dobbs-Allsopp 1993; 2002; Bouzard; Morrow). These Mesopotamian forms were used as part of ceremonies accompanying the refounding and restoration of sanctuaries destroyed by war (see Boda 2006; Boda and Novotny). The Mesopotamian forms link the destruction of a key city and/or its sanctuary to a decision made in the divine assembly and resulting in the abandonment of the sanctuary by its gods. The destruction is carried out by the god Enlil through a human enemy. In the Mesopotamian laments usually the city's patron goddess challenges this decision of the assembly and laments the demise of city and sanctuary (see Dobbs-Allsopp 1993; 2002).

2.1.4. Form. F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp has identified key connections between these Mesopotamian dirges and the book of Lamentations but is careful to note that Lamentations is a "thorough translation and adaptation" of the genre put to a different use (Dobbs-Allsopp 2002, 9). Unlike the Mesopotamian laments, Lamentations employs typical Hebrew poetic devices, clearly identifies the culpability of the people, replaces the destructive god Enlil with Yahweh and the weeping goddess with the personified city of Jerusalem (Daughter Zion), and avoids any mention of the return of Yahweh or restoration of the temple and city (Dobbs-Allsopp 2002). Therefore, in the view of these researchers, the Mesopotamian city dirges may have provided a precedent for some of the elements found in Lamentations, but even so, there is evidence that the form has undergone significant changes and may only echo a general tradition of lamenting over the destruction of a city and sanctuary. This evidence, along with the fact that the Mesopotamian city dirges typically incorporated lament prayers, could explain why other traditional Hebrew forms, including the funeral dirge (cf. 2 Sam 1:17-27 with Lam 1:1-11, 17; 2:1-12; 3:48-51; 4:1-6) and the individual (Lam 1:12-16, 18-22; 2:20-22) and communal (Lam 3:40-47; 5) lament can also be identified within Lamentations (see Gunkel; Wester-mann). Of the five poems, only Lamentations 1; 2; 4 usually are seen as reflecting strongly the genre of the city dirge, with Lamentations 3 dominated by individual lament with some communal lament, and Lamentations 5 comprising a communal lament.

Although it is possible that all three form traditions (funeral dirge, individual lament, communal lament) have informed the book of Lamentations (see O'Connor, 10-11), there may be another way to explain the connections at least to the tradition of the Mesopotamian city dirge. The use of a goddess to express the predicament of the city and sanctuary within the tradition of the Mesopotamian city dirge suggests that it has been influenced by the ubiquitous phenomenon of female mourning rites in ancient societies. Therefore, it is likely that the ancient Mesopotamian liturgists envisioned a *divine council akin to human society, with a female figure crying out against the merciless acts of a male-dominated divine council as she mourned the loss of the city and sanctuary. Motifs shared by the city dirges in Mesopotamia and the poems in Lamentations, therefore, can be attributed to female mourning rituals that ancient societies shared in common.

2.2. Setting. Even if a link can be established between the Mesopotamian city dirges and the poems in the book of Lamentations, the absence of any reference to the rebuilding of the sanctuary and the return of the deity shows clearly that the setting in which the poems in Lamentations arose is different from the ceremonies related to temple refoundation that gave rise to the Mesopotamian city dirges (see Dobbs-Allsopp 2002; contra Gwaltney). The fixation with the events surrounding the fall and destruction of the city and its aftermath in Lamentations suggests that the setting of the poems is most likely the series of days of fasting that arose immediately after the fall of Jerusalem. Evidence for mourning rites associated with the destroyed sanctuary and possibly also the fallen state is found in Jeremiah 41:4-9. There, eighty men from Shechem, Shiloh and Samaria, displaying rites associated with mourning (shaved beards, torn clothes, self-inflicted wounds, weeping), are depicted in the seventh month as on their way to "the house of Yahweh" with grain offerings and incense. While this evidence comes from the beginning of the Babylonian exilic period, Zechariah 7-8 speaks of the practice of four fasts during the "seventy years" of the exile, fasts that took place in the fourth, fifth, seventh and tenth months (Zech 7:5; 8:19). That these fasts were related at least to the temple in Jerusalem (as Jer 41) is suggested by the fact that a delegation from Bethel approaches the priests and prophets of "the house of the LORD Almighty" (Zech 7:3) to determine whether they should now come to an end with the second temple nearing completion. Some have suggested that the four fasts were related to a complex of four key events related to the fall of the Judean kingdom (Wellhausen, 103-7; Ackroyd, 207n122): tenth month (588 BC), the siege of Jerusalem began (2 Kings 25:1; Jer 39:1); fourth month (587 BC), Jerusalem's walls were breached, and leadership fled (2 Kings 25:3-7; Jer 39:1-10; 52:6-11); fifth month, Jerusalem was destroyed (2 Kings 25:8-12; Jer 52:12-16); seventh month, Gedaliah was assassinated (2 Kings 25:25-26; Jer 41:1-3). Since the delegation from Bethel in Zechariah 7 originally only asked about one fast (fifth month [Zech 7:3]), which was expanded first to two fasts (fifth, seventh months) in Zechariah 7:5 and later to four fasts (fourth, fifth, seventh, tenth months) in Zechariah 8:19, it is possible that these fasts reflect a diversity of rites observed by different communities within the land and possibly also in exile.

Other compositions that may have arisen in this liturgical setting are now found in the Psalter (Pss 44; 60; 74; 79; 83; 106; 123; 137) as well as in narrative books describing the practice of penitential *prayer in the Persian period (Ezra 9; Neh 1; 9; Dan 9). That the same context is suggested for both laments and penitential prayers, the latter coming to dominate the liturgical expression of the Persian period community, is bolstered by close literary and ideological connections that have been established between the book of Lamentations and this tradition of penitential prayer (see Boda 2008). Close associations also between Lamentations 3 and the prophetic lament liturgy in Jeremiah 14:1-15:4 (which most likely occurred during the reign of Zedekiah, last king of Judah) suggests a common liturgical setting for prayers of lament and penitence throughout the sixth century BC.

3. Literary Features and Structure.

Observations on the original setting of the individual compositions provide some insights into the historical circumstances that gave rise to these compositions as well as the basic building blocks of the individual poems. However, such insights need to be supplemented by analysis of the final canonical shape of these originally independent prayers. This involves paying attention to key rhetorical features employed throughout the collection (see Rhetorical Criticism).

3.1. Personification. One regular rhetorical feature is personification, usually related to the city of Jerusalem, but also to its gates, walls, roads and surrounding kingdom. By personifying these physical structures and regions, the composers were able to vividly describe the pain and express the heart cry of the people. There is a sense that the poets send out God's "precious" Zion to intercede for them, hoping that she may have greater success to gain Yahweh's ear (see Lanahan, 43-45; Heim; on the image "Daughter of Zion/Jerusalem," see Dearman 2009; Floyd 2008, 2012).

3.2. Voice. Another rhetorical feature has been highlighted especially in the work of N. Lee, who analyzes the modulating voices throughout the book (although see Westermann, 65, 139-40). Lee identifies the two dominant voices in Lamentations with two voices that can be discerned in the book of Jeremiah: Jeremiah the prophet and a female poet voicing personified Jerusalem's pain (called "Jerusalem's poet"). This dialogue, which Lee traces back to "different poetic singers who performed their composed songs in response to one another" (Lee, 42), is prominent in Lamentations 1; 2; 4. The female perspective of Lamentations 5 (cf. Lam 5:14b with Lam 5:15a) and links to the earlier cries of personified Jerusalem (cf. Lam 5:17 with Lam 1:13, 22; Lam 5:17 with Lam 4:17) suggest that the communal lament of Lamentations 5 has taken over the role of the personified Jerusalem (Lee, 196).

Lee's study, building on the earlier work of W. Lanahan on Lamentations and especially of C. Mandolfo (2002) on biblical laments, highlights the importance of sensitivity to the various voices that appear throughout the book (see also Miller 2001; Mandolfo 2007; Conway 2012; Boda, forthcoming). No two poems are alike in the structuring of the voices. One needs to be alert to the impact that employing various voices has on the reading of the poem. W. Kaiser picks this up in his analysis of Lamentations 1 when he notes, "It would appear that emotional and psychological progress is realized in this poem as it moves from a more distant, descriptive 3rd-person reporting in verses 1-11 to a more personal, private 1st-person speech in verses 12-22" (Kaiser, 44). The poem begins with an external point of view, observing the pain of the personified city, only to give voice to the suffering woman, who discloses her inner turmoil. In Lamentations 3 this inner turmoil is presented from the outset and is expressed not by the city personified as a woman but rather by a suffering man (warrior?). The interplay of various voices provides more opportunities to express and experience the pain of the crisis.

3.3. Acrostic. A third key rhetorical feature in Lamentations is the acrostic that structures four of the five poems (Lam 1-4). This literary device appears at several points in the OT (Pss 9-10; 25; 34; 119; 145; Prov 31:10-31; Nah 1) as well as in other Semitic literature, including Akkadian, Ugaritic and Paleo-Canaanite (see Westermann, 98-100; O'Connor, 12). Several purposes have been offered to explain the use of acrostics, including fulfilling magical rites, aiding memorization of poems, emphasizing completeness, or producing aesthetically pleasing literature (Westermann, 98-100; O'Connor). Although there may be multiple purposes behind the use of acrostics, most likely they communicate that the poem expresses totality, and in the case of Lamentations both the total devastating effect of the destruction and the total expression of the pain of those who experienced it.

3.4. Structure. The uniqueness of each poem's acrostic pattern in Lamentations 1-4 shows that each poem in the book has its own integrity. Nevertheless, some have questioned whether the book merely represents an anthology of poems or instead was designed as an integrated collection. Although recognizing independence for each poem, J. Renkema (1988; 1998), for instance, argues for a collection united by connections between equivalent letter stanzas in the four poems (e.g., elements in stanza 'ālep in Lam 1 may be found in stanza 'ālep in Lam 2, 3 or 4). Although some examples seem to support his view, the evidence is not consistent across all stanzas in all poems.

D. Reimer draws on modern grief theory in order to trace the thematic structure of Lamentations, concluding that the book moves through the stages of isolation (Lam 1), anger (Lam 2), bargaining (Lam 3), depression (Lam 4) and acceptance (Lam 5). Reimer is careful to admit that these themes are only “dominant” in their respective poems, but these various stages appear at various points in all the poems—a point that led earlier scholars to abandon such psychological theory as a basis for structural analysis (see Moore; Joyce). Especially difficult to this structure is Reimer’s identification of the final poem with its conclusion vacillating between confident hope and embittered lament.

The fact that Lamentations 3 has not only the longest poem but also the most complicated acrostic brings rhetorical focus onto this poem within the collection. The reader should take note of the message of this central poem (see Morrow, 112), which represents the height of rhetorical artistry and so also, as K. O’Connor has said, functions as “the book’s most important chapter, the book’s theological heart” (O’Connor, 13). This central poem points to a theological solution to the present suffering, one that accentuates Yahweh’s grace and justice (Lam 3:1-40). This solution, however, is seriously challenged in the remainder of the book, first in the central poem itself (Lam 3:41-66) and then in the two poems in Lamentations 4—5. This latter is emphasized recently by I. Provan (1991), Dobbs-Allsopp (1997) and T. Linafelt, who remind readers that the book does not end with Lamentations 3:40. The final two chapters contain poems shorter than Lamentations 1—3, with Lamentations 5, although containing twenty-two verse units as the first four poems, abandoning the acrostic pattern. This suggests that Lamentations 5 signals the end of this completeness—something made clear in its painful and dialectal conclusion. As O’Connor has argued, Lamentations 4—5 “move back to themes of grief, anger, and despair, and smother hope like a blanket over fire” (O’Connor, 13-14). Therefore, the overall flow of the book of Lamentations suggests an honest struggle in the midst of the darkness of the exile, even if it foreshadows the dominant solution that will be adopted within the community in the wake of the exile (cf. Ezra 9; Neh 1; 9; Dan 9) (see Boda 2008).

4. Content of Each Poem.

4.1. Lamentations 1.

- 1:1-9a Third-person description of Zion’s suffering
- 1:9b First-person singular cry of Zion to Yahweh
- 1:10-11a Third-person description of Zion addressed to Yahweh and Zion
- 1:11b First-person singular cry of Zion to Yahweh
- 1:12-16 First-person singular cry of Zion to onlookers (the nations?)
- 1:17 Third-person description of Zion’s suffering and its cause
- 1:18-19 First-person singular cry of Zion to the nations about Yahweh’s innocence and Zion’s rebellion
- 1:20-22 First-person singular cry of Zion to Yahweh about the nations’ guilt (malediction)

The first poem in the collection draws the reader in to view the pain of personified Zion from an external vantage point through third-person speech (Lam 1:1-11). At the outset no attribution of guilt is given; the reader is allowed to experience the shocking pain before realizing in Lamentations 1:5 and again in Lamentations 1:8-9 that Zion’s sins lie behind this suffering. This first section introduces a key emphasis of this poem—the solitude of the city, first seen in the opening declaration that she is “deserted” (Lam 1:1) and then in the refrain in Lamentations 1:2, 9: “there is none to comfort her.” At two points in Lamentations 1:1-11 the voice of the suffering city emerges, both consisting of cries for Yahweh to look upon her affliction (Lam 1:9b, 11b). The detachment of the first half of the poem is soon lost in the second half as Lamentations 1:12-16 shifts to the first-person voice of the city as she pleads with those who pass by. Zion echoes the themes already introduced in the third-person section, admitting her sins and repeating the refrain of solitude in Lamentations 1:16, “no one is near to comfort me,” already encountered in Lamentations 1:2, 9. For a moment in Lamentations 1:17 the perspective shifts to the external with a short third-person description of Zion that again reminds the reader that “there is no one to comfort her.” But then the poem plunges back into the bitter first-person pain of Zion that carries the poem to its conclusion (Lam 1:18-22). In this concluding section

Zion first speaks to the nations about Yahweh (“Listen, all you peoples” [Lam 1:18-19]), admitting that her suffering was caused by her rebellion; Yahweh was innocent. Her speech then engages Yahweh directly, expressing her distress, admitting her culpability, but also highlighting the pain that the nations have inflicted upon her (Lam 1:20-22). Here again the refrain emerges in Lamentations 1:21, now expressed in first-person speech by Zion herself: “There is no one to comfort me.” This section calls for vengeance upon those who have treated Zion so brutally, suggesting that although the discipline was deserved, the nations have violated God’s justice in their actions.

4.2. Lamentations 2.

- 2:1-10 Third-person description of the suffering of Zion and Judah
- 2:11-12 First-person singular lament over Zion’s suffering
- 2:13-19 First-person singular address to Zion
- 2:20-22 First-person singular lament of Zion to Yahweh

The second poem begins, as did the first poem, with a detached third-person description of the pain (Lam 2:1-10) focusing on the city (Daughter Zion) and kingdom (Daughter Judah) as women. The final verse in this section (Lam 2:10) describes rites connected to mourning and lament (sit on ground in silence, sprinkle dust on heads, put on sackcloth, bow heads to ground), and this introduces the first-person voice that emerges in Lamentations 2:11-12, the voice of one who weeps while observing the pain of the people. In Lamentations 2:13-19 this or another first-person voice turns and addresses Daughter Zion directly, highlighting the city’s suffering, attacking the false prophets, and identifying the defeat of the enemy as the planned judgment of Yahweh. As in Lamentations 2:10, so Lamentations 2:18-19 depicts the rites of mourning and lament of the people and even encourages such rites from the “walls of Daughter Zion” (Lam 2:18-19). In response to this invitation a voice of prayer addresses Yahweh directly to conclude the poem in Lamentations 2:20-22. In the first poem Daughter Zion asked onlookers this searching question: “Is any suffering like my suffering that was inflicted on me, that the LORD brought on me in the day of his fierce anger?” (Lam 1:12). In this second poem Daughter Zion addresses this to God directly: “Whom have you ever treated like this?” (Lam 2:20).

4.3. Lamentations 3.

- 3:1-20 First-person singular lament over God’s judgment on the male poet
- 3:21-24 First-person singular transition to hope
- 3:25-39 Application of the poet’s experience to all people
- 3:40 First-person plural cohortative invitation
- 3:41-47 First-person plural communal response
- 3:48-51 First-person singular lament over God’s judgment on the people
- 3:52-66 First-person singular thanksgiving and request (malediction)

The third poem begins with the expression of a “man” (geber [Lam 3:1]) who has experienced suffering at the hand of God (Lam 3:1-17) and explains to the reader how he moved from despair (Lam 3:18-20) to hope (Lam 3:21-24). This situation is then applied universally to anyone who experiences similar circumstances (Lam 3:25-39)—a presentation that prompts an invitation to the entire community to examine their ways and return to God (Lam 3:40). A response to this invitation by the people comes in Lamentations 3:41-47, and this response appears to reject the observation in Lamentations 3:39 that no one has a right to complain against God. This communal complaint argues that although they have admitted their sin, God has not responded to them (Lam 3:41-47). Furthermore, a first-person common singular voice follows in Lamentations 3:48-51, weeping over the despicable state of the city-community, and functions as a transition to a closing individual prayer in Lamentations 3:52-66, which contains both thanksgiving and request.

The source of hope for the afflicted man (Lam 3:1-20) in Lamentations 3 is clearly his consideration of the gracious character of God in Lamentations 3:21-33. Here the composer uses the breadth of Hebrew lexical stock of “grace,” including “covenant loyalty” (hesed [Lam 3:22, 32]), “compassions” (rahāmîm [Lam 3:22, 32]), “faithfulness” (’ēminā [Lam 3:23]), “goodness” (tôb [Lam 3:25, 26, 27]) and “salvation” (tēšû’â [Lam 3:26]). In light of such grace, the poet encourages the people to wait (qwh [Lam 3:25]), seek (drš [Lam 3:25]), wait silently (yhl Hiphil + dūmām [Lam 3:26]), bear the yoke (nś' + 'ōl [Lam 3:27]), sit alone (yšb + bādād [Lam 3:28]), be silent (dāmam [Lam 3:28]), put one's mouth in the dust (ntn + be'āpār pihū [Lam 3:29]), give one's cheek to the smiter (ntn + lēmakkēhū lehī [Lam 3:30]) and be filled with reproach (šb' + bēherpā [Lam 3:30]). Such actions describe the posture of passively accepting the discipline of God but also of awaiting God's deliverance.

All of this leads to a presentation of the *justice of God in Lamentations 3:33-38, teaching that God "does not afflict with delight" (Lam 3:33) but rather disciplines because of *sin (Lam 3:37-38). In light of this, there is no room for complaint when being punished for one's sins (Lam 3:39). Thus, in this central poem it is a consideration of the grace of God that is to prompt an acceptance of the discipline of God and a refusal to complain in light of one's culpability. It is this that leads to the key penitential invitation in Lamentations 3:40. Nevertheless, the frustration of the people comes out in Lamentations 3:41-47 as they declare that they admit their sins (Lam 3:41), and yet God has not pardoned, and they continue to live in their suffering. The repetition of the term "destruction" (šeber) in Lamentations 3:47-48 shows that the first-person common singular voice (possibly the same one that began the poem in Lam 3:1-20) feels this frustration of the people (Lam 3:48, 51) and is committed to interceding for the people (Lam 3:49) until Yahweh looks upon their suffering (Lam 3:50). This same voice closes off the poem with a prayer of request for himself as well. In this closing prayer the poet calls for God's justice and vengeance on his enemies (Lam 3:59-66) based on his own past experience of God's *salvation (Lam 3:52-58).

4.4. Lamentations 4.

- 4:1-10 First-person singular description of the need of the people
- 4:11-16 Third-person description of the need of the people
- 4:17-20 First-person plural lament over disaster
- 4:21-22 Second-person prophetic announcement of judgment and salvation

The fourth poem begins in Lamentations 4:1-10 with a first-person description of the need of the people (note "my" in Lam 4:3, 6, 10), focusing especially on the common fate of those considered most (children) and least (princes) vulnerable. In this section the focus is on the deplorable circumstances rather than on the cause of the crisis. With Lamentations 4:11-16 the poem shifts into a third-person description of the need, now identifying the cause as Yahweh's fierce anger against the sins of prophets and priests (Lam 4:13). In Lamentations 4:17-20 a first-person plural voice, possibly the voice of the prophets and priests who now "grope through the streets as if they were blind" (see Lam 4:14), emerges. This voice articulates the failure of both international allies (Lam 4:17) and national leadership (Lam 4:20) to rescue them in their time of need. The poem ends (Lam 4:21-22) with what appears to be a prophetic announcement of judgment and salvation, declaring a curse against the rival Daughter Edom, who takes pleasure in their demise, and promising Daughter Zion that her punishment will one day end.

4.5. Lamentations 5.

- 5:1 Request: call for Yahweh's attention
- 5:2-18 Lamenting the predicament, admitting guilt
- 5:19 Motivation for God to act
- 5:20 Questions (borderline accusations)
- 5:21 Request: call for Yahweh's action
- 5:22 Motivation for God to act

What is immediately noticeable about the final poem in the book is that even though it consists of twenty-two units, it is not an alphabetic acrostic, as are the other four. There are other points of divergence. It is the shortest of all the poems and the most consistent, employing a first-person plural voice throughout. The poem contains the elements typical of the communal laments of the Psalter, with the depiction of the predicament (Lam 5:2-5, 8a, 9-16a, 17-18), the assignment of the cause of the predicament (Lam 5:6-7, 8b, 16b, 20, 22), the motivations for help (Lam 5:19, 21) and the request for help (Lam 5:1, 21). In the prayer of Lamentations 5 there is no denying that the cause of the predicament is traced to the sin of the people: both in the previous generation (Lam 5:6-7) and (most likely) in the present generation (Lam 5:16b). However, the questions of Lamentations 5:20 ("Why do you always forget us? Why do you forsake us so long?") and the suggestion of Lamentations 5:22 (“unless you have utterly rejected us and are angry with us beyond measure”) imply that the endurance of the predicament is God’s responsibility. What is missing is blame directed at the enemies, which dominates much of the earlier poems in Lamentations. The request forms a bracket around the entire poem with three imperatives for God’s attention in Lamentations 5:1 (“remember . . . look . . . see”) and two imperatives for God’s action in Lamentations 5:21. The community longs for God to cause them to return to God in *covenant relationship, a return that has both physical and spiritual dimensions, and to renew their community’s experience to the glory days of the past. The final stanza of Lamentations 5 brings the book as a whole to an awkward end, vacillating as it does back and forth between the postures of hope (Lam 5:19, 21) and frustration (Lam 5:20, 22). It is not surprising in the darkness of the exile that the book ends without acrostic style and with the declaration of frustration. As T. Linafelt has argued, “The book is left opening out into the emptiness of God’s nonresponse. By leaving a conditional statement dangling, the final verse leaves open the future of the ones lamenting” (Linafelt, 60).

5. Theological Traditions and Themes.

5.1. Suffering and Redemption. Taken as a whole, these diverse poems provide theological resources for suffering and salvation (see Kaiser). The present pain is identified as a loss of rest (Lam 1:3) and inheritance (Lam 5:2), an absence of comfort (Lam 1:2, 9, 16b, 17a, 21) and especially a loss of covenant relationship with Yahweh through the loss of the religious structures that sustained this relationship (Lam 2:1, 6, 7, 9c). This pain has affected all levels of society (rich/poor, male/female, young/old), all aspects of society (physical, social, spiritual) and even ongoing generations of society (past and present).

The poems express the reason for pain in various ways. At times the frustrated voice of the poets suggest that this pain, or at least its enduring quality, is purposeless, the result of an angry God whose wrath will never be satisfied (Lam 5:20, 22). At many places it is clearly seen as discipline for sin (Lam 1:5, 8-9, 14, 18, 20; 2:14; 3:39-42), even though the amount of suffering seems to be disproportionate to the sin of the people, pain at a level unknown to humanity (Lam 1:12; 2:20). Lamentations 3:40 suggests that there is a purifying role as the people speak of examining and testing their ways. Of course, the cause of the pain often is linked to the wiles of enemies taking advantage of the people’s plight (Lam 1:21-22; 2:16; 3:52-66; 4:21-22; 5:2, 8), even if this opportunity was provided by Yahweh’s legitimate judgment (Lam 1:15, 17; 2:17; 4:13).

The cause of the suffering is linked to the three classic reasons found in the biblical lament tradition: self, enemy, Yahweh. The various poems consistently identify the supplicants as responsible for their own pain due to their rebellion against God. The enemies often become the subject of the lament. Yahweh is regularly identified as playing an active role in the suffering that has been experienced, but this is carefully nuanced with the qualification that this action was justified because of the sins of the community.

The request in the various prayers is dominated by calls for Yahweh (e.g., Lam 1:11, 20; 2:20-21) or passing nations (e.g., Lam 1:12, 18, 21) to give attention to the need of the people, for God to uphold their cause (Lam 3:59), and for God to wreak vengeance on their enemies (Lam 1:22; 3:64-66; 4:21-22). At times voices describe or exhort the people or city to cry out to Yahweh (Lam 2:18, 19), to call for relief (Lam 3:55-56), to confess and *repent of their sin (Lam 3:40-42), to wait upon Yahweh by submitting to the suffering (Lam 3:19-30), even though at other times such cries are considered rejected by Yahweh (Lam 3:8). In Lamentations 5 the request becomes far more explicit and practical, calling at the outset (Lam 5:1) for Yahweh to give attention to their past circumstances and their present disgrace, and at the end (Lam 5:21) for Yahweh to restore their relationship with him and renew their life as in “days of old.”

Strategies for surviving the present pain appear at various places in the poems. Key is accepting culpability for this suffering—that is, admitting one’s sins and even the sins of former generations (Lam 5:7, 16) and absolving Yahweh of any wrongdoing (Lam 1:16). At a couple of places Yahweh’s character is highlighted as essential for living through the pain. In Lamentations 3:19-39 the poet encourages a submissive posture toward the suffering, one demanded by the culpability of the sufferer. In this section the poet clings to the gracious character of Yahweh, and it is this that gives him hope. Additionally, it is Yahweh's sovereignty over the affairs of the world that infuses meaning into the present discipline (Lam 3:34-38). In Lamentations 5:19 the community clings to the eternal and sovereign character of Yahweh. Surviving the pain, however, will mean not just a theological reorientation but also a spiritual reorientation, one that involves crying out to God (Lam 2:18-19), a cry that ultimately involves not complaint (Lam 3:39) but rather self-examination, repentance and confession (Lam 3:40-42).

5.2. Zion, Retribution and the Character of Yahweh. One cannot miss the central role that *Zion theology plays in the book of Lamentations (see Albrectson, 219-30; Ackroyd, 46; Renkema 1998, 44-45). This theology was foundational to Judah's kingdom and thus was emphasized by royal circles and the priestly groups that the monarchy supported. The first move that David made as king of the united tribes was to shift his capital from Hebron, which lay in the heart of Judah's tribal territory, to Jerusalem, which lay on the northern border, which Judah shared with Benjamin and was a city without traditional attachment to any tribe. This shift helped David control the northern tribes, uniting the nation geographically at Jerusalem and personally in the Judahite king. The connection between the name "Zion" and Jerusalem is uncertain, but it appears that it predates David's arrival in the city, a part of which was called "the fortress of Zion" (2 Sam 5:7; 1 Chron 11:5). Another dimension of Davidic kingship also appears to be associated with the pre-Davidic Jerusalemite tradition, that of Melchizedek's priestly kingship (cf. Gen 14:18-19 with Ps 110). As various psalms reveal (Pss 2; 46; 48; 76; 84; 87; 122; 137), the Zion tradition depicted Jerusalem as the place of God's dwelling and seat of his rule over all the earth, replacing and exceeding the Canaanite seat of divine rule on Mount Zaphon. So exalted was this city that it is seen as invincible, secure from any attack of the enemy—a belief that led to an emphasis on the inviolability of Zion, lulling the people into a false confidence based on God's past choice of Jerusalem and its sanctuary. The prophets will confront this royal ideology, predicting that Zion would be destroyed (Jer 26:18-19; cf. Jer 7:1-15; Mic 3:12) and its sanctuary abandoned by Yahweh (Ezek 10) because of the rebellious behavior of the people. It is understandable, then, why the Zion tradition is expressed so strongly in the book of Lamentations as the people struggle with the promises related to the city of Jerusalem and its sanctuary. In the book it is the Zion tradition that is associated with the most bitter of lament and pain.

Combined with this Zion theology, however, is a strong *retribution theology that has been informed by the Deuteronomistic and prophetic traditions and accepts that the fall of Jerusalem has been caused by the covenantal rebellion of the people against Yahweh (see Brandscheidt; Gottwald 1962, 66, 70; Albrectson, 230-37; Ackroyd, 46; Hawtrey, 78). Thus, even when the lament is most bitter, there is always an admission of the culpability of the people.

However, the greatest hope in the book is not related either to the election theology of Zion or to Deuteronomistic or prophetic retribution theology; rather, it is only with the abandonment of Zion theology in the central chapter that one is shown the way forward for the community. In place of Zion theology is the key grace tradition (Lam 3:21-33), linked especially to the ancient rehearsal of Yahweh's "name" found in Exodus 34:6-7 (cf. Num 14:18; Ps 86). This fixation on the "character creed" is followed immediately in Lamentations 3:33-39 with a theology of divine discipline closely allied with Deuteronomistic and possibly wisdom theology (see Gottwald 1962, 71-72), which reminds the people that God does not "afflict with delight" (Lam 3:33) or approve of injustice (Lam 3:34-36) but rather dispenses discipline because of sin (Lam 3:37-38). Instead of complaint (Lam 3:39), the people are encouraged to examine their ways and turn back to God and confess their sins (Lam 3:40). This solution is informed by the agenda set out in several key earlier texts (Lev 26:40-41; Deut 30:1-4; 1 Kings 8:46-51), even though these texts look to the exilic community and Lamentations looks to the community left behind in the land (see Boda 2008).

The book of Lamentations showcases the theological struggle of a people living in the wake of the greatest crisis in their history. In it we observe the intersection of several key theological streams that rose to prominence in the closing moments of the kingdom of Judah. As the central poem and conclusion to the book make clear, the theological struggle would remain unresolved in the short run.

6. Canon.

6.1. Lamentations and the Old Testament. The Hebrew Jewish canonical traditions generally placed Lamentations among the Ketubim (Writings), the third and final section of the canonical books, as one of the five Megillot (scrolls) to be read at the major festivals (Ruth, Song of Songs, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations, Esther). In this way, Lamentations is read in terms of the enduring worship rhythms of the Jewish community in the postexilic period. In contrast, the Greek Jewish canonical traditions placed Lamentations between Jeremiah and Ezekiel—that is, among the Prophets. As noted above, this connection to Jeremiah is reflected in the preface to the book of Lamentations provided in the Greek tradition, which identifies the lament that follows as arising from Jeremiah in response to the exile of the community and destruction of Jerusalem. There is, however, internal evidence for a connection between the book of Lamentations and Jeremiah (cf. Lam 2:14 with Jer 5:31; Lam 2:22 with Jer 6:25; Lam 3:14 with Jer 20:7; Lam 3:15, 19 with Jer 9:14; 23:15; Lam 3:48–51 with Jer 14:17; Lam 3:53 with Jer 38:6; Lam 4:17 with Jer 2:36) (see Morrow, 110–11). This connection to Jeremiah, as well as to other Prophetic Books (esp. Is 40–55), has received particular attention in recent scholarship (e.g., Lee; O'Connor; Boase; Mandolfo 2007; Boda, Dempsey and Snow Flesher). The connections between Lamentations and the prophets, however, have not led to the conclusion that Jeremiah was responsible for the book of Lamentations, although Lamentations 3 appears to be the closest to the Jeremianic tradition (see Boda 2008), but rather that the book of Lamentations offers a response from the perspective of an abused Daughter of Zion to the earlier prophetic tradition that set in motion the suffering catalogued in the book of Lamentations (e.g., Jeremiah) or sought to express hope beyond the suffering (e.g., Is 40–55). In the book of Lamentations the Daughter of Zion gets to talk back to prophet and deity alike.

6.2. Lamentations and the New Testament. Lamentations is not the final word on the Jewish community in Jerusalem. The fasts with their laments and penitential prayers at the temple site would be replaced by the renewal of the festal calendar with the reconstruction of the second temple in the late sixth century BC. But Zion would never regain the glory of the preexilic era, and the dominance of the penitential prayer tradition after the exile is testimony to the fact that the people longed for more. This longing can be discerned among that cast of faithful characters who appear in the temple courts early in the Gospel of Luke (Zechariah and Elizabeth, Simeon and Anna, Joseph and Mary) as they await the *Messiah and identify him in Jesus. This Jesus would enter into his people's suffering in a land still under foreign occupation. He would express his pain over and compassion for Jerusalem and yet predict its downfall (Lk 13:34–35). Like Lamentations 3, his message would be focused on God's gracious invitation to repentance. He would even cry out in lament to God ("My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" [Mt 27:46; Mk 15:34]) on that hill outside of Zion as he hung dying for the sins of his people and those of the whole world. It is interesting to see how the Zion traditions are resurrected in the NT to describe the new experience of grace for the people of God in Jesus Christ, who functions in the order of Melchizedek, as these traditions are transferred to the "heavenly Jerusalem," which is both a present reality (Heb 7:1–9:28; 12:22–23) and a future hope (Rev 21) (see Fuller Dow).

LAND

The theological importance of land in the Prophets, as in the rest of the OT, cannot be overemphasized. However, it is difficult to generalize across the prophetic tradition because variations of emphasis can be detected, reflecting different authorial and editorial perspectives and changing historical contexts. The preexilic and exilic prophets are most clearly concerned with the land of Israel and the events leading up to the *exile and hoped-for restoration. The postexilic prophets, although writing from a perspective after the exiles' return to their land, have different concerns and preoccupations. Of all the prophets, Jeremiah is most vocal on the subject of land, whether physical, political or theological, for which reason he is described as "the poet of the land par excellence" (Brueggemann, 101).

2. Politics, Geography, Economics and Ecology
3. Theological Themes

1. Words and Meanings.

Two Hebrew words are used to denote "land" in the biblical prophets, 'ereš and 'ādāmā. Of these, by far the most frequent is 'ereš, which is found over nine hundred times compared with only seventy-five uses of 'ādāmā. The range of meanings for both 'ereš and 'ādāmā, though very wide, falls broadly into three overlapping categories: (1) denoting the whole earth or world (in the case of 'ereš sometimes paired with "the heavens" [e.g., Is 1:2]); (2) describing a land mass, whether territory in general or a particular land or country, in the latter case often with its name (e.g., "land of Egypt" [Jer 44:12]) or a possessive pronoun (e.g., "your land" [Is 2:7]); (3) referring to the soil or to land as a portion of ground (e.g., Amos 2:7). The meaning (and thus translation) of the Hebrew usually can be determined by the characteristics noted above and by the context, but there are numerous instances of ambiguity. The fluidity in the terms and their referents undoubtedly reflects the narrower geographical horizons of the ancient world and the much closer overlap in biblical thought between ideas of cosmic space and territory. This article focuses on the range of meanings in the second and third categories listed above. Across the Prophetic Books both 'ereš and 'ādāmā are most often used within the second category—that is, to denote land or territory, whether general or specific. More than six hundred occurrences of 'ereš and fifty of 'ādāmā fall into this category.

2. Politics, Geography, Economics and Ecology.

Land in any time period or place has enormous importance for a range of complex and often interlinked reasons. Both local and national landscapes have economic, political, environmental and cultural significance, as well as physical characteristics. All these issues feature in the writings of the biblical prophets, who are aware of the social, environmental and military importance of land as well as its theological potential.

2.1. Politics. Political negotiation and military struggles over land form an important part of the history of Israel and Judah, and many of the prophets deal directly or indirectly with matters of diplomacy and *warfare. The three main clusters of prophetic activity represented by the Prophetic Books center on key political events concerning the overpowering, loss and restoration of the promised land (see 3 below): (1) the eighth-century BC threat from Assyria and last stages of the northern kingdom, Israel, culminating in its destruction in 722 BC (Hosea, Amos, First Isaiah, Micah); (2) the Babylonian invasion and conquest of the southern kingdom, Judah, in 587 BC and the exile in Babylon (Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Obadiah, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Second Isaiah); (3) the return from exile and rebuilding of Judah and Jerusalem from the late sixth century BC onwards (Third Isaiah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi) (see Israelite History). Three books fall outside this categorization: Joel lacks any historical markers that locate it in a particular time frame, although it graphically depicts the turmoil of warfare and an invading army; Nahum comprises a judgment oracle against the Babylonian city Nineveh; Jonah is a story about the *repentance of that same city.

The preexilic and exilic prophets highlight the inextricable link between Israel's and Judah's faithful obedience to God and the political security of their land, and this theme is explored by N. Habel in his analysis of land ideology in the book of Jeremiah (Habel). Military defeat and exile are held up as the consequence of rebellion against the Lord (Is 1:19-20; Jer 25:7-9; Ezek 12:2-3), and conquering armies and rulers are regarded as acting at the behest of the Lord (Is 5:26-30; Jer 5:15-17; 25:8-9; Amos 6:14; Hab 1:6). Conversely, the conquest of Babylon by the Persian emperor Cyrus, which paves the way for the return of the exiles to Judah, is also seen as God's action (Is 45:1-3). Attempts by individual prophets to shape political and military policy take the form of direct confrontations with the king (Is 7:1-17; 37:5-13; Jer 37:17-21) and of oracles warning against forming alliances with the surrounding *nations instead of trusting in the Lord's power and care (Is 30:1-3; Jer 2:17-18; Ezek 17:15-21; Hos 7:11-12; 12:1).

2.2. Geography. The prophets demonstrate considerable awareness of geographical and topographical features of the land, both of Israel itself and of its neighbors. The location of surrounding nations is identified (sometimes inaccurately) according to points of the compass (Is 9:11-12; Mic 7:12). Knowledge of particular geophysical events, such as the annual inundation of the Nile floodplains upon which Egyptian agriculture depended, is used to graphic effect (Is 19:5-10; Amos 8:8; 9:5). *Mountains and valleys, rivers and deserts (see Wilderness, Desert) form part of the prophetic vocabulary, and the prophets clearly are keen observers of their surroundings. Many references to such features, although undoubtedly informed by their geophysical characteristics, take the form of stylized and/or metaphorical descriptions—for example, the mountain of the Lord (Is 2:2-4; Mic 4:1-3; Zech 8:3), natural elements accompanying divine theophany (Hab 3:8-10), and disaster coming “from the north” in Jeremiah (Jer 1:14-15, and a further sixteen times; see also Ezek 23:24).

2.3. Economics. The political significance of land is matched by its importance as a natural resource, with key crops such as grapes and olives being valuable export commodities in ancient Israel. The importance of vines and viticulture in prophetic material, especially Isaiah (e.g., Is 5:1-7; 27:2-5), can be accounted for by the ease of cultivating vineyards in the soil conditions and topography of the hill slopes of Israel, in contrast to the salinated floodplains of the Mesopotamian and Nile Deltas. This makes the production of grapes and wine in the land of Israel a potentially lucrative source of income and may account for the Babylonians permitting the resumption of agriculture in Judah under Gedaliah the governor (Jer 40:9-12). The prophets demonstrate knowledge of agricultural practice in their oracles (Is 17:6; 24:13; Ezek 17:5-8) and awareness of the need for wisdom in farming methods (Is 28:23-29). The distinction, and sometimes conflict, between agricultural and pastoral concerns is well represented, with the outcome of political defeat being depicted as the incursion of cattle and sheep into cities and their agricultural hinterlands (Is 7:23-25; 32:14).

2.4. Ecology. The prophets show great awareness of, and concern for, the interconnection between human populations and their environments (Marlow 2009). This connection is part of a three-way relationship, between God, the people and the land. When God is honored and obeyed, the land flourishes, as do its inhabitants. When God is put to one side, the land is desolate and unfruitful. The close interdependence between people and environment that informs prophetic oracles is partly a result of the economic and practical factors mentioned above; the prophets themselves, as much as their audiences, depend on the land for survival. The climatic conditions of ancient Israel, whereby short wet winters are followed by exceptionally hot and dry summers, make for a precarious existence for human beings and livestock, and drought is an ever-present fear (Jer 14:1-6). Conversely, a raging torrent over hard, sun-baked soil results in flash flooding that can destroy crops and livestock in a moment (Is 28:2; Jer 47:2).

Prophetic concern with the relationship between people and landscape also reflects the prophets' keen observation of their surroundings as they draw on the natural world for a rich range of metaphors and similes. This is particularly true of Hosea, who "clothes the thoughts of each succeeding sentence in new imagery" (Wolff 1974, xxiv) (see, e.g., Hos 11:10-11). Wild animals such as the lions and bears that roamed the ancient Near East represent both a literal threat to human beings (Jer 5:6; Amos 3:4, 8) and a graphic metaphorical picture of judgment (Jer 49:19; Amos 5:18-19). Warfare and enemy invasion have an immediate and catastrophic effect on the land. The destruction of habitation and the depopulation of human settlements are followed, as one might expect, by the colonization of ruined buildings by a variety of wild animals (Is 13:20-22; 34:13-15). Although undoubtedly devastating for the human populations concerned, it is part of the creatures' God-given right of possession and happens at his volition (Is 34:16-17). The natural scavenging instinct of creatures such as vultures and jackals, with which the prophets were familiar, undoubtedly informs oracles that describe the destruction of a nation by means of "the birds of the air and the wild animals of the land" (Jer 15:3 [cf. Ezek 39:4]). The destroying power of a plague of locusts paints a graphic picture of a forthcoming, yet unspecified, enemy invasion (Joel 1:4-7; 2:2-5).

The political, economic and ecological importance of land is explored by E. Davis in her agrarian reading of the OT in dialogue with contemporary agrarian authors such as

W. Berry. She discusses the warnings of preexilic prophets such as Amos against the aggressive and acquisitive centralized agrarian policies of his day and draws comparison with today's tendency to value economic growth at the expense of land care that she sees demonstrated in much contemporary large-scale agribusiness.

3. Theological Themes.

W. Brueggemann's description of the ancient Israelite story as land gift, land possession and land loss provides a helpful framework for exploring land theology in the prophets (Brueggemann, xvii). To this may be added land restoration as a key concern, even if one that is rather ambiguous and elusive, and the notion of the land mourning and rejoicing as a powerful and significant theological theme.

3.1. Land Gift. The notion of land as a gift from God is expressed in a variety of forms. The prophets frequently refer back to Israel's historical traditions to remind the people of God's gracious dealings with them in the past, to call them to account for their current behavior, and to offer hope based on collective memories. Although Abraham, Isaac and Jacob rarely are mentioned by name in connection with land in the prophets, the prose sections of Jeremiah record over fifteen times that the land was given by God to the ancestors (e.g., Jer 7:7; 11:4; 24:10), as does Ezekiel (20:42, and a further three times). Closely associated with this is the concept of the land as the Lord's most beautiful inheritance or heritage (nahālā) (Jer 3:18-19), which the children of Israel have defiled (Jer 2:7; 16:18), and which they will forfeit on account of their actions (Jer 17:4). Ezekiel's temple vision speaks of the restoration of that inheritance (Ezek 47:13-14; 48:29; see also Zech 2:12). A separate strand in the prophets emphasizes the Lord's deliverance of Israel from the land of Egypt, the land of their captivity. This historical recollection forms part of the prophetic repertoire when passing judgment (Amos 3:1-2) or calling for repentance (Hos 13:4; Mic 6:4), in laments over the present wickedness of the exiles (Ezek 20:5-10) and in confessions of sin (Dan 9:15).

3.2. Land Possession. In general terms, Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel use the expression "the land of the living" to denote being alive, in contrast to being consigned to the underworld, or Sheol (Is 38:11; Jer 11:19; Ezek 26:20). More specifically, Israel's dwelling in the land is depicted metaphorically by the prophets as being planted by the Lord as a choice vine (Is 5:1-7; Jer 2:21; Ezek 17; see also Hos 9:13), but which has incurred his wrath (Jer 11:16-17) and will be uprooted from the land in which it were planted (Jer 12:14-17; 45:4; see also Jer 1:10). The return from exile is depicted in similar vein as a replanting of Israel by the Lord (Is 60:21; Jer 24:6; Amos 9:15).

The land itself is described as beautiful (šēbī [Jer 3:19; Ezek 20:6, 15; Dan 11:16]), pleasant, (hemed [Jer 3:19; see also Is 27:2]) and glorious (kābōd [Is 10:18; Ezek 20:6, 15]). It is a land flowing with milk and honey (Jer 11:5; 32:22), likened to the garden of Eden (Joel 2:3), and one in which a variety of plants and animals abound (see 4 below). The land is implicitly viewed as holy, by association with the holiness of Mount Zion (Is 57:13; Jer 31:23; Ezek 20:40). The presence of the glory of the Lord that Isaiah encounters in his temple vision fills the whole land (Is 6:1-3), and its human inhabitants unsuccessfully look to the land to conceal them from his presence (Is 2:10-21; cf. Amos 9:3).

3.3. Land Loss. The preexilic and exilic prophets are clear that Israel's right to remain in the land is dependent upon their faithfulness to the Lord (Is 1:19), and the impending military defeat and exile are attributed to a number of specific factors, including unfaithfulness to God, neglect of *social justice, and hypocrisy. Hosea uses a carefully constructed metaphor in which marital fidelity and the welfare of the land are combined to condemn the northern kingdom, Israel, for worshiping Canaanite gods (Hos 2:1-13) (see Marlow 2009, 166-72), a theme picked up by Jeremiah some 150 years later (Jer 2:2-3; 3:1-5). The outcome will be a return to the instability and precarious existence of their previous lives before settlement in the promised land (Hos 12:12) or being scattered among the nations as God turns his back on them (Jer 18:15-17). The land is described as polluted or defiled by the sins of its inhabitants, who have ignored God's *laws and statutes (Is 24:5), pursued other gods (Jer 2:23-24; 3:2, 9) and set up idols (Jer 16:18; Ezek 36:18).

Amos, First Isaiah and Micah speak out against the hypocrisy of devout religious observance while the basic, God-given principles of *justice and righteousness are being ignored (Is 1:12-17; Amos 5:21-24; 8:4-7; Mic 6:6-12). Such exploitation of the poor by the complacent and decadent elite in society provokes the prophets' condemnation (Is 3:13-15) and results in God's judgment on the people and their exile from the land (Is 5:11-14; Amos 6:4-7). This judgment on the sin of the inhabitants has physical consequences for the land itself, including the loss of fertility (Is 5:7-10; Mic 6:13-15), *destruction by flood and earthquake (Amos 5:6-9; 8:7-10) and desertification and drought (Jer 9:10-12) (see Marlow 2010, 106-13).

It is a misconception that following the exile to Babylon the land of Judah was completely destroyed and depopulated. Despite prophetic hyperbole such as Jeremiah 13:19 and descriptions of the exile that suggest that only some of the poorest were left behind (2 Kings 25:8-12), both biblical (Jer 40:9-12) and extrabiblical (see Middlemas) evidence supports the view that the land continued to be inhabited and farmed. Significant theological themes in Second Isaiah such as Zion-Jerusalem (Is 52:1-3, 7-10) may refer to the inhabitants of "templeless" Judah rather than the Babylonian exilic community as commonly assumed (Tiemeyer). The presence of a continuing population in Judah also accounts for some of the hostility experienced by those returning from exile (Ezra 4:1-6).

3.4. Land Restoration. The return from exile and restoration of the land are hinted at by some of the prophets and are the focus of extensive visionary descriptions in others. Although the oracles of salvation in preexilic prophets such as Amos (Amos 9:11-15) and Hosea (Hos 2:18-23) may reflect a later editor's desire to moderate the harsh and unequivocal judgement oracles of earlier prophets, the view of source critics that these must necessarily be postexilic additions is unsatisfactory and takes no account of the allusive and unspecific content of these texts. The hope and optimism that characterize these exilic messages of deliverance and restoration often are without specific historical marker, a notable exception being Second Isaiah's description of the Persian king Cyrus as the one anointed by the Lord to deliver Israel (Is 45:1-4).

A number of powerful images and ideas are evoked as the prophets announce *salvation and the end of exile. It is couched as the renewal of Israel's *marriage to the Lord (Is 54:5; Hos 2:16-17), a new *covenant (Jer 31:31-34; Ezek 34:25-31; 37:26; Hos 2:18) and restoration of the Davidic throne (Jer 33:14-22; Ezek 34:23-24; Amos 9:11-12). The three-way interconnection noted above (see 2.4) can be seen in the fact that, for the prophets, renewal of the relationship between God and his people also involves the well-being of the land, not just its political significance. As well as the Lord comforting his people (Is 40:1-2; 49:13) and forgiving them (Is 4:4; Jer 33:8; Ezek 36:23-28), the land itself will be restored to its former fertility (Ezek 36:29-30; Hos 2:21-22). Renewal of the land is couched in exaggerated language as “dripping with sweet wine” (Joel 3:18; Amos 9:13) and a return to its Eden-like state (Ezek 36:34-36). In the prophet Isaiah’s vision of a future idyllic existence the relationships between human beings and wild animals will be harmonious instead of hostile (Is 11:6-9; 65:25). By far the most extensive picture of restoration from exile is Ezekiel’s vision of the restored temple (Ezek 40—44), which encompasses not only the temple itself and its ritual practices but also an idyllic picture of the flourishing and healing of the land (Ezek 47:7-12).

3.5. Land Mourning and Rejoicing. The land fails or flourishes according to the sins of the people that live in it. This is depicted in graphic terms as the sorrow and delight of the natural world at the breaking and re-forming of the relationship between God and his people (see Lament, Mourning). The prophets make good use of the ambiguous meaning of the Hebrew root ’abal (“to mourn, dry up”) (see Hayes) to depict the land in personal terms, mourning and desolate as a result of Israel’s sinfulness (Jer 12:4, 11; 23:10; Joel 1:10). The sequence of cause and effect is particularly clear in Hosea 4, in which the inhabitants of the land (i.e., Israel) have neglected God’s laws (Hos 4:1). This results not only in the breakdown of human society, in which stealing, adultery and murder become rife (Hos 4:2), but also in the mourning and desolation of the physical land and its inhabitants, both human and animal (Hos 4:3). This prophetic insistence that human sinfulness has consequences for the natural world is particularly pertinent in the light of the serious environmental issues facing the world today (Marlow 2008).

The land is also able to praise God alongside its human inhabitants. Isaiah’s depiction of restoration of the land includes the rejoicing and blossoming of the desert alongside the salvation and healing of Israel (Is 35:1-2; see also Joel 2:21). The impending return from exile is a reason for all to sing a “new song” of praise to the Lord—land and sea, mountains and forests, town and desert (Is 42:10-11; 44:23; see also Is 51:3). The message of hope that the prophets present is grounded in their view of the land as a good gift from the Lord that has been destroyed because of human disobedience to God but that will be walked upon again with joy.

LAW

The great medieval Jewish philosopher Maimonides insightfully highlighted an important aspect of divine law that is central to the messages of the biblical prophets: at its heart, law is teleologically oriented. That is, God gives laws so that people might be wise, theologically and generally, and so that humanity might flourish and prosper (Novak, 92-121). The prophets encouraged Israel to live in accordance with God's instructions, and they brought messages of judgment when these standards were not met. The prophets appealed to many different sources to discern divine law: human moral consensus, Deuteronomistic traditions, oracles and visions, and, very occasionally, Sinai. Surprisingly, the prophets very rarely appeal to Sinai in order to highlight Israel's breach of law. This article provides a summary of the prophets' engagement with law as well as the relationship of the legal corpus in the Pentateuch to the Prophetic Books. Then, a prophetic theology of law is given that attempts to take into account the way in which the prophets viewed and rhetorically employed law.

3. A Prophetic Theology of Law

1. Law in the Prophets.

This section summarizes the ways in which the prophets viewed and integrated law into their messages. There are several words that can refer to legal documents, traditions or concepts: tôrâ ("law, instruction,"), ḥuqqâ ("stipulation"), ʿedût ("testimony"), mišpat ("judgment") and dāʿat ("knowledge").

1.1. Law in Isaiah. The book of Isaiah opens with the prophet denouncing economic and social oppression (Rendtorff, 170). The leaders of the nation traded justice for a bribe and exploited the most vulnerable members of society (Is 1:17, 23). Within this warning the leaders are encouraged to "listen to Yahweh's message [dēbar-yhwh]" and to "give ear to our God's instruction [tôrât ʾēlohênû]" (Is 1:10). Although Isaiah describes his teaching as tôrâ, T. Lescow believes that he did not mean to equate his message with previously received Torah; rather, Isaiah employed this term for polemical effect (Lescow, 372-73). Since "our God's instruction" is parallel to "Yahweh's message," it likely refers to the contemporary message of the prophet rather than previously revealed Scripture.

Tôrâ also appears in the book's second message (dābār). The prophet describes a future day in which the *temple of Yahweh will reach global prominence (Is 2:2). The Gentile nations will stream to it in order to learn (yrh) from tôrâ how to live in peace (Is 2:3). While the Jerusalem temple is pictured as the storehouse for tôrâ, as individuals learn from and internalize it, tôrâ flows out from *Zion (miššîôn tēšēʾ tôrâ) when they go back to their homelands (Is 2:3). At this time, disputes will be settled amicably, and instead of preparing for war, people will devote their energies to agricultural production (Is 2:4). Tôrâ not only teaches people outwardly but also seemingly transforms them into a new kind of humanity that pursues a godly way of life instead of the path of violence and oppression (Is 2:5). M. A. Sweeney outlines traditional views that see a parallel between tôrâ in this passage and that in the Pentateuch (Sweeney, 50-52). Just as the law was given on Mount Sinai in the first exodus, so in the return from Babylon tôrâ will proceed from Mount Zion (for application of this to Is 1:10 as well, see Fischer, 24-36). While this is a valuable observation from a canonical perspective, it should be noted that there is no explicit mention of the exodus or Sinai traditions in the Isaiah passages themselves.

Isaiah faced opposition in his day, and he encouraged his disciples to carry on his teaching, "Bind up teaching [tēʾûdâ], seal instruction [tôrâ] among my students" (Is 8:16). He said that a time would come when people will seek instruction not from the prophets but instead from ancestral gods and the dead (Is 8:19). Yet, disciples who previously received tôrâ from Isaiah would remember that this had been foretold and take comfort in the fact that people who seek wisdom from unauthorized sources "will have no dawn" (Is 8:20 NRSV). This passage may imply that both oral and written dimensions were involved in the prophetic educational process (Carr, 143-44). Therefore, tôrâ was not merely something to "give an ear to" (Is 1:10) but also to write down and preserve.

Isaiah 24:5 contains a similar theme as Isaiah 5. The verses leading up to Isaiah 24:5 describe God as "about to empty the earth, devastate her, and turn her face into a heap of rubble" (Is 24:1). No one will be spared from this judgment—from priest to layperson, owner to slave, creditor to debtor (Is 24:2). The inhabitants of the earth have "transgressed instructions [tôrôt], overturned prescriptions [hōq], broken the eternal covenant” (Is 24:5). This is the only time in the MT of Isaiah in which tôrâ appears in the plural; however, the Greek tradition translates this as a singular. In any case, since tôrôt and the terms of the covenant have been breached, the earth will be consumed by a curse [ālâ]” (Is 24:6) (see Blessings and Curses).

While the book of Isaiah, along with most other OT texts, presents tôrâ as a divine gift to Israel, it does not picture tôrâ as Israel’s exclusive possession. Instead, one way in which Yahweh intended for the knowledge of God’s upright character (sedeq) to spread was by expanding and making more prominent tôrâ among the *nations (Is 42:21; the LXX has ainesis [“praise”] in place of tôrâ, likely the result of confusing the similarly shaped letters τ in tôdâ [“praise”] and τ in tôrâ). Yahweh desired Israel to accomplish this through obedience and adherence to divine law, but instead they were unwilling to walk in God’s ways (Is 42:24). God therefore handed the people over to looters and foreign captors, which temporarily stunted the spread of tôrâ (Is 42:22-24). The clearest passage within the Isaianic corpus that reflects these concepts is Isaiah 51:4: “Pay attention to me, my people! My nation, give ear to me! For tôrâ will go out from me, my decision will be a light for peoples.” Some argue that Mosaic tôrâ is in view here (e.g., Koenig, 356-57), but the imagery of light used in connection with correction/instruction was quite common throughout the ancient world because many cultures regarded the sun-god Shamash as the god of justice (Smith), and ancient readers likely would have understood the use of this imagery in Isaiah as a similarly broad trope.

In fact, nowhere in the book of Isaiah is tôrâ directly linked to Sinai or the Pentateuch in particular (nonetheless, R. E. Clements maintains that all of First Isaiah’s uses of tôrâ refer to the inchoate “law-book of Moses” [Clements 2007, 70]). Reflecting upon all of the uses of tôrâ within Isaiah, Sweeney defines tôrâ as “the teaching of YHWH, expressed by the prophet, which stands as the norm for proper conduct by both Israel and the nations, and which stands as the norm for order in the created world” (Sweeney, 63). Accordingly, we should view Isaianic law as having a universal rather than particular scope and application. In some ways, this is similar to the perspectives seen in other ancient Near Eastern texts, as in the Akkadian “Shamash Hymn,” in which the sun-god is described as watching everything that happens and concomitantly is all-wise. In response to this belief the hymn proclaims, “The whole of mankind bows to you, / Shamash, the universe longs for your light” (Lambert, 128-29). Yet, for the Israelite prophets, Yahweh takes on the attributes and functions that the Mesopotamians ascribe to Shamash.

The biblical writers approached law more broadly than is typically the case within the Anglo-Saxon legal tradition (Renz, 77). For instance, the first oracle of what is commonly referred to as Deutero-Isaiah recounts God’s greatness in creating the world. Isaiah 40:14 asks the rhetorical question “Whom did he consult, and who showed him discernment, and who taught him in the laws of nature [ōrah mīspāt] and taught him knowledge [da‘at] and made known to him the way of discernment [derek tēbûnôt]?” This passage refers not to forensic legal stipulations but rather to the patterns and formations of the universe.

1.2. Law in Jeremiah. In Jeremiah 2 the prophet delivers an oracle against Israel in which Yahweh accuses the people of God of unfaithfulness. He recounts God’s saving acts in bringing the people up out of Egypt and into the land. However, the leaders spurned God, and the prophet outlines the infidelity of three groups in particular along with their offense: the priests (the “graspers of the law” [tōpēšē hattôrâ]) did not actually know (yḏ’) God, the civil leaders (rō‘îm) rebelled against God, and the prophets prophesied for Baal (Jer 2:8). It is noteworthy that the priests are criticized not for having failed to read or remember tôrâ but rather for not knowing God. It seems that even the OT, or at least this prophet, saw tôrâ as living and active and not merely as dead letters. In other words, since the priests did not know God, who, as we saw in the discussion of Isaiah, was the very source of tôrâ, they had no hope of knowing God’s instruction even though they grasped it in their hands. In a slightly different triad later in the book, the people maintain that Jeremiah’s public voice must be silenced, and that doing so will have no effect on national leadership, for “tôrâ will not disappear from a priest, nor council from a sage, nor a message from a prophet” (Jer 18:18). Again, tôrâ is seen as being within the purview of the priestly caste.

In contrast to Jeremiah 2: 18, which seem to imply that the priests were mere preservers of tôrâ, Jeremiah 8:8 indicates that tôrâ was intentionally manipulated by (priestly?) scribes (sōpērîm): “How can you say, ‘We are wise’ and ‘Yahweh’s Torah is with us’? In actuality, the lying stylus of scribes fashions it into a lie.” According to T. E. Fretheim, the scribes are not accused of rewriting tôrâ and destroying the previous versions; rather, it is their interpretation of the law that is at issue. Specifically, the scribes promulgate the message of “peace” and complacency alongside the (false) prophets. Fretheim ably describes this situation: “Their ‘soft’ use of the law never convicts anyone, never moves people to ask, ‘What have I done?’” (v. 6). They find ways of using the law to conceal the real problem rather than to reveal it” (Fretheim 2002, 150). On the other hand, J. W. Rogerson believes that “the most natural sense of the passage is that those who claim to be wise, perhaps to belong to a class of learned interpreters, are mistaken, because that on which they base their interpretations is flawed. . . . The wise men may not be aware of this, in which case the insidious effects of the corruption are even worse” (Rogerson, 114).

The scribes were supposed to preserve tôrâ because it contained the words (Jer 6:19) and even the voice (Jer 9:13; 32:23) of God, and it was given to guide the way of life of God’s people (Jer 26:4; 44:10). The prophet compares the apostasy of his own day to that of their ancestors as they failed to keep tôrâ and instead followed after other gods. Yet, the contemporary stubbornness of heart is more egregious than the sins of previous generations (Jer 16:11-12). In line with Deuteronomic theology, since the people have rejected the teachings and commands of God, they will be expelled from the land (Jer 16:13; 44:23). However, this period of judgment will not last forever; there will be a day when God will restore the people, just as they were previously brought up from Egypt (Jer 16:14-15). At this time Yahweh will make a covenant with the “house of Israel” in which he will place (ntn) his tôrâ inside them (bēqirbām) and inscribe (ktb) it upon their heart (‘al-libbām) (Jer 31:33). Theoretically, according to Deuteronomy 6:5, this should already have been the case, yet Jeremiah seems to have thought that more work was necessary.

Jeremiah 44:23 is another text conveying Deuteronomic theology, and it is the only place where the word ‘ēdūt (“testimony”) appears in the prophets, although it is fairly frequently used elsewhere: “Because you burned incense and sinned against Yahweh and did not obey Yahweh, and because you did not follow his teaching [tôrâtô], his stipulations [huqqôtāyw], and his exhortations [‘ēdewōtāyw], therefore this disaster has befallen you, as is still the case.”

1.3. Law in Ezekiel. As with other prophets, Ezekiel employs a three-part trope (Greenberg, 156) differentiating the various mediums of divine revelation to the appropriate offices: visions belong to prophets, tôrâ belongs to priests and wisdom belongs to elders (Ezek 7:26). In this account God will enact judgment upon the people by removing all three types of revelation from their midst. In Ezekiel 22:26 the prophet describes the behavior of the priests as “criminally violating my tôrâ” (hāmēsū tôrātī) and subsequently lists what this entailed: profaning holy things, not maintaining the difference between impurity and purity, and not teaching (hōdī‘û) about the Sabbaths. Ezekiel 43:12; 44:5 use tôrâ to designate the architectural designs, maintenance and procedures governing the Jerusalem temple. One of the violations of this law that Ezekiel highlights is that foreigners are brought into the temple and, even more, the priests have outsourced the care of holy objects to them (Ezek 44:5-9) (see Zimmerli, 448, 453-55). Toward the end of this chapter the prophet says that the day is coming when the Zadokite priests will properly keep these regulations, in particular, the Sabbaths and festivals (mô‘ādīm) (Ezek 44:24).

In Ezekiel 20:11 God says that after the Israelites were brought out of Egypt and into the wilderness, “I gave to them my statutes [huqqōtay] and made known to them my regulations [mīšpāṭay] which humanity should do and live by.” Ezekiel 20:12 specifies the Sabbath as a sign that would remind the people that Yahweh was the one who consecrated (qdš) them. Many commentators assume that Ezekiel refers here to the tradition relating the giving of the law at Sinai (e.g., Fishbane, 138), and while this is likely the case, we should note in passing that there is no explicit mention of Moses, Sinai or the Decalogue. Ezekiel also contains an extensive section commonly known as the Temple Vision (Ezek 40:1—48:35), in which he gives detailed instructions regarding the restoration of the building and activities of the Jerusalem temple. Yet, the details that Ezekiel gives, including terminology, furnishings, offerings for the first month, liturgical calendar, Levitical territory and laws of inheritance, differ in many respects from pentateuchal stipulations (Blenkinsopp 1990, 195). These differences were thought to be so significant that at times the canonicity of Ezekiel was somewhat in doubt (b. Šabb. 13b), and they have prompted a contemporary commentator to observe, “These and other differences challenge the fundamental prophetic law of noncontradiction; true prophecy must agree with Mosaic revelation (Deut. 18:15-18)” (Block, 500).

1.4. Law in the Twelve. Hosea proclaims that God was so frustrated with Israel as to bring a legal dispute against them: “Listen to the message of Yahweh, O Israelites, for Yahweh has a lawsuit [rib] against the inhabitants of the land because there is no faithfulness or loyalty or knowledge [da‘at] of God in the land” (Hos 4:1). The prophet also condemns the dishonest nature of society: “So they conclude agreements and make covenants with false oaths, and justice [mišpāt] degenerates into poison weeds, breaking out on the furrows of the fields” (Hos 10:4 NJPS). Similarly, Amos addresses Israel as those who “turn justice [mišpāt] into wormwood and discard righteousness [šēdaqā] to the ground” because they extract onerous payments from the poor and they take bribes at the expense of justice for the needy (Amos 5:7).

Habbakuk opens with an observation that the efficacy of tôrâ is blunted (pwg) when people commit violent acts and corrupt justice (Hab 1:4). By implication, tôrâ is powerful only when people comply with it. Zephaniah announces the judgment of God against the people because of a catalog of sins that includes priests who do violence (hms) to tôrâ because they profane what is holy (Zeph 3:4). Haggai also centers his use of tôrâ upon purity laws (Hag 2:11) and uses the analogy of food becoming unclean when it touches profane provisions to describe the nation as unclean because they have not finished rebuilding the temple (Hag 2:10-19).

Zechariah 5:1-4 recounts the prophet’s vision in which he saw a flying scroll with a list of names detailing those who had stolen or lied.

The scroll likely represents law and justice that flow out from the temple (Tiemeyer, 143). The lone positive use of tôrâ within the Twelve appears in Micah 4:2, in which tôrâ is used along with the word (dēbar) of Yahweh that proceeds from Zion. A day will come when the nations will joyously stream to the holy mountain to receive this divine teaching and in order to settle disputes in a peaceful manner as God (through the priests who mediate and apply tôrâ) judges them (Mic 4:3).

Most scholars believe that two appendices were added to the book of Malachi: Malachi 4:4 (MT 3:22) and Malachi 4:5-6 (MT 3:23-24). It is likely that the appendices originally were intended to bring only the book of Malachi to a close, but during the process of compiling the Twelve it was felt that they would also provide an appropriate ending to the entire prophetic corpus (Chapman, 131-46). The first appendix reaffirms the complimentary relationship of the Pentateuch and prophets with the imperative “Remember the instruction [tôrâ] of Moses my servant whom I charged in Horeb with statutes [huqqim] and regulations [mišpāṭim] for all Israel.” The second appendix describes the future return of Elijah, which many see as a way of including the former prophets into this scheme.

2. Relationship of the Pentateuch and the Prophets.

Perhaps the most curious issue surrounding law in the prophets is the absence of features concomitant with and even essential to law within other sections of Scripture. For instance, the narrative that recounts Moses receiving the law, most prominently distilled in the Decalogue, from God at Mount Sinai is in many ways the most important event within the Pentateuch. Accordingly, Sinai is so closely associated with law that J. D. Levenson states, “The experience of Sinai, whatever its historical basis, was perceived as so overwhelming, so charged with meaning, that Israel could not imagine that any truth or commandment from God could have been absent from Sinai” (Levenson, 18-19). Yet, from a cursory reading of the biblical prophets it seems that Sinai was far less significant for them.

Within Jewish and Christian literature it is common for writers to use tôrâ to refer to the Pentateuch as a whole. However, the prophets hardly ever used the term in this way. Within the last few centuries of biblical scholarship it has been a matter of debate whether the Pentateuch as it exists in the so-called canonical forms of the LXX and the MT was around when the biblical prophets were active. Some scholars believe that the prophets worked with the Pentateuch as a whole (Sailhamer, 484), while other scholars think that the majority of the prophets and their early editors were familiar with the Deuteronomistic school but Priestly sections were added later in the compositional process (Otto). Classic examples illustrating this are the theological similarities between Jeremiah and the Deuteronomistic History (Brueggemann, 143-46; Maier), on the one hand, and the remarkable absence of Moses and the Sinai tradition in all but a handful of passages in the prophets, on the other. The latter phenomenon contains two elements worthy of further consideration.

2.1. Moses in the Prophets. Moses is the person most intimately associated with law within the Pentateuch and in Jewish and Christian interpretation. Yet, his presence within the prophets is scant. His name appears in the prophets only five times in the MT. Isaiah 63:11-12 recalls the salvation of God at the parting of the sea. Most translations of Isaiah 63:11 render the first line of the poetic arrangement similar to "Then his people recalled the days of old, the days of Moses and his people," yet the second half, which includes "the days of Moses and his people," is likely a later insertion, since the Greek tradition does not translate this. However, Moses does legitimately appear in Isaiah 63:12 as the one through whom God worked to part the sea. This passage goes on to give praise to God for the care and deliverance of Israel, yet no mention is made of Sinai and the giving of law to Moses.

In Jeremiah 15:1 Yahweh gives the prophet a blistering oracle to pass on to the people in which God says, "Even if Moses and Samuel were to stand before me, my heart would not go out to this people. Send them away from my presence! Let them go!" (NIV). This oracle merely relates the significant intercessory role of Moses and Samuel, and no specific mention is made of the traditions surrounding their lives and ministries or Moses' reception of tôrâ (Choi, 200-201).

Micah 6:4 mentions Moses along with Aaron and Miriam as the leaders whom God sent to the people as they came up from Egypt. The prophet also mentions the opposition from Balak king of Moab and from Balaam the seer, but again explicit mention of Sinai and Torah are completely absent. Nonetheless, some have seen the three individuals in this verse as representing different facets of life: Moses represents law, Aaron the priesthood, and Miriam prophecy (Kessler, 264). Furthermore, in the remainder of the chapter Micah does go on to briefly mention aspects of cultic sacrifice and economic dishonesty. B. K. Waltke believes that the inclusion of Moses here in Micah is "a strong argument for the antiquity and authenticity of the biblical traditions ascribed to Moses" (Waltke, 377). Yet, since many believe that this passage has a more Deuteronomic than Priestly tone (Mays, 130), the question concerning which of "the biblical traditions" were available to Micah is still in play.

2.2. The Decalogue in the Prophets. As we saw above, the prophets do not explicitly connect tôrâ to Moses. Furthermore, and perhaps even more striking, the prophets mention only once the theophany at Sinai and the giving of the Decalogue (Mal 4:4). We might be inclined to skip over this as inconsequential were it not for the fact that the Sinai event "constitutes the most salient religious event of the wilderness sojourn" (Aaron, 143). From a literary perspective, the only pentateuchal event comparable to the Sinai theophany is the deliverance of the Israelites through the Red/Reed Sea and the destruction of Pharaoh's army. No single event within the Pentateuch receives more treatment than Sinai (the specific event is narrated in Ex 19—20; 24; 32—34; also in Deut 5—6; 9—10), except perhaps the plague narrative (Ex 7—13) (the Joseph story is a narrative composed of multiple scenes and events that stretched over many years).

The themes of exodus and law naturally go together. It is only after Yahweh has delivered the people from slavery that he can then grant them freedom within the bounds of divine instruction. The prologue of the Decalogue makes this link explicit with God's statement "I am Yahweh, your deity who brought you out from the land of Egypt, from a house of slaves" (Ex 20:2; Deut 5:6). References to the exodus often appear within the prophets (e.g., Is 40:3; 43:2, 19-21; 51:9-11; 52:4-5; Hos 2:14-15), yet clear links to the Decalogue are few and far between, if they exist at all.

B. S. Childs thought that “at times certain prophets virtually cite the text of the Decalogue” (Childs, 64), yet an examination of the two texts that he cites, Hosea 4:2 and Jeremiah 7:9, does not lead to such an optimistic conclusion. Additionally, A. Rofé believes that Hosea quotes the opening formula of the Decalogue in 12:10; 13:4 (Rofé, 394). However, these references are oblique and might be better explained as literary tropes. It is true that *intertextuality in extrabiblical ancient Near Eastern oracles was subtle and proper nouns were not often used; nonetheless, Mesopotamian prophets quoted or adapted some of the most prominent and characteristic phrases of the literature to which they alluded in order to make a literary link clear (Halton). The biblical prophets did not function this way with respect to the Decalogue or to the Sinai tradition (aside from a few echoes in Is 4:2-6; 25:1-9 [Fischer, 24-36], and possibly the understanding expressed in the Talmud that Ezekiel “annulled” divine teaching within the Decalogue [Levinson, 63]), yet their references to the exodus from Egypt and the parting of the sea are unmistakable and fairly frequent (for a discussion of methodologies relating to OT intertextuality, see Hays). Furthermore, a reference to the Decalogue and/or Sinai would lend tremendous support to the rhetorical goals of the prophets as they judged the people for their sins and called them to repentance. Yet, instead of reminding the people of the Sinai event and their obligation to live according to the stipulations in the Decalogue, the prophets more often appealed to Yahweh’s law found within the norms of “human moral consensus” (Barton, 61).

3. A Prophetic Theology of Law.

R. E. Clements argues that while many of the prophets predate the Pentateuch from a canonical perspective, the prophets are dependent upon it to provide the background for their critique of Israel (Clements 1978, 123-25). Yet, as we have seen above, the prophets seldom refer to the most central elements within the Pentateuch to provide a basis for their understanding of law. Therefore, it seems that Clements must appeal to the placement of the prophets within the second section of the tripartite division of the Jewish canon to show dependence upon the Pentateuch. Yet, this alone does not lead to the conclusion that books in the latter part of the canon are dependent upon former books either from a literary or theological dimension. Traditionally, Job is seen as reflecting a very early period, from the time of Abraham or even before; however, its placement in the last section of the Jewish canon, the Writings, did not imply that it was dependent on the Pentateuch, since in much of ancient Jewish interpretation Job was seen as predating Moses (Dell, 7-8). Accordingly, a “canonically” informed theological reflection need not imagine that the prophets were reading from complete Torah scrolls and should instead attempt to discern the actual method of the prophets themselves rather than construct a secondary “canonical” schema.

Instead of an appeal to Sinaitic Torah, the prophets appear to refer to a broad, pre-Sinai conception of law that is reflected in Genesis 26:5: “[All this will come to pass] because Abraham heard my voice and he kept my injunction [mīšmartī], my commands [mīšwōtay], my statutes [huqqōtay], and my laws [tôrōtāy]” (we should keep in mind that Genesis could have been, and probably was, reworked in light of the Sinai tradition). Even elements that seem central to Sinaitic revelation, within the narrative world of the Hebrew Scriptures, actually have roots going back to primeval stories in Genesis (e.g., Sabbath in Gen 1, the temple as a reflection of the creation of the world [Balentine, 136-41], and clean and unclean animals in the account of Noah). Since these concepts are more closely related to and spelled out in greater detail within the Sinai tradition, from a historical perspective we could view them as anachronistic interpolations of the Priestly and/or Holiness schools. But, from a theological perspective, as Fretheim points out, the Genesis 26 passage “is no simple anachronistic reference to the law given at Sinai” (Fretheim 2003, 186). We could extend this observation to the other Genesis accounts as well.

Within Genesis law is linked to creation (Schmid, 104-5). Along these lines, we could view the prophets as bypassing the Sinai tradition in favor of highlighting a more fundamental breach—a breach of the created order and, concomitantly, humanity’s relationship with God. For the biblical prophets, law is not an abstract concept but rather is the very character and nature of God that God embedded into the fabric of the universe. As A. Heschel puts it, "Crime is not a violation of a law, but a sin against the living God" (Heschel, 217).

This perspective gains further footing when viewed alongside the theme of creation and new creation that is repeated throughout the Jewish and Christian Scriptures. The Bible recapitulates the sequence of creation, de-creation and re-creation starting with Eden, expulsion from the garden, and Eve giving birth to two sons; a cycle or two later we read of the flood that obliterated the distinction between the waters and dry land, the preservation of the new human (Noah), and creation starts anew as the waters recede (Blenkinsopp 2011, 155-70), and so on until the exodus and the people of God receive another start in Canaan; in a sense, this is an act of re-creation, a new crop of humans (the old ones having died in the wilderness) are brought to the Eden-like land. The giving of the law at Sinai was a contextually conditioned guide to accompany this new creation (Sweeney). From a theological perspective, the prophets skip over Sinai and tap into an Ur-tradition of law in order to admonish the nation to repent and hopefully avoid the coming de-creation (the exile) or to look back to the recent experience of de-creation (again, the exile) in order to avoid another iteration of this cycle. As Fretheim explains, "God's creation is at stake in Israel's behaviors, not simply their more specific relationship with God" (Fretheim 2005, 165).

This perhaps leads to the message concerning law that the prophets most urgently sought to convey: embracing divine law leads to *peace and life, while rejection of it leads to *destruction and violence (see Is 2—5). Divine law fosters human flourishing and a harmonious relationship with God. According to the diversity of prophetic witness, God's law is found in many forms: Siniatic revelation, Deuteronomistic reflections, prophetic oracles and *visions, the natural world, and human moral consensus. While the prophets warn that turning aside from this path will lead to de-creation, the penitent can take comfort that re-creation is just around the corner.

LEADERSHIP

The OT describes a range of leadership positions within Israel's society. As the prophets interact with different aspects of their society, they inevitably engage with these leaders. The authority of these leaders is recognized by the prophets, though they are aware that holding an office does not necessarily indicate actual leadership. The prophets expect their leadership to lead the nation to a more faithful walk with Yahweh. Leaders who fail to do this are rebuked by the prophets.

1. Leadership Terms
2. Assessments of Leadership in the Prophets
3. Integrated Perspectives

1. Leadership Terms.

There are a range of terms in the OT related to this subject, though no one summary term is equivalent to the English word leadership (for a summation of the main terms in this field, see NIDOTTE 5:117, though it does not include religious leaders in this domain). Rather, the focus tends to be on the specific leadership role that is fulfilled, though the semantic range of these terms can overlap. For instance, both dīn and šōpēṭ can refer to a judge as someone who decides legal questions, though both can also refer to governance or administration more generally. In this latter sense, their meaning relates to ʾādōn (“lord”), which can also be a synonym for melek (“king”), though ʾādōn is perhaps the broadest term. Nevertheless, even from this brief survey it becomes apparent that anyone searching for leadership terms in English needs to be aware that a range of Hebrew terms may lie behind any one term in English, and conversely, any one Hebrew term may be translated in a range of different ways, depending upon the emphasis in the particular text.

Although these terms overlap in meaning, it is possible to identify two principal areas of leadership, each of which is reflected at various points in the prophets, though this typology is more a tool of analysis than something on which the prophets consciously reflect. Leadership terms may be used with reference to rule (including administration and military command) or religious action, but they often cut across these fields, and it is not always possible to limit any one occurrence to only one category. For example, a king was at various times a ruler, someone who participated in specifically religious activities, someone responsible for administration (such as hearing legal complaints) and also a military commander. Approaching leadership through these subcategories can be helpful because it recognizes the OT’s concern with the function that a leader fulfills at any point; and even staying with the example of the king, it is generally the case that only one or two of these aspects is emphasized at any one point. On the other hand, this typology is not one that the prophets formally develop, and we will also see points where an integrated approach is more helpful.

A consistent theme that emerges is that all forms of leadership exist under Yahweh’s greater rule. Leaders are required to lead the people to an authentic practice of faith in Yahweh and to model this in their own actions. Thus, leadership is concerned both with what leaders do and their character. Leaders who fail may be removed by Yahweh and replaced by another. The removal of Eli from the priesthood and Saul from the throne in 1 Samuel therefore are paradigmatic for the prophets, as they demonstrate Yahweh’s authority over all forms of leadership, while David and Moses provide the dominant human model of faithful leadership.

2.1. Rulership. A collection of terms is related to the theme of rule, so that to a certain extent terms associated with judicial or military matters can be subsumed under them. Among the most important of these are melek (“king”), ʾādōn (“lord”), nāgîd (“ruler, leader”), nāṣîʾ (“chief, king”), pehâ (“governor”), śar (“prince, official”) and zāqen (“elder”), though others come into this subcategory at various points, including priests. It is clear even from these, however, that rulers may function in different ways, and the type of leadership offered may vary from local expressions (chiefs, elders) through to that associated with the nation as a whole (king, prince), though the distinctions between these types of rule are not absolute. Likewise, when considering rulers, we will also see that their rule is at various points focused on civil administration or military command, so that they become the model for all other leaders in these areas. An important theme for kings is that they are also often characterized as shepherds, something that draws on both a common motif across the ancient Near East and also the presentation of David as a shepherd in 1 Samuel 16—17 (see Laniak, 42-74).

The prophets approve such leaders whom they believe lead the people to serve Yahweh faithfully, while the failure to do so leads to prophetic condemnation. A clear example of this can be seen in Jeremiah’s message to Josiah’s sons in Jeremiah 22:11-30, though this passage needs to be seen in the wider context established for it in Jeremiah 21:11-22:10. In Jeremiah 21:11-14 the prophet announces Yahweh’s word to David’s house, though a specific king is clearly intended. The dynasty as a whole is summoned to execute justice and work for the needs of the weak because the failure to do so would result in Yahweh’s judgment (Jer 21:11-12), judgment modeled in his promised actions against Jerusalem in Jeremiah 21:13-14. It is this background that enables the prophet to summon the Davidic dynasty to practice justice, while assuring it of Yahweh’s judgment should it fail (Jer 22:1-9). Because of this, Jeremiah is able to announce Yahweh’s judgment on Shallum (better known as Jehoahaz [Jer 22:11-17]), Jehoiakim (Jer 22:18-23, though Jer 22:20-23 is concerned with the effect of judgment on Jerusalem) and Coniah (better known as Jehoiachin [Jer 22:24-30]). Each is judged as inadequate, and in the case of Shallum it is specifically indicated that he has sought his own wealth rather than justice for his people. In this, he is specifically contrasted with Josiah (Jer 22:15-16), who is assessed positively because he did execute justice and righteousness, thus forging a close link between the leader's actions and character. The close association between rulers and their people shows that they can bring blessing to them by establishing justice, but they incur judgment by failing to do so. Jeremiah accepts that kings can be positive, but he also is aware of the dangers that they pose.

The potential and threat of rulers can also be seen in Isaiah. In Isaiah 7:3-9 Ahaz is challenged to trust Yahweh in the face of the threat from an alliance between Syria and Ephraim against Judah, and in Isaiah 7:10-11 he was even offered the chance to ask for a sign from Yahweh in confirmation. His failure to do so results in the famous "Immanuel" prophecy (Is 7:12-17), along with the assurance of an attack by Assyria instead. By contrast, when confronted by the Assyrians, Hezekiah trusted in Yahweh and led the people to do so, bringing a stinging rebuke from the Rabshakeh (Is 36:4-10), though in a telling irony his words do point to the truth (see Briggs, 121-22). Faced with evidence that seemed contrary to faith, Hezekiah demonstrated the faith that Ahaz did not and thus provided appropriate leadership for his people. A similar struggle to be faithful is evident in the stories of Jeremiah's encounters with Zedekiah (Jer 37-38), where Zedekiah seemingly wanted to follow Jeremiah's advice but ultimately was unable to do so because of his fear of others (Jer 38:19). Since Jeremiah has then to negotiate with the other officials, it is clear that they exercised the real leadership at the time, even though Zedekiah was in office. Similarly, it was the intervention of Ebed-Melech that saw Jeremiah removed from a cistern where he was held (Jer 38:7-13) after Zedekiah confessed that he could not act against the wishes of his officials (Jer 38:5), so it was Ebed-Melech who actually offered leadership.

Kings were not the only figures who could be assessed in this way. In Isaiah 3:13-15 we read of a court case initiated by Yahweh against the princes (sar) and elders (zāqēn) of the people because not only had they failed to bring forth justice for the people, but in fact they were the ones responsible for the oppression of the poor. These terms refer here to a broader pattern of leadership than kings alone but make clear that all forms of rule are a responsibility, not a privilege.

This pattern continues into the postexilic period. At the center of a series of visions concerning the situation of the community, Zechariah 3-4 records visions concerned with the high priest Jeshua and the governor Zerubbabel. These men provided joint leadership for the community, though both seem to have faced significant opposition, perhaps because Zerubbabel was a descendant of David but did not bring about a restoration of the monarchy. Nevertheless, Zechariah insists that Yahweh was working through them both. In the case of Jeshua this is symbolized by a change of his clothes (Zech 3:4-5), while Zerubbabel was assured that the presence of Yahweh's *Spirit was sufficient to overcome opposition (Zech 4:6-7) and see the new *temple completed (Zech 4:8-10). If Zechariah 4:11-14 refers to them as the "sons of oil" ("anointed ones" in most English translations), then the sense of the vision would be that just as the oil from an olive tree is part of Yahweh's agricultural blessing for his people, so these two leaders are a blessing, even if this is not recognized by all (similarly Redditt 1995, 68; for an alternative view, see Boda). Leadership that sought to lead the people to worship was regarded as a blessing, but in Zechariah 9-14 we encounter a number of passages referring to shepherds that clearly are critical of them. Like much of Zechariah 9-14, the interpretation of these passages is disputed, but such a high concentration of "shepherd" and "flock" language indicates that leadership is a crucial concern in these chapters (see O'Kennedy), while the fact that the shepherds are never identified means that they are best taken as leaders in general (Redditt 1989, 631). Yahweh remains the good shepherd for the people (Zech 10:3), but at the same time he condemns those shepherds who fail to protect their people (Zech 11:17). Jeshua and Zerubbabel could be commended because their leadership reflected Yahweh's concerns, even though they lacked public support. But leaders who fail to do this, even if publicly recognized, stand under Yahweh's judgment. Zechariah thus continues to develop themes developed by earlier prophets in commending rule that is committed to Yahweh while condemning that which undermines the well-being of the community. That rule, and especially kingship, could provide appropriate leadership is reflected in the messianic hope, though there it is a transformed leadership that understands the priority of Yahweh's rule (e.g., Is 11:1-11).

2.2. Religious Leaders. References to religious leaders are less common than to rulers but are still relatively frequent. We are not concerned only with priests here, since prophets and the wise can also provide leadership. Although it is a quotation from his adversaries, Jeremiah 18:18 indicates that each of these exercised some form of leadership, and Jeremiah himself does not seem to dissent from the understanding of their roles, even if he would not accept their conclusion that leadership and instruction would continue even if Jeremiah were to be removed. Indeed, it is not impossible that priests, the wise and prophets were central figures among Jeremiah's opponents (similarly Thompson, 440). What is clear, however, is that teaching was central to each of these forms of religious leadership. For the priests, this was concerned with the tôrâ, which here is best understood as "instruction" rather than simply "law" (Hutton, 138), whereas for the wise it was "counsel" and for the prophet the "word." Each was recognizable because their teaching came in a different mode, but they provide leadership through their teaching, and their particular leadership role can be recognized by the mode of that teaching. In the case of priests, there was the additional element of their association with worship, but although this is sometimes mentioned and clearly contributes to them being viewed as leaders, the main focus of the prophets is on their teaching.

Priests can be viewed by the prophets as reliable figures, though before the exile this tends to occur in reference to isolated actions rather than in their wider role (Is 8:2; Jer 37:3). We do not find positive portrayals of the wise, and the prophets who are mentioned in the prophetic literature usually are presented as false (e.g., Hananiah in Jer 28). However, in Haggai and Zechariah we see a more positive portrayal, in part because of their support for the high priest Jeshua (e.g., Hag 1:14), but also because of the expectation that priests would provide appropriate teaching in response to the people's questions (Hag 2:10-13; Zech 7:3). The importance of Jeshua's role as high priest is stressed in Zechariah 6:11-13, where he not only shares leadership with a mysterious figure known as "the Branch," but also shares "counsel" with this figure, thus uniting priestly teaching with wisdom. In Joel 1:13; 2:17 we find a point where the priests' role in leading worship is important in leading the nation's repentance, suggesting that although they were implicated in the situation that led to the nation's distress, they were still able to fulfill their role.

It is, however, more common to find the prophets criticizing religious leaders for their failures. This is invariably the case with the wise (e.g., Is 3:3; 5:21; 29:14; Jer 8:8-9) and usually true of prophets (e.g., Mic 3:5-7), but it is also frequently true of the priests. Thus, in Isaiah 28:7-13 the teaching of prophet and priest is contrasted with Yahweh's justice, parodying their instruction as drunken ramblings. Similarly, in Jeremiah 2:8 we find the failures of the priests and prophets linked (here also with kings) for failing to provide proper instruction to prevent the people from turning from Yahweh. It is this failure in teaching that leads to Yahweh's judgment on priest, prophet and elder (in terms of counsel, so wisdom is the issue) in Ezekiel 7:26, while in Micah 3:11 it is the fact that the teaching of priest and prophet is sold that leads to their judgment (cf. Zeph 3:4). In spite of the possibilities for priests hinted at in Haggai and Zechariah, Malachi points to their continued shortcomings, especially their failure in instruction (Mal 2:1-9) (see Tate, 401). The contention of Hosea 4:4-14, that the people reflect their religious leaders (see Lundbom, 67-68), is thus a common one across the prophets.

In spite of the religious leaders' failures, the prophets anticipate the inclusion of them in Israel's restoration. Thus, the national restoration portrayed in Jeremiah 31:7-14 particularly mentions the priests among those who will experience Yahweh's bounty. Likewise, in Jeremiah 33:17-22 the priests are mentioned along with the descendant of David as those who are central to Yahweh's process of restoration. But it is in Ezekiel 40-48 that the importance of the priests in the program of restoration is particularly highlighted. Although critical scholarship has often sought to trace various layers within this text, a case for its general unity can still be made (McConville, 13-17; Greenberg, 181-89) from which a reasonably unified picture emerges, even if issues such as the relationship between the Zadokites and Levites cannot be resolved here. Ezekiel does not legislate for priests so much as assume that they will be central to any restoration of worship. As such, space is made for them in the temple and *land (Ezek 40:44-47; 42:13-14; 45:4; 48:10-14), and worship practices are assumed to involve them (Ezek 43:19-27; 44:15, 29-31; 45:18-20; 46:2, 19-20). More importantly, their teaching function is specifically reinstated so that they not only instruct the people on matters of practice but also act as judges and so demonstrate how the law applies (Ezek 44:23-24). Ezekiel thus anticipates a restored religious leadership, but its restoration is shaped by the law. In Isaiah 61:6; 66:21 we may have something that goes beyond this in that future priests are not restricted to Levites and Zadokites, though their role appears to be similar. That is, although religious leaders fulfill several roles, teaching continues to be central, but that teaching already has its content defined in the law.

3. Integrated Perspectives.

Although I have separated out these areas of leadership for the purposes of analysis, the reality is that they were woven together such that although we can identify the different functions that were fulfilled, all forms were interrelated. That leadership could be viewed collectively is apparent from passages that link various forms of leadership, the clearest example of which occurs in Micah 3. Both Micah 3:1 and Micah 3:9 address the "heads of Jacob," who are then accused by Micah of a failure to establish justice. One could therefore imagine that Micah's concern is with rulers, and to the extent that he focuses on the corruption of the judicial system, this is correct. But in Micah 3:5-8 the prophets who preach in return for payment are highlighted, the concern being that such prophets have become one with the government and therefore no longer critique the abuses perpetrated by the nation's leadership. Micah does not deny their status as prophets, but contrasts their concern with payment with his own empowerment by the Spirit so that he might declare the nation's transgression, a transgression that must be judged because of its absence of justice. Likewise, although Micah 3:9-10 addresses government abuses, Micah again notes that the prophets divine for money while adding that the priests teach for money while claiming Yahweh's presence. Rulers are meant to establish Yahweh's principles in the life of the community, and religious leadership was meant to teach what that was. The two are meant to complement one another even as they retain a degree of independence so that each could critique the other. The various functions of leadership are here integrated with one another because they had collectively failed to develop a community that reflected Yahweh's purposes. This is why Yahweh's judgment had to come. Nevertheless, the failure of those leaders was not the last word, which is why Micah 4:9 insists that the absence of king and counselor is not the end, for Yahweh is Israel's ultimate leader, which is also why all leaders are accountable to him.

LITERARY APPROACHES

The Bible, an enduring written work of undisputed social power, has always held a primary place in the canon of Western Literature. As such, this article could explore the multiple ways in which the prophets, as participants in the Bible's literary canon, have been read as literature through history. That is a worthy and encompassing pursuit, but the aim of this article is more modest. It explores an approach to the prophetic texts that arose in the 1970s and 1980s and self-consciously and critically engages the final form of the prophets as coherent literary works.

Reading the prophets in this way is part of a trend in broader biblical scholarship. The publication of J. Muilenburg's 1968 Society of Biblical Literature presidential address, "Form Criticism and Beyond," observed the need for, and hastened the proliferation of, methodologies that "moved beyond" historical-critical paradigms and focused on narrative shaping and aesthetics, and on rhetorical affect. In subsequent years, methodologies such as rhetorical, narrative, reader-response and structural were appropriated to explore the biblical text, including the prophets.

Historical-critical methodologies view the prophets as charismatic figures whose genuine oracular utterances are preserved in the books of their name together with the accretions of subsequent traditions. Historical-criticism pursues the ipsissima verba of the prophets. Its intent is wholly historical: unearthing the historical prophet, his words, and the compositional history by which those words grew into the present text.

Literary approaches to the prophets seriously engage the final form of the biblical books. While attention to diachronic, historical questions at times informs the investigation, its focus remains upon the final form of the text as an appropriate locus of study in which prophetic books yield evidence of intentional literary shaping and a coherent message.

Some of the literary methods and concerns explored in this article apply equally to each of the books of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel and the Twelve Prophets; others are more narrowly applied. The literature is, of course, extensive; each prophetic book could be treated separately. This article, then, is intentionally a survey, drawing selectively for illustrative purposes from research on the entire prophetic corpus.

1. Literary Unity
2. Textual Poetics
3. Theology, Canon and Scripture
4. Future Directions

1. Literary Unity.

The eschewal of historical questions and the consideration of the final form as a unified whole is one of the primary hallmarks of a literary approach to the prophets. This remains, explicitly or implicitly, part of all literary approaches, and though a commitment to investigate the text as received may be a priori, it is affirmed by a variety of signifiers that point to the Prophetic Books' character as unified literary works.

For instance, a literary approach to the book of *Isaiah moves beyond the historical-critical consensus of the existence of First, Second and Third Isaiah to explore issues of verbal, thematic and theological unity in the final form. R. Rendtorff's 1993 essay (published originally in German, 1991) demonstrates this new approach, noting such unifying factors. Continuing prolific work by the guild has strengthened the idea of Isaianic unity. Unifiers such as those explored by Rendtorff, and others such as structure, metaphors, *intertextualities and the impact of Isaiah's canonical and scriptural character (see essays in Melugin and Sweeney; Watts and House; Hauser) question the viability of a continuing commitment to a tripartite reading of the book.

Similar work moves *Jeremiah studies from a historical-critical investigation of sources A, B and C to consideration of the work's literary unity. Elements such as consistent themes, the place of key chapters within the structure, and even the unifying force of the prophetic persona that pervades the whole support the intentionally literary nature of the work. Such studies reveal "the contours of an overall plan and a theology that keeps the canonical book together, so that those who listen carefully will hear its message" (Kessler, xii).

*Ezekiel too is now approached with a commitment to viewing its literary form as a unified whole. Thus, M. Greenberg's 1983 commentary, while not naive regarding authorial unity, argues for the book's essential character as a "product of art and intelligent design . . . [shaped by] Ezekiel, if not the very words of Ezekiel himself" and engages the rhetorical purposes of such artful design (Greenberg, 26). Similarly, D. Block's two-volume commentary attends to the book's literary nature, apparent in its unifying framework (Block, 1:23-39).

The unity movement does not pass over the Book of the *Twelve, which early modern research considered only as an anthology of separate books. P. House argues that the collection, united by genre, structure and theme, and a discernible comedic plot, is intentionally presented as a unified work (House 1990). Further evidence of synchronic readings is apparent in M. Sweeney's two-volume work on the Twelve in which he primarily attends, without ignoring diachronic considerations, to synchronic considerations.

Finally, even such a dichotomized book as *Daniel (with its divide between narrative and apocalyptic prophecy and its use of two languages [Dan 2-7, in Aramaic, is enclosed by Dan 1; 8-12, in Hebrew]) can be considered in literary categories. Thus, recent commentaries witness to the influence of literary studies, note structural and theological unities, and demonstrate a commitment to engage the book in its final form (e.g., Goldingay).

Unified literary readings do not necessarily presuppose wholesale affirmation of the books as the ipsissima verba of historical prophets. Although the books may be so construed, the prophet might also be construed as an implied persona garnered from the finished product and created by the redactional work of disciples and/or redactors. Then, too, the historical or redacted prophet may also virtually be erased from the interpretive process, and the inscribed message freed from any such historical or redactional moorings. But pointedly in each case, historical-critical consideration is no longer the sole, or even the reigning, paradigm. Fresh, critical literary engagement with the work argues that in order to properly hear the prophetic message, it must be heard primarily as presented, as a literary whole.

Several methods of investigation, as noted above, are used to support the unified character of Prophetic Books. Some of these methods are also applied to reveal the literary character of a smaller section or to connect a prophetic book to others works within the canon of Scripture. To these varied methods we now turn.

2. Textual Poetics.

Textual poetics are the constituent ingredients of a literary work; working together, a text's poetics form literature. Poetics is not the process of interpretation, but it is an exploration of the building blocks of literature and of how those building blocks are assembled. An investigation of literary approaches to the prophets necessarily requires an investigation of poetics, and although many categories could be pursued (e.g., irony, characterization, perspective, chiasmic structures) here, the categories of narrative plot and unifying structure, intertextuality, and metaphor provide an entry into the central poetics of the prophets.

2.1. Narrative Plot and Unifying Structure.

Plot and structure are necessities of a literary work, and a few examples will show the importance of these elements within a literary approach to the prophets. C. Seitz's assessment of Isaiah's overall structure breaks down its tripartite divisions (Seitz 1988; 1990). He notes that as one moves from First to Second to Third Isaiah, no clear indication is given that redactional boundaries are crossed. Further, a superscription is found as the book opens but not also at the start of Second or Third Isaiah, contrary to what one might expect of a redacted composite. Finally, he notes that the book has only one commissioning narrative (Is 6), and that Isaiah 40, rather than providing a second commissioning narrative to open Second Isaiah, is structured to serve as a reactivation of the message of Isaiah 1-39 for a new audience—the audience to whom the whole book is addressed. Seitz's arguments for structural unity within the book have been favorably received and extended.

Similarly, structuring the book of Jeremiah in its canonical form is undertaken while acknowledging its complex literary composition. Offerings by A. J. O. van der Wal, L. Stuhlman and M. Kessler in a 2004 collection of essays (Kessler) provide three different approaches to structuring the book; the variations attest not only to the book's complexity, but also to the rapidly moving field of Jeremiah scholarship, which has yet to arrive at consensus.

Van der Wal's structure falls just short of a true synchronic reading, as he leaves Jeremiah 52 outside the structure as a later redacted piece. Stuhlman and Kessler, however, though each provides a different structure, use a truly synchronous reading of the whole book. Interestingly, each also describes Jeremiah in terms of its storyline or plot. For Kessler, that plot begins in Jeremiah 1 with Yahweh as Lord of Judah and the nations and is retrospectively addressed in Jeremiah 25 as the prophetic message is summarized while also proleptically presenting Babylon's doom. Finally, that prolepsis is fulfilled in Jeremiah 52. Stuhlman's plot presents a two-part drama focusing on the prophetic persona of Jeremiah. In the drama Jeremiah's fall into hopelessness and rise into seasoned endurance reflects Judah's own destiny.

Isaiah too can be conceived as a literary drama with plot, characters and scenes. J. D. W. Watts's commentary presents Isaiah 1—33 as a drama in six scenes whose plot centers on the relationship between Yahweh and Israel. The plot extends via a prologue (Is 1—4) and epilogue (Is 62—66) to draw in Jerusalem and the temple. The complication in the drama is Israel's sin, which calls for Israel's condemnation. As the plot unfolds, several solutions to absolve Israel are presented (Is 7—64), until Yahweh presents his decision in the final chapters. Throughout, Watts treats Isaiah as a coherent and synchronous whole.

A final example reveals how the exploration of plot has marked literary approaches to the prophets. P. House, working with the final form of the Book of the Twelve, argues that its arrangement is an intentional presentation of a U-shaped comedic plot in which the protagonist (here, *Israel) descends to the depths (*exile) before rising once again to restoration (fully experienced only in the future) (House 1990, 111-62). House traces a plot that includes expected elements such as an introduction (Hosea, Joel), complication (Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah), crisis (Nahum, Habakkuk), falling action (Zephaniah) and resolution (Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi). House's argument urges that the Book of the Twelve be read as one book, a unified, synchronic account of Israel's relationship with Yahweh. Though not undisputed (see the diverse opinions in Ben Zvi and Nogalski), House's reading of a unified plot demonstrates the application of this literary identifier to the prophetic works.

2.2. Intertextuality. Appropriate definitions for *intertextuality are debated. Here, a summation provided by J. Nogalski provides a framework for discussion and includes the following four categories: quotations (the reuse of a phrase, sentence or paragraph), allusions (a word or words eliciting recollection of another text for a specific purpose), catchwords (a quotation or allusion often found at the seams of text and used to form connections across textual units) and motifs and themes (devices, often present across a large corpus, used to reveal the unique emphases of that specific work) (Nogalski 1996). A further category of intertextuality that takes up the extensive reuse of biblical texts within a prophetic work is also examined. Consideration of the prophets as literature draws attention to these forms of intertextuality, revealing the artfulness of the literary work in its final form. Again, questions of compositional history may be an extended part of such consideration, but they are not its necessary focus.

2.2.1. Allusions, Quotations, Catchwords, Motifs and Themes. A prime example of extensive intertextuality is traced in Rendtorff's 1993 work mentioned above, which argues for the unified character of the book of Isaiah. Several examples of Rendtorff's findings are mentioned here to illustrate the literary power of intertextuality.

Rendtorff traces the occurrences of the word comfort throughout Isaiah and its service to the motif of Yahweh's comfort granted to various groups, including his people, *Zion and all who mourn. He is careful to acknowledge that comfort is highlighted throughout the corpus, and he particularly notes its presence in key chapters, such as Isaiah 12; 40; 51; 66. Similarly, he traces the use of the phrase "the glory of Yahweh," significantly present in each of the three sections of Isaiah. His essay reveals that other intertextualities span the book's three sections, but often they cluster in key chapters (such as Is 6; 12; 40; 51; 66). Though found throughout the book, Rendtorff particularly marks their presence in Isaiah 40, which Rendtorff counts as a central chapter, uniting and thematizing the whole book.

Rendtorff also considers certain themes and motifs in the book, noting their consistent presence, but also the ways in which these themes and motifs develop and change as Isaiah progresses. So, for instance, the theme of Zion or Jerusalem is present in Isaiah 1—39 but is not fully developed. In the second part of Isaiah it is richly developed as a personification and is a central theme. The theme continues in the third section of Isaiah but is less widely dispersed, being concentrated in Isaiah 60–62; 65–66. As in the intertextualities of “comfort” and “the glory of Yahweh,” Rendtorff notes the coalescing of this motif in key chapters (Is 1; 12; 35; 40) that provides a unifying thematic skeleton across Isaiah.

Rendtorff also considers the motif of *righteousness, noting its presence in Isaiah as a theological concept. In the first section of Isaiah it appears in relation to human behavior, while its usage in the second section of Isaiah reveals the character of Yahweh’s actions. Finally, in the third section of Isaiah the two stand in reciprocal relationship: Yahweh’s righteousness calls for human righteousness. As Isaiah draws toward its close, it is Israel’s *salvation that will bring about Israel’s righteousness.

Rather than the themes and motifs calling for a dissection of Isaiah into purported earlier traditions, Rendtorff allows that they hold the book together. The medium of intertextuality adds to the coherent message of Isaiah, issuing a powerful call for Israel to abandon sin and to embrace Yahweh’s salvation.

The study of theme is also apparent in literary approaches to the Twelve. Particularly, the theme of the *Day of Yahweh is traced to suggest an intentional theological unity (Rendtorff 2000). This reading argues for an inclusio marked by the term the “day of Yahweh” in Joel 2:11 and Malachi 4:5, within which the Day of Yahweh finds expression in almost every book. The theme is built through various related terms that, if the Twelve are read sequentially and in light of Joel’s concern with the Day of Yahweh, are likewise seen to refer to the same day. Yet, while the theme unites the books, it does not present a monochromatic picture of that day. As the Day of Yahweh first presented in Joel encompasses “different . . . and divergent” perspectives (Rendtorff 2000, 80), so such difference is echoed throughout the remainder of the Twelve.

The intertextual phenomenon of catchwords is particularly pertinent in literary readings of the Twelve. Assuming that the Twelve are intentionally redacted to be read as one book with chronological, thematic and plot progression, Nogalski points to the presence of catchwords that stand most often at the seams of the books (i.e., at significant junctures and at the beginnings and endings of books), appear often to be redactionally inserted, and serve to connect both adjacent and nonadjacent books (Nogalski 1993; 1996). So, for instance, Amos 1:2 takes up Joel 3:16, while Obadiah 4 reuses verses that close Amos (Amos 9:2-4). The catchwords may also develop as a juxtaposition that ties into overarching themes within the Book of the Twelve. Thus, Hosea 14:7 utilizes agricultural words such as “vine,” “wine” and “grain” promised to the “inhabitants” in their future. By contrast, Joel 1:2-20 presents the “inhabitants” facing present agricultural disaster that involves the “vine,” “wine” and “grain.” The juxtaposition thus highlights overarching themes of loss through judgment and of future restoration. Further, Nogalski argues that these catchword motifs reappear throughout the corpus at significant junctures (thus, the agricultural images reappear in Hab 3:17; Hag 2:16-19; Zech 8:12; Mal 3:10-11).

2.2.2. Reuse of Biblical Traditions. Intertextuality is also apparent in the use within prophetic texts of pentateuchal traditions. While the direction and nature of such reliance remains debated, scholarship has successfully compared the intertexts as synchronous readings. In each instance it is the intertextual juxtaposition of an evoked past to the constraints of a new present that garners powerful theological commentary.

An extensive example of such intertexts is found in Ezekiel’s use of pentateuchal traditions, particularly in the historical overviews of Ezekiel 20; 23 (see McKeating; Patton; Levitt Kohn). Ezekiel’s historical overview shows a similar unfolding of events such as is found in Deuteronomy 1–11 and related in Deuteronomistic texts such as Joshua 24; 1 Kings 8. It is, however, a highly selective, negative reading of Israel’s past. The retelling appears as a response to the events of exile and anticipates a new exodus—not now from Egypt, but from Babylon.

Ezekiel’s historical retelling conspicuously absents Moses as a character. Yet, C. Patton argues that the “no good laws” of Ezekiel 20 prepare for the giving of a new law that evokes Moses’ lawgiver role, a law found in Ezekiel 40–48. H. McKeating also connects these chapters with the figure of Moses. He cites a narrative framework that reflects Moses’ life and shows that Ezekiel 40—48 is concerned with laws that in the Pentateuch attach to Moses: regulations regarding temple worship, priestly service, land allocation and conduct of leadership. R. Levitt Kohn also sees in the character of Ezekiel a life of a second Moses, taking on the Mosaic roles of prophet, priest and legislator.

By pursuing the intertextual relations between the Pentateuch and Ezekiel, the literary creativity of the prophetic text is unveiled. Reusing familiar traditions, Ezekiel reframes them in new literary contexts. In these new contexts intertextual echoes provide theological commentary that is more than the sum of its parts.

2.3. Metaphor. Given the deep emotion expressed by the prophets, Israel and even Yahweh surrounding covenant failure and the possibility of (and eventual actuality of) exile, it is not surprising that metaphor, which stirs emotion in such multivalenced ways, is so common in the Prophetic Books. The abundant supply of literary metaphors is explored in scholarship in a variety of ways.

R. Melugin reads Isaiah 1 synchronically, showing how the metaphor of Yahweh's trial of his foolish sons is juxtaposed to that of the punishment and restoration of Yahweh's faithless bride. The juxtaposition of the two metaphors forms a mosaic picture of Israel's past, present and future. Melugin traces the metaphors' message throughout the entire book, not by flattening all subsequent metaphors to woodenly conform to those in Isaiah 1, but instead by exploring the evocative ways in which each articulates with those in Isaiah 1. The unifying mosaic of metaphors imaginatively evokes the judgment and restoration of Israel.

The troubling, extended metaphors in Ezekiel 16; 23 provide rich resources for literary study (similar studies also engage the feminine images in Jer 2—5 [see Weems]). J. Galambush examines the metaphorization in Ezekiel of cities as woman and wife, plumbing both its nature and function and bringing expertise from the fields of feminism and semiotics. To the study of the metaphor she adds a study of the depiction of the city of Jerusalem elsewhere in Ezekiel, noting that it too takes up images of female sexuality and defilement. Ultimately, Galambush concludes that the extended metaphors in Ezekiel 16; 23, together with the depiction of Jerusalem in feminine terms elsewhere in the book, builds a picture of city-as-woman so defiled and abominable that it can no longer serve as a viable image for the future restored city. Instead, the restored Jerusalem in Ezekiel 40—48 is depicted as an inviolable fortress.

Galambush explores the meaning of metaphor for its contribution to the essential meaning of the whole prophetic work. Other studies of metaphor ask not so much after the metaphor's contribution to the meaning of the whole book; rather, a metaphor within a specific passage is explored as to its rhetorical effect upon both ancient and modern audiences. Thus, F. van Dijk-Hemmes applies feminist insights and the study of pornography to the metaphor in Ezekiel 23, and C. Newsom explores the rhetorical effect of metaphor in Ezekiel's oracles against Tyre.

3. Theology, Canon and Scripture.

Literary approaches to the prophets work out of a commitment to the unified nature of the prophetic texts and attempt to hear them in their final form. The attention to the prophets' final form aligns literary approaches to the prophets quite naturally with questions of theology, canon and Scripture, each of which similarly turns to the final form of the text as the locus of inquiry.

3.1. Theological Readings. With the locus of study moved from the history behind the text to the text itself, it is inescapable that the major character within those texts—Yahweh, the God of Israel—becomes a central focus of study.

Certainly, any of the approaches discussed above can lead to questions of theology. Thus, the structure of the Twelve, plotted from sinfulness through judgment to restoration, evokes reflection upon the character of Yahweh, who is instrumental to the plot's progression. Tracing the structure of Jeremiah through the lens of the prophet's own life, which moves from despair to endurance, calls for reflection upon Yahweh. For instance, what is Yahweh's role in the midst of Jeremiah's complaints, and what does this role reveal about God? Or, as one considers the theme of righteousness as it develops in Isaiah, what does this theme reveal about Yahweh's priorities and purposes in salvation? The sometimes shocking metaphor of the city as a woman calls for deep (even troubling) reflection upon the God whose city Jerusalem is, and the indeterminacy of metaphor in Hosea speaks of God, but in ways that both conceal and reveal (Landy 2001). Whether the theological reading arises as a corollary to the data revealed through literary study or becomes the intentional purpose of a literary approach (so, e.g., House 2000), theological reflection is an expected outcome of literary approaches.

3.2. Canonical Readings. In 1979, B. S. Childs's Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture introduced a canon-oriented interpretive stance. This stance, in attending to the final or canonical form of the text, is also literary in its orientation. His work on Isaiah in that volume, given the preponderance of historical-critical inquiry at that time, especially reveals the newness of canon-oriented interpretation (see Canonical Criticism). Exploring the canonical setting of the three sections of Isaiah, Childs does not deny the value of historical-critical inquiry. However, he moves well beyond this by attention to the literary, canonical form of the text. He argues that so-called First, Second and Third Isaiah lose historical particularity once set into their canonical form. The canonical setting requires the sections to be heard in light of the whole, and, under the influence of Isaiah 40—66, the whole finds an eschatological meaning.

Many interpreters, working with the categories described above under "Literary Unity" and "Textual Poetics" may also work with a canonical orientation, and canonical orientations generally are attuned to literary categories within the text. More recently, Seitz, working with a canonical understanding of one Book of the Twelve, seeks to build a conceptual hermeneutic for canonical reading. He argues that such reading is not ahistorical but truly historical, as "final canonical form is also a piece of history, belonging to decisions made in the past about how an ancient prophetic witness is finally to be heard" (Seitz 2007, 233). His argument, aligning canonical reading with historical processes, is important because it addresses a disjunction. The disjunction arises through the different foci of historical criticism (diachronic) and literary approaches (synchronic), which too often pit one against the other as the appropriate method to engage the biblical text. Seitz's work attempts to incorporate both stances, acknowledging the interpretive value of each yet still holding the canon as the final locus of interpretation.

3.3. Scriptural Readings: Reception by a Hearing Community. Since this article began with a nod to the social power of the Bible through history, it seems appropriate to end the discussion in a similar place. Once the final literary form of the prophets is examined, it is not long before one asks how those writings are heard by communities ancient and modern. An exploration of a text's hearing communities may include investigation of how ancient audiences heard metaphors (e.g., the metaphorical presentation of Jerusalem as Yahweh's wife), or it may explore the reception of the Twelve by literati in postexilic Yehud (Ben Zvi).

But hearing the prophets as literature also involves present-day communities for whom the prophets are Scripture. Such hearing, working in the heritage of historical criticism and the critical engagement of literary approaches over thirty years, should not be naïve. Thus, Melugin's 1996 essay stands in an anthology of twelve essays that critically engage literary readings of Isaiah. Of those twelve essays, five explore the reception of the text, two of them from an explicitly scriptural perspective. That Melugin introduces the volume and is himself a prolific contributor to critical study of the prophets as literature suggests that his reflections on Isaiah as Scripture themselves have passed through a critical framework.

Melugin's article unfolds various figurative constructs in Isaiah that together form an allusive mosaic (see 2.3 above). He spends much of the article simply explaining the constructs and how they articulate one to the other. But his concluding paragraphs reveal his commitment to make his literary explanation subservient to the reading of the prophets as Scripture. He notes, "The most basic purposes for the use of Scripture in communities of faith, I believe, should be performative; the community's most sacred texts should be powerful agents for judgment and healing. Explanation should be supportive rather than primary" (Melugin, 302). His exploration of prophetic tropes reveals a "construction of a symbolic world in which a community may hear and respond to God" (Melugin, 303).

As Melugin draws to a conclusion, he recognizes that his own generation's application of literary approaches is indelibly marked by the concerns, scholarly locations and conventions of that generation. By that token, present-day literary reading of Isaiah as Scripture will likely differ from those of ancient Israel (and, indeed, every successive generation). But the commitment to reading the texts as Scripture engages one in a “centuries-old community which employs Isaiah (and other scriptures) to shape its experience of God as judge and savior” (Melugin, 303).

4. Future Directions.

Scholarly investigation of the prophets as literature, begun in the 1970s, has not yet run its course or ushered in a successor. As further study on literary approaches to the prophets proceeds, I suggest briefly three areas for further fruitful engagement.

First, Isaiah studies have garnered a lion's share of the attention of literary approaches, but as indicated in 1.1 above, none of the prophetic corpus remains unaddressed. Yet, there remains ample room to increase the literary study of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel and the Twelve. For instance, the search for coherence in Jeremiah studies can be described as being in “ferment” (see Kessler, ix), and much work is needed to bring scholarly consensus to such ferment. Another area for further work is Daniel. Although there are several commentaries that utilize literary insights, further work can address the possibility of engaging the highly dichotomized book as a unified literary work.

Second, critical engagement around key issues must continue. Basic questions such as the nature of intertextuality and how to determine its intentionality remain open for investigation. How does scholarship speak with certainty to whether intertextuality is merely in the eye of the reader, or, indeed, can scholarship do so at all? And, given attention to the receptor as a genuine location of meaning, are such questions the ones to be asked?

Another key issue that continues to face ongoing debate is the nature of the Book of the Twelve. Is it rightly read as an anthology, or as one book? If one book, do such readings apply literary methods too liberally, finding “coherence” in words or themes that are simply standard within the prophetic genre? That a consensus can be achieved is doubtful, but perhaps the ongoing debate will serve to sharpen each approach.

Third, Seitz's work (see 3.2 above) suggests a possibility of rapprochement between diachronic and synchronic studies. Conversation regarding the place of each in scholarly engagement will continue, with the hope that the insights of both can be critically integrated. Seitz's work moves in this direction, and there are hopeful signs elsewhere that the divide between the two schools can be bridged.

Such directions in scholarship are inevitable, given the current field. But it is also assured that the prophetic works—in their grand scope, in their literary expertise, in their emotive expanse—will simply continue to delight, engage and trouble readers. Good literature remains just that, and the prophets exemplify the genre.

LITURGY AND CULT

Investigation of the relationship between canonical prophets and the *worship practices of ancient Israel involves a variety of issues. One must first examine the cultic function of prophets within the wider context of the OT and the *ancient Near East. From this background, questions emerge regarding how canonical prophets addressed the cult and to what extent if any their contributions to worship have been preserved in the Prophetic Books. The writing prophets can easily be misunderstood as being antiritualistic, but consideration of their broader message indicates that they were deeply concerned that the cult function properly, and their *visions often portray a vibrant and promising future for *temple worship. The presence of liturgical elements within the prophets is difficult to validate; nevertheless, a number of passages likely preserve records of liturgical performance.

1. Definitions.

"Prophecy," properly speaking, is a divine message intuitively received by a human agent for transmission to a third party. The intuitive aspect of this definition is important to differentiate prophecy from forms of deductive *divination that were also related at times to worship and sacrifice, such as the use of Urim and Thummim or, common in Mesopotamia, extispicy. Deductive divination involved binary answers (yes or no) to consultations of the deity, but prophecy involved direct speech by the deity through the human agent. While a binary response to an inquiry may be indistinguishable from prophecy at the literary level (e.g., 2 Sam 5:23-24), generally the length of the message and the use of formal, prophetic speech introductions identifies a message as prophetic.

The “cult” is understood to be any setting of worship, whether an official institutional site, such as a royally sponsored temple (1 Kings 5:3; 12:28-31; Amos 7:13), a temporary altar or shrine (1 Sam 10:8; 1 Kings 3:2, 4; 18:30) or a private household (Judg 17:1-13). “Liturgy” pertains to words and actions performed by cultic officials or laity in the course of worship. While priests and prophets sometimes were listed as separate functionaries in the OT (Is 28:7; Jer 14:18; 18:18; Mic 3:11), the social identity of a prophetic intermediary could be priest, Levite or lay person, and any of these could function in relation to the cult in official or unofficial capacities (2 Chron 20:14; 1 Sam 1:1, 20 with 3:1, 20; 10:11; Jer 20:6; Ezek 1:3; Amos 7:14).

2. Prophecy and Cult in the Ancient Near East.

Most of what is known about prophecy in the ancient Near East stems from royal or temple records, whether administrative archives or monumental inscriptions. Because these texts were selected for preservation by institutional interest, they are by nature pro-temple and predominantly pro-royal. The sources portray a very active role of prophets in cultic affairs in Mesopotamia. There is also evidence of divine speech delivered in the royal cult of Egypt. Extrabiblical prophetic texts from Zakur in Syria as well as Deir ‘Allah and Amman in the Transjordan may be related to cultic activity. The following discussion is important to show that the phenomenon of cultic prophecy was deeply imbedded within the culture of the ancient Near East and resulted in written records. As such, it raises the expectation, a priori, that prophets engaged in service of the cult in Israel as well, and that their writings preserve liturgical elements.

2.1. Mesopotamia.

2.1.1. Mari and Eshnunna. Although prophecy existed in Mesopotamia prior to the Old Babylonian period, the archive of Zimri-Lim discovered at Mari preserves the most extensive collection of texts related to prophecy in the second millennium BC. Royal correspondence, recording the words of prophets, frequently refers to oracles originating in temple settings, and often these reports concern commands from a deity regarding cultic affairs (Huffman, 48-56). This comports with the command from the king, reported in one letter: “Write to me whatever oracle is delivered in the temple of God and which you hear” (ARM 26 196; Nissinen, Seow and Ritner, 27). An example of one such report states, “In the temple of Hišamitum, a prophet called Iši-aḫu arose and said” (ARM 26 195; Nissinen, Seow and Ritner, 26). Some of these divine messages offer instruction or mild rebuke to the king regarding his cultic duties (e.g., A. 1121 + A. 2731; ARM 26 194, 206, 215, 220, 221; see Nissinen, Seow and Ritner, 17-21, 24-25, 38-39, 49-50, 54-55, 55-56). A particularly informative document, the “Ritual of Ishtar,” describes a liturgy in which various participants, including musicians and prophets, are mentioned (A. 3165; A. 1249b + S. 142 75 + M. [unnumbered]; Nissinen, Seow and Ritner, 80-83). The musicians are directed to perform alternate tunes, depending on whether or not the prophet is “inspired” to speak at a fixed point in the liturgy.

Contemporary with the Mari sources are two prophetic texts from Eshnunna that likely derived from the temple archive, indicating the presence of cult prophets in that city (FLP 1674 and 2064; Nissinen, Seow and Ritner, 94-95). A later, Middle Assyrian text, which specifies food rations for prophets among the temple personnel, suggests that cult prophecy was not restricted to the Mari period of the second millennium (VAT 17999; Nissinen, Seow and Ritner, 185).

2.1.2. Nineveh and Babylon. Unlike the Mari archive, which reports prophetic speech and activity within administrative correspondence, texts from Assurbanipal’s library in Nineveh preserve direct scribal records of prophetic speech. Although prophets were active outside of temple contexts, the messages that were preserved originated largely from prophets and prophetesses closely associated with the cult of Ishtar, hailing from cities with major Ishtar temples (Nissinen 2000, 95-102). One of the prophecies itself contains a colophon identifying the prophetess as a temple votaress (SAA 9 1.7; Nissinen, Seow and Ritner, 108). The substance of these prophecies is chiefly *salvation oracles in response to inquiry and lament by the king or the king’s mother (Hilber 2005, 62-69). For example, in one oracle Ishtar responds to the king’s mother, “Since you implored me” (SAA 9 1.8; Nissinen, Seow and Ritner, 109). A unique text (SAA 3 13) closely related in substance to one prophetic oracle (SAA 9 9) is formulated as a lament-response dialogue in the temple between the god Nabu and the king Assurbanipal (Hilber 2005, 70-74). In a few places the deity demands increased cultic support from the king (SAA 9 2.3 ii 24-27; 3.5 iii 26-27; Nissinen, Seow and Ritner, 113-14, 122-24).

Other texts reinforce this portrait of cult prophecy. Prophets were active participants in the Akitu festival, the substitute king ritual, and the ritual of Ishtar and Dumuzi, all involving cultic activity (SAA 3 34, 35; SAA 10 352; SAA 13 37; K 2001; Nissinen, Seow and Ritner, 151-52, 164-68, 175-77). A priest's letter placing a cultic demand on the king cites a prophecy originating explicitly in the Assur temple (SAA 13 37; Nissinen, Seow and Ritner, 167-68); another letter from a temple official contains a report of prophetic rebuke to the king for a cultic misdeed (SAA 13 144; Nissinen, Seow and Ritner, 169). Not all prophetic address to the king concerning cultic affairs was admonitory. Assurbanipal claims to have received authorization for temple restoration from prophets (Assurbanipal Prism T ii 7-24; Nissinen, Seow and Ritner, 143-44). Finally, the mention of prophets among temple personnel in various lexical lists (SAA 12 69; MSL 12 4.212, 4.222, 6.2; Nissinen, Seow and Ritner, 166-67, 186-88) further supports the assertion that prophetesses and prophets were established servants in temple liturgy during Neo-Assyrian times.

Evidence of cult prophecy exists for the Neo-Babylonian and Late Babylonian periods as well. A temple offering list includes a prophet along with the high priest (OCuT 1 20-21; Nissinen, Seow and Ritner, 192-93), and prophetic speech comprised part of the liturgy for the Akitu festival (RAcc 129-146; Nissinen, Seow and Ritner, 195-96).

2.2. Egypt. A consensus prevails that prophecy did not exist in Egypt. The texts usually consulted, which contain foretelling and social admonition, are actually a form of wisdom literature not derived from divine messenger speech (e.g., Prophecies of Neferti). While the assessment of these texts is correct, a class of Egyptian texts has been overlooked in discussions on Egyptian prophecy (Hilber 2011). These royal inscriptions record first-person divine speech that is framed with introductory speech formulas and was delivered to the king in a cultic setting. Hatshepsut's and Horemheb's coronation rituals set the pattern for succeeding kings from the New Kingdom onwards. Both sources record divine speeches to the king, but Hatshepsut's inscription contains a particularly enlightening report of the proceedings: the ritual priests "proclaimed her royal names, for the god caused that it should be in their hearts to make her names according to the form with which he had made them before" (Breasted, §§229-30, 239). Even if fictive in the case of Hatshepsut's unorthodox ascension, this report probably corresponds with actual custom in order to portray a credible coronation. Horemheb's reliefs describe the god coming forth from the temple to meet him and declaring his divine sonship. Texts accompanying Tutankhamen's Opet festival set divine address to the king in the context of reliefs depicting ritual procession, presentation of offerings, dancing and records of human speeches and songs celebrating the event. Perhaps the best examples of royal cultic prophecy are in temple dedication inscriptions of Thutmose III and Amenophis III, featuring triumph hymns spoken by Amun to the king, some of which were preserved at the Station of the King in the temple where the king stood for cultic ritual. These texts were adapted for the next five hundred years in royal reliefs depicting sword conferral by the god to the king (Kitchen, §§28, 29, 64). Therefore, it seems likely that priests functioned prophetically in the royal cult of Egypt.

2.3. Levant. From Iron Age Levant a salvation oracle delivered in response to royal lament is preserved on a stela from Zakkur in Syria, and an announcement of victory has survived from the former capital of the Ammonite kingdom. Although a temple setting cannot be proven for these texts, it seems likely that cultic ritual was involved. Also from the Transjordan is the Balaam oracle found at Deir 'Allah, probably in what was a sanctuary (Nissinen, Seow and Ritner, 202-12).

3. Old Testament Cultic Prophecy.

3.1. Cult Prophetic Activity. Among the many scholars who advocated for extensive involvement by OT prophets in the cult, S. Mowinckel and A. Johnson stand out. Their primary evidence is as follows: (1) prophets were active at festivals and cultic sites (1 Sam 3:21; 10:5; 19:19-24; 1 Kings 18:16-39; 19:10; 2 Kings 2:3; 4:22-25, 38); (2) there was a close association between prophets and priests (Is 28:7; Jer 6:13; 8:10; 14:18; Lam 2:20; 4:13; Mic 3:11; Zech 7:3); (3) Jeremiah and Ezekiel are of priestly descent (Jer 1:1; Ezek 1:3); (4) the book of Jeremiah describes his ministry in the temple and relates his ministry to priests and other prophets who were there (Jer 23:11; 26:7; 27:16; 29:26; 35:4); (5) in addition to the prophetic ministry of the Levites (1 Chron 25:1), there is an extended description of the intercessory role of a Levite who prophesies in response to a royal lament (2 Chron 20:5, 14).

This proposal never attained full consensus, and prominent voices have expressed skepticism regarding the existence of cult prophets. H. Gunkel, for example, observed that the conjunction of prophets and priest was not cultic, since other texts of a similar nature include other functionaries as well who are not cultic figures (Jer 4:9; 8:1; 18:18; Mic 3:11). The presence of prophets at a cultic site does not establish their cultic duties. Rather, they may be present simply because of their desire, as pious individuals, to be present, or if they spoke prophetically, it was only because a cultic site would assure them of an audience, and the message need not be related to the cult. A text such as Jeremiah 29:26 merely suggests that priests were responsible to lock up antagonistic prophets such as Jeremiah. The priestly descent of Jeremiah is problematic (1 Kings 2:26-27 shows that his family was cut off from priestly duty), and Ezekiel's call came after exile from the temple.

Although many of the texts advanced in support of cult prophetism do not bear up under examination, several passages remain strong witnesses to this phenomenon. The Shunammite's desire to seek Elisha at a shrine on a day other than a feast day (2 Kings 4:23) suggests both that he resided there and was active on holy days. The fact that the prophets descending from the high place were still prophesying (1 Sam 10:5) indicates that they assumed this role in worship at the site. Most clear is the function of prophets alongside priests in the temple, since their "wickedness in the temple" is equated with their prophetic words (Jer 23:11, 14, 34-40). In this regard, Jeremiah 20:1-6 serves as a reminder that an overlap between priests and lay prophets is likely, but in either case, the prophetic voice was heard in the cult. The reference in Jeremiah 29:26 to sanctioning "every" maniac gives the impression that this occurrence was common. Indeed, the likelihood that some prophets lived in the temple, and therefore were part of the institutional staff, is not easy to disregard in the light of Jeremiah 35:4. At a minimum, Chronicles attests to cultic prophecy in the postexilic period, but also in the preexilic period, if the Chronicler's sources are historically credible.

The question of the nature of the cultic prophecy described in 1 Chronicles 25:1-3 remains. Were some Levitical singers recipients of oracles in the usual sense of prophecy, were they merely described as "prophesying" only by analogy to early traditions linking prophecy with music (e.g., 2 Kings 3:15), or does this text witness to a broader sense of "prophecy" that existed in both the preexilic and postexilic temples in which prophetic speech could take various forms? However one conceives of this phenomenon in 1 Chronicles 25, it does not preclude the ministry of prophets serving liturgically in the periods of the first and the second temples.

3.2. Psalms. One of the debates between Mowinckel and Gunkel regarding cult prophecy was whether or not actual prophetic speech is preserved in the book of Psalms. Mowinckel argued that certain psalms originated from cultic prophets, but Gunkel maintained that psalms appearing to contain prophetic speech are merely poetic imitation of prophetic style. Given the evidence just described, that prophets not only participated in worship but also were in some cases part of institutional temple staff, and that cult prophecy is deeply embedded in the culture of worship throughout the ancient Near East, it is most likely that some psalms preserve actual prophetic speech (Hilber 2005). Recent studies that attend to the rhetorical function of divine speech in the psalms might support Gunkel's contention that such speech is only a poetic device. However, examples of the process from oral prophecy to written liturgical text in both Mesopotamia and Egypt make the theory of cult prophecy more likely, since rhetorical function does not necessarily preclude prophetic origin. Thus, prophetic speech preserved in the psalms reinforces interpretations that some canonical prophetic texts preserve liturgical material.

4. Opposition to the Cult.

The capacity of prophets to critique cultic practice appears for the first time in the historical record with the oracle of the man of God against Jeroboam's illicit altar at Bethel (1 Kings 13:1-5). Following this, the prophet Ahijah directed an oracle against the house of Jeroboam, specifically because he sponsored idolatrous worship in conjunction with it (1 Kings 14:1-16). Numerous passages in the writing prophets criticize the cult in Israel and Judah, and debate has emerged over whether the prophets were opposed to the cult in principle or were only critical of cultic malpractice and disregard for ethical duty. Inseparably related to this question is the antagonism between prophet and priest characterized by some scholars as inherent in the relationship.

4.1. Anticultic or Reformist? Much of late nineteenth-century scholarship viewed preexilic prophets as ethical revolutionaries who opposed the ritualism of the cult and mocked its religious efficacy. Only in exile did the institution of the cult and priesthood gain a foothold in the prophetic tradition through the writing of Ezekiel. Opinion swung away from this consensus during the twentieth century toward a model in which prophets opposed only hypocritical ritual that disregarded ethical demands, and writing prophets came to be viewed more closely with the cult (Gordon, 9-12). Along with this paradigm change, the older position was criticized as the product of nineteenth-century liberal Protestantism, specifically the combination of enlightenment humanism and anti-Jewish (and anti-Catholic) sentiment (Zevit). Nevertheless, some recent contributors to the debate, working outside of nineteenth-century presuppositions, still advocate a polarization between prophet and cult.

Numerous texts in the writing prophets demean the value of ritual offerings (e.g., Is 1:10-17; Jer 6:20; 7:21-26; Hos 6:6; Amos 5:21-24; Mic 6:6-8) and even circumcision (Jer 4:4; 9:24-25). R. Hendel writes, "Although many scholars in recent years have attempted to read these passages as something other than rejection of ritual, . . . these scholarly attempts do not do justice to the texts" (Hendel, 190-91). Hendel draws upon the contributions of social theorists Max Weber and Mary Douglas, who suggest that there is a natural conflict in cultures between religious functionaries who claim legitimacy based upon their hereditary rights and tradition (priests) and those whose social authority stems from acceptance of their personal call as mediators of divine revelation (prophets). At the foundation of this conflict are differing cosmological understandings as to whether or not ritual is efficacious. Furthermore, Hendel argues that the prophet binds together history and ethics (e.g., Mic 6), whereas the priest links them together with ritual (Lev 19). So in priestly theology, ritual is inextricably connected to the ethical, with sacrificial procedures purifying human pollution from the sanctuary. Prophets deny this efficacy.

Advocating a similar position, J. Barton uses Douglas's theory to counter the claim that prophets would have to step outside their culture altogether in order to maintain such a thoroughly antiritualistic stance. He grants that some prophets may have thought only festive indulgence or hypocritical worship to be unfitting, but since several texts (e.g., Jer 7:22; Amos 5:25) appear strictly antiritualistic, nineteenth-century scholars who polarized prophet and cult were essentially right, in spite of their unjustified presuppositions.

In general response to these arguments, evidence suggests that preexilic, classical prophets held a positive view of the cult when it functioned in its prescribed manner. The report of Isaiah's call (Is 6), whether an experience while in the temple complex or only a vision with temple imagery, would be incongruent for a prophet whose position was uncompromisingly anticultic. His encouragement to Hezekiah in the face of Sennacherib's invasion was a positive response to the king's temple lament (Is 37). Z. Zevit observes that both Isaiah (Is 2:2-3) and Micah (Mic 4:1-2) envisioned the cult as a magnet to attract the nations, and Jeremiah spoke encouraging words in the temple: "Make good your ways and your deeds, and I will cause you to dwell in this place" (Jer 7:3 [although, in light of Jer 7:7, it must be admitted that "this place" may not refer specifically to the temple]) (Zevit, 208). More pertinent is Jeremiah's promise that Sabbath obedience would result in an abundance of temple offerings (Jer 17:24-26; 33:10-11, 18). Even if, as some commentators maintain, these are not words from the prophet Jeremiah, the author saw no incongruence between Jeremiah's *covenantal theology and procultic sentiments. Isaiah's future vision also depicts outcasts and Gentile nations gathering to the sanctuary with lavish *sacrifices (Is 56:4-7; 57:13; 60:7, 13; cf. Zephaniah [see 4.2.6 below]). These are hardly appropriate visions if prophets were in principle opposed to ritual.

Furthermore, several psalms contain rhetoric that elevates a right attitude and ethical life over ritual (Ps 40:6; 50:8-15; 51:16-17; 69:30-31). Although this rhetoric is not antagonistic, as in the case of the prophets, it demonstrates a similar hierarchy of values commonly used to mitigate the anticultic rhetoric of the prophets. In addition to these psalms, M. Weinfeld points to wisdom texts, both Israelite (Prov 15:8; 21:3, 27; 28:9) and Egyptian (Weinfeld, 190-93). For example, the Instruction of Merikare exhorts, "More acceptable is a loaf [offering] of the upright than the ox of the wrongdoer" (Weinfeld, 190). Thus, the common interpretation that prophets opposed only unorthodox or hypocritical cultic activity is intrinsically reasonable when viewed in the broader cultural context.

Social theory illustrating that religious functionaries polarize over ritual only suggests that such is possible, but nothing in the OT necessitates conflicting theologies between prophets and priests. L.-S. Tiemeyer provides a valuable treatise on the relationship between prophets and priests, demonstrating that prophets opposed only priestly malpractice. In fact, within highly ritualistic cultures, "prophetic" and "priestly" functions can cohere in the same individual (e.g., shamans). There is evidence of "professional competition" for prestige between prophetic and priestly functionaries in Mesopotamia, but their activities were not viewed as intrinsically antithetical.

J. Jeremias carefully nuances the supposed dichotomy between "anticult" writing prophets and "peace prophets" of the cult. He argues that all prophets potentially participated in the cult, challenging the people to orthodox worship and ethical practice but also interceding for the welfare of the people. Some misused the latter role and were called to account (cf. Jeremiah [see 4.2.2 below]), and their liability for failure to announce judgment implies that it was their responsibility to do so (Jeremias, 6-9). Those prophets who announced a message of national doom found themselves isolated from the institutional cult. The preservation of this message in the writing prophets was due to the national relevance and historical vindication of their burden (Jeremias, 195-99).

4.2. Unorthodox Cultic Practices. The propensity of Israelites throughout their history and from all strata of society to engage in unorthodox forms of worship is well attested in the biblical record. For this reason more than any other, Yahweh sent the prophets (2 Kings 17:13). Section 2 above summarizes the role of Mesopotamian prophets in advocating for cultic reform, specifically when the king was neglectful of his duties in this regard. However, nothing in the broader ancient Near East resembles the exclusive devotion of OT prophets to one God and his cult (see Gordon, 86). Indeed, the same Mesopotamian prophet could speak in the name of several deities (e.g., SAA 9 1.4), a phenomenon in stark contrast to the preaching of biblical prophets.

4.2.1. Isaiah. The criticism of cultic unorthodoxy in Isaiah 56—66 (Is 57:1-10; 65:1-12; 66:1-6, 17) is complicated in the scholarly literature by a debate concerning the social setting and identity of the prophet's opponents. One common proposal (e.g., Hanson) suggests that during the exile and the early postexilic period conflict arose in the Judean community regarding the manner by which Yahweh would restore his people. On one side, "realistic" theorists contended for a political solution through a Persian-sponsored temple community led by Zadokite priests. However, a movement of "visionaries" opposed this hierarchy. This anti-theocratic group drew upon earlier prophetic ideals and argued that the prophetic function of Yahweh's servant had been subsumed collectively in the entire community. Representing this latter position, Isaiah 56—66 stands in direct opposition to the Zadokites and pro-temple theology as advocated in Ezekiel 40—48, Haggai and Zechariah.

This hypothesis has been questioned from several angles (for a summary, see Tiemeyer, 10-13), but the most relevant consideration for this essay concerns the proposed polarization between Isaiah 56—66 and temple theocracy (e.g., Ezra, Haggai, Zechariah). Tiemeyer argues that Zechariah (Zech 3:1-10; 6:9-15) and Haggai (Hag 2:10-14) also criticize the priesthood (cf. Mal 1:6—3:5). The difference is that Isaiah 56—66 calls not just for radical cleansing, but for the destruction of corrupt priests. Thus, all prophets speak with the same voice, condemning a corrupt priesthood. The theology that God's presence transcends earthly habitation (Is 66:1-6) does not deny the validity of the cult either (Ezek 40–48; Haggai; cf. 1 Kings 8:27); rather, it subordinates cultic ritual (Is 66:3) to right attitude and obedient behavior (Is 66:2b) that is free from syncretism (Is 66:17) (Schramm, 162–68).

One may question whether Isaiah 56–66 originated in a postexilic context or instead comprises oracles of Isaiah of Jerusalem. The latter option avoids the doubtful proposal of rank *idolatry in the postexilic Jerusalem temple, which draws no fire from any postexilic prophet. Whatever one's view of the compositional history of the book of Isaiah, disparaging comments and condemnation about cultic practice are best understood in a manner consistent with the positive visions for the cult elsewhere in Isaiah.

4.2.2. Jeremiah. Jeremiah announced that the cult of his day had become so corrupted by syncretism and worship of other gods that offerings were unacceptable and destruction of the temple was imminent (Jer 2:8–13; 6:19–20; 7:9, 16–34; 11:15; 14:10–12; 18:15; 23:10–14, 39). However, he faced strong opposition from cult prophets who proclaimed the inviolability of the temple (Jer 4:10; 6:14; 7:4; 8:11; 14:13; 18:18; 23:16–22; cf. Ezek 13:10, 16), in part through their hermeneutical misuse of earlier tradition (Jer 23:30 [?]; 28:1–11).

Jeremiah 7:22 is particularly difficult because it appears to draw on a tradition that denied any sacrificial cult in early Yahwism (cf. Amos 5:25). Whether such a tradition ever existed is doubtful, and alternative explanations are numerous (see Lundbom, 481–89). Probably, Jeremiah employs an “idiom of exaggerated contrast” whereby “the first of two statements is negated only for the purpose of setting off the second” (Lundbom, 488). In similar fashion, Amos builds on the implied negation in Amos 5:25 to underscore Amos 5:26–27: Israel's cult will accompany them into exile. The illocutionary force of these statements is not about cultic history or sacrifice per se but rather the relative subordination of cultic duty to covenant obedience (cf. Jer 6:19–20; 7:5–7; 9:23–26).

4.2.3. Ezekiel. Addressing Israel in exile (Ezek 3:4–11), Ezekiel undermined the same false notions of temple inviolability attacked by his contemporary Jeremiah in Jerusalem. The vision of Yahweh's glory departing the temple (Ezek 9–11) incorporates a common ancient Near Eastern motif of divine abandonment of a sanctuary immediately before its destruction, in this case prompted by various manifestations of idolatry and uncleanness that defiled God's holiness in the temple (Ezek 5:11; 8:6; for the cause of social violence as well, see Ezek 22–23; 36:18). As with other prophets, this anti-temple message must be balanced with Ezekiel's vision for the sanctuary offerings in the future restoration (Ezek 20:40–41) (see 5.1 below).

4.2.4. Hosea. Hosea derides Israel for manifold covenant violations (Hos 4:1–2), yet his assault on the cult is framed primarily by his abhorrence of Israel's idolatry and their sacrifice at illicit worship sites (Hos 4:11–14; 13:1–4; for announcements against Judah, see Hos 4:15; 5:5, 13; 6:4; 12:2). Cultic officials, both priest and prophet, are culpable (Hos 4:4–6, 9; 5:1; 9:7–8; 10:5), with final rejection evident in exile (Hos 8:11–13; 9:1–6, 15–17), a fate awaiting Jeroboam's calf cult as well (Hos 8:5–6; 10:5–6). Consequently, Israel's cult is a vacuous attempt to meet Yahweh (Hos 5:6), who delights in loyalty more than sacrifice (Hos 6:6). His rebuke is not a condemnation of the institution of the cult or ritual but rather is an exhortation to orthodoxy and orthopraxis.

4.2.5. Amos. Amos's criticism of the cult is primarily directed against worship corrupted by social injustices (see 4.3.3 below). However, one text, Amos 8:14, alludes directly to the defection from covenant stipulations set in motion by Jeroboam, a prime target in the books of Kings (1 Kings 12:28–32; 16:26; 2 Kings 10:29; 17:16; 23:15). The reference to idolatry in Amos 5:25–26 also implies that Amos viewed worship by some of his contemporaries to be idolatrous (see 4.2.2 below).

4.2.6. Zephaniah. Zephaniah attacks Judah's priests and worshipers who have turned to other gods (Zeph 1:4–6). If the phrase bēt 'ādōnêhem (“house of their Lord”) in Zephaniah 1:9 refers to Yahweh's temple rather than an aristocrat's estate (“house of their lord”), then priestly violence and pagan ritual are linked directly with the temple. Priestly defilement is clear in Zephaniah 3:4. The unusually frequent use of the “gathering” motif for both judgment and worship (Zeph 1:2; 2:1; 3:8, 18, 20) hints at a possible setting for Zephaniah's speeches as the Feast of Ingathering. While the “gathering” of some on the Day of Yahweh will be for judgment (i.e., they will be the sacrificial victims [Zeph 1:7; 2:1]), a remnant will be gathered for restoration in the prophet's "pro-cult" portrait of universal worship by all nations (Zeph 3:9-10, 18-20).

4.2.7. Malachi. Restoration of worship after the exile did not end the need for reform. Although Malachi does not voice the same accusations against idolatry that pervade the preexilic prophets, flirtation with foreign gods surfaces indirectly in his remarks about intermarriage and profanation of the sanctuary (Mal 2:11), a defilement inseparably related to social injustice toward Israelite wives (Mal 2:12-13). The prophet also condemns defilement from inappropriate offerings (Mal 1:6-14) and the withholding of tithes (Mal 3:7-10). Malachi warns that failure to reform will lead to purification of the temple and community by Yahweh's messenger, who will eradicate both cultic corruption and social injustice (Mal 3:1-5).

4.3. Ethics and Cult. M. Nissinen has observed that looking out for the poor and needy was an expected social function of temples in the ancient Near East (Nissinen 2003) (see Wealth and Poverty). Therefore, it is not surprising to find the potential among ancient Near Eastern prophets to admonish the king regarding social themes, although this is a minor emphasis in the extant texts. The Israelite cult also provided for the poor (Lev 7:11-21; Ps 22:25-26), adding irony to the need for biblical prophets to implicate the Israelite cult in their criticism of social injustice and ethical failure (see Social Justice).

4.3.1. Isaiah. Isaiah lists social injustice as a disqualification for acceptable worship (Is 1:10-17). The fact that Isaiah mentions prayer among the rejected practices (Is 1:15) strongly supports the view that it was not ritual or the cult to which he objected but rather cultic practice without an appropriate attitude and ethical commitment. This interpretation is reinforced in Isaiah 58:1-14 (cf. Is 56:1), where the prophet condemns days of fasting because proper ethical behavior does not match the humility avowed by the fast.

4.3.2. Micah. According to Micah 1:13; 2:1-2; 6:9-12, social elites in Judah had adopted oppressive economic policies similar to those practiced in Israel and spoken against by Amos (Amos 5:11; 6:4; 8:4-6). In this context, Micah 6:6-8 is not an anticultic proclamation but rather an exhortation to the higher calling of justice (cf. Mic 6:9-12).

4.3.3. Amos and Hosea. Amos's polemic against the cultic institutions of the northern kingdom alludes to unorthodox syncretism (Amos 8:14), but his primary accusation implicates cultic centers with the social injustices of Israel's elite. So the end of luxurious homes accompanies cutting off the horns of the altar at Bethel (Amos 3:14-15), symbolizing impotency of sacrifice under such social conditions. Similarly, Yahweh rejects festivals and offerings because of the injustice and hypocrisy associated with them (Amos 5:21-24; 8:4-6). In his satirical invitation to worship at Bethel (Amos 4:1, 4-5 with Amos 5:4-7), the central symbol of Jeroboam's kingdom (Amos 7:9, 13), Amos indicts the whole nation for seeking injustice rather than Yahweh. An accusation against social violence also contributes to demeaning the cult by Amos's contemporary Hosea (Hos 6:6, 9).

4.3.4. Zechariah. Zechariah's interests extend beyond completion of the temple to spiritual restoration of the people (see 5.2 and 6.6 below). The question posed by the delegation from Bethel regarding fasting (Zech 7:3) offered Zechariah an opportunity to instruct the broader community on a ritual matter. Fasting must flow from true repentance and a life of covenant fidelity evidenced by social justice (Zech 7:9-10; 8:16-17) (see Boda 2003a, 399, 405). In this, Zechariah affirms continuity with the cultic theology of earlier prophetic tradition (Zech 7:12), envisioning as well the attraction of Jewish feasts for gathering the nations to Yahweh (Zech 8:18-23; 14:16-21).

5. Support of the Cult.

The prophets always attempted to move the cult toward its ideal function. In this sense, even criticism constitutes cultic support. But continuing the procultic visions of preexilic prophets (see 4.1 above), Ezekiel and postexilic prophets in particular endeavored to restore worship through visions of a new temple community.

5.1. Ezekiel. Regardless of one's view of its compositional history, the book of Ezekiel as a whole, including Ezekiel 40—48, was transmitted by the ancient community as a prophetic contribution relevant to temple cult. Ezekiel addresses the important question of the place of the temple after the exile. No longer would Yahweh be a "sanctuary" in a diminished way as during the exile (Ezek 11:16). Concomitant with Israel's spiritual revival, Yahweh would restore his holy presence in the midst of his people for all time (Ezek 37:27-28; 39:29). Expanding this theology, Ezekiel appends his vision for the temple (Ezek 40—48), closing the book with a re-naming of Jerusalem, “Yahweh is there.”

Ezekiel’s vision complements the balance evident in the rest of the prophetic tradition, both “visionary” and “priestly,” “dream” and “reality” (contra Hanson; see Joyce, 147-48). In the new temple, the glory’s departure is reversed (Ezek 43:4). The temple once again becomes the cosmic center of creation, from which emanates a river, giving life to the most desolate places (Ezek 40:2; 47:8-9). Nations are welcome to reside with Israel within the temple’s sanctified hinterlands (Ezek 45:3; 47:21-23; 48:12), yet maintaining graded holiness (Ezek 24:20). Although the sacrificial system is lavish and efficacious (Ezek 43:27), Ezekiel’s description leaves the temple “empty” of furnishings, perhaps to focus on a strikingly anthropomorphic divine presence, which replaces the ark (Ezek 43:7; cf. Jer 3:16-17) (Joyce, 150-53). Not only would Ezekiel’s vision have offered theological support to postexilic cultic initiatives, but also it had practical application for Ezekiel’s contemporaries to move them to repentance from their idolatrous ways (Ezek 43:10-12).

5.2. Haggai and Zechariah. Political and socioeconomic difficulties hindered the postexilic community from following through on temple construction, so Haggai and Zechariah lent their prophetic voices to move the community forward (Ezra 4:24—5:2; 6:14; similarly, this entire narrative of the return and rebuilding of the temple commences by reference to the prophecy of Jeremiah in Ezra 1:1). Haggai urged that the solution to economic fruitlessness was responsible action (Hag 1:2-11; 2:18-19), promising a day when their warrior God (Hag 2:6) would bring the wealth of nations to their humble temple (Hag 2:7-9) (see Warfare and Divine Warfare). Zechariah, on his part, echoed the political sentiments of Haggai (Hag 2:21-23), advancing Zerubbabel for his support of the temple (Zech 4:6-10) and endorsing Joshua as high priest (Zech 3:1-10; 6:9-15). Zechariah’s oracles (and perhaps visions) are closely related to temple construction (Zech 1:16; 2:10-13; 4:9; 6:14-15) (see 6.6 below).

6. Contribution to Liturgy.

If one accepts that OT prophets in both the pre-exilic and postexilic periods promoted ethical piety and orthodox practices in worship, then it is natural to expect that they not only spoke critically when necessary for cultic reform but also contributed in a constructive manner toward its liturgy. As noted above, ancient Near Eastern prophets contributed in various ways to the liturgy of their respective cults. The presence of prophetic speech in Psalms 12; 60 (cf. Pss 75; 82; 85) also suggests a role for prophets in liturgical intercession. Even Gunkel admitted that many features of psalms were influenced by patterns of prophetic speech (Gunkel, 286-87). When the issue is examined from the side of the Prophetic Books, the difficulty is determining what texts might preserve liturgy. Did a prophet merely utilize a speech form similar to what one might find in the cult, or was the performance setting for a particular prophetic discourse actually cultic? The following discussion focuses on texts for which there is evidence of liturgical performance in the prophet’s speech.

6.1. Isaiah. Isaiah is replete with oracles that conform to hymnic patterns (e.g., Is 12:1-6; 25:1-5; 26:1-6; 42:10-13; 49:13; 54:1-3). Salvation oracles in Isaiah 40—48, with their “fear not” formula, self-identification of the Deity (“I am Yahweh”) and recollection of previous prophecy, find some of their closest correspondence, form-critically, to cultic prophecy from Assyria (e.g., SAA 9 1.1; 1.4; 1.6; 2.5; Nissinen, Seow and Ritner, 102-16; Weippert). Yet there is no certainty that these Isaianic oracles functioned liturgically.

Two passages containing penitential lament (Is 59:1-21; 63:7—64:12) are frequently proposed as liturgies, stemming from observations that hold true regardless of one’s dating of the texts. Isaiah 59:1-20 exhibits a prophetic accusation (Is 59:1-8), with corporate lament and confession (Is 59:9-15a) followed by divine response (Is 59:15b-20) (Werline, 36-41). Most commentators separate Isaiah 59:21 from Isaiah 59:15b-20, but this detracts from the liturgical pattern. The first-person divine speech in Isaiah 59:21 caps the third-person report of Yahweh’s intent to intervene, which strengthens the function of Isaiah 59:15b-20 as divine response in a liturgical dialogue (cf. the change to first person in Ps 12:5; 60:6-8; Joel 2:18-20). Commentators note that the abrupt shift to the theme of covenant and the mission of the servant (singular “you”) recalls Isaiah 42:6; 49:8; 54:10; 55:3.

Closer to the pattern of communal psalms is Isaiah 63:7–64:12 (cf. Pss 44; 78; 106). These texts incorporate lament with a rehearsal of national salvation history and in some cases highlight the failure of the people as the cause for their lamentable situation. Like Isaiah 59:1–20, Isaiah 63:7–64:12 features confession (Is 64:4–7) and petition for Yahweh's intervention as a warrior (Is 64:1–3; cf. Is 63:1–6), but the element of petition is more explicit (Is 63:15–64:5, 8–10 [see Werline, 41–44]). Conspicuously absent from Isaiah 63:7–64:12, but present in Isaiah 59:1–21 and other communal laments, is an oracle of assurance (Bautch, 40).

6.2. Jeremiah. The fact that Yahweh forbids Jeremiah to intercede for the people (Jer 7:16; 11:11 with 14) implies that he would customarily do so (cf. the communal “we” in Jer 3:22–25). Jeremiah's “confessions” with divine response offer evidence of prophetic liturgy (Jer 10–20 [divine dialogue]). Other instances in Jeremiah describe his involvement as a mediator with divine response to inquiry from the community, but not intercessory lament (Jer 21:2; 37:3; 42:2; cf. Jer 26:1–8, where the prophet's words on a fast day call the people to repentance, but they do not constitute intercession). M. Boda argues that the occurrence of this theme in Jeremiah 14:1–15:4 suggests a communal ceremony in which the prophet responds to a lament offered by a representative of the people (Boda 2001). While R. Werline stresses Jeremiah 29:10–14 as showing a shift toward penitential prayer drawing on Deuteronomy 4:25; 30:1–4 (Werline 29–30), Boda notes similarities between Jeremiah 14:1–15:4 and Leviticus 26 to demonstrate how Jeremiah infused priestly theology into the prayer tradition of the people. So one sees in Jeremiah a prophetically authorized transition in emphasis toward national penitential prayer over the classical pattern of complaint, an emphasis represented in exilic and postexilic prayers such as Psalm 106; Ezra 9; Nehemiah 1; 9; Daniel 9.

6.3. Daniel. The emphasis on penitential themes described in the preceding section is clearly evident in the prayer of Daniel 9. The prayer follows no thorough outline, although the general thrust moves from opening praise (Dan 9:4) through confession and acknowledgment of God's just judgment (Dan 9:5–14) to petition for forgiveness (Dan 9:15–19). It displays all the themes that have been associated with penitential form (Boda 2006a): the central attribute is repentance, drawing on both Deuteronomistic (Dan 9:13; cf. Deut 30:1–2 [šûb]) and Priestly (Dan 9:4, 7, 20; cf. Lev 26:39–40 [hitwaddâ, mā'al]) terminology for confessing guilt associated with exile. Failure to heed the prophet's warnings (Dan 9:6, 10) also rings a Deuteronomistic note (cf. 2 Kings 17:13). The concern for guilt is coupled with Jeremiah's seventy weeks (Dan 9:2), which Daniel's *angelic interpreter takes up in response to the prayer as he relates the solution to exile with Levitical remedies for sin (Dan 9:24; cf. Lev 16:21; 26:18, 21, 24, 28). Intergenerational sin links the continuous failure of Israel with the consequence of exile (Dan 9:5–6, 8; cf. Lev 26:39). Conversely, complaint in these prayers is replaced with creedal confession of God's great attributes and acknowledgment of his righteous judgment (Dan 9:4, 7). The people are characterized as a remnant whose *exile by the nations cuts them off from their identity with the land (Dan 9:7, 16–17). Yet they are rooted in the traditions of the *law and *covenant (Dan 9:4–5, 11–13, 15, 19). Though not necessarily related to a cultic setting, Daniel's prayer is intimately concerned with a crisis in the cult.

6.4. Joel. The book of Joel bears marks of a liturgical origin. In the face of national calamity, Joel summons the people to gather for lament and fasting at the temple (Joel 1:13–14; 2:15–17a), calling for repentance, concomitant to sincere shows of lament (Joel 2:12–13a). After the summons, Joel presents a liturgical sample of the lament (Joel 1:15–20). An oracle of salvation follows (Joel 2:19b–27), recording the divine response. The oracle is reported with narrative introduction (Joel 2:18–19a [cf. ESV; NET; NRSV; NIV]), taking a viewpoint after all these events had run their course (preferable to the future-tense translations of the NASB, which disregards the normal past-time function of the preterite verbs). It is possible that Joel only adopts liturgical forms and so does not reflect actual events (Ogden, 97). But even if this were the case, the book preserves the type of contribution that might be expected from prophets serving in the cult: a liturgical pattern of summons, lament and prophetic response. G. Ogden suggests that Joel 2:28–3:21 records further divine response to the *prayers of the prophet, reflecting motifs common to many psalms of communal lament.

6.5. Habakkuk. There is nothing to adjudicate whether or not the prayers and oracles in Habakkuk 1—2 were performed in a cultic setting. The prayers are complaint in form, but they could be either communal (with representative “I”) or purely individual. Habakkuk 3, on the other hand, bears a superscription (authorship with musical notation) and postscript (designation with further musical notation) indicating its cultic function. All four elements appear together in the superscription of Psalm 6:1, and three appear in other psalms (e.g., Ps 8:1; 12:1; 22:1; 53:1; 61:1; 62:1). Psalm 102 bears the same classification, “prayer.”

Of further interest regarding the liturgical use of Habakkuk 3 are David’s song (2 Sam 22:1-51) and Hezekiah’s poem (Is 38:9-20). The former song functions to commemorate David’s experience of Yahweh’s deliverance over a critical period of life (2 Sam 22:1). Hezekiah’s poetic memoir (Is 38:9) captures his reflections on Yahweh’s deliverance for future temple music (Is 38:20). In a similar manner, Habakkuk 3 offers a theological reflection of the prophet’s dialogue with Yahweh in the first two chapters: Habakkuk rests in the terrifying, sovereign power of the Divine Warrior to judge the wicked and vindicate the righteous.

6.6. Haggai and Zechariah. Boda argues that temple reconstruction rituals from the ancient Near East influenced the structure of Haggai as a book (decision [Hag 1], preparation [Hag 2:1-9], foundation laying [Hag 2:10-23]) (Boda 2006b). Although this order would reflect the natural course of events for any such project, Haggai could preserve words used in the actual rituals. Zechariah’s visions in Zechariah 1:7—6:15 are also possibly united around the theme of temple foundation (Zech 1:16; 2:10-11; 4:9; 6:15) in a way that reflects ancient Mesopotamian rituals for temple restoration, suggesting a liturgical background for Zechariah 1—6 (Halpern). However, some of these parallels are speculative, and parts of the visions could simply be alluding to temple foundation imagery without constituting a liturgy as a whole. Other concerns are also evident in the text, such as the theme of *repentance in the narrative frames of Zechariah 1:1-6; 7:1—8:23, which leads Boda to propose a setting in postexilic penitential rituals (Boda 2003b). But even this theme is subordinate to Zechariah’s support for temple restoration (Zech 8:9, 18-23). So although Zechariah probably ministered in liturgical settings, direct associations between these cultic messages and passages from the book of Zechariah are difficult to establish.

7. Conclusion.

Throughout the ancient Near East, prophets were concerned with the cult, often contributing to temple service. In the OT, the most conspicuous role was criticism, reflecting the prophetic passion to reform the worship of ancient Israel. This concern reverberates throughout preexilic and postexilic prophetic writings. The only discernible change is not in the prophetic phenomena, but rather in a theological shift in response to different religious challenges. Pre-exilic prophets called for reform but in the end announced complete destruction of the cult as the only solution toward a future glorious restoration. But the messages of exilic and postexilic prophets concerned the restoration of proper temple worship. In both periods there is evidence that prophets actively contributed to the liturgy, interceding on behalf of the people with lament, penitence and divine response.

MALACHI, BOOK OF

The book of Malachi is the last of the twelve Minor Prophets and is the final book of the OT in most English versions of the Bible. The prophet Malachi preached to a diverse audience. His sermons were directed to the disillusioned, the cynical, the callous, the dishonest, the apathetic, the doubting, the skeptical and the outright wicked in postexilic Judah. Yet, as a sensitive pastor, Malachi offered the “valentine” of God’s love to a disheartened people. As a lofty theologian, he instructed the people in a basic doctrinal catechism, highlighting the nature of God as universal king, faithful suzerain and righteous judge. As Yahweh’s stern prophet, Malachi rebuked corrupt priests and warned of the coming day of God’s judgment. As spiritual guide, he exhorted his audience to a more sincere life of *worship and challenged the people to live out the ethical standards of the Mosaic *covenant. Most important, Malachi was Yahweh’s messenger and his essential message to Israel was profoundly simple: “I have always loved you,” said the LORD” (Mal 1:2).

The prophet’s references to the messenger who prepares the *Day of the Lord, along with the Lord’s sudden appearance in his *temple (Mal 3:1) and the coming of the prophet Elijah, build a natural bridge to the NT (Mal 4:5; cf. Mt 11:10, 14; 17:10-12; Mk 1:2; 9:11-13; Lk 7:27). The message of Malachi is always relevant to the life of the church, with its emphasis on proper worship, priestly (i.e., pastoral) *leadership, *marriage and divorce, and matters of *social justice.

1. Author.

The book is silent on the issue of authorship, although it is assumed that the prophetic-word formula (“The word of the LORD to Israel through Malachi” [Mal 1:1]) signifies that Malachi penned his own oracles. Based on the translation of Malachi 1:1 in the LXX (“by the hand of his messenger”), some scholars have taken “Malachi” to be a title for an anonymous prophet, perhaps a play on words with Malachi 3:1, “my messenger” (Heb mal’ākī). The fact that “Malachi” stands as a unique proper noun in the OT should not disqualify its use as a personal name, since both Habakkuk and Jonah are also exceptional among the names of the Hebrew prophets. The name “Malachi” may be translated “my messenger” or “my angel,” and it serves as a fitting name for a prophet of God. The name “Malachi” also fits a pattern of other Hebrew names ending in i, such as “Beeri” (Hos 1:1) and “Zichri” (Ex 6:21).

The Bible records no biographical information for Malachi. His inclusion among the OT prophets both identifies Malachi as spokesperson for God and verifies his commission as a divine messenger. Malachi’s sermons display a strong interest in the temple, priesthood and *sacrificial system of worship. Although he may have been a priest, he seems to speak as an outside observer of that system. Later Jewish tradition includes Malachi, along with Haggai and Zechariah, as members of the Great Synagogue

(b. B. Bat. 15a). According to this tradition, this assembly of Jewish prophets, elders and teachers was instrumental in the collection, preservation and transmission of the Hebrew Scriptures and Jewish religious traditions during the time of transition between the end of the biblical era and the beginning of the rabbinic period of Jewish history.

2. Date and Occasion of Writing.

Typically, the book of Malachi is dated around 450 to 430 BC. It often is assumed that Malachi was a contemporary of Ezra and Nehemiah because the prophet addresses the same religious concerns and social ills confronted by these two postexilic reformers. For example, Malachi denounces a lax and corrupt priesthood (Mal 1:6–2:9), mixed marriages and divorce (Mal 2:10–16), liturgical decay, including neglect of the tithe (Mal 3:8–12), and social injustice (Mal 3:5)—the same abuses corrected during the ministries of Ezra and Nehemiah (cf. Ezra 9:1–15; Neh 5:1–13; 12:30, 44–47; Neh 13:4–31).

A careful study of the language of Malachi's oracles, however, reveals that the Hebrew text of the book has great affinity to the books of Haggai and Zechariah (see Hill, 395–400). Socioeconomic and political analysis of Persian-period Judah also suggest chronological ties between the three postexilic prophets (see Israelite History). For example, the Haggai-Zechariah-Malachi corpus acknowledges the leadership of a (presumably Persian appointed) "governor" (Hag 1:1; Mal 1:8; cf. Zech 4), a functioning second temple in Jerusalem (Hag 1:14; Zech 7:1–3; Mal 1:10–14), and generally an era of economic decline and spiritual malaise (Hag 1:5–6; Zech 8:12–13; Mal 3:8–12, 14–15). In fact, E. Meyers and C. Meyers note that the social setting for the language of power, the lack of reference to any royal social context (in Zech 9–14 and Malachi), and the Persian activities in response to the problems with Greece and Egypt that reduced the potential for provincial autonomy in Judah make the most sense against the backdrop of the early fifth century BC (Meyers and Meyers, 16–32). On the basis of this evidence, it seems more likely that Malachi was a slightly later contemporary of these two postexilic prophets of the second temple. He probably was preaching in Jerusalem sometime between 500 and 475 BC. It is even possible that the battle between the Persians and Greeks at Marathon (c. 490 BC) was the occasion that prompted Malachi's message. Given Malachi's report of the destruction of Edom (Mal 1:3–5) and his references to the "nations" (Mal 1:11, 14), the prophet may have interpreted that titanic struggle between east and west as at least a partial fulfillment of Haggai's prediction that God was about "to shake the heavens and earth" and "overthrow royal thrones" (Hag 2:21–22).

Malachi addressed Jews in the recently formed province of Judah (formally Yehud) in the Persian satrapy of Eber-Nahara during the reign of King Darius I (522–486 BC). His audience included expatriates resettled in Judah and the descendants of those Hebrews who survived the Babylonian sack of Jerusalem but were not deported to Mesopotamia.

The edict of Cyrus the Great issued in 538 BC serves as the historical background for the ministries of the postexilic prophets Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi. The decree permitted conquered people groups who had been deported to Mesopotamia by the Babylonians to return to their native lands. The royal edict is associated by some scholars with the clay barrel known as the Cyrus Cylinder, discovered in the late nineteenth century. In it Cyrus also issued decrees permitting other captive people groups to return to their homelands. The edict cited in 2 Chronicles 36:23 and repeated in Ezra 1:1–4 is presumably such a directive. The first wave of emigrants to Jerusalem numbered 42,360, along with 7,337 servants (Ezra 2:64–65).

These emigrants were led back by Sheshbazzar, a prince of Judah and the first governor of the restoration community in postexilic Judah (Ezra 1:5–11). The foundation for a new temple was laid during the early stages of his administration, sometime in 538 or 537 BC (Ezra 5:16). The meager project was soon abandoned, however, and the construction site lay neglected for two decades. The promising start quickly faded amidst the stark reality of Persian domination and the problems of mere survival among the competing provinces of the satrapy. Not until the preaching of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah (520–518 BC) did the initiative to rebuild the Jerusalem temple resume (cf. Hag 1:14). The second temple was completed in March of 515 BC (Ezra 6:15). The second temple was erected under the auspices of the Persian king Darius I, and the monies granted for the rebuilding probably took the form of "tax rebates" from the Persian royal treasury.

Politically, Judah struggled for identity amidst a sea of hostile neighboring satrapy provinces. The office of provincial governor was still in its infancy, and the provincial bureaucracy was in an embryonic stage of development. Any deference shown to Judah by the Persian overlords, religious or otherwise, was largely a matter of political pragmatism, since the Persian army needed a base of operations for the conquest and control of Egypt.

Religiously, the second *temple had been completed, but it paled in comparison to its Solomonic predecessor (Ezra 3; Hag 2:1-9). Temple worship was in a sorry state, as worshippers cheated God in their sacrifices and tithes. The priesthood was also in need of reform, as the ministry of the apathetic priests was actually leading people into sin, not out of it. The hopes raised by Haggai and Zechariah for a revival of the Davidic dynasty rooted in the figure of Zerubbabel (Hag 2:20-23; Zech. 3; 6:9-15) seem to have disappeared by the time of Malachi. The priests and the Levites were the "powerbrokers" when he preached to Judah.

Socially, Malachi confronts a population given to religious cynicism and political skepticism. The disillusionment of the postexilic Jewish community was prompted by several theological misunderstandings, including the expectations for wealth that Haggai had promised once the second temple was rebuilt (Hag 2:7, 18-19), the restoration of the Davidic covenant predicted by Ezekiel (Ezek 34:13, 23-24), and the implementation of Jeremiah's "new covenant" (Jer 31:23, 31-33). In the minds of many in Malachi's audience, God had failed his people.

3. Structure.

Most biblical interpreters divide the book of Malachi into six oracles or disputations (see the outline below), although other divisions are suggested (e.g., P. Verhoef breaks Mal 1:6—2:9 into two pericopes [Mal 1:6-14; 2:1-9] and counts seven oracles [Verhoef, 162], while W. Kaiser identifies five oracles by combining Mal 2:1-9 with Mal 2:10-16, and Mal 2:17—3:5 with Mal 3:6-12 into single pericopes [Kaiser, 17]).

The book roughly follows the general pattern of prophetic literature, including an indictment (Mal 1:2—2:17 [often outlining specific covenant violations]), the threat of divine judgment (Mal 3:1-5), instruction (Mal 3:6-12 [usually including a call to repentance]) and the aftermath (Mal 3:13-4:3 [including an affirmation of future hope or the promise of deliverance]). Beyond this, however, the overall structure and organization of these literary units has proven more difficult to assess. For instance, J. Smith regards Malachi as a well-planned and harmonious book (J. Smith, 3), while J. Baldwin finds no particular literary structure in the book and considers the work a haphazard treatment of topics (Baldwin, 214). Still others view Malachi's oracles as heavily redacted composite speeches created as a literary device for didactic purposes (so Redditt, 152-55) or fashioned merely as a literary "bookend" for the twelve Minor Prophets (so Nogalski, 211) (see Book of the Twelve).

A middle ground between the somewhat loose structure of the book observed by Baldwin and the highly edited structure of Malachi's speeches proposed by Redditt and Nogalski is preferred. Attempts to discern structure in the collection of oracles by relating the prophet's sermons to more formal structural analysis and overarching theological ideas have merit. One method, the structuralist approach, highlights keyword links that join sections within a pericope or join one pericope to another (e.g., McKenzie and Wallace, 558-60; they document covenant terminology connecting the oracles of Mal 1:6—3:12 with the idea of covenant presumed in God's election of Israel in Mal 1:2-5). Such an approach affirms that the oracles are linked by covenant ideas and terms and suggests that the first oracle, God's election of Israel (Mal 1:2-5), is a prologue or introduction that informs the rest of the oracles (Hill, 34; cf. Verhoef, 179-84, loosely arranging Malachi's oracles after the pattern of the suzerain treaty, with Mal 1:2-5 functioning as the historical prologue).

Attempts to connect Malachi's disputations to formal treaty structure (so Verhoef) or the covenant-lawsuit pattern (the so-called rib pattern) are useful for emphasizing the covenant theme of the book, but they strain to compress all the data into the precise literary form (e.g., O'Brien 1990, 63-64). In either case, the prophet's tone and style are confrontational, similar to the reasoned and forceful argumentation typical of a courtroom setting (see Achtemeier, 172).

Additionally, E. Clendenen's *rhetorical analysis of Malachi proves helpful in assessing the thematic structure of the book (Taylor and Clendenen, 221-22). He identifies the prophet's oracles as a hortatory discourse type of persuasive speech that possesses no definite order (like the more careful notational structure of narrative). Malachi's oracles are in keeping with prophetic speech that may be both repetitive and recursive (or overlapping). This accounts for the covenant context and pervasive legal tone of the oracles and helps to explain the inverted or chiasmic structure of the prophet's message, arranged accordingly (see Dorsey, 323):

- (A) Yahweh, who loves (Mal 1:2-5)
- (B) priests who have cheated God (Mal 1:6-14)
- (C) Levi's covenant in the past (Mal 2:1-9)
- (D) [the focal point] the call to faithfulness (Mal 2:10-16)
- (C') the future messenger of the covenant (Mal 2:17—3:6)
- (B') people who have robbed God (Mal 3:7-12)
- (A') Yahweh rewards the righteous (Mal 3:13—4:3 [MT 3:13-21])

This reading of Malachi assumes the traditional division of the book into six hortatory disputations framed by a superscription (Mal 1:1) and a double appendix (Mal 4:4-6 [MT 3:22-24]):

- Superscription: Malachi, Yahweh's messenger (Mal 1:1)
- First Disputation: Yahweh's love for Israel (Mal 1:2-5)
- Second Disputation: Indictment of corrupt priesthood (Mal 1:6—2:9)
- Third Disputation: Indictment of faithless people (Mal 2:10-16)
- Fourth Disputation: Yahweh's coming messenger of justice and judgment (Mal 2:17—3:5)
- Fifth Disputation: The Call to Serve Yahweh (Mal 3:6-12)
- Sixth Disputation: The Coming Day of Judgment (Mal 3:13—4:3 [MT 3:13-21])
- Appendices (Mal 4:4-6):
- Challenge to obey the law of Moses (Mal 4:4 [MT 3:22])
- Elijah and the Day of Yahweh (Mal 4:5-6 [MT 3:23-24])

4. Text and Versification.

The Hebrew text (MT) of Malachi is in a very good state of preservation (see Text and Textual Criticism). Portions of the book of Malachi are attested by fragments of the DSS, including Malachi 1:13-14 and parts of Malachi 2:10—4:6 (MT 2:10—3:24). Preliminary study of these fragments reveals that portions of these manuscripts (4Q76) agree with the LXX against the MT (see Fuller). Two verses in the MT of Malachi are especially difficult to interpret (Mal 2:15, 16), due both to textual corruption and grammatical anomaly. Baldwin has suggested that the text at this point has "suffered perhaps at the hands of scribes who took exception to its teaching" (Baldwin, 240).

The versification of the MT differs from the versification of English Bibles at the conclusion of the book of Malachi. The Hebrew Bible orders the last six verses of the book (Mal 4:1-6) as a continuation of Malachi 3 (MT = 3:19-24).

5. Malachi Among the Twelve Prophets.

The ancient Hebrew and Greek manuscript traditions reveal that most or all of the twelve Minor Prophets often were written on a single scroll (although scribal practice does not explicitly indicate that these books were considered a literary unity). This has led some scholars to postulate that the twelve Minor Prophets are a "book" (often called the *Book of the Twelve), a collection of prophetic books organized into a unified composition with discernible literary structure and plot movement (see House). At the very least, it may be possible to regard the twelve Minor Prophets as a scroll unified by the prophetic genre with an implied narrative and a central theme (or themes? [see Gottwald; Petersen 2000]). D. Petersen identifies the prophetic concept of the Day of the Lord as the dominant theme of the Minor Prophets (Petersen 2000, 9-10). T. Collins recognizes several principal themes in the Book of the Twelve, including covenant election, fidelity and infidelity, fertility and infertility, turning and returning, God's justice and God's mercy, God's kingship, the temple, and nations as enemies and nations as allies (Collins, 65). Additionally, the Book of the Twelve is framed by the prophetic call to repentance (employing similar phraseology). Notably, the first two books (Hos 6:1; 7:10; 14:1-2; Joel 2:12-14) and the last two books of the collection (Zech 1:3-4; Mal 3:7) admonish the Hebrews to turn back to God and restore faithful covenant relationship with him.

The books of Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi form a distinct subcollection or literary corpus within the Book of the Twelve. All three prophets belong to the Persian period of early postexilic Hebrew history and are unified by literary device (e.g., the rhetorical question and the repetition of prophetic speech formulas) and theological themes (God's sovereignty over the nations, God's faithfulness to his covenant promises, *repentance, temple worship, eschatological judgment and *blessing).

Like Zechariah 9—11; 12—14, the book of Malachi is prefaced by the compound title that includes the genre classification term "oracle" (Heb maššā') and the prophetic-word formula "the word of the LORD" (Heb dēbar yhwē). The relationship of the three maššā' oracles is a point of scholarly discussion. The headings do provide a basic literary framework for Zechariah 9—14 and Malachi and may indicate the activity of an editor group responsible for bringing Haggai-Zechariah-Malachi into their canonical arrangement (Meyers and Meyers, 90-91; on the literary integrity of the three oracles, cf. Childs, 490-91). The combination of the two expressions is a distinctive feature of late biblical prophecy (Meyers and Meyers, 91). The term maššā' means "oracle" or "burden" in the sense of a pronouncement of prophetic judgment and invests the prophet's message with both divine authority and a certain sense of urgency.

The Haggai-Zechariah-Malachi corpus sometimes is described as a narrative profile of postexilic Jerusalem recounting the spiritual history of the Hebrew restoration community. For example, R. Pierce understands the record of the postexilic prophets more negatively as one of covenant failure, since Malachi ends where Haggai begins, with a religious community in disarray (Pierce 1984b, 411). Conversely, others interpret the spiritual history of the restoration community as recorded in the Haggai-Zechariah-Malachi corpus more positively as the account of repentance and worship renewal prompting the return of the community to proper relationship with the Lord God (e.g., Schneider, 143-49; House, 96-109). The closing verses (Mal 4:4-6) may serve double duty as both appendices to the book and perhaps to the entire OT prophetic corpus. These additions, with their appeal to the ideal figures of Moses and Elijah, tie the oracles of Malachi (and the Book of the Twelve) to the larger collections of the Torah and the Latter Prophets in the OT canon.

6. Literary Style.

Like Haggai and Zechariah, the speeches of Malachi are essentially prose summaries in the third person. The speeches of Malachi are formally classified as belonging to the genre "oracular prose." The messages are "oracular" in nature because they represent authoritative prophetic speech motivated or inspired by God himself. By "prose" is meant that the literary texture of Malachi is a blend of prosaic and rhetorical features approaching poetic discourse but distinctive of prophetic style. This kind of prophetic speech often is characterized by formulaic language. Examples of these stylized expressions in Malachi include the prophetic-word formula ("the message that the LORD gave" [Mal 1:1]), the messenger formula ("said the LORD Almighty" [e.g., Mal 1:8, 14; 2:4]), the self-introduction formula ("I am the LORD" [Mal 3:6]) and the call-to-repentance formula ("return to me" [Mal 3:7]).

The discourse units in Malachi may be broadly categorized as judgment speeches because they accuse, indict and pronounce judgment on the audience (see Form Criticism). The prophet's style is also argumentative, whether understood more generally as disputation speeches (e.g., Baldwin, 213-14; Glazier-McDonald, 20-21) or identified narrowly as a covenant lawsuit format (e.g., O'Brien 1990, 63-64). More precisely, the literary form of Malachi's oracles may be linked to both Westermann's "legal procedure" (or trial speech) and the "disputation" as a subset of the legal-procedure speech form (Westermann, 169-76). The disputation speech pits the prophet of God against his audience in confrontational dialogue. It is possible that the origin of the disputation format in Malachi should be traced to a source deeper than the rhetorical style of the writer. For instance, J. Adamson suggests that the prophetic speech form of charge and countercharge exchanged between prophet and audience may have been rooted in the heated cries of hecklers protesting and questioning the prophet's sermons when he first preached his message on the street corners (Adamson, 805). Typically, in Malachi the disputation features these elements: (1) a truth claim declared by the prophet; (2) a hypothetical refutation on the part of the audience in the form of a question; (3) the prophet's answer to the audience rebuttal by restating his initial premise; (4) the presentation of additional supporting evidence.

The desired outcome in both covenant-law-suit and disputation speeches "is to leave the opponent devoid of further argumentation and resigned to the divine decision" (Patterson, 303). The disputation developed as an alternative form of prophetic speech because the people were unresponsive to the more conventional oracular speech. This rhetorical-question-and-disputation format gave rise to the dialogical method of exposition peculiar to the later rabbinic schools of Judaism (cf. the teaching method of Jesus in Mt 5:21, 27: "You have heard that it was said . . . , but I say unto you . . .").

7. Audience.

Malachi's first oracle (Mal 1:2-5) is addressed generally to the Hebrew community living in postexilic Jerusalem and environs. The prophet's second (Mal 1:6-2:9) oracle is aimed specifically at the priests and Levites serving in the second temple. The final four oracles (including the call to repentance [Mal 3:6-12]) of Malachi's prophecy are once again directed broadly to the inhabitants of postexilic Judah (Mal 2:10-16; 2:17—3:5; 3:6-12; 3:13—4:3), although the Levites are specifically mentioned again in the fourth oracle or disputation (cf. Mal 3:3-4). The righteous Hebrews within the restoration community are singled out and contrasted with the wicked in the final oracle (see Mal 3:16-18).

8. Message.

The message of Malachi is all about "getting things right." The thrust of Malachi's preaching may be placed under the umbrella theme "covenant," specifically the covenant of Jacob (i.e., the patriarchs [Mal 1:2]), the covenant of Levi (Mal 2:4-5, an obscure reference, perhaps an allusion to the covenant made with Phinehas in Num 25:10-13), the covenant of marriage (Mal 2:14) and the covenant of Moses (Mal 4:4). The essential idea of covenant is that of an agreement or treaty that establishes a relationship between parties with attendant obligations and responsibilities. It is not surprising, then, that three of Malachi's disputations deal with right relationships. The prophetic messenger also works on the premise that proper knowledge of God and his covenant is essential to maintaining these right relationships.

First, the prophet calls the people back to a right understanding of who God is as Israel's father, suzerain and covenant maker (Mal 1:2-5). Next he admonishes the priests and the people to return to the practice of right worship by participating in the temple sacrifices with honesty and integrity (Mal 1:6—2:9). The prophet addresses the issue of right relationships in marriage by decrying divorce and encouraging loyalty on the part of spouses (Mal 2:10-16). Right relationships must extend to the community at large in attitudes and behavior that promote honesty because God is just (Mal 2:17—3:5). The honesty foundational to social justice must also motivate right giving to God because he is gracious and generous in his response to those who are faithful (Mal 3:6-12). Finally, Malachi summons his audience to right relationship with God because he is faithful to his word and desires genuine worship (Mal 3:13—4:3). Interestingly, a pervasive subtheme in the book is honesty, as three of the six disputations urge the people of postexilic Judah to embrace this virtue.

9. Theological Concerns.

The book of Malachi is primarily a theology proper, a treatise on the nature and character of God (see VanGemenen, 204-8). The prophet reminds his audience that their Lord is "father" of Israel (Mal 1:6), as well as "master" and "king" (Mal 1:6, 14). Wary of the extremes of familiarity and formality, Malachi is careful to present a balanced picture of the Lord Almighty. God is sovereign over both the nations (Mal 1:3-5, 11, 14) and Israel as his elect nation or "special treasure" (Mal 1:2; 3:17). Yet his love for Israel (Mal 1:2) does not preclude divine testing and even judgment for the sake of purifying his people (Mal 3:2-3).

Malachi's knowledge of and identification with Israel's covenant tradition place his book in the mainstream of OT theology. The prophet recognized God as both the maker and keeper of covenant with Israel (Mal 1:2; 2:10), and he understood the status of Israel as "adopted child" by virtue of that covenant relationship (Mal 1:6). The conditional nature of Yahweh's covenant placed a premium upon Israel's obedience to the treaty stipulations and the necessity of repentance for a breach of the covenant relationship (Mal 3:7, 16-18). The threat of divine judgment against Israel is rooted in God's unchanging nature (Mal 3:6) (see God). This is not so much a metaphysical statement about God's immutability, a theological commentary on the nature of his being, as it is an affirmation that God is eternally faithful to his covenant initiatives (cf. Ex 6:5; Lev 26:40-42; Ps 111:9; Jer 31:20) (see Baker, 288-89). Malachi acknowledged that Israel's relationship with the Lord demanded both "vertical" and "horizontal" responsibilities in the form of proper *worship (Mal 1:10-14) (see Mallone, 43-59) and *social justice (Mal 3:5) (see Baker, 275-80).

Perhaps more troublesome for Malachi's audience is the sobering reality that the Mosaic covenant is still operative. The prophet maintains that the stipulations of God's Sinai treaty established with Israel after the exodus from Egypt, with its attendant *blessings and curses, has currency for postexilic Judah. This raises theological questions for Malachi's audience at two levels. If the Mosaic covenant is still in effect, "Where is the God of justice?" (Mal 2:17). Malachi's audience alleges that the retribution principle of the Sinai covenant has been revoked because the righteous were not experiencing divine blessing, and all the while the wicked appeared to be thriving (Mal 3:14-15). Implicit in this charge of divine injustice is the perception that postexilic Judah still languished under the "corporate curse" of the *law of Moses due to the disobedience of other (or even previous?) members of the Hebrew community. The pious Jews of the restoration community were clamoring for the "new covenant" paradigm of Jeremiah (Jer 31:31-34). Under the umbrella of this covenant relationship the righteous would no longer be held hostage to the covenant misbehavior of an earlier constituency. Rather, individuals were now to be held accountable for their own sins (Jer 31:29-30; Ezek 18:2-4). Malachi's sermons, and the responses of his audience, reflect the tension for the people of God living between these two theological realities as the old covenant slowly makes way for the new covenant (cf. Mt 9:14-17; Lk 22:20).

Malachi preaches a lofty doctrine of *marriage as companionship with the spouse of one's youth (Mal 2:14) and parenting as a shared responsibility (Mal 2:15). The prophet calls attention to the sacred nature of the husband-wife relationship by placing the covenant of marriage (Mal 2:14) within the context of the covenant between God and Israel (Mal 2:10) (see Hugenberger, 27-47). This explains his censure of easy divorce and the exhortation to remain loyal to one's marriage vows (Mal 2:16). Malachi's teaching anticipates the more rigid instruction of Jesus and Paul on divorce (cf. Mt 19:11; 1 Cor 7:1-16). In context, the prophet's prescriptive treatment of divorce may reflect the "exclusivist" tendencies of postexilic Judaism to reestablish the ethnic purity of Israel diluted by intermarriage (cf. Ezra 9; Neh. 13:23-31).

Malachi's *eschatology conforms to the conventional prophetic paradigm of threat and promise. Like Zechariah, Malachi pictures divine judgment as both punishment for sin and a call to repentance (Mal 3:7). The goal of God's judgment is purification and especially the restoration of acceptable worship on the part of the faithful of Israel (Mal 3:3-4). The NT understands that the "messenger" or forerunner who prepares the way for the Lord's epiphany at his temple was realized (at least in part) in the ministry of John the Baptist (Mal 3:1; 4:5-6; cf. Mt 11:14). John's ministry affirms that divine judgment entails both purification of the righteous and punishment of the wicked (Lk 3:4-9). Malachi does make an original contribution to OT eschatology with his reference to the "scroll of remembrance," in which the names of the righteous are recorded (Mal 3:16; cf. Dan 12:1; Rev 20:12). Malachi, and thus the OT, ends with an admonition to obey the teachings of the Mosaic covenant, an exhortation to look expectantly to the future for the coming Day of the Lord, and a warning to maintain covenant faithfulness across the generations, punctuated with the threat of divine curse (see Johnston, 262).

10. Imagery in Malachi.

At one level, the Bible is a product of the historical and cultural environment from which it emerges, and the book of Malachi is no exception. The prophet makes reference to images and symbols well known in his day. An understanding of the background and context of these word pictures enhances the significance of Malachi's message to his audience. A few of the more striking examples are noted below.

The "refiner's fire" and the "fuller's soap" are powerful images depicting the purifying effects of divine judgment (Mal 3:2). The word for “soap” (Heb bōrīt) describes an alkaline salt or soda powder derived from the iceplant (found in Mesopotamia but not Syro-Palestine) and used as a laundry detergent in the ancient world. There is some question as to whether the prophet makes reference here to two common trades in the biblical world, the smelter and the fuller or launderer, or whether the expression should be understood against the backdrop of a two-stage metallurgy process of smelting and purifying crude lead by using potash as a reagent in separating the dross from the precious metal. The word picture of the alkali soap applied for the cleansing of sin in postexilic Judah is unique to Malachi in the OT. The passage advances the sober reminder that the judgment associated with the Day of the Lord is meant for both the righteous and the wicked.

Malachi makes reference to a symbolic “book [or scroll] of remembrance” (Mal 3:16), and this heavenly register may have its earthly counterpart in the Persian “book of records” (Esther 6:1). The idea of heavenly tablets kept by deities upon which were recorded the deeds and destinies of individuals and nations extends from Sumerian to talmudic times. The idea of a “heavenly book of life” is known elsewhere in the OT (cf. Ex 32:32-33; Ps 69:28; Dan 12:1). These heavenly books become symbols of divine judgment in Daniel 7:10; 10:21; 12:4. Such texts may provide the OT background for the books opened at the great white throne judgment in Revelation (Rev 20:11-15).

Malachi appeals to the metaphor of a furnace in his forecast of a coming day when God will destroy the arrogant and the wicked (Mal 4:1 [MT 3:19]). The “furnace” (Heb tannūr) refers to a fixed or portable beehive shaped earthenware oven or stove used especially for baking bread. For the prophet, it becomes a frightening symbol of divine judgment likening the Day of the Lord to an oven that incinerates those who oppose God (cf. Ps 21:9 [MT 21:10]).

The best-known image in Malachi is the celestial figure of “the sun of righteousness” rising “with healing in its wings” (Mal 4:2 [MT 3:20]). The sun is a symbol for God in Psalm 84:11, but “the sun of righteousness” probably is an adaptation of the winged sun-disc icon of Persian art. In ancient Mesopotamia the winged sun-disc icon was widely used and represented the guardianship of the deity for the king. Malachi applies the solar epithet to God as the deity who will truly provide blessing and protection for those people overshadowed by his wings. As early as Hippolytus, Christian interpreters have understood the word picture as a messianic title fulfilled in Jesus Christ (see Ferreiro, 307-11).

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE

The prophets do not set out to describe practices and institutions such as marriage and divorce for their audiences. Instead, they address marriage and divorce in Israel both as social realities and as a metaphor for the relationship between Yahweh and Israel.

J. J. Pilch states that Hebrew does not have a single unambiguous word for "marriage" (the verb b'l is translated in some versions as "to marry," but other versions translate it as "to be[come] a husband"). Marriage is conveyed in the prophets with language similar to that found in the Pentateuch: lqh ("to take" a woman/wife [Ezek 44:22; cf. Gen 19:14]), b'l ("to marry, be[come] lord" [Is 54:1; 62:4, 5; cf. Gen 20:3]), ntn ("to give" a woman/wife [Jer 29:6; Dan 11:7; cf. Ex 2:21]).

Hebrew also lacks a single unambiguous term for "wife." The word 'issâ can mean "woman," "wife" or "female animal." The word 'issâ conveys "wife" when it combines with certain words or when it is set in the context of certain social descriptions mentioned in the accompanying paragraphs. "Wife" is conveyed in the prophets with language similar to the Penta-teuch: wife forsaken (Is 54:6), wife of youth (Jer 3:1), wife of a neighbor (Jer 5:8; cf. Ex 20:17), take a wife (Jer 16:2; cf. Gen 24:7), adulterous wife (Ezek 16:32), my wife (Ezek 24:18; cf. Gen 20:11), wife of your covenant (Mal 2:14).

The absence of unambiguous technical terms for "marriage" and "wife" does not suggest, however, that the institution or practice of marriage did not exist. Nor does it imply that there was no way of talking specifically about marriage, wives or husbands. Hebrew possesses many terms reflecting the practice of marriage: "husband," "concubine," "son-in-law," "daughter-in-law," "father-in-law" and "mother-in-law." It also possesses many terms denoting what happens when marriage is violated or broken: "adultery," "divorce decree" and "prostitution."

Marriage is a significant institution in ancient Israel. Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Hosea, Joel, Zechariah and Malachi deal with marriage in some form or fashion. It would be helpful for us to know how a wedding was conducted, how marriage was commonly lived out, and how divorce was worked out, but none of the prophets offer specific descriptions. For the most part, they assume that their audience is aware of these institutions and practices. The prophets engage both marriage and divorce as practices to be addressed and as metaphors designed to illustrate the sacred nature of the relationship between Israel and Yahweh. The prophets offer only glimpses of marriage and divorce, so at best we have only pieces of a much larger puzzle. It is clear that marriage in the time of the prophets shares a family likeness to practices described throughout the rest of the OT.

4. Marriage and Divorce

1. The Practice of Marriage in Israel.

M. D. Carroll R. notes that the prophets do not attempt to legislate family law as in the Penta-teuch, nor do they attempt to produce narratives of marriage as in Genesis or Samuel or reflections on marriage like those preserved in various wisdom texts. In the Prophets marriage is predominantly used as a metaphor for the relationship between Yahweh and Israel. *Feminist scholars such R. J. Weems and A. Brenner, following the lead of other traditional scholars, have taken the words of Hosea 1—3 and Ezekiel 16; 23 as literal descriptions of actual marriage practices. This leads these feminist scholars to condemn the culture, the prophets and the God of these texts as misogynistic. Other scholars, such as P. L. Day and Carroll R., have urged caution in reading the rhetoric of these prophets as literal descriptions of marital practices. When reading powerful texts such as Hosea and Ezekiel, one needs to focus on their powerful use of metaphor in the rhetoric that they employ (Stienstra). Day illustrates this point by asking about the contemporary phrase "to nurse a tree." This metaphor communicates neither the medical practices of nursing nor the way a mother feeds her newborn child. Day's illustration shows us that caution needs to be exercised in reading the Prophets for glimpses of the practice of marriage and divorce in Israel. If we are attentive to this caution, we may still be able to infer some understanding of marriage and divorce practices as described in prophetic texts.

1.1. Marriage Ceremony. It appears that some of the figurative usages of marriage seem to disclose the actual practices and conventions of marriage. As noted above, it is not easy to discern when this is so, but the following seem to give us glimpses of marriage in the times of the prophets. Not surprisingly, weddings were meant to be memorable events where both the bridegroom and the bride dressed for the occasion. The groom was decked in garland, and the bride in special clothing and jewels (Is 61:10; Jer 2:32). The wedding was meant to be a time of rejoicing (Is 62:5; Jer 25:10), singing (Jer 33:11) and *worship of the Lord (Jer 33:11). The bride was known for her devotion (Jer 2:2). A wedding was a time of joy for the community, and the absence of this community event would be felt (Jer 7:34).

1.2. Marriage Benefits (Singleness and Widowhood). It is clear that singleness of any state for a woman was not seen or experienced as a benefit. Both Isaiah and Jeremiah remind and plead for the people to defend widows (Is 1:7, 23; Jer 7:6; 16:9; 22:3), since some viewed widows as vulnerable and some viewed them as prey (Is 10:2). In dangerous times, it appears that women preferred a polygamous marriage to being single (Is 4:1). Although marriage offered security to a woman, it did not create invulnerability to war and conquest (Jer 6:11-12; 8:10; 14:6). Marriage could stay intact in times of *warfare, but couples could go into exile (Jer 38:23). Like all wars, the war and conquest in Jeremiah's day multiplied the number of widows (Jer 15:8; 18:21). Wives in Jeremiah's day experienced famine, pestilence and war, which meant that their children were vulnerable to suffering and early death. Wives were not, however, merely passive recipients of what came along; sometimes they too were active in committing crimes and worshiping other gods (Jer 44:9, 15).

Oddly, Jeremiah tells the people to see that exile will not bring an end to the nation, so he encourages the exiles to marry, to take wives for their sons, and to give their daughters to be wives (Jer 29:6). They are to settle there and grow their families.

1.3. Personal Life of the Prophets and Marriage. We are told of the marital status of four of the prophets. Isaiah was married to a prophetess, and they had children together (Is 7:3; 8:3). Jeremiah is commanded by the Lord not to take a wife and not to have children (Jer 16:2). Ezekiel is told that his wife is going to die, and that he is not to mourn (Ezek 24:16) (D. Lipton takes a minority position and believes that Ezekiel was not forbidden to mourn her after her death, but he was to refrain from petitioning on her behalf before her death). Hosea is commanded to marry a wife of whoredom (Hos 1:2).

1.4. Violations of Marriage. Infidelity was practiced by husbands (Jer 5:8) and by wives (Jer 3:20). The practice of adultery was prevalent enough to make it into various lists of prophetic rebuke (Jer 7:9; 23:10, 14; 29:23).

2. The Practice of Divorce in Israel.

The prophets take up the language of divorce as it is used in the Torah (see Law). Ezekiel utilizes the same terminology for divorce that appears in Leviticus and Numbers: grš, which often means "to drive out." Isaiah, Jeremiah and Malachi use the language of Deuteronomy: šlh, which often means "to send out." While it is possible that the two words refer to different practices, it is more likely that the words are just different terms used by each community in Israel (with Leviticus and Numbers referring to the priestly community and Deuteronomy referring to the community at large).

Ezekiel's discussion of divorce focuses on the qualifications of a Levitical priest who is allowed to serve in the future sanctuary. He echoes the words of Leviticus as he addresses the life and practices of Levitical priests. A Levitical priest is not allowed to take a divorced (gērūšā) woman as a wife and be eligible for service in the sanctuary.

In Malachi 2:14-16 we hear Yahweh making it clear that he hates divorce (in particular he hates the divorce of Judeans from Judeans). Instead, he expects faithfulness to the wife of one's youth. It appears that in Malachi divorce itself can be the act of faithlessness (for an alternative view, M. Zehner argues that this passage is linked to Malachi 2:10-12, and that Malachi is addressing more specifically the time and situation of Ezra and Nehemiah where Israelite men were divorcing their first wife, who is Jewish, and marrying foreign women). In addition to Deuteronomy, Malachi also seems to be arguing that the people of Israel are to uphold marriage as a gift of God at creation (Gen 1:27; 2:22-24) (Perdue). Isaiah and Jeremiah also speak of the practice of divorce found in Deuteronomy. In Deuteronomy 24:1-4 we learn that if a man is displeased with the woman whom he takes in marriage, he may write her a certificate of divorce, place it in her hand, and send her out. Isaiah speaks of the practice of using a divorce decree (Is 50:1). Although Jeremiah uses the same term as Isaiah for a divorce decree, Jeremiah has a fuller description that parallels that of Deuteronomy 24:1-4. In Jeremiah 3:1 a man sends his wife away; a little later, in Jeremiah 3:8, Yahweh tells Jeremiah that he gave Israel a certificate of divorce for her unfaithfulness. This legal document, or "quitclaim" (as P. J. Scalise calls it), functions as proof of the divorce for the divorced women. We are told by Malachi that Yahweh hates divorce (Mal 2:16), but we note that Yahweh speaks of "divorcing" Israel (Jer 3:8) and Judah (Is 50:1).

3. Marriage, Divorce and Remarriage as a Metaphor

Although the metaphors of marriage and divorce are utilized by the prophets, no prophet uses the images of marriage in a monolithic way.

In line with what is mentioned above, it should be noted that Ezekiel and Hosea have been viewed as “pornoprophets” by some feminist scholars. Although these texts of Scripture have traditionally been accepted, many feminist scholars have worked to show them to be objectionable (Weems and Brenner are among scholars who represent this position). Day states that both traditional and feminist scholars mistakenly agree that the descriptions of the treatment of the women in Ezekiel and Hosea are based on actual practices in the ancient Near East. Day, however, offers a corrective reading that assumes that since Ezekiel uses the metaphor extensively, there is no need to assume that these practices described actually occurred. Nor is there much support from ancient Near Eastern literature to indicate that these were actual practices. Carroll R. joins Day in offering a helpful critique of such readings. Both Day and Carroll R. make clear that what we assume about the practices deeply impacts our readings of the prophets.

3.1. Isaiah. The image of the bride in Isaiah functions in messages of hope to God’s people. This is seen in Isaiah 49:18, where the image makes clear that the days of devastation will turn into days of blessing, and in Isaiah 60, with the image of a bride who is clothed lavishly by her husband.

In Isaiah 50 Isaiah contends that Yahweh has been faithful, but Israel has not. In this chapter Yahweh asks the question, “Where is your bill of divorce?” The question should elicit the answer “It does not exist,” since Yahweh did not leave or send them away; rather they reaped the consequences of their sins. Israel has been unfaithful. Yet through it all Yahweh faithfully keeps coming back for them (Is 50:2), and they do not respond to his overtures. However, in Isaiah 54 we see the opposite. Here it is Yahweh who left Israel for a period, so that she was like a widow, but now he has returned. He will gather Israel, who is like a wife forsaken, and give her everlasting love. The metaphors are not reified or fixed; instead, the author feels free to move in different directions with them.

3.2. Jeremiah. Jeremiah feels free to identify Judah as a whore (Jer 2:20), an incompetent bride (Jer 2:32), a wayward wife (Jer 2:33) and a murderously oppressive woman (Jer 2:34). In Jeremiah 3 the metaphors switch throughout the chapter. Judah is a wayward bride who acts like an assertive whore, but she tries to return to Yahweh as a daughter who asks her father to take her back. Yahweh sees through the insincerity of Israel and states that false sister Judah should have learned a lesson from wayward sister Israel’s experience. Israel becomes less guilty when viewed in the light of Judah’s actions, so the prophet is told to offer an invitation to the north (where the remnant of Israel live) to return to Yahweh. In Jeremiah 31:32 Yahweh, after offering great hope, reminds them that although they broke their covenant with him as their husband, he will make a new covenant with them.

3.3. Ezekiel. As mentioned above, Ezekiel 16; 23 have generated great controversy among readers, commentators and the church. In Ezekiel 16 Yahweh speaks of Jerusalem as a woman whom he has taken for his wife. She turns out to be wantonly unfaithful. Yahweh describes in vivid sexual metaphors how she will be punished. In Ezekiel 23 the word of the Lord speaks of Yahweh having two wives, Oholah (Israel) and Oholibah (Judah), both of whom are unfaithful. Oholah became unfaithful first. She was delivered to her lovers (Assyria), who uncovered her nakedness and killed her. Oholibah had the opportunity to learn from her sister’s demise, but instead she becomes more corrupt. Again Ezekiel uses vivid sexual metaphors to describe how this wife of Yahweh will be punished. Weems and Brenner are representative of scholars who take these descriptions as evidence of an abusive and misogynistic patriarchal society. Both Day and Carroll R. argue that the focus of the metaphor is on the relationship of Israel and Yahweh. If we take Day’s position, we find that the texts are powerful metaphorical pieces that point to the oncoming destruction of a people who have been unfaithful to their covenant with Yahweh.

3.4. Hosea. Various questions have emerged on the relationship of Hosea 1—2, told in the third person, and Hosea 3, told in the first person. These questions deal with the chronology of events, the identity of the woman, the historical nature of Hosea’s wife, and the call of Hosea. Is the woman in Hosea 3 Gomer or another wife? Do the accounts in Hosea 1 and Hosea 3 offer parallel accounts of the marital history of Hosea or accounts that supplement one another? Are these historical referential accounts, or are they figurative? Did Hosea know that Gomer was a whore before he married her, or did he discover this after he had married her?

J. A. Dearman, with reference to H. H. Rowley, argues that a plain reading shows that the woman in all three chapters is Gomer, that the stories supplement each other, and that they are told in a chronological fashion. While acknowledging the possibility that the command "to marry a whore" is a retrospective view of the prophet, again Dearman argues that the plain reading of Hosea 1 assumes Hosea's obedience to the commands of Yahweh. The call of Hosea is to marry a wife of whoredom and to have children of whoredom.

The names of the children cause us to wonder if the children are actually Hosea's or are the result of Gomer's unfaithfulness. In Hosea 2 it seems that Hosea is a violated husband who wants to take his anger out on his wife, but then we realize that it is Yahweh who is the violated one (Hos 2:8). It is at this point that we are no longer sure how much access or clarity we have to the historical Hosea. D. J. A. Clines points out that Yahweh makes one threat (Hos 2:3-5), and then the next threat (Hos 2:6-13), and then the threats turn empty. Yahweh switches course and promises to come after them with love (Hos 2:14-23). Hosea 3 gives us a cloudy glimpse into Hosea's life, but even in this chapter the point is not Hosea or his wife, but rather Yahweh disciplining Israel.

4. Marriage and Divorce.

Marriage was a significant institution in ancient Israel. Divorce was a major disruption of this practice. The prophets expected marriage to be honored and to last. They have no positive words for the brokenness of divorce. Marriage and divorce provided a metaphor to describe the relationship between Yahweh and Israel. Unfortunately, Israel only provides reasons for the dissolution of their relationship, and God responds sometimes with judgment and ultimately with hope.

MESSIAH

Originally referring primarily to someone anointed by Yahweh into a specific role as a prophet, priest or (especially) king, the term messiah is also applied more widely to cover a hoped for redeemer figure who emerges in the OT and whom Christians affirm finds fulfillment in Jesus. Intertestamental texts (e.g., T. Sim. 7:1-2) seem to expect a priestly savior as well as a royal one, while the Qumran community may have anticipated a prophetic messiah too (1QS IX, 9-11; 1Q28a II, 11-21 [cf. Jn 1:19-28]). If we accept the wider definition in the NT, then a range of titles could also be considered, such as "Servant of Yahweh" or "Son of Man." Since these other titles are considered elsewhere in this volume, the focus in the present article is restricted to a royal figure associated with the promise to David, though royal themes are also evident in the other titles.

1. Terminology and Hermeneutical Issues
2. The Influence of the Davidic Covenant
3. Perspectives within the Prophets

1. Terminology and Hermeneutical Issues.

The English word messiah is based on the Hebrew māšīah, an adjective related to a verb (mšh) meaning “to anoint” or “to cover with oil.” The verb does not necessarily have a technical sense related to messianism. For example, in Amos 6:6 those who “anoint themselves with the finest oils” refers to the excesses of the wealthy who are unconcerned with the needs of the poor, and four times the verb mšh refers to wafers spread with oil (Ex 29:2; Lev 2:4; 7:12; Num 6:15). However, the most common use is to mark something or someone initiated into a role by Yahweh. Hence, individuals called by Yahweh to a specific task could be anointed by smearing them with oil. When Aaron and his sons were initiated into their priestly ministry, they were anointed (Ex 28:41; 29:7), as also was the tabernacle and its equipment (Ex 29:36; 30:26). Similarly, Elisha’s anointing (1 Kings 19:16) was to initiate his prophetic ministry. However, anointing is most commonly to designate someone as Yahweh’s appointed king, such as Saul (1 Sam 9:16; 10:1), David (1 Sam 16:13), Solomon (1 Kings 1:34) or Jehu (1 Kings 19:16; 2 Kings 9:3). This is not restricted to Israelite kings, as Elijah was directed to anoint Hazael as king of Aram (1 Kings 19:15), and the only occurrence of māšīah in Isaiah (Is 45:1) refers to the Persian king Cyrus. Anointing did not necessarily indicate Yahweh’s choice of someone as king, but rather could point to popular acceptance of someone as king (Judg 9:15; 2 Kings 11:12).

Consideration of the terminology indicates that we cannot simply look up all occurrences of māšīah (or its cognate verb) and understand the hope of messiah within the prophets. Indeed, māšīah occurs infrequently in the prophets, and apart from Isaiah 45:1 it is found only in Habakkuk 3:13, while in Daniel it occurs only twice (Dan 9:25-26). None of these passages is quoted in the NT, and the passing allusion to Daniel 9:26 in Luke 21:24 does not directly address the question of the Messiah. The verb mšh is similarly infrequent, and often it lacks any overt messianic overtones. This does not mean there is no messianic consciousness in the prophets, but it does suggest that the messianic hope is not found through a simple word study. This, therefore, raises an important hermeneutical issue about how to identify those texts that can properly be considered messianic. Some, such as W. Kaiser, have argued that the prophets consciously anticipate the Messiah in a range of texts, and therefore those texts that the NT cites were messianic in intention (Kaiser, 13-35). But even allowing for Kaiser’s concept of “corporate solidarity,” in which the Messiah can be seen in the form of either an individual or the nation, it is difficult to see that a text such as Hosea 11:1 (cited in Mt 2:15) is intentionally messianic, and in any case one must inquire as to what Matthew means by claiming that this text was “fulfilled” in Jesus’ return from Egypt. As P. Jenson has argued, there is a range of ways in which prophecy can be understood, and this must be acknowledged in how we read prophetic texts (Jenson, 190-204). Hence (with McConville, 13), we should see that there are connections between these texts, but these emerge through the process of reading texts against developing circumstances and seeing new significance in them.

There is a two-way movement between the OT and the NT in their final form (Sailhamer, 18, 22), where the OT expresses a hope for deliverance and restoration that is relevant to its own historical context. We can consider as “messianic” those that express this hope through a royal figure (though without excluding priestly and prophetic elements) who brings redemption. It is important that there be some reference to a central redeemer figure if we are to distinguish messianic texts from those that are more generally eschatological. The NT shows us one way in which the messianic hope was understood, seeing connections that might not have been immediately apparent but are either expressed directly or are latent within the OT. The NT interprets a range of texts as messianic but does not exhaust those that are significant for this theme. Although the term māšīah is rare within the prophets and is never used in them with the technical sense of “messiah,” we can acknowledge that through those passages that point to a redeemer, it provides the theological impetus that led to a more developed messianism.

2. The Influence of the Davidic Covenant.

Because the messianic hope within the OT as a whole draws so strongly on royal themes, we must briefly consider the basis of this. The covenant with David recorded in 2 Samuel 7:1-17 is foundational (see Clements, 12), and is drawn on in a variety of ways throughout the OT (see Schniedewind). D. Hubbard has summarized some of the ways in which this covenant contributed to messianic thought through its restatement of the promises to Abraham and pivotal place within the books of Samuel and the Former Prophets generally (Hubbard, 39-42). Through this, the Davidic hope not only shaped the proclamation of many of the prophets but also contributed to the understanding of figures such as the Servant of Yahweh, who, though not strictly Davidic, is presented in themes that draw on Davidic kingship. Although most scholars date the final edition of the books of Samuel to the period of the exile, it is arguable that knowledge of the promise became widespread much earlier so that prophets from the eighth century BC were able to draw on it. That David's successors failed to live up to the terms of the promise seems to have spurred the prophets to look toward an idealized future Davidide who would fulfill the terms of the promise (e.g., Jer 23:5-6). Of particular importance was that David's dynasty would hold the kingdom in perpetuity (2 Sam 7:13) so that his throne would be secure (2 Sam 7:16). The exile triggered reflection on how this promise could be fulfilled in the absence of a Davidic monarch, but rather than rejecting the Davidic hope, this was then expressed in specifically eschatological terms (e.g., Ezek 37:24-28). This was not the point at which such thinking was initiated; rather, it was an extension of a thought process that already reached back into Israel's history (see DOTHB, Kings and Kingship).

The influence of the Davidic covenant also explains why some themes are so important within the messianic texts of the OT. It was particularly important that kings in the ancient Near East provide both security and justice for their people. Whether from external or internal pressures, it was the task of the king to protect their people from oppression. Yahweh is seen as Israel's king within much of the OT, providing such security for his people (e.g., Ps 99:1-4), but it is equally the case that Yahweh achieves his rule through the Davidic monarch (Ps 72), who could also be understood as Yahweh's son (Ps 2:7). Hence, themes of *justice and *peace are particularly prominent in the messianic hope in the prophets, extending the traditional role of the king into an eschatological renewal. There is also an interplay between the messianic figure and Yahweh's own work as these themes are extended into an eschatological renewal that is to be initiated through the Messiah.

3. Perspectives within the Prophets.

In examining specific texts within the prophets, it is possible to survey the central passages within any given book (as does H. G. M. Williamson for Isaiah, M. Boda for Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi [Boda, 45-74], and W. Kaiser across the collection [Kaiser, 136-230]), but there is also value in highlighting the central themes that emerge across the collection as a whole. The danger in such an approach is that a distinctive text might be overlooked, but it does stress the fact that there is a significant unity in how the messianic hope develops across the collection as a whole. The themes considered here emerge from the discussion of the influence of the Davidic covenant, though it should be noted that most texts draw on several of them. Some passages, therefore, will be discussed under more than one heading as we appreciate the multicolored nature of the messianic hope. An important motif that emerges through this is that the messianic hope is placed within the context of Yahweh's work for his people, so that Yahweh remains the savior of his people, though the Davidic figure to which the prophets refer is one through whom he will bring this salvation.

3.1. Restored/Renewed Davidic Kingship. A crucial element in the messianic understanding of the prophets focused on the continuation of the reign of David, and in particular on a representative of David's family who would provide a reign consistent with Yahweh's promise to David. Such a king's reign would be truly consistent with Yahweh's reign. This pattern is also consistent with the theology of kingship outlined in Deuteronomy 17:14-20, where the king's central task was to read the Torah (possibly Deuteronomy itself) and so fear Yahweh by living out the Torah. This theme is explored also in the books of Samuel, which interpret kingship as one manifestation of Yahweh's reign, though emphasizing that human kings always stand under Yahweh's authority (Firth, 43-45). Even before the exile we begin to see texts that anticipate a Davidic king who will truly reign on Yahweh's behalf, though it is also true that the exile triggered further reflection on how Israel could experience such a king. Consistently, as the prophets reflect on this theme, they stress that Yahweh is the one who brings restoration to and through Davidic kingship. Yahweh remains as the nation's savior, but the future king is integral to his purposes. Thus, in Zechariah 9:9-10 the coming king is clearly patterned on David and is said to come and initiate a reign of peace, but this is achieved only because of what Yahweh does first. The royal hope is founded in Yahweh's activity, some of which he may bring about through his king.

One of the earliest expressions of this hope occurs in Hosea 3:4-5. Assuming that this is an authentic oracle of Hosea's (for the issues, see Davies, 97-98, though he regards the reference to David as an exilic addition), we may need to date it fairly late in his ministry, perhaps into the 720s BC, but still before the fall of Samaria in 722/21 BC. As the only northern prophet (Amos was slightly earlier, but most likely from Judah though active in the north), Hosea is an important witness about how the Davidic monarchy was understood. The oracle occurs as the conclusion to a passage where Hosea is again to love an adulteress woman, a prophetic sign act that also points to Yahweh's love for his people. Israel will experience many years without a king (cf. Hos 7:16; 10:3, 7; 13:10-11), which in the north meant various dynasties not descended from David, but there would come a point when they would again seek Yahweh and David their king and so experience Yahweh's goodness. The timing of this is not made clear, merely occurring "afterward" and "in the latter days" (Hos 3:5), but that such a Davidic hope was held out is both a critique of the various dynasties of the north and early evidence that even though the north had rejected the reign of David (1 Kings 12:16-20), his line was understood as providing the appropriate direction for the nation. Like Amos 9:11-15, this effectively presumes a reunification of the people of God within the framework of the promise to David, but that Hosea refers to "David" and not the current Judean king suggests that Hosea is looking toward an ideal descendant of David. For Hosea, the future of the people of God was under a renewed Davidic ruler.

Although Hosea speaks of such a king from the perspective of an anticipated *exile of the northern kingdom, his language appears to be taken up in Jeremiah 30:9 and applied to Judah's exile as well. This passage comes from when there was no longer a descendant of David ruling in Jerusalem. It promises that Yahweh would overcome the nation that then ruled Judah and raise up David their king for them. Jeremiah thus subtly updates Hosea's language, emphasizing that it was Yahweh who would restore David's line.

Though disputed by some (for details, see Boda, 52-53), a similar theme seems to emerge in Haggai 2:20-23. Living after the exile, Haggai appears to reflect on Jeremiah 22:24, where Coniah (better known as Jehoiachin) had been rejected, described as a "signet ring" that Yahweh would remove. For Haggai, the question would be whether there could be a future for the line of David now that Judah was ruled by the Persians. By describing Zerubbabel, Jehoiachin's grandson, as a "signet ring" chosen by Yahweh (Hag 2:23), he shows that the promise to David continued in spite of the enduring absence of a Davidic king. The absence of a Davidic king therefore was not an impediment to the continuation of the promise, though it is still Yahweh's reign that is preeminent.

Reflection on the Davidic hope is also apparent in several passages in Isaiah (Williamson, 30-72). This royal hope is an important feature of Isaiah 1-35. It is notable that Isaiah 40-66 has different emphases, though this does not mean that these chapters lack messianic awareness. Isaiah 9:1-7 thus celebrates the birth of a child who will bear the responsibility of government, but who will specifically hold David's throne (Is 9:7). The identity of this child is not made clear, but though the titles given to him in Isaiah 9:6 may be conventional, they also point to one who transcends any existing ruler. The child is not seen as a redeemer himself; rather, it is Yahweh's zeal that will accomplish it, though the child will indeed bring about Yahweh's justice. Something similar can be noted in Isaiah 11:1-5, which anticipates a future ruler from the "stump of Jesse" (Is 11:1). The reference to Jesse probably is a means of looking beyond any existing descendant of David, though it is especially important in highlighting that this is a renewed Davidic line where the king has Yahweh's Spirit rest upon him, thus also stressing that what the king does is actually what Yahweh does. Similarly, the king mentioned in Isaiah 16:4b-5 is said to be active only after oppression is ended, again assuming that Yahweh is the savior for his people, but that he expresses his salvation through his king.

We have already noted Jeremiah 30:9 on this theme, but this passage is also related to Jeremiah 23:1-6. Here, the prophet criticizes other shepherds who have failed God's people. Indeed, they have scattered Yahweh's people, but he will bring them back and give them shepherds who will properly care for them. Within this pattern of leadership, Yahweh promises to raise a righteous "Branch" (see also Zech 3:8, 6:12) for David to rule as king. The name given to this king, "Yahweh is our righteousness," puns "Zedekiah," indicating that Jeremiah here looks beyond David's current descendants for an ideal descendant. This considers kingship in the context of other rulers, a theme also evident in Isaiah 32:1-8, but which again points to the king as Yahweh's gift for his restored people rather than the king being the savior figure. Daniel 9:24-27 could be understood along similar lines, but the interpretation of the figure mentioned there is disputed, and it might not refer to an individual messianic figure (Meadowcroft, 430-32, 440-46). This hope continues to be articulated after the exile as the prophets wrestle with the political structures imposed by Persia, and though David is not directly named, it is evident in texts such as Zechariah 6:9-15.

3.2. Justice and Righteousness. Because the restoration that is to come will be Yahweh's work and the king will reign on his behalf, the expectation is that the king will enact Yahweh's will for his people, a will expressed in the practice of *justice and righteousness. In so doing, the king truly represents Yahweh to his people.

This theme is particularly important in Isaiah 11:1-9; 16:4b-5. Isaiah 11:1-9 is a description of the work of a shoot from the stump of Jesse, probably extending the metaphor of the forest from Isaiah 10:33-34, where Yahweh brings down human powers that have opposed him, thus emphasizing that the work of the king takes place within a context established for him by Yahweh. That we see here a renewed Davidic kingship is apparent from the reference to the *Spirit of Yahweh in Isaiah 11:1-2. It is the endowment of the Spirit that enables the king in Isaiah 11:3-5 to practice justice and righteousness for his people, judging not by what he sees but with equity for the poor while bringing down the wicked. This is precisely what Yahweh is said to have done in Isaiah 10:33-34, so the king thus continues Yahweh's work, though it is extended beyond bringing down those powers opposed to Yahweh to also establish justice for all the earth. Similarly, in Isaiah 9:7 the king is said to establish justice and righteousness as part of the increase of his government, especially as the mechanism by which his throne is established, though again it is the zeal of Yahweh that will bring this about. The element of "counsel," which was important in Isaiah 11:2, reemerges in Isaiah 16:3, where an unnamed figure is also directed to give counsel and grant justice. The question of who is speaking at various points in Isaiah 16:1-5 is much contested (see Childs, 131-32), but if we understand it as a dialogue between representatives of Moab and Jerusalem, then Isaiah 16:1-2 could be a request by Jerusalem that Moab sue for peace to which the Moabites respond asking for counsel in Isaiah 16:3-4a. Isaiah 16:4b-5 would then explain a future hope for all, in light of the victory that Yahweh will bring, which would include justice for all through a Davidic king. The Moabites thus are pictured seeking justice and, along with Jerusalem, discover it comes through a renewed Davidic king. If Isaiah 11:10 also refers to a Davidic king (so Stromberg) to whom the nations will come, then Isaiah 16:5 provides a specific illustration of this, while also suggesting that Isaiah 11:4 refers to equity for the poor of the earth as a whole and not just the land of Israel.

The king's role in expressing Yahweh's justice and righteousness is also emphasized in two passages in Jeremiah. In Jeremiah 23:1-6 the coming Davidic king is contrasted with the "shepherds" who have destroyed the people (Jer 23:1), though this king is placed within the context of the renewal of leadership that Yahweh will bring (Jer 23:4). Expressing themes similar to Isaiah 11:3-5, the promise is that Yahweh would raise up a Davidic king who would execute justice and righteousness, though here the land discussed is the land of Israel. Again, this is a renewed Davidic king, the renewal being demonstrated in the play on the name of Zedekiah in the promised king's name, emphasizing Yahweh as the source of righteousness. These themes are further developed in Jeremiah 33:14-26. Although textually problematic (the whole passage is not in the LXX), it has significant text-linguistic links with the whole of Jeremiah 30-33 (Rata, 82-85), suggesting there are good reasons for considering it as genuinely from Jeremiah, though given its emphasis on the continuity of the Davidic covenant (Jer 33:17, 25-26), it probably is from early in the exile. The passage also refers to a perpetual covenant with the Levites (Jer 33:18), a theme that may lie behind Paul's description of Christian ministry in Romans 15:14-29. It thus was necessary to affirm during the exile that the nation's hope for righteousness and justice lay with Yahweh fulfilling his promise to David (Jer 33:15-16). Although Jerusalem rather than the king is here called "Yahweh is our righteousness" (Jer 33:16), this seems to be an outcome of the justice wrought by the Davidic king, something earlier attributed to Josiah (Jer 22:15) but that here takes on an eschatological cast.

3.3. Security. The hope of security for the people of God is closely linked to that of justice and righteousness and also flows from the fact that Yahweh is the savior. The promise of the king is then for one who rules within the context of the salvation that Yahweh has established, though in Isaiah 7:10-17 it is Ahab's failure to understand this that leads to the promise of Immanuel, so that even where the Davidic kings fail, Yahweh continues to provide his people with security symbolized in the child. It is the presence of Yahweh that brings security, and indeed Yahweh's presence is vital for all these themes. However, where the theme of justice and righteousness tends to reflect on how the people of God experience the king's reign, the theme of security is concerned with how they relate to other peoples. It is clear that both these themes depend upon and shed light on one another.

The element of security is particularly emphasized in Isaiah 9:1-7. If the passage is intended to be announced by a herald to Galilee as a result of Tiglath-pileser's conquest of the region in 734-32 BC (so Tate, 416), then this is an authentic message from Isaiah that expects a renewal of the Davidic kingdom for both the north and the south, though this should not be tied too closely to any one Davidic king, since the king's reign is "from this time forth and forevermore" (Is 9:7), though this figure is never actually called "king." That is, whatever specific elements were anticipated within the tumultuous period at the end of the northern kingdom, Isaiah looks beyond them to announce that Yahweh will bring in his reign through his king, with the oracle as a whole perhaps based upon an enthronement ritual. From this perspective, it anticipates not only the nation's joy at the defeat of the enemy but also a king whose throne names point to his status as one who reigns under Yahweh to bring peace. The king who brings justice to his people also ensures their security and prosperity (šālôm), though only because Yahweh ensures it. Something similar can be said for Jeremiah 23:6, where the promised Davidic king will be central to the security of both Israel and Judah, though again this security is ultimately provided by Yahweh, with the king as the means by which this is delivered, something that here stands in contrast to the abject condition of Judah relative to Babylon under Zedekiah.

The impact of the Assyrians is evident also in Micah 5:1-6, where it seems that several different oracles have been woven together to highlight how Yahweh would deliver his people and the role of an anticipated ruler in this. Here, Jerusalem appears to be besieged, most likely by Sennacherib in 701 BC, so that (as with Jer 23:6 a century later) the word of hope offered here emerges out of a period of extreme national distress. Like Isaiah 9:1-6, Micah refrains from calling the Davidic figure described here "king," but the reference to Bethlehem as the place of origin for this figure (Mic 5:2) clearly points to David, while the language of military success has royal overtones. These links with David also suggest that the description of the ruler as "from of old" (Mic 5:2) refers back to the origin of the Davidic dynasty. In the context of the nation being given up (reading Mic 5:3 as "one shall give them up"), the ruler is pictured as the point to which the nation returns. The ruler's task is to shepherd the people, a royal image, though he does so in Yahweh's strength, and so he brings security not only for his people but also to the ends of the earth and so delivers the nation not only from the invading Assyrians but also from "Nimrod," a reference to Babylon (Mic 5:6), though here

Babylon is subservient to Assyria. Again, confronted by external pressure, the prophet looks to Yahweh to bring deliverance but understands that deliverance to come through a Davidic figure who also brings security.

That the security brought by the Davidic king is subservient to Yahweh's is emphasized in Ezekiel 37:24-28. In a wider discussion of the return from exile and renewal of covenant, Ezekiel anticipates the nation being restored under David, who will be "prince forever," though he is also described as king. This is clearly more than the historical David, but although David reigns, it is Yahweh who brings security for them such that they can multiply, because Yahweh dwells with them.

3.4. Restored Creation. Besides providing security from enemies, the prophets anticipate a restoration of *creation that is associated with the restored Davidic figure. This goes beyond the absence of warfare and sees a restoration to the harmony of creation noted in Genesis 1—2. A clear example of this can be seen in Isaiah 11:6–9. Within the context of the Davidic references in Isaiah 11:1, 10, the text anticipates a restoration of harmony so that hunter and prey live in peaceful coexistence, with Jerusalem as the central example of this (Is 11:9). It is never stated that the king will initiate this restoration, but it is clearly linked to his reign of justice in Isaiah 11:4-5 and thus to Yahweh's Spirit. That this is so is evident from the fact that these themes are also taken up in Isaiah 65:17 in terms of Yahweh's eschatological work and without reference to a royal figure. But since the king's role is to do Yahweh's work, it is simply the case that in Isaiah 65:17 the prophet points to the ultimate source of this restoration rather than the king as Yahweh's agent. It is striking that both Isaiah 11:9 and Isaiah 65:17 emphasize the universal knowledge of Yahweh so that this knowledge, in part evidenced by the king's demonstration of justice, provides a reference point for understanding creation's restoration.

A more detailed expression of this theme occurs in Ezekiel 34:17-31. The passage occurs within the context of Ezekiel's prophecy against the nation's "shepherds" (Ezek 34:1-16). Ezekiel appears to draw on Jeremiah 23:1-7, which critiques Judah's earlier kings before anticipating the righteous reign of a Davidic king. Ezekiel here criticizes Israel's earlier kings for failing their people and not bringing them back to Yahweh. Ezekiel goes further, insisting that Yahweh would judge between the sheep yet also bring back his flock so that they would no longer be prey and would have Yahweh's servant David as "prince" (Ezek 34:23-24). Yahweh would save his people, but the Davidic figure would continue his reign. This reign would be marked by a covenant of peace (Ezek 34:25), where wild beasts would be banished, the land would receive adequate rain and there would be abundant harvests, as well as security from foes. Ezekiel thus makes explicit the link between the security associated with the king and the restoration of creation. Like Isaiah, however, Ezekiel links this to the knowledge of Yahweh, with the text twice declaring that this was so the people would know Yahweh (Ezek 34:27, 30). The abundance of covenant language here also suggests a close link with Jeremiah's new covenant (Jer 31:31-34), but Ezekiel's emphases highlight the close association of this hope with the Davidic king.

3.5. Promise of the Spirit. A final theme to note is the association of the royal figure with the *Spirit of Yahweh. In the OT, reference to the Spirit frequently is a means of pointing to Yahweh's empowering presence and not to a nascent Trinitarian theology, though it is consistent with the latter. The idea of a Spirit-empowered ruler goes back to Saul's anointing (1 Sam 10:9-16), but it is especially important because of David's experience in 1 Samuel 16:13. This provides the paradigm for the anticipated Davidic ruler. The experience of the Spirit is especially clear in Isaiah 11:1-3, where the endowment of the king enables him to live in a close relationship with Yahweh and is crucial to the king's ability to exercise Yahweh's justice and bring security. Ezekiel 37 also brings together the theme of Spirit and king, so that it is Yahweh's breath/wind/Spirit (rûah) who brings life back to the dry bones of Israel (Ezek 37:4-14) while also anticipating the just rule of a Davidic king (Ezek 37:24). Although the king's experience of the Spirit is not specific here, being part of the nation's experience, it is clear that the reign of the king is still dependent upon the work of the Spirit. Again, this emphasizes the fact that the king's role is to reign faithfully under Yahweh, and it is the enabling of the Spirit that permits this.

MICAH, BOOK OF

The prophet Micah is known only from his book and from the allusion to him in Jeremiah 26:18-19, the most remarkable reference to a prophet by another prophet in the Hebrew Bible. His name is a contraction of mikā'el, "Who is like God?" (see Mic 7:18), or possibly mikā'yēhū, "Who is like Yahweh?" (as Micaiah, 1 Kings 22:8; the form of the name in Jer 26:18 MT is close to the latter). The heading of the book, its content (e.g., Mic 1:10-16) and the Jeremiah allusion all point to Micah's having worked at least in the time of King Hezekiah, and therefore against the background of Assyrian aggression, first against the northern kingdom of Israel, then against Judah (see Israelite History). This makes him roughly a contemporary of Isaiah, also a southern prophet (cf. Is 1:1). As with Isaiah, Micah's message bears significantly upon Judah and Jerusalem, or *Zion. Indeed, one of the striking features of the book of Micah is that it shares with Isaiah the important oracle about the pilgrimage of the nations to Zion (Mic 4:1-4; cf. Is 2:2-4).

The book of Micah stands sixth in the Book of the *Twelve in the MT form, but third in the LXX (after Hosea and Amos). Perhaps surprisingly, it is the first of the Twelve to turn the spotlight of prophetic criticism directly on Judah and Jerusalem (since Hosea and Amos are spoken mainly to the northern kingdom, Joel contains hardly any criticism of its addressees, Obadiah is a salvation oracle, and Jonah has no obvious political setting). Micah's realization that even the Jerusalem *temple was not immune to divine punishment (Mic 3:12) is one of the most important theological affirmations of the book and made its mark upon the prophetic canon, as is shown by the citation of this prophecy in Jeremiah 26:18. His message is designed to avoid the worst disaster by turning people from their *sins. He is remembered as having been successful in this, at least as far as Jerusalem was concerned, in Jeremiah 26:18-19. The deliverance of Jerusalem is recorded in 2 Kings 18—19 and Isaiah 36—37.

1. Date, Setting and Composition
2. Structure and Outline
3. Major Themes
4. Micah in the Canon

1. Date, Setting and Composition.

1.1. Date and Historical Context. The prophecy of Micah is located by its superscription (Mic 1:1) in the kingdom of Judah in the latter half of the eighth century BC. As well as Hezekiah (725 or 715-687 BC), it also mentions Jotham (742-735 BC) and Ahaz (735-715 BC). These dates span the fall of the northern kingdom (722 BC) and the crisis of Sennacherib's attack on Judah in 701 BC. Scholars differ on the dating of Hezekiah's reign, some adopting an earlier chronology for him, which puts his accession at 727 or 725 BC (see Anderson and Freedman, xviii). In that case, there would be no clear evidence of Micah having worked earlier than that king. It is not possible to identify particular sayings that go back as far as Jotham's reign, though equally one cannot exclude this. As the book does not afford clear evidence of this sort, it is possible that the dating of Micah's ministry to the reigns of the kings named may function to locate him broadly in a period of history. For E. Ben Zvi the information in the superscription corresponds to the shape of the past in the imagination of the community for whom the book was written, rather than necessarily to strict factual accuracy (Ben Zvi, 18).

Micah's home town was Moresheth, probably Moresheth-Gath, not to be confused with Philistine Gath mentioned in Micah 1:10 (see Andersen and Freedman, 110, for a discussion). It was probably a fortified city in the Shephelah, the low hills west of Jerusalem, bordering on Philistine country. The places named in Micah 1:10-16, therefore, must have been familiar to him. And assuming that he did in fact minister in the period of rising Assyrian dominance and aggression, he will have felt acutely the danger to his homeland, which reached its height in 701 BC. An oracle such as Micah 5:2-6 [MT 5:1-5] appears to come from a time when the Assyrian invasion of Judah was a threat that had not yet been realized (esp. Mic 5:5-6 [MT 5:4-5]; see Cook, 114).

1.2. Composition. Because certain passages seem to presuppose an *exile, it is usually held by commentators that the book contains additions to the words of Micah. It is common to date Micah 4:1-4 to a postexilic period, for example (but see below). Indeed, there is a tendency to find genuine words of Micah in chapters 1—3 and additions from later times in chapters 4—7. Micah 7:11-20, for example, seems to presuppose an exile and also has some similarities with Isaiah 40—55. Ben Zvi points to the reference to *Babylon in Micah 4:10, which would be anachronistic in the eighth century, and other references to exile and the return of exiles (e.g., Mic 2:4, 10, 12-13; Ben Zvi, 9). E. Achtemeier concludes that Micah's words were "incorporated into a Micah book that found its final form sometime after 515 BC" (Achtemeier, 290). Some modern studies attempt to reconstruct the composition histories of specific parts of the book. J. Jeremias does this for Micah 7:8-20 in an excursus. J. A. Wagenaar traces the growth of Micah 2—5 through five stages, beginning with a handful of sayings he considers authentic to Micah in chapters 2—3, then finding levels of material from the period after the fall of Jerusalem in 587 BC, originating in circles around Jeremiah; a late exilic layer associated with Ezekiel, featuring a redactional organization of oracles of judgment and hope; a postexilic strand including Micah 4:1-5, with its vision of the nations' pilgrimage to Jerusalem; and a fifth stage in which the book as a whole was formed, at some time in the fifth or fourth centuries BC (Wagenaar, 317-26). C. S. Shaw, in contrast, noting the kind of approach exemplified by Wagenaar, offers a response to this, finding settings for speeches throughout the book in preexilic times (Shaw, 1-22). The issue, as often with the prophetic books, is how far the process of the book's composition can be traced with any confidence.

The cases of Micah 3:12 and 4:1-4 raise this issue in particular ways. First, the memory of Micah 3:12 in Jeremiah 26:18 has led scholars to ask how such a memory might have been preserved. Did the elders who remembered Micah in Jeremiah's day know the text in written form? The elders do not seem to be quoting a book. Rather, they know more about Micah than is written in the book. (They know that Hezekiah did not kill him, a fact that we do not know from any other biblical source). It may be that the sayings of Micah were passed on in more than one form, perhaps both oral and written. The oracles may have been attached at one time to stories about the prophet, of the sort that we find in Amos 7 and Hosea 1—3. If so, it seems as if only some of these have been preserved as the sayings of the prophets became fixed into the book forms that we now know. (See Andersen and Freedman, 111-16, for more detailed discussion).

Second, Micah 4:1-4 raises a similar question. How did it come about that two almost identical oracles could find their way into two different prophetic books? The main options, all espoused in the modern critical era, are: (1) The saying originated with one of the prophets, and was taken over by the other (or it has been introduced into the other's book by redactors); (2) The saying was already known to both; (3) The oracle is original to neither prophet but was introduced into both books by later redactors (see Hillers, 52, for a brief account).

The last of these options is often adopted, because the thought in the passage is similar to Second Isaiah, and because it is supposed that eschatological sayings are likely to be postexilic. R. Mason puts it thus:

It is . . . idle to ask whether 4:1-4 (= Isa 2:2-4) is "originally" by either Isaiah or Micah. It is by neither; but its presence in both books shows how the prophetic collections were treated in order to make them relevant to later generations (Mason, 49).

The placement of Micah 4:1-4 immediately after Micah 3:9-12, reversing the words of judgment there point by point, Mason thinks is the work of postexilic editors who are convinced that the time of judgment is past and the time of salvation has come.

This point about the structure of Micah 3:9—4:4 is perfectly valid. However, each of the other possibilities above can be taken seriously too. Of these, it is simplest to suppose that the oracle was taken over by one prophet from the other. There is no reason to think this might not have been considered legitimate (a similar duplication occurs in Obadiah 1-7 and Jer 49:9-10). And, as Andersen and Freedman point out, neither the language nor the ideas in the passage are demonstrably postexilic (Andersen and Freedman, 424). On the basis of a detailed comparison of the textual differences between the two, they cautiously favor the view that Micah is the original (Andersen and Freedman, 423). B. Waltke comes to the same conclusion (Waltke 1988, 170-75; 2009, 213-29). J. Blenkinsopp leans to a likelier original setting in Isaiah, while noting the extreme difficulty of deciding the issue (Blenkinsopp, 190). Ben Zvi draws attention to the range of opinions that have been advanced, without adopting any, but rather observes that the essential point is that in its context here it is entirely "Micah," in the sense that "it is integral to the book, it fits its broader (textual) environment, and that it clearly communicates a sense of coherence within the larger set of readings in chs. 4-5 and with its preceding unit" (Ben Zvi, 102).

Like the case of Micah 3:12, this text also suggests that prophetic oracles had an existence apart from the books in which they found a place. Oracles were collected into books in a way that is not fully known to us. This unique occurrence of the same oracle in two books gives some indirect evidence of the process. It is an instance of an oracle that was presumably originally associated with one prophet being included also in the book of another, albeit integrated carefully into that book's discourse and themes. This was hardly accidental, since in both Isaiah and Micah it has a function in the structure and theology of that book (see Formation of the Prophetic Books).

2. Structure and Outline.

Commentators vary considerably in their attempts to break Micah down into satisfactory subsections. M. Jacobs finds that commentators have divided the book into between two and six sections (Jacobs, 60). It is common, however, to divide it into three: either Micah 1—2; 3—5; 6—7 (Smith, 8; cf. Allen, 257-61) or Micah 1—3; 4—5; 6—7 (Andersen and Freedman, 7; Mason, 13-14). Sometimes Micah 7:18-20 is considered a separate concluding section (e.g., Ben Zvi, 4). The former threefold division may be seen to produce a pattern in which each section consists of a judgment passage—followed by an assurance of salvation (Mic 1:1—2:11 and 2:12-13; 3:1-12 and 4:1—5:15; and 6:1—7:7 and 7:8-20 (Achtmeier, 288; see also Hillers, 8). The latter can yield a slightly different structure: Micah 1—3 (judgment); 4—5 (hope); 6—7 (judgment and hope). Differences like this can depend on how a particular passage is interpreted. For example, Micah 2:12-13 has been read either as an oracle of salvation or of judgment, or it has even been moved to a different point in the book because it is seen as out of place (Jacobs, 83-84, 193). Ben Zvi's five- or six-fold division, namely, Micah 1:1 (Superscription); Micah 1:2—2:13; 3:1-12; 4:1—5:14; 6:1—7:17; 7:18-20 (Conclusion), has the effect of heightening the significance of Micah 3, with its explanation of the fall of Jerusalem in terms of misguided leadership (Mic 3—4).

2.1. Structure. No structure of Micah is perfect or commands agreement. In the outline of the book's structure that follows, I follow the first pattern given above:

Micah 1:1—2:13: Witnessing the just judgment on Samaria and Judah—but a gathering.

Micah 3:1—5:15 [MT 5:14]: Zion condemned—but redeemed!

Micah 6:1—7:20: Controversy and lament—but pardon!

2.2. Outline.

2.2.1. Micah 1:1—2:13: Witnessing the Just Judgment on Samaria and Judah—But a Gathering.

Micah 1:2. Micah's words begin with an appeal to the *nations to witness God's judgment (cf. Deut 32:1). This affirms that the whole earth belongs to him (cf. Ps 24:1). Curiously, the judgment is directed "against you," that is, the nations themselves. The point seems to be that in God's judgment on his own people all the nations are somehow involved. This fits with the vision in Micah 4:1-4, where the nations come to a restored Zion to see Yahweh there. Yet in other texts they are clearly under his judgment (Mic 7:16-17; cf. Mic 4:11-12).

Micah thinks of God as speaking "from his holy temple," that is, in Jerusalem (cf. Amos 1:2). Yet Jerusalem and Judah themselves are accused and under threat from invasion by an enemy as a punishment from God. Zion-Jerusalem appears elsewhere in the book under the banners of both judgment and *salvation (see 3.4 below).

Micah 1:3-16. The background is the Assyrian attacks in the late eighth century, including the fall of Samaria (the northern kingdom) in 722 BC and the destruction of many of the cities of Judah by Sennacherib in 701 BC (see Israelite History). There is an oracle against Samaria in Micah 1:6-7. Then attention turns to Jerusalem in Micah 1:10-16, as the enemy closes in by a western route. This could be the attack recorded in 2 Kings 18:13-16, which forced King Hezekiah to pay tribute. But there is not enough detail to make this certain, and it could come from a time before the fall of Samaria (Andersen and Freedman, 113).

As a cause of the judgment the religious sins of the people are emphasized, and the same prostitution metaphor is used as in Hosea (Mic 1:7). Micah is depicted as suffering personally because of the burden of his message in a way that is reminiscent of the later Jeremiah (Mic 1:8-9; cf. Jer 8:22—9:3 [MT 9:2]; see also Jer 30:12).

Micah 2:1-11. Micah takes further the reason for God's judgment, now mainly oppression of the poor. The powerful are accused of ruthless greed as well as pride (like Is 2) and falsehood (like Jer 9) (see Social Justice). God's judgment meets the sin point by point: the powerful rob others of their "inheritance" (as Ahab robbed Naboth, 1 Kings 21); so God will destroy the "inheritance" that is Israel itself (Mic 2:4: a different Hebrew word from Mic 2:2, yet close in meaning. The two are used in parallel in Deut. 18:1). Micah 2:6-11 shows Micah in a kind of dialogue with opponents, who apparently argue that judgment will not come (Mic 2:6; see Jacobs, 113-14). This is similar to Jeremiah's dispute with "false prophets" (Jer 23; 28). The motif of "falsehood" is also echoed in Jeremiah (Mic 2:11; cf. Jer 9:3 [MT 9:2]).

Micah 2:12-13. The theme of "gathering" is surprising after Micah 2:1-11 (some put it after Micah 4:7). But we find words of salvation coming at early stages in other prophetic books, before the full message of doom has been unfolded (e.g., Hos 1—3; Is 2:2-4; Jer 3:12-18). The imagery itself is hard to pin down. But the passage is part of the pattern of alternation of judgment and salvation sayings (see 2 above).

Scholars have commented on the odd sequence of metaphors in these verses. The "gathering in” to the safety of a sheepfold in Micah 2:12 is hard to relate to the “breaking out” in Micah 2:13. Is it the same shepherd-image, or is the picture now a military one? And does it relate to the “breaking out” of a siege, or more generally to God’s rule in a future time? The difficulty of interpreting individual sayings of this sort is one reason why it is hard to establish settings for prophetic passages. (Contrast the comments of Smith, 28-29, and Hillers, 39.)

2.2.2. Micah 3:1—5:15 (MT 5:14): Zion Condemned—But Redeemed!

Micah 3:1-12. “Heads,” “rulers,” “prophets,” “seers,” “diviners” and “priests” come under attack here, that is, all who exercise power. They are accused of savage oppression. When the poor are denied the justice they should receive from those in authority, it is as good as committing the worst kind of violence against them (Mic 3:2-3). (For denial of justice in the courts, see also Amos 5:7, 15).

As a result, Zion itself stands under judgment (Mic 3:12). This was shocking to those who believed that Yahweh dwelt in the temple in Jerusalem, and would not abandon his people (Mic 3:11). It is the first full frontal attack on Jerusalem and the temple in the Book of the Twelve, and it comes from a prophet who began with Yahweh speaking “from his holy temple” (Mic 1:2). Micah is addressing the hard question about the nature of Yahweh’s relationship with Israel. The ancient *covenant with David involved a promise that David’s son Solomon would build a temple for Yahweh and that the dynasty thus established would last “forever” (2 Sam 7:13). Micah plays his part in working out how this promise related to historical events, and also to the covenantal strain that emphasized the need for the chosen people to pursue justice. His words are quoted a century later in defence of Jeremiah, who made a similar prophecy to this (Jer. 26:16-19, cf. vv. 2-6).

Micah 4:1-13. The theme changes abruptly again to salvation. Micah 4:1-4 is very similar to Isaiah 2:2-4. Micah looks beyond the present crisis to a time when nations shall come to Jerusalem to learn the tôrâ (“law” or “instruction”) of Yahweh, and there will be peace between them. (This tôrâ does not necessarily equate with the Torah of Moses, as in the canonical form of the Pentateuch, but rather to the ongoing teaching of Yahweh’s words, as mediated by both prophets and priests) (see Law). In Micah the passage makes a stark contrast with Micah 3, especially Micah 3:9-12. In R. Mason’s words, this is “no coincidence.” The condemnation in Micah 3:9-12 “is followed immediately by a promise that this judgment will be reversed in every particular” (Mason, 49).

Micah 4:5 sounds a change in direction, where the nations are still worshipping their own gods. The continuation (Mic 4:6-13) is in contrast to the vision of nations at peace, for now the image is of the people of Zion rescued from exile in Babylon, and their conquerors defeated. Micah 4:13 contrasts with Micah 4:3. The picture is of a *remnant” (Mic 4:7) returning after exile. The thought here is a little like that of Isaiah 40—55.

Micah 5:1-15 (MT 4:14—5:14). Micah 5:1 is obscure, but it seems to refer to a siege in which the ruler of Judah is humiliated (Achtmeier, 338). This image is immediately reversed with a prophecy of a future ruler (Mic 5:2-4 [MT 5:1-3]). The word “king” is avoided here, yet the reference to Bethlehem makes us think of David, the son of Jesse from Bethlehem (1 Sam 16:1, 18; cf. Gen 35:19). The shepherd metaphor was widely used for kings in the OT and in the ancient Near East (Jer 23:1-6; Ezek 34), and it also evokes memories of the shepherd David. The historic line of kings will come to an end, but God will raise up a new king. This will be after a period of *suffering (Mic 5:3 [MT 5:2], probably referring to the exile). The ruler who is proclaimed here will be a true shepherd, who will feed his flock and bring peace. (For peace as a feature of the messianic kingdom, see also Is 9:7 [MT 9:6]).

The restoration of Judah (or its “remnant,” Mic 5:7 [MT 5:6]) will mean that it will prevail over the nations that had oppressed it (Mic 4:5-9 [MT 4:4-8]). Micah 5:10-15 is a direct word of judgment against those nations.

2.2.3. Micah 6:1—7:20: Controversy and Lament—But Pardon!

Micah 6:1-5. The final section of the prophecy turns back to judgment. It opens with a saying in the familiar style that is found in other prophetic texts (cf. Hos 4:1-10; Is 3:13-15; Jer 2:4-13). The form is sometimes called the controversy, or lawsuit, pattern, because of the dominant word here in Micah 6:1-2 (rib). It is better termed a “covenant accusation.” It is not a rigid form, but used freely by the prophet (Andersen and Freedman, 510-11). Yahweh recalls the *exodus from Egypt itself, and Israel's leaders whom he appointed (cf. Amos 2:9-10). He then mentions Balaam, a sort of opposite of Moses. Together they stand for true and false prophecy. The Balaam incident shows that God was determined to save Israel, and that he could not be stopped by any other power (in this case an enchanter's spell, Num 22-24). "Shittim to Gilgal" is the last stage of Israel's journey to the promised land. Shittim was a place where Israel sinned (Num 25:1), so here too God hints that he brought them to the land even in spite of their sin. He argues for these reasons that they should have kept faith with him.

The covenant accusation has often been thought to have a special form with a legal or cultic background. Micah 6:1-4 may be compared with Psalm 50, which is said to be a fuller example of the form. (Important treatments are found in Huffmon; Clements 1965; Nielsen; Cook, 75-76. See also Andersen and Freedman, 508-11, for a cautious review of this approach to rib texts, in which they argue that the prophets used traditions freely, rather than reproducing rigid forms.) The specific covenantal background of the rib has been questioned, in line with the tendency in scholarship to date the fully developed conditional form of covenant to the Deuteronomistic movement, which is later than the eighth-century prophets (Clements 1975).

Micah 6:6-8. Micah poses questions rhetorically as if from would-be worshipers. Yet the tone is ironic, and the way the questions are asked suggests the answers: "Will the LORD be pleased with thousands of rams?"—of course not! The thought behind these questions is the same one that we find in Hosea 6:6; Amos 5:21-24, as well as Psalms 40:6 [MT 40:7]; 50:7-15. The point is that the formalities of worship are nothing in themselves.

Micah's summary of true religion (Mic 6:8), in contrast, is famous. It does not consist in any kind of religious performance. Instead, it stresses doing justice (mišpāt, like Amos 5:24), showing "kindness" (hesed, like Hos 6:6), and it adds a touch of Micah's own, a humble walk with God. "Walking," together with the associated "ways" and "paths," is a common OT metaphor for the moral life or the life lived with God, already used by Micah in 4:2 (cf. Pss 23:3; 25:4, 9-10; and Brown, 31-53). There is a further echo of Micah's language in Deuteronomy

10:12-13. Micah 6:8 implies that the people had enough knowledge already to know what true religion was. The form of address, "O mortal" (NRSV, that is, "man," in the sense of "human being," ʾādām) suggests that human beings in general have a knowledge of God's basic commands and are subject to them.

Micah 6:9-16. A renewed accusation of injustice leads to a threat of "desolation" (Mic 6:13, 16; cf. Jer 19:8). Other threatened punishments have an ironic ring about them (like Hag 1:6) that remind of the "futility curses" of Deuteronomy (Mic 6:14-15; cf. Deut 28:38-44).

Micah 7:1-7. The last accusation in the book is a *lament, in which Micah again expresses his own anguish at the falsehood in the land (Mic 7:1, 7; cf. Mic 1:8; Jer 8:22-9:9 [MT 9:8]). In doing so he gives a glimpse of the prophet's faithfulness and his rejection of his people's sin (cf. Hos 9:14). (This strand in prophetic thinking reaches its height in Jeremiah's so-called Confessions; e.g., Jer 11:18-23; 12:1-6; 15:15-21.) His attitude of "waiting" for the LORD is exemplary for a people who look for deliverance (Mic 7:7; cf. Hab 2:1-4).

Micah 7:8-20. The final turn in the book is again to *salvation. The voice in Micah 7:8-10 appears to come from one who is in exile but who knows that deliverance will come. Return from exile is assured (Mic 7:11-13). A prayer for Yahweh to "shepherd" his people (Mic 7:14) echoes the "shepherding" of the messianic ruler (Mic 5:4 [MT 5:3]). The nations who opposed Israel shall be brought low (Mic 7:15-17; cf. Is 2:9-10). Yet there is a hint of them turning to the LORD (Mic 7:17). Here again there are similarities to Isaiah 40-55, which also had visions of salvation for the nations, or at least their recognition that Yahweh is God (Is 49:22-26; Achtemeier, 290). But the passage must also be understood within the structure of Micah. In Micah 1:2 the nations' "seeing" was a witness to judgment on Israel; now they witness God's salvation of his people. They in turn are judged but turn to Yahweh for salvation.

The book closes (Mic 7:18-20) with a praise to Yahweh. The rhetorical question, "Who is a god like you?" (Mic 7:18), is a play on Micah's name (see the preamble, above). The uniqueness of Yahweh, also a major theme of Isaiah 40-55, is in his willingness to forgive and show compassion. This theological high point in the book puts Micah close to Hosea (Hos 11:8-11).

3. Major Themes.

The book of Micah, like other prophetic books, seeks to understand the destiny of *Israel in the light of both Israel's theological heritage and its historical experience of adversity and judgment. The elements of the book's theology are the familiar themes of sin and judgment, exile from land and the hope of salvation. The way in which these are considered to arise in the book varies with the critical approaches taken. Thus, in the strongly *redactional method espoused by Wagenaar, he finds a progressive theologizing of judgment and salvation, beginning with words of judgment directed against oppressive landholders, and developing through to a rationalization of God's dealings with Israel through the Babylonian exile and restoration from it. In contrast, for example, Cook's analysis embeds much of the discourse of Micah in what he calls the "Sinai theology," which had ancient sources and which fed ultimately into the Deuteronomic stream.

In another modern trend, there is attention to the *rhetorical form of the language in the book (Shaw, Jacobs). Jacobs examines the relationship between hope and judgment as part of her search for coherence in the book's discourse, and aims to make sense of both the individual parts and of the relationship between coherence within the parts and that of the book as a whole. Her reading is set against the background of a history that goes beyond the time of Micah to the exile, but is distinct from the older redactional method in its understanding of the text's coherence.

Finally, mention should be made of E. Runions, who brings a cultural criticism to bear on critical attempts to establish coherence, showing how cultural assumptions and images affect perceptions of problems and resolutions. In critical dialogue with Shaw (191-97), Runions draws attention, for example, to the case of feminized cities of Samaria and Jerusalem, which are readily cast respectively in the roles of contagious prostitute and "damsel in distress" rescued by a male hero. Her reading resists unities and solutions that she regards as unduly and unwittingly influenced by the reader's ideology (see Feminist Interpretation).

The question of how much the prophets were inheritors of theological tradition and how much the books that bear their names contribute and testify to the development of the theology of the OT remains contested (see Prophecy and Tradition). For example, some form of belief in Yahweh's election of Israel is evidently implied in Micah 6:1-5, an instance of the so-called lawsuit pattern, or rib (as noted above, see Huffmon; Cook, 75-76). But how much can be concluded from this about what form of election theology Micah knew is not obvious and depends on how one evaluates a whole range of evidence both within Micah and elsewhere. However, in highlighting theological emphases in the book, it will be useful to start with five topics identified by Cook, who sees Micah as heir to Israel's "Sinai theology." Cook organizes the book's theology around the basic notion of Israel's tenancy of the land.

3.1. Election. The people of Israel are Yahweh's "elected vassals" (Cook, 71). The central evidence for this is the lawsuit in Micah 6:1-5 and its continuation in Micah 6:6-8. God's controversy (rib) with his people depends on an assumption that they owed him something (Mic 6:1-2). That obligation is traced here to his deliverance of their ancestors from slavery in Egypt (Ex 19:4-6; 20:2). The phrase "my people" itself (Mic 6:3) has echoes in the exodus narrative (Ex 3:7; 5:1), and the allusion to the Balaam story (Num 22-24) also points to the Pentateuchal traditions of exodus and progress toward the land. Cook finds several linguistic echoes of the exodus narrative in Micah's words, and for him it is significant that Israel's obligation to Yahweh is grounded here in the Sinai tradition of the exodus rather than in the concepts of covenant associated with David or Zion (Cook, 75-76).

3.2. Land as Inheritance. The people possess the *land by inheritance. In Micah 2:1-5, 6-11, Micah's accusation of the oppressive landowners is based in the notion that ordinary Israelites, as families and kinship groups, had a stake in the land as an inheritance (naḥālâ, as frequently in Deuteronomy, e.g. Deut 4:21; Cook, 81-82). For ordinary people, such a stake in the land meant in practice their security to enjoy a place to dwell without threat from powerful neighbors (Mic 2:9). Micah is opposing the progressive annexation of land and property in Israel by a powerful elite, who were in effect clients of the increasingly centralized royal establishment, at the expense of the traditional family lineages of Israel. This analysis of Micah's social critique goes back to A. Alt and is adopted, with variations, by J. A. Dearman (45-48; cf. Cook, 81-84). The point of theological importance is that Micah has a specific theological view of land possession in Israel that attributes the benefits of Israel's inheritance of the land to the people as a whole and according to their families. To assert rights to land by virtue of overwhelming *wealth or power was therefore a violation of Israel's status as heirs to a land given by Yahweh (to put it in Deuteronomistic terms), and an offence against justice and against Yahweh.

3.3. Yahweh Alone. If the people are "vassals" who hold the land as a fiefdom from Yahweh, Israel's loyalty is to Yahweh alone, or to keep the metaphor, he is the true owner of the land and its sole "landlord" (cf. Lev 25:23). The unique claim of Yahweh on Israel is expressed in Micah 1:2-7, in terms which bring the southern Micah very close to the northern Hosea (esp. in Mic 1:7; cf. Hos 2:2-13 [MT 2:4-15]; Cook, 92-93; Allen, 273). The insistence on separation from other gods continues in Micah 5:10-15, in a passage sometimes thought to be later than Micah because of its Deuteronomistic overtones (Mic 5:12-14, cf. Deut 7:5; 16:21; 18:9-14). However, the thought is anticipated in Micah 1:2-7 and has echoes elsewhere in the pre-exilic prophets (Hos 13:2).

3.4. Conditional Possession. As we saw, the lawsuit pattern in Micah 6:1-5 was an indication of obligations that came with elect status. The continuation of that passage in Micah 6:6-8 is one of the best-known texts in the prophets, expressing the fundamental requirement of Israel, that they "do justice" (mīšpāt), and "love kindness" (hesed), and "walk humbly with your God." Micah has this in common with other pre-exilic prophets, who also strongly insist on the futility of formal *worship apart from a deep commitment to loving and doing what is right (cf. Is 1:10-17; Hos 6:6) (see Liturgy and Cult). The mirror opposite of loving what is right is in Micah 2:1-2, with its echo of the tenth commandment (Ex 20:17) and its understanding of the relationship between desire and the action, in this case for evil. The criticism of worship severed from *ethics need not be taken as a repudiation of sacrificial worship in itself, however, but rather as part of an expression of the nature of Yahweh worship in its full dimensions.

Other passages also point to conditionality in Israel's relationship with Yahweh and its enjoyment of the benefits of the land. Micah 6:14-15 consists of so-called futility curses, where all attempts to secure well-being are frustrated (see Blessings and Curses). The passage is reminiscent of the covenant curses in Deuteronomy 28:38-40 (Cook, 100-101), and in a similar way strikes an ironic chord in the context of the belief that Yahweh has given his people the land for their good, a central tenet of Deuteronomy's covenantal theology. But the most remarkable instance of Micah's conditional theology is his awareness that not even Jerusalem with its temple carries a permanent guarantee of Yahweh's favor (Mic 3:9-12; Cook, 102-3). The logic of this passage is very similar to that of Jeremiah's famous "temple sermon" (Jer 7:3-15; also in Jer 26:2-6). It is in the context of that sermon that some of the elders of Judah recall this saying of Micah, and recognize that a word spoken against the Jerusalem temple might indeed be a *word of God. The debate that followed that sermon, as recorded in Jeremiah 26, exposes the issues that attend the preaching of both prophets. Sections of the audience of Jeremiah evidently think that Jeremiah has in effect blasphemed by daring to utter a word against the temple (Jer 26:7-11), but others recognize that this cannot be so, citing the older prophecy of Micah and its vindication in the sparing of Jerusalem (Jer 26:16-19). (The reference is to the miraculous deliverance of the city from the siege laid to it by Sennacherib's Assyrian forces in 701 BC; 2 Kings 18—19; Is 36—37.) At stake is the nature of the covenant. There is evidence, from Jeremiah 26 and elsewhere, of a belief that Jerusalem and its temple would always be protected from destruction by Yahweh on the grounds that it was his chosen dwelling place (e.g., Ps 46; Is 31:4-5). The word of Micah testifies to an understanding, long before the temple actually fell, that Yahweh's commitment to Israel did not separate the promise of continuance from his requirement both of loyalty to him and of the practice of justice in the land. The latter suggests affinities with Sinai traditions rather than those of Zion (cf. Mic 3:11 with Ex 23:8; Deut 16:18-19; see Cook, 104).

3.5. Just Rule. The question of Jerusalem also raises that of the nature of rule in Israel, since there is a close connection in Israel's traditions between the Jerusalem temple and the Davidic royal house (2 Sam 7; Ps 132). Micah's attitude to this is not entirely clear. The crucial text is Micah 5:2-6 [MT 5:1-5], a traditionally messianic passage heralding a ruler from Bethlehem Ephrathah. The prophecy uses royal language ("shepherding," Mic 5:4), and the vision of a reign of *peace has certain echoes of the Davidic prophecy in Isaiah 9:5-6. On one view, Micah here refers to none other than King Hezekiah (Shaw, 222-23). This is plausible because Hezekiah is remembered in 2 Kings 18—19 as a righteous king who averted a national disaster by his prayer and trust in Yahweh. The passage may be taken quite differently, however, because it avoids the term "king" (melek), preferring the more general "ruler" (môšēl). Bethlehem too may be thought to stand in opposition to Jerusalem, representing the traditional clans of Judah in contrast to the ruling classes around the king in the capital. On this view the predicted ruler is actually contrasted with Hezekiah, because of the (equally valid) memory that in his day Judah had in fact been overrun by the Assyrians (Cook, 118). This debate is hard to resolve. There is some danger of unnecessarily polarizing, as between Davidic and non-Davidic, centralizing and locally based authority. But it can be said that the text holds out the hope of a victorious ruler, who may be called "messianic," and whose reign of peace must be understood to stand in contrast to all self-serving, overweening power, whether Israelite or foreign (see Messiah).

One narrative illustration of the kind of power Micah rejects is provided by King Ahab, from a century before. Ahab craves the property of his neighbour Naboth, and egged on by his wife Jezebel, Ahab allows the man to be conspired against and murdered, and then takes his chance to get what he wanted (1 Kings 21:1-16). The story corresponds to several of the themes we have observed: the desire for a just ruler, the concern for justice in the way in which property is held, and the dangerous relationship between the craving of the heart and murderous action.

3.6. The Prophecy as a Whole. The Book of Micah, like other prophetic books, is diverse in form and expression. Some of this diversity consists in the prophet's use of a range of types of speech to create rhetorical effects. He vividly portrays people leaving towns in his home region to go into exile (Mic 1:10-16). He accuses people of *sin with great insight (Mic 2:1-2), and sometimes with savage imagery (Mic

3:1-3) or irony (Mic 2:11). He thinks the unthinkable, that Zion itself should be razed to the ground, as if there had never been a city there (Mic 3:12). He appeals to reason, with his "covenant accusation" (Mic 4:1-4). He conducts rhetorical "dialogues" with his hearers in order to arrest attention and then drive home a point (Mic 6:6-8). And he utters a lament (Mic 7:1-7). Like Jeremiah's "confessions," this lament no doubt reflects his own anguish at the terrible message he is proclaiming, but it is also part of his proclamation. His grief over sin is at the same time an accusation of sin. Yet the factor of personal lamentation is a powerfully persuasive device. It also says something important about the role and influence of the prophet—to be one who embodies and reminds of the true path of covenant obedience. The message of Micah cannot be evaluated apart from a recognition of the prophet's personal investment in proclaiming God's word and his desire to see judgment averted.

The message itself, as we have seen, has notes of accusation and coming judgment on one hand and of the hope of salvation on the other. It stands as a testimony not just to fluctuating hopes and fears as the fortunes of Israel and Judah change, but to theological reflection on how the God of Israel can come to his people in judgment, and yet still be found to be the source of future hope. One recent treatment of this theme is that of Jacobs. She argues that hope and judgment may be "aspects of the same reality" (Jacobs, 219). A reading of the book of Micah points to the reality of hope, not in the sense of an unrealistic belief that adversity, or judgment, can simply be avoided; rather, "Hope may also be constituted in the awareness of the character of God," as in Micah 7:18-20 (Jacobs, 220). This is a hope that can reckon with the reality of judgment, but believe, on the grounds of God's character and historic commitment to Israel, that judgment may not be the end (Jacobs, 221).

The balance of possible effects of the prophecy on an audience may change, however, with new situations. People who have had to endure the terrors and losses at the hands of both Assyrians and Babylonians may need to be encouraged to hope in God for restoration and salvation, while those who have been restored to temple and land after exile may need to go on hearing the words of judgment in order to keep it from falling back into false trust—a big part of the problem Micah (and others) addressed in the first place. However, the salvation oracles also continue to be needed, for even after the temple was rebuilt, the community had trying times when God's promises seemed to have been only partially fulfilled. Mason compares postexilic Micah with Chronicles:

So, after the exile, the faith of the people was stimulated by a renewal of the prophetic promises of old, but with a pastoral call to the community to keep the faith during the present time of waiting (Mason, 50).

4. Micah in the Canon.

Micah's significance in the canon has much to do with the book's attitude to Jerusalem and kingship. Its record of Micah's word of warning against presumption on Yahweh's favor on the grounds of Israel's possession of the temple (Mic 3:9-12) took an important place in the witness of the prophetic canon with its preservation in the Book of Jeremiah (Jer 26:18-19). Micah's word therefore grasps the problem that comes to expression not only throughout the prophetic books, but also other parts of the OT canon, especially the books of Samuel and Kings, and the Psalms, namely in what way might the ancient covenant of Yahweh with Israel be considered still to stand, in the light of his judgment on them, with its climax in the destruction of the temple? Micah's influence on Jeremiah in particular presumably stems from this, but goes further, as shown by Andersen and Freedman (27; drawing on Cha), who find numerous echoes of Micah in Jeremiah, for example: Micah 1:8 (Jer 4:8); Micah 1:9, 14 (Jer 15:18); Micah 1:10, 16 (Jer 6:26; 7:29); Micah 2:4 (Jer 9:18); Micah 3:5 (Jer 6:14); Micah 3:11-12 (Jer 7:4-15); Micah 4:9-10 (Jer 4:31; 6:24); Micah 7:1-2 (Jer 5:1); Micah 7:5-6 (Jer 9:4-5 [MT 9:3-4]).

Paradoxically, Micah also contains one of the OT's most memorable prophecies of a glorious future for Zion-Jerusalem, in its vision of the nations' pilgrimage (Mic 4:1-4). While it is the Book of Isaiah that exhibits the most elaborate and profound reflection on the theme of Zion, Micah nevertheless contributed to the theological thinking whereby the symbolism of Jerusalem could be sustained through and beyond the loss of the temple in 587 BC and given eschatological significance in the hope of an ultimate inclusion of the nations in God's salvation.

Finally, Micah's prophecy about a ruler from Bethlehem is quoted in Matthew 2:3, in answer to Herod's question, prompted by that of the magi, as to where the Messiah was to be born. The birth of Jesus in Bethlehem has an echo of David's origins there, and forms part of Matthew's demonstration of Jesus' fulfilment of messianic prophecy. At the same time, it fits well with Micah's concept of the ideal ruler, who is distinguished from self-serving power, now in the form of King Herod. Micah anticipates a kingdom of peace extending to the ends of the earth, and this is now proclaimed with the coming of the Messiah Jesus (see Prophets in the New Testament).

MOUNTAIN IMAGERY

Mountains and hills are poignant figures of speech in the prophets. The imagery is multivalent, bringing to mind the land, divine presence, idolatry, future blessing and so forth. To appreciate the function of mountains as figures of speech, one must be sensitive to how the prophets used poetic imagery.

The primary Hebrew terms were har ("mountain") and gib'â ("hill"). The words appear in parallel poetic lines, suggesting that the domains of meaning overlap. English versions usually translate gib'â as "hill," but har is glossed as "hill" or "mountain." The NIV, for example, translates har as "hill," "hill country" or "hillside" approximately one-third of the time and as "mount," "mountain" or "mountain top" approximately two-thirds of the time. Both har and gib'â are used as figures of speech.

4. Mountains as Images of Criticizing and Energizing

5. Interpreting Mountain Imagery

1. The Culture of Mountains.

In order to understand what mountains signified, we begin by reviewing the significance of mountains for the Israelites.

In Palestine, mountains and *wilderness are the two most prominent geographical features. At almost any location, one is either on a mountain or can see a mountain. In contrast to the barrenness and disarray of deserts, mountains suggested abundance and stability (Ps 65:12-13; Prov 8:25). But mountains could also be obstacles and places of danger.

Mountains carried special meaning throughout the ancient world. Various ancient Near Eastern sources attest to mountains as the primary sources of commodities. Timber, stone and marble came from mountains; gold, silver and copper were mined in mountains (Waldman). Streams flowed from mountains (Jer 18:14). Pasture was found in mountains and valleys. Cedars from the mountains of Lebanon were especially renowned (1 Kings 5:6, 10; Hag 1:8).

Mountains came to be places of religious power, the intersection of heaven and earth (Ex 19:18; 24:17). Since the holy presence seemed to be geographical rather than personal or communal, the most sacred space was on the highest mountains (Eliade, 41-46). People went to mountains to *worship and to make requests of the gods (Is 30:29; Jer 17:26).

Similar to Mount Olympus, whose summit was the residence of the Greek gods, Mount Zaphon in northern Syria was home to the Canaanite god Baal-Hadad (cf. Is 14:13). Victory celebrations and banqueting of the gods occurred frequently on Baal's mount. The mountain acquired cosmic significance, for the gods met there and made decisions that affected the whole cosmos (Clifford, 57-79, 97, 192) (see Divine Council).

From early in the history of the Israelites, mountains were the loci of pivotal encounters with Yahweh, as Abraham, Moses, Joshua, Elijah and others experienced (Gen 22:9-12; cf. Ex 3:1-4:17; 17:6-7; Deut 32:48-50; Josh 8:30-35; 1 Kings 18:30-39; 2 Chron 3:1). God became closely identified with mountains: "Yahweh is a god of the mountains" (1 Kings 20:28). Mountains became holy ground (Ex 19:12-13a, 23b).

In the Gospels, mountains continued to be featured places of divine events, such as when two prophets, Moses and Elijah, appeared on the mount where Jesus was transfigured (Mt 17:1-13; Mk 9:2-13; Lk 9:28-36).

For several centuries Mount Sinai was the mountain of the Israelites, and for good reason. There, Yahweh revealed himself to Moses as never before, turning the mountain into a volcano (Ex 19:18-19), adding decrees to the *covenant and ratifying it (Ex 19:5-8; 34:10-14), inscribing the Ten Commandments on stone tablets, permitting Moses to see his back (Ex 33:23), venting his anger when the desert wanderers worshiped a golden calf, and affecting Moses so much that his face was terrifyingly radiant (Ex 34:29-30). Although Sinai is rarely referred to by name in the prophets (Paran [Hab 3:3]; Horeb [Mal 4:4]), the *law of Moses and the covenant relationship provided the underlying framework of the prophetic ministry. The objective was to rescue the people from a return to Egypt (Deut 28:68; Jer 43:7; 44:12; Hos 8:13; 9:3) and to bring them back to Sinai and its covenant.

When the ark of the covenant was placed in the holy of holies, Mount *Zion became the holiest of mountains. Yahweh manifesting his presence in a *temple on a high place precisely fit Israelite expectations of their God. In contrast to Sinai, which kept the people at bay (Ex 19:12-13, 21-24), the temple mount welcomed pilgrims (Songs of Ascent [Pss 120—134]).

Remarkably, a psalmist and a prophet, employing poetic license, described Mount Zion as if it were Zaphon: “the city of our God, his holy mountain . . . Mount Zion, the peaks of Zaphon” (Ps 48:1-2 [cf. Is 14:13]). It probably is too much to conclude, however, that “the application to Zion of the name of Baal’s mountain suggests a large degree of continuity between Israel and Canaan” (Levenson, 1099).

In the OT Wisdom literature, mountains and hills evoked images of antiquity, stability, refuge, provision and primeval order (VanGemeren, 481-82). But mountains could also signify *wrath, as in the quaking of mountains on the *Day of the Lord (Ps 18:7), or redemption, as in the skipping of mountains on the day of deliverance (Ps 114:4).

2. Mountains as Figures of Speech.

Given the prominence of mountains in Palestine and given the importance of events and people associated with mountains, it is not surprising that mountains became a prophetic mode of apprehension and a rhetorical device. If the prophets wanted to refer to the land, mountains were their image of choice. If they wanted to refer to the people, they could do so via mountains. With poetic license and imagination, the prophets gave mountains meaning far beyond literal, geographical phenomena.

2.1. Metonymy. The land was central to Israelite religion, and mountains became a figure of speech for the *land of the covenant: “I will crush the Assyrian in my land, and I will trample him on my mountains” (Is 14:25a [cf. Is 25:10; 37:32; 57:13; 65:9; Ezek 19:9; 35:12; 37:22]); “I will weep and wail for the mountains” (Jer 9:10a). Mountains could figure the land of Edom (Obad 8-9; Mal 1:3) or Assyria (Nah 3:18). Mountains were also metonymy for the people of Israel: “O mountains of Israel, hear the word of the LORD” (Ezek 36:1 [cf. Ezek 36: 4, 6, 8; 6:2-3; 7:7; 39:2]).

The most frequent referent for the image of mountain or hill was the Temple Mount in Jerusalem. The site was referred to with essentially synonymous designations: “the mountain of the LORD’s temple,” “Mount Zion,” “the mount of the daughter of Jerusalem,” “the hill of Jerusalem,” “the high mountain of Israel,” “my mountain,” “my holy hill” and “the mountain of the sovereign LORD” (Is 2:2; 8:18; 10:32; 60:14; Jer 17:3; 31:23; Ezek 20:40; Zeph 3:11; Zech 8:3).

By metonymy and synecdoche, the referent for mountain could shift from the Temple Mount to the city as a whole, to the ruling authority in Jerusalem, to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and to God’s kingdom (Is 2:2; 10:12; 16:1; 29:8; 31:4; 37:32; Dan 2:35, 44-45). For an even more imaginative referent, note in the NT: “You have come to Zion, the mountain and city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem . . . the church of the firstborn” (Heb 12:22-23).

2.2. Personification. Mournful music or the absence of music envisaged dark times of judgment (Ezek 26:13; Amos 8:3, 10); however, the opposite was true in times of hope: mountains were called on to sing joyfully (Is 44:23; 49:13; 55:12). Mountains were also summoned into court for jury duty: though the people of Israel failed to recognize their guilt, inanimate mountains would understand the case that Yahweh had against the people (Mic 6:1-2).

2.3. Apostrophe. The Lord speaks through Ezekiel: “Hear, O mountains of Israel, . . . I am bringing a sword against you” (Ezek 6:3 [cf. Ezek 35:3, 15; 36:1, 4, 6, 8]). Also, “I am against you, O destroying mountain” (Jer 51:25 [cf. Hos 10:8; Mic 6:2; Zech 4:7]).

2.4. Meiosis. By diminishing the importance of towering mountains and high hills—“the haughtiness will be humiliated”—Isaiah magnifies the Lord: “he alone will be exalted” (Is 2:12-18, 22). Similarly, “Though the mountains be shaken and the hills be removed, yet my unfailing love for you will not be shaken” (Is 54:10 NIV).

2.5. Metaphor. Mountains could be images of prominence and proclamation. A flag displayed on a mountain was a metaphor for a summons to battle (Is 18:3). On the other hand, a flag on a mountain could suggest a scene of forlornness, being left to flap aimlessly in the wind (Is 30:17). Making an announcement from a mountain portrayed communicating news far and wide (Is 40:9). A summons for people to assemble on a mountain was a metaphor for viewing events taking place in the land (Amos 3:9).

Mountains also signified protection and provision: “I will bring back the flock of Israel to their pasture, and they will graze on Mount Carmel, in Bashan, on the hills of Ephraim, and in Gilead; their hunger shall be satisfied” (Jer 50:19). However, the sense of protection and safety could be deceiving (Jer 49:16; Amos 6:1).

Mountains could denote prestige and power. God denounced Sennacherib’s prideful claim that he had ascended to the tops of the mountains (Is 37:24). Nebuchadnezzar was described as a conqueror: “He will be as imposing as Mount Tabor is among the mountains, as Mount Carmel is against the backdrop of the sea” (Jer 46:18 NET).

Sometimes mountains were images with negative overtones. Describing the despair of the people, God referred to them as lost sheep roaming the mountains (Jer 50:6; Ezek 34:6; Nah 3:18). Enemies were pictured as coming from mountains: “With a noise like that of chariots they leap over the mountaintops, like a crackling fire consuming stubble, like a mighty army drawn up for battle. At the sight of them, nations are in anguish; every face turns pale” (Joel 2:5-6 NIV [cf. Is 13:4; Jer 4:15]). Mountains were metaphors for obstacles, and leveling them portrayed paving the way for a deliverer (Is 40:4; 45:2; 49:11).

2.6. Allegory. Ezekiel offers an extended description of Assyria as a cedar tree growing on a mountain. It was majestic in beauty, yet God cast it aside: “Foreigners from ruthless nations cut it down and left it on the mountains” (Ezek 31:12a [cf. Is 5:1-7]).

3. Mountains as Images for Deity.

Because mountains brought to mind prominence, prestige and power, they were ready images of kingliness. Jeremiah refers to the Babylonian king as a mountain (Jer 51:25). The king of Babylon claimed, “I will raise my throne above the stars of God; I will sit enthroned on the mount of assembly, on the utmost heights of the sacred mountain. I will ascend above the tops of the clouds; I will make myself like the Most High” (Is 14:13b-14 NIV). Regarding the king of Tyre, “You were on the holy mountain of God and you walked among the stones of fire” (Ezek 28:14). In poetic language, the prophets pictured these kings with semidivine status.

Regarding Yahweh, his mountain is said to be holy and the home of righteousness (Jer 31:23; cf. Is 11:9). “Jerusalem will be called the city of faithfulness, and the mountain of the LORD of hosts will be called the holy mountain” (Zech 8:3). “You who forsake Yahweh and forget my holy mountain . . . I will destine for the sword” (Is 65:11-12a [cf. Zeph 3:11]).

Mountains became influential images of divine presence. The Temple Mount became “the place of the name of Yahweh Almighty” (Is 18:7), an enduring theophany. It was God’s home and throne (Is 8:18; 25:10; cf. Ezek 11:23), and he would reign there in glory (Is 24:23; Mic 4:7). “Zion with its temple was the symbol and sacrament of the presence of the living, life-creating God” (Keel, 112). But disobedience to the covenant relationship could jeopardize God’s presence on the mountain. Ezekiel observed Yahweh abandoning the mountain of his temple: “The glory of the LORD ascended from the midst of the city and stood on the mountain to the east” (Ezek 11:22 [cf. Ezek 10:18]).

God’s immensity and incomparability were underscored by the prophets’ imaginative scenes of how mountains respond when Yahweh appears. Like peons before a potentate, mountains tremble, writhe and even disappear in the presence of the divine (Is 64:1, 3; Mic 1:4; Nah 1:5; Hab 3:10). Habakkuk says, “The ancient mountains disintegrate; the primeval hills are flattened” (Hab 3:6 NET). Indeed, God is higher than these mountains, for he created them (Amos 4:13). Isaiah raised a provocative question: “Can anyone weigh one of God’s mountains?” (Is 40:12). The prophetic imagery makes a compelling statement: while mountains were of the highest magnitude in human consciousness, God’s greatness surpasses everything.

4. Mountains as Images of Criticizing and Energizing.

Adopting the paradigm that prophetic imagination fundamentally entails criticizing and energizing (Brueggemann, 3), we find that mountain imagery was common in both aspects of the prophets’ endeavor to dismantle the dominant consciousness and to nurture an alternative worldview.

4.1. Criticizing. In contrast to mountains as images of divine presence, mountains could be images in relation to *idolatry. Using the illicit love of prostitution as metonymy for the illicit love of idolatry, Israel is portrayed as a prostitute lying on every mountain with her lovers (Is 57:7; 65:7; Jer 2:20; 3:6; Ezek 20:28; 22:9; Hos 4:13; 10:8). “Do the cool waters from those distant mountains ever cease to flow? Yet my people have forgotten me and offered sacrifices to worthless idols!” (Jer 18:14b-15a NET [cf. Is 65:11]). “So I will pull your skirt up over your face and expose you to shame like a disgraced adulteress! People of Jerusalem, I have seen your adulterous worship. . . . I have seen your disgusting acts of worship on the hills throughout the countryside” (Jer 13:26-27 NET [cf. Jer 17:2; Ezek 18:6, 11, 15]).

In order to help hearers gain a sense of God’s disappointment with the chosen people and with the surrounding nations, the prophets used imagery involving mountains. While today we might say that the world was turned upside down, the prophets said that the mountains were quaking, the hills were swaying, and the earth had returned to the primeval state of being formless and void (Jer 4:23-24). The prophets said the people were like chaff blown by the wind across the hills (Is 17:13). They announced that the people would become prey for the birds of the mountains (Is 18:6). “I will strew your flesh on the mountains” (Ezek 32:5-6 NRSV [cf. Ezek 35:8]). “The slain will be left to rot, the stench from the corpses will be everywhere, and the mountains will be drenched with blood” (Is 34:3).

Mountains were specifically pictured as bearing the brunt of God’s wrath. They will shudder in the face of his burning anger (Is 5:25; Jer 4:24; Nah 1:5). God will send a sword against the mountains (Ezek 6:3; cf. Ezek 7:7). They will become a wasteland without inhabitant, and no one will pass through them (Ezek 33:28-29; 35:3, 15; cf. Is 32:14; Hag 1:11). They will be overturned (Ezek 38:20). “Zion will be plowed like a field, Jerusalem will become a heap of rubble, the temple hill a mound overgrown with thickets” (Mic 3:12 NIV [cf. Jer 26:18]). “I will make you a threshing sledge, sharp, new, and having teeth; you shall thresh the mountains and crush them, and you shall make the hills like chaff” (Is 41:15 NRSV [cf. Is 27:12]). Possibly addressing Babylon, God declares, “I am against you, O destroying mountain. . . . I will stretch out my hand against you, roll you off the cliffs, and make you a burned-out mountain” (Jer 51:25 NIV). “What are you, O great mountain? Before Zerubbabel you shall become a plain” (Zech 4:7 NRSV). God’s frustration with the marital infidelity in the covenant relationship reaches a climax when he stunningly announces, “My mountain . . . and all your treasures I will give away as plunder” (Jer 17:3 NIV).

4.2. Energizing. In contrast to mountains suffering under the weight of God’s wrath, they became the focus of future blessings. “How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of the messenger who announces peace, . . . who says to Zion, ‘Your God reigns’” (Is 52:7 NRSV [cf. Nah 1:15]). God will restore Israel to the mountains in the same way one might plant a tender sprig on a high and lofty mountain (Jer 50:19; Ezek 17:22-23; 20:40; 34:13-14; 36:8). The prophets imagined streams of water, wine and milk flowing freely on mountains—preferred beverages on the preferred landscape (Is 30:25; Joel 3:17-18; Amos 9:13). They imagined an abundant banquet of meat and wine being held on Mount Zion for all the nations (Is 25:6-7) and animals not harming or destroying on the holy mountain (Is 11:9; 65:25). “Every valley shall be lifted up, and every mountain and hill be made low; the uneven ground shall become level, and the rough places a plain" (Is 40:4 NRSV [cf. Is 49:11]). "The mountains and the hills before you shall burst into song, and all the trees of the field will clap their hands" (Is 55:12b NRSV [cf. Is 42:11]). God and the exiles will return to Mount Zion, and he will establish his kingdom and rule over the remnant (Dan 2:35, 44-45; Joel 2:32; Obad 1:21; Mic 4:6-7; Zech 8:3). Opposite to the language of criticizing, in which God announced that he would give away his mountain, now he says, "Whoever takes refuge in me will inherit the land and possess my holy mountain" (Is 57:13 NIV [cf. Is 65:9]).

5. Interpreting Mountain Imagery.

The prophets used the imagery of mountains in various ways, and in many cases the imagery was not limited to a single, specific meaning. This is not disconcerting, for it is the nature of poetry. The poet's imagery of mountains could express ideas better than words, allowing hearers to experience a concept, not necessarily to perceive precise information. While it was impossible in the ancient world to put into words all that mountains did to the Israelites' minds and emotions, it would be even less possible today. In some cases, the language of the prophets may be almost too intense and vivid for modern readers' ears. As L. A. Schökel semi-nally commented, "What has been written with imagination, must also be read with imagination, provided the individual has imagination and it is in working order" (Schökel, 104).

Examples of prophetic imagery that especially require imagination to grasp pertain to energizing figures of speech. Sometimes we simply have to let imagery stand in its audacity without disembodiment by exegesis: "On that day the mountains shall drip sweet wine, the hills shall flow with milk, and all the stream beds of Judah shall flow with water" (Joel 3:18a NRSV [cf. Amos 9:13b]).

An energizing theme occurring in a variety of passages involves the mountain of Yahweh being raised above other hills and nations streaming to it (Is 2:2-3; 60:3; Mic 4:1-2; Zech 8:22). Distant people, tall, smooth-skinned, and strange of speech, will bring gifts (Is 18:7). God will bring the foreigners to his mountain who have become God-fearers (Is 56:6-7). Israelites who were perishing in Assyria and exiled in Egypt will return to the mountain and worship (Is 27:13; Jer 31:6, 12; Mic 7:12). Horses, chariots, wagons, mules and camels will bring pilgrims to the mountain (Is 66:20).

The Israelites were accustomed to making pilgrimages up to Jerusalem, and in their thinking, the hill of God was the greatest mountain on earth. Geographically speaking, Mount Zion sat in the shadow of the Mount of Olives to the east and was not the highest hill in Jerusalem or in Palestine, much less in the world. But because God dwelled there, it was the mountain of all mountains, standing stronger and taller than all others and commanding the respect of all people. According to Psalm 48:2, it was beautiful in its loftiness. The act of worship of going up to the mountain was a means of exalting the name of the Lord.

So when Isaiah proclaims, "Nations shall come to your light, and kings to the brightness of your dawn" (Is 60:3 NRSV), we may not know fully what that means, but we do know that the function of the imagery is acclamation: God's preeminence and universal rule are being pictured as if the whole world will come and bow at the mountain. It was a call to the errant Israelites to come back to the mountain, to celebrate God's return to his mountain, and to worship the God of the mountain.

NAHUM, BOOK OF

In the Protestant canon, the prophecy of Nahum is the thirty-fourth book, and the seventh book of those known as the Minor Prophets. It offers a strong warning to Nineveh (cf. *Jonah), which was for a period the capital of the Assyrian Empire, the nation that had controlled Israel and Judah since the mid-eighth century BC. It had destroyed the northern nation of Israel and its capital, Samaria, in 722 BC, leaving the tribes of Judah under its subjection. Assyria itself fell to Babylon in 612 BC, bringing to fruition Nahum's warnings.

1. Historical and Geographical Background.

Understanding the prophecy of Nahum depends on knowing its particular setting in time and place, since without this understanding, Israel and its God appear harsh and vengeful. Lying athwart the major trade routes between Egypt and Africa to its southwest and Asia Minor, Syria and Mesopotamia to its north and east, Israel encountered the movement of foreign troops from among the Egyptians, Hittites, Syrians, Assyrians and *Babylonians as they campaigned one against the other. Israel also suffered periods of occupation by several of these regional superpowers.

Assyria had influence in Israel during the mid-ninth century BC under Shalmaneser III (858-824 BC) and wielded imperial power more strongly over both Israel and Judah a century later, defeating the northern kingdom of Israel in 722 BC, taking many into exile from there (2 Kings 17), while also threatening Judah in the south (2 Kings 18:17—19:37) (see Israelite History). During this period of Assyrian strength, Nineveh, the object of Nahum's prophecy, became its capital city. It was not Assyrian imperialism per se that was problematic to Nahum, but rather the cruelty with which it was wedded (see Nineveh as "the city of blood" [Nah 3:1]). Sennacherib, the Assyrian king who invaded Judah in 701 BC (2 Kings 18:13; 2 Chron 32:1-19; Is 36:1-22), recorded his siege of Lachish in carved reliefs on his palace walls in Nineveh. Included are depictions of flaying and impaling some of the captives, just one example of the physical atrocities committed by Assyria upon those they conquered. Many surviving captives were exiled, with heavy annual tribute levied on those remaining. Such brutality terrorized Assyria's enemies and angered Judah's God (Nah 1:2-6).

2. Composition and Literary Craft.

Nahum's prophecy lacks explicit reference to kings' reigns that could aid in dating its composition. A date range is discernible, however. It must have been written after the destruction of the Egyptian city No-Amon/Thebes (modern Karnak or Luxor) in 663 BC, which is referred to in the past (Nah 3:8-10), yet before the fall of Nineveh to the Babylonians in 612 BC, since this event is what is being anticipated in the prophecy. With the death of Ashurbanipal in 631 BC, Assyria's power started to wane, with its great armies (Nah 1:12) starting to fade away (Nah 3:13), so the prophecy could be associated with this pivotal death.

Some regard the book as a compilation of numerous, originally separate oracles. The work of K. Spronk, showing an overarching structure and the interplay between various parts of the book, supports compositional unity in its present canonical form (Spronk, 3-5). The composition exhibits fine literary craft, mixing numerous literary genres and various poetic devices. The book begins with a hymn (Nah 1:2-8), has a vision of a court scene (Nah 1:12—2:2) and contains a dirge (Nah 3:1). Some suggest a partial acrostic, with successive sections beginning with successive letters of the Hebrew alphabet (Nah 1:3-7). There is clear use of metaphor (Nah 1:10, 13; 2:11-13; 3:4-7, 13) and simile (Nah 2:7; 3:12, 15-17) as well as irony (Nah 3:1, 14). Some of these devices show their power in oral/aural presentation, while others, such as the chiasm in the last two chapters of the book (Spronk, 5), come through more clearly in written form (see Literary Approaches).

3. Content.

3.1. Heading (Nah 1:1). This prophecy is doubly identified as an “oracle” and a “book.” The former is a verbal message often, though not exclusively, referring to non-Israelites (cf. Is 13:1; 15:1; 17:1; 19:1; 21:1, 11, 13; 23:1; Zech 9:1), here Nineveh, the Assyrian capital city. On the east bank of the Tigris River about six hundred miles upstream from the Persian Gulf, it is the site of the modern city of Mosul. The “book” is a written document, indicating that the importance of the material goes beyond a simple oral presentation to its enscripturation, making it available to a wider audience. The heading also identifies the means of revelation, a “vision,” and its recipient, Nahum. The name “Nahum,” meaning “comforted,” shares its root with “Menahem,” (“one who comforts” [2 Kings 15:14]) and “Nehemiah” (“Yahweh has comforted”). The location of Nahum’s hometown, Elkosh, is uncertain.

3.2. Hymn Describing Yahweh (Nah 1:2-11). Hymns praise God for several of his attributes and actions. They regularly mention those that would be considered positive toward those in a good relationship with him (e.g., Nah 1:7; cf. Ps 145), though attributes such as *wrath and vengeance toward opponents of himself and his people are also worthy to be praised, as they are here (see also Ex 34:6-7, which mixes vengeance and blessing, though emphasizing the latter). Being jealous, God brooks no rivals (Josh 24:19-20), but against those who unjustly harm his faithful lover, Judah, he brings vengeful wrath, repaying the wrongdoers (Deut 32:41). The hymnic introduction to Nahum’s prophecy is theologically significant, indicating that the following words, which could be seen as simply the oppressed angrily lashing out from their physical *suffering, are driven by the very character of *God, who both cares and is just, reacting to their suffering from the essence of his being. He is also powerful, controlling not only human enemies but also the forces of nature (Nah 1:3-6). The hymn is not satisfied with simple objective description, but becomes much more personal, closing by confronting Nineveh directly as the “you” facing God’s wrath (Nah 1:11).

3.3. Oracle of Two Verdicts (Nah 1:12—2:2). God addresses the two sides, both addressed as *women by way of feminine grammatical forms (see Nah 3:1-7), in subsequent oracles, alternating second- and third-person pronouns (“you/ them”) to distinguish addressee and subject, first providing hope to Judah (Nah 1:12-13, 15) and then judgment to Nineveh (Nah 1:14, 16-2:2). Each party’s identity, only implicit in the original (which uses “you”), is made explicit with them being named in some translations (Nah 1:12, 14 [e.g., NIV, MESSAGE]). God acknowledges that Judah’s affliction was from his hand, but now it will cease, bondage turning to freedom. Affliction’s cause is unspecified here, though Isaiah specifically identifies Assyria as God’s means for punishing Judah for turning away from him like any pagan, godless nation (Is 10:5-11). Isaiah there contends that Assyria’s excesses in carrying out God’s ordained punishment of his people causes Assyria’s downfall, which could also be the cause for chastisement here, though the reason is not explicit. Punishment of the oppressor is good news for Judah (Nah 1:15; cf. Is 52:7) because this diminution will allow Judah again to flourish (Jer 27:22). Historically, the one coming against Assyria (Nah 2:1) was Babylon, to which Assyria fell in 612 BC. Theologically, it is God who is behind Babylon’s actions, as the author indicates by using the term “attacker” (NRSV: “shatterer”), used elsewhere of Yahweh (2 Sam 22:15; Hab 3:14; Zech 13:7).

3.4. Increasing Confrontation (Nah 2:2-13). The brutal attack upon Assyria is described in vivid color, particularly red, for which the Hebrew word is a play on “blood” (2 Kings 3:22). This and other oracles of destruction in the prophecy anticipate the impending onslaught of Babylon, with Nineveh's fall to these southern neighbors in 612 BC. Some suggest that the description is so vivid that it must have been written after having actually been witnessed by the author. The argument is not compelling, however, since rare was the generation from that period that did not have firsthand contact with such conflict on some scale.

The oracle follows a chronological progression of battle: the blazing attack (Nah 2:3-4) met by a hurried defense (Nah 2:5), which proves ineffective (Nah 2:6-8), with the city defenseless and open to pillage (Nah 2:9-10). Nineveh's former ferocity, expressed in metaphors of wild, ravaging beasts, is remembered and mocked (Nah 2:11-12), with God claiming ultimate victory, picking up numerous themes and concepts from the previous verses, making the punishment appropriate to those who suffer it (Nah 2:13). Those who took exiles suffered the same fate (Nah 2:7).

3.5. "Woe, Bloody City" (Nah 3:1-7). Nineveh will experience mourning due to shocking depredations that will befall the city. The Assyrian king Ashurbanipal records his actions against a captured city in a royal inscription: "I captured many soldiers alive. The rest I burnt. . . . I built a pile of live (men and) heads before their gate. . . . I burnt their adolescent boys and girls" (Millard, 159). Bloody anguish afflicted on others will be repaid, the plunderer plundered (Nah 3:1), the attacker attacked (Nah 3:2) and the slaughterer slaughtered (Nah 3:3). Brisk, clipped sentences conjure up the swift enemy attack. Nineveh is metaphorically compared to two women operating on the margins of society: the prostitute and the witch (cf. 2 Kings 9:22; Is 57:3). A prostitute, whose seduction and enticements degrade all parties, will herself be degraded, and a witch, whose sorceries force others to her will, will herself be overpowered. The head of the world's most powerful empire of the period, to which people had flocked in awe at its power and in supplication for its favors, will now be shunned by these same people due to its great ruin. The lack of "comfort" (Heb root nhm) plays on the prophet's name, "Nahum," meaning "comforted."

3.6. A Satire Against Might (Nah 3:8-13). Nineveh, in its egotistical self-elevation, is called to compare itself to No-Amon/Thebes, also an imperial capital city, of Egypt during the Middle and New Kingdoms. It later became a religious center for the worship of Amon, the remains of whose temples are still visible in Luxor and Karnak. Located on the east bank of the Nile some five hundred miles south of the Mediterranean, Thebes could rely neither upon water barriers nor neighboring allies, Cush (Ethiopia [Zeph 2:12]), Put (Gen 10:6) and Libya (2 Chron 12:3) for salvation from the Assyrian onslaught under Ashurbanipal, to whom the city succumbed in 663 BC. Ironically, Thebes' captors, those who perpetrated upon the city war crimes of infanticide, dispossession and slavery, themselves will suffer in similar ways. Nineveh's mighty armies and strong defenses will prove futile, might becoming like the "weaker sex," and strength made vulnerable because defenses are left open.

3.7. Useless Preparations (Nah 3:14-19). Nineveh is called to a fool's errand, preparing for a siege from which there will be no escape. Enclosing oneself for protection of necessity closes out the water supply needed to supply a city, so storage in anticipation is called for, as is hasty reworking of defenses that might have fallen to ruin (Nah 3:14). From the fire of God's wrath (Nah 1:6) and the approaching assault there will be no escape. The metaphor of the swarming and devouring locust/grasshopper (see Joel 1:2-12; 2:1-11) is given a dual focus. On the one hand, the overwhelming, swarming enemy will pick them clean (Nah 3:15). On the other hand, among their own number are merchants who would be expected to provision the city and military personnel who would be expected to protect it; both will vanish, without trace or help against the encroaching enemy.

The prophet finally directly addresses the Assyrian ruler, whose capital city, Nineveh, is on the verge of collapse. Even those charged with the care of the people are instead careless, leaving the sheep in their charge to wander defenseless (Nah 3:18). The wound of the Assyrian Empire is now mortal, a matter of woe for them (Nah 3:1) but an occasion for rejoicing and applause (see Is 55:12) for those who have felt the empire's cruelty. God is finally vindicated; the jealous keeper and defender of his people (1:2) brings justice.

4. Theological Themes.

4.1. The Nature of God. Nahum's *God is called "Yahweh" (rendered in English Bibles as "LORD") thirteen times in the course of the book. The only true “name” of God, it indicates a covenant intimacy, promising aid to God’s people (Nah 1:7; 2:2), but judgment on those who oppose him (Nah 1:2 [3x], 3 [2x], 9, 11, 12, 14; 2:13; 3:5), a dichotomy spelled out in Nahum 1:7. His role in bringing vengeance against his opponents is reiterated by Paul (Rom 12:19). He is thus not capricious but instead deliberate in his responses, showing justice in both blessing and cursing. In light of this, though it is not spelled out in so many words in the prophecy itself, the fact that Yahweh had in the past “afflicted” his people would indicate that they had turned against him, but now they were restored upon returning to him.

Yahweh is depicted in masculine images, such as a general leading his troops who defeat the mighty enemy, a foil to the other masculine player, the Assyrian king, whose followers are ineffective (Nah 3:18).

4.2. The Nations. God exercises control over all peoples, not just Judah (see Nations). The two superpowers of the period, Egypt and Assyria, though seemingly all-powerful to those who faced them, were swiftly dispatched by Judah’s God. He was able to use as his instrument to this end the Babylonians, who, though not named in the prophecy, are the anticipated conquerors of Assyria. Being foreign is not itself the cause for punishment, however, but rather opposition to God and his servants. God’s previous actions against Judah are proof of this, and their restoration upon repentance would suggest that blessing could befall even Israel’s enemies if they too would turn to Israel’s God, as it did to the same Ninevites when they responded to Jonah’s warnings (Jon 3:6-10).

NATIONS

This article focuses on countries or people groups that are considered foreign from the perspective of Israel and Judah. Much of the prophetic literature of the OT deals with foreign nations, but attitudes toward them are far from uniform. On the one hand, very many individual prophetic oracles pronounce judgment against foreign nations, and the books of Nahum and Obadiah are devoted entirely to the denunciation of Assyria and Edom, respectively; on the other hand, other prophetic statements speak very highly of foreigners, especially during the period following the return from *exile. In any case, it is clear that prophets very rarely viewed Israel in isolation from events that were unfolding on the international scene. Rather, the prophetic literature most often reflects the assumption that Yahweh’s activity held implications at home as well as abroad.

1. Terminology
2. Specific Nations
3. Oracles About Foreign Nations
4. Universalism, Monotheism and Isaiah 40—55

1. Terminology.

Two Hebrew terms are used most often in reference to foreign nations in the OT. The word gôy (“nation” [often expressed in the pl., gôyim]) tends to be understood in the political sense, while ‘am (“people” [pl., ‘ammîm]) is generally understood as an expression of kinship. Thus, for example, Yahweh significantly instructs Hosea to name his son lô’ ‘ammî, meaning “not my people” (Hos 1:9).

Other terms are used with less frequency.

Within the prophetic literature, nearly all occurrences of lē'ummîm are limited to the book of Isaiah, and the term frequently appears alongside words that have similar meanings, such as gôyim (Is 34:1; 43:9), 'ammîm (Is 51:4; Jer 51:58; Hab 2:13), 'ādām ("humanity" [Is 43:4]) and 'iyyîm ("coastlands" [Is 41:1; 49:1]). While 'iyyîm is very often translated as "coastlands," on some occasions it can refer more generally to distant lands (e.g., Is 42:4, 10; 66:19; Jer 31:10). All occurrences of this word in the Prophetic Books are concentrated within Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, with only two exceptions (Dan 11:18; Zeph 2:11). The word tēbēl ("world") appears predominantly in late prophetic literature (e.g., Is 24:4; 26:9, 18, 27:6; 66:19), and often it refers to the inhabitants of the world in a far-reaching, universalistic sense (Fabry and van Meeteren, 559, 561-62).

2. Specific Nations.

It is not possible here to detail all of the foreign entities mentioned in the prophetic literature, but several are addressed on a recurring basis. The coastal cities of Tyre and Sidon are frequently mentioned (e.g., Is 23; Jer 47:4; Ezek 26—28; Joel 3:4; Amos 1:9-10; Zech 9:2-3), as are Ammon (Jer 49:1-6; Ezek 21:28-32; 25:1-7; Amos 1:13-15; Zeph 2:8-9), Moab (Is 15—16; Jer 48; Ezek 25:8-11; Amos 2:1-3; Zeph 2:8-9) and the cities of Philistia (Is 14:28-32; Jer 47:1-7; Ezek 25:15-17; Joel 3:4; Amos 1:6-8; Zeph 2:4-5; Zech 9:5-8). Edom is often remembered for its apparent complicity with *Babylon in the destruction of Jerusalem (Is 34:5-15; Jer 49:7-22; Ezek 25:12-17; Obad 1-21; cf. Ps 137:7; Lam 4:21-22).

Among foreign nations, Assyria, Babylonia and Egypt are especially prominent. The book of Nahum, which is devoted entirely to judgment against Assyria, details some of the Assyrian atrocities (e.g., Nah 3:1-4). Also, the prophet Hosea may be referring to Israel's temptation to align with Egypt against Assyria when he describes Israel as a "dove, silly and without sense" (Hos 7:11 NRSV). Another key episode involving Assyria comes from the Judean king Hezekiah's interaction with Sennacherib's forces at the time of the siege of Jerusalem in 701 BC (Is 36—37). Although Assyria had surrounded Jerusalem and defeat seemed inevitable, the angel of Yahweh struck down the Assyrian troops overnight and Jerusalem was miraculously spared.

After the Neo-Babylonian Empire replaced Assyria as Judah's main military threat, the long reign of Nebuchadnezzar II (605-562 BC) brought about the destruction of Jerusalem and the *temple by 586 BC. Texts such as Jeremiah 27:1-17 suggest that there was considerable disagreement about the most appropriate stance toward Babylon, with Jeremiah advancing the unpopular opinion that Judah would be best served by submission to Babylon. Jeremiah even advises the exiles to pray for the city of their captivity (Jer 29:1-7). All the same, those prophets who witnessed the subsequent fall of Babylon were inclined to view this turn of events as no less than the hand of God at work to deliver the people of Israel (Is 13:1—14:23; 44:24—45:8; Jer 50—51; Zech 2:6-8).

Egypt is best remembered in the OT as Israel's former taskmaster when the Hebrew people were enslaved in the land (e.g., Is 52:3-4). Yahweh's deliverance of his people from the land of Egypt serves as the basis for the covenant at Sinai (Ex 20:2), which adds a theological dimension to Israel's relationship with Egypt. Thus, in Hosea 11:1-4, for example, Yahweh compares his deliverance of Israel to raising a young child (cf. Hos 2:15; 13:4; Amos 3:1; Mic 6:4). However, Israel's inclination to turn to Egypt for assistance (Hos 7:11, 16; 12:1) was tantamount to a rejection of Yahweh's covenant. The anticipated result of such action is a return to captivity (Hos 8:13; 9:3).

The book of Isaiah similarly admonishes King Hezekiah of Judah against alliances with Egypt in the face of the Assyrian threat during the late eighth century BC. As the Assyrian commander puts it, Egypt will prove to be an unreliable ally, a broken reed that will only pierce the hand of anyone who leans on it (Is 36:6, 9). Despite their horses and military strength, the Egyptians are merely human, and so such plans are doomed to failure (Is 30:1-5; 31:1-3). More than a century after the reign of Hezekiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel similarly denounced King Zedekiah's inclination to turn to Egypt in rebellion against his treaty obligations with Babylon, just prior to the fall of Jerusalem (Jer 37:1-9; Ezek 17:1-21).

3. Oracles About Foreign Nations.

3.1. Origins. Nearly all of the Prophetic Books contain a collection of oracles about foreign nations, but their origin is not immediately obvious (Hayes 1968). It is entirely possible that oracles directed against other nations constitute some of the earliest types of prophecy in Israel (Gottwald, 49). This is supported by comparison with prophetic sayings against foreign nations in ancient Near Eastern literature dating to the beginning of the second millennium B.C., including the Sumerian "Curse of Agade" (ANET 646-51; Cooper) and several Egyptian execration texts (ANET 328-29; Bentzen). In both cases, the utterances are given within the context of warfare, presumably to bring about a favorable outcome. Likewise, a number of texts found at Mari, also from the first part of the second millennium B.C., contain messages from various prophetic figures to Zimrilim, the king of Mari. One such letter, possibly written in association with a military conflict, is addressed to Zimrilim but condemns Babylon directly (ARM 13.23; Malamat, 214-19; Hayes 1967). This is not unlike many oracles about foreign nations in the Bible, which directly address other nations even though they may not have ever received them.

In the OT, Balaam is portrayed as a mercenary prophetic figure who is recruited by Balak, the king of Moab, to curse Israel so as to bring about its defeat, in a role similar to the prophetic figures of the ancient Near East. This view of a prophet who performs duties for the royal court is also similar to that of later prophets, such as Isaiah ben Amoz (e.g., Is 7:36—39). On this basis, the Balaam account is often thought to be an early representative of the prophetic role in international affairs.

Many other early representations of Hebrew prophecy take place on the battlefield (e.g., 1 Sam 15:2-3; 1 Kings 20:26-30; 2 Kings 13:14-19), which may indicate that oracles concerning foreign nations initially developed within the context of holy *warfare (von Rad, 94-114; Miller; Cross). If so, the pronouncement of judgment against Israel's enemies would be perceived as a confirmation of Yahweh's presence and assistance in military victory, with an implicit blessing for Israel (see Christensen). However, even if the prophetic denunciation of foreign enemies developed out of the context of early warfare, it is difficult to be certain that the later foreign nations oracles, such as those collected in the books of Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, have been directly influenced by "holy war" traditions. These collections exhibit broad diversity in form, content and purpose, and they do not always pronounce judgment against foreign nations.

In addition to warfare, Israel's *worship may also have influenced the development of oracles about foreign nations. In Psalm 60:6-8, for example, God responds to a cry of distress by announcing the destruction of other nations. Similarly, Lamentations 4:21-22 correlates the alleviation of Yahweh's punishment of *Zion with judgment against Edom. Such oracles may reflect the context of the royal court, although other cultic settings have also been suggested (see Hayes 1968, 87-92). Despite these possibilities, it is most likely that a variety of circumstances have contributed to the development of oracles concerning foreign nations. Furthermore, their origins cannot be determined with certainty from the extant collections in the Bible.

Alongside the prevailing view that oracles about foreign nations developed from the context of warfare, it is commonly assumed that such oracles—often called "oracles against the nations"—imply a message of *salvation for Israel (Westermann, 204-5). This is undoubtedly true in some cases, but a proclamation of judgment against a foreign nation does not necessarily convey salvation for Israel (Hamborg). The Egypt oracles in Isaiah, for example, seem to denounce military dependency on Egypt against the Assyrian threat (Is 19:1-4; 30:1-5; 31:1-3; cf. Is 18:1-2, 4-6, concerning Cush). These oracles predict the downfall of Egypt as evidence of its inadequacy as an ally (cf. Is 36:6-9). In at least one case, the oracle conveys judgment against Judah for its dependency on Egypt: "When the LORD stretches out his hand, the helper will stumble, and the one helped will fall, and they will all perish together" (Is 31:3 NRSV). Similarly, the oracle at Isaiah 14:28-32 ostensibly warns the people of Philistia that the Assyrian oppression is not yet over, but one can assume that the warning is ultimately intended for the Judeans. Since Philistia was not involved in the oppression of Judah at that time, a word of judgment should not be taken as a message of salvation for Judah. To be sure, an oracle announcing the downfall of Babylon, for example, can be understood to imply the salvation and restoration of Judah (e.g., Is 13:1—14:23; Jer 50:1—51:58). But it cannot always be said that an oracle against a foreign nation conveys good news for Israel or Judah.

In sum, it seems that a variety of circumstances may have prompted oracles about foreign nations oracles. In any event, such oracles are best understood in terms of their implications for Israel or Judah rather than simply in reference to the foreign nations themselves.

3.2. Collections of Nations Oracles. One interesting dimension of oracles about foreign nations is that while isolated examples can be found (e.g., Is 10:5-19; 30:6-7), they often are grouped together into collections (e.g., Is 13—23; Jer 46—51; Ezek 25—32; Amos 1:1—2:3). In addition to any organizational or thematic aim, a particular collection may also serve a rhetorical function. For example, the book of Amos employs an element of surprise by pronouncing judgment against several foreign nations before finally pointing the finger of accusation at Israel, beginning at Amos 2:6 (the oracle against Judah at Amos 2:4-5 is often viewed as a later insertion, in which case the rhetorical effect would still apply). Ezekiel's oracles against Tyre (Ezek 26—28), followed by several concerning Egypt (Ezek 29—32), clearly are taken out of chronological order, but the present arrangement seems to support the belief that Nebuchadnezzar's attack against Tyre was a prelude to Egypt's downfall (cf. Ezek 29:17-20).

At the same time, any deliberate initial arrangement of a collection of oracles is likely to be obscured by expansion or reorganization of the collection over time. In the book of Ezekiel, for example, the oracles against Egypt (Ezek 29—32) disrupt the otherwise clockwise geographic arrangement of oracles addressed to Judah's neighbors in Ezekiel 25—28. Also, the current form of the collection at Isaiah 13—23 contains several oracles with a uniform mašša' title ("oracle concerning . . ."), which are disrupted by several non-mašša' oracles (Cook, 25-47). Moreover, some collections of foreign nations oracles now include oracles directed against Israel or Judah (e.g., Is 22:1-11; Amos 2:4-5, 6-8). Thus, it is reasonable to suppose that the aims and sensibilities regarding the assembly of oracles into collections have likely changed over the course of the development of the literature.

By way of summary, it may be safe to say that oracles about other nations play such a prominent role in the prophetic literature because they ultimately concern Israel and Judah.

Above all, the rich deposit of oracles regarding foreign nations witnesses to belief in the sovereignty of Yahweh, who is not simply the God of the Israelites, but is Lord of all nations. This conviction often reinforces the prophetic message in light of unfolding international circumstances. Thus, the anticipation of defeat at the hands of a political enemy might be interpreted as divine judgment against misdeeds (e.g., Jer 44:2-6) rather than as evidence of Yahweh's impotence. By contrast, the downfall of an enemy can be interpreted as an indication of divine favor and vindication against the injustice of Judah's oppressors (e.g., Is 14:24-27).

4. Universalism, Monotheism and Isaiah 40—55.

With regard to international affairs, the prophetic literature provides some of the best examples in the OT of the development of the theme of universalism. Within the context of the present discussion, "universalism" does not refer to "Christian universalism," the notion that all of humanity will eventually be reconciled to God. Rather, the concept of universalism in the OT begins with the belief that Yahweh is not the God of the Israelites only, but is sovereign over all nations. For example, Zephaniah 2:11 declares, "The LORD will be terrible against them; he will shrivel all the gods of the earth, and to him shall bow down, each in its place, all the coasts and islands of the nations" (NRSV). Similarly, the call of Jeremiah as a "prophet to the nations" (Jer 1:5) seems to imply from the outset that the message of the book has a global significance. Often, the universalistic vision includes a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, as in Zechariah 8:22: "Many peoples and strong nations shall come to seek the LORD of hosts in Jerusalem, and to entreat the favor of the LORD" (NRSV [cf. Is 2:2-4 // Mic 4:1-3; Is 60:1-3; 66:18-21; Zech 14:16-19]).

Isaiah 40—55 seems to be especially interested in the theme of the nations of the world acknowledging the sovereignty of Israel's God. Not only will the nations observe what Yahweh has done for Israel (Is 41:4; 42:11-12; 49:7), but also Israel will be a "light to the nations" (Is 42:6; 49:6). The meaning of this phrase has been much debated, especially as it potentially relates to foreign nations. It often has been interpreted in reference to the conversion of foreigners (e.g., Blenkinsopp), although an alternative view is that the “nations” are understood as dispersed Israelites (e.g., Hollenberg). In any case, the primary interest in Isaiah 40–55 seems not to be in the salvation of foreign nations for their own sake, but rather in the universal exaltation of Yahweh as the God who reigns over all nations (e.g., Is 52:10; cf. Mic 1:11) (see Kaminsky and Stewart). By contrast, Luke 2:32 echoes this reference in a way that refers to the conversion of Gentiles.

This universalistic perspective in Isaiah 40–55 often is accompanied by explicit expressions of monotheism, which may indicate an important shift in Israel’s view of Yahweh (see God). While the entire OT unequivocally prohibits the worship of foreign deities, much of the literature presupposes their existence (Ex 20:2-3; Deut 5:6-7; cf. Jer 16:13; 25:6; Mic 4:5). The ancient Song of the Sea asks, “Who is like you, Yahweh, among the gods?” (Ex 15:11 [cf. Ex 18:11; 23:32-33]), and in Psalm 82 God brings other deities to trial for their injustice. By contrast, Isaiah 40–55 frequently asserts that there are no other gods besides Yahweh (Is 44:8; 45:5, 14-23; cf. Jer 5:7; 16:20).

This emphasis on monotheism may help to explain differing viewpoints toward the nations in Isaiah 40–55 and elsewhere. Some texts, such as Isaiah 49:23, envision foreign nations in subservience to Israel: “Faces to the ground, [kings and queens] will bow down to you and lick the dust of your feet” (cf. Is 49:26; 51:22-23; 60:11-12, 14; Mic 7:16-17). Although they are bowing to Israel, this verse goes on to state that the outcome will be Israel’s acknowledgment of Yahweh’s sovereignty. As this example illustrates, the concern is not simply for the welfare of foreign nations, but mainly for the recognition of the greatness of God.

At the same time, other texts envision foreign nations living in peaceful harmony with each other and with Israel. Some of these are especially noteworthy for their positive portrayal of former enemies and oppressors of Israel. This is especially true for Egypt and Assyria, traditionally viewed among Israel’s greatest enemies (e.g., Is 7:18; 10:24; 52:4; Jer 2:36; Hos 11:5; Zech 10:11). Despite this, Isaiah 19:23-25 envisions Egypt and Assyria worshipping together with Israel (cf. Mic 7:12), and the book of Jonah also deals favorably with the subject of Assyria as the recipients of God’s mercy. Additionally, Isaiah 56:3-8 speaks specifically of the inclusion of foreigners in the worship of Yahweh.

Attitudes toward foreign nations seem equally diverse outside of the book of Isaiah, including the literature of the postexilic period, although the date of such texts is often disputed. Zechariah 9:1-8 denounces several foreign entities, but Zechariah 9:7b remarkably asserts Philistia as a “remnant for our God” (NRSV), just like one of the clans of Judah (cf. Amos 1:8). Also, Joel 3:1-15 speaks of Tyre, Sidon and Philistia being sold into the hands of the Judeans. The prophet even calls for a reversal of Isaiah 2:4; Micah 4:3, so that plowshares are beaten into swords, and pruning hooks are made into spears. In another example of opposing viewpoints, Zechariah 14:1-5 envisions an apocalyptic day of Yahweh’s coming when the nations will be summoned to do battle against Jerusalem, but then Yahweh will fight against these nations (Zech 14:3), and Jerusalem will ultimately remain secure (Zech 14:10-11). Finally, Malachi 1:2-5 exhibits a strong sense of nationalism, with particularly harsh words against Edom, but by contrast, Malachi 1:11 emphasizes the purity of worship among the nations, where Yahweh’s name is revered (also Mal 1:14). This statement could be interpreted to refer to the worship of Diaspora Jews who were scattered abroad, but one need look no further than the book of Jonah to find a clear instance of foreign worshipers of Yahweh (e.g., Jon 1:16; 3:5-10).

OBADIAH, BOOK OF

Obadiah, the smallest book of the OT, consisting of a mere twenty-one verses, focuses on the prophesied destruction of Edom following that country's aggressive acts toward Jerusalem during a time of Israelite national calamity. Along with *Jonah and *Nahum's prophecy against Nineveh, Obadiah is the only book in the OT whose primary subject matter concerns a foreign nation. Despite its brevity, the book contains important theological messages about the relationship between God and the *nations, the significance of Jerusalem, the *Day of Yahweh, and God's commitment to his people. Obadiah also raises questions about the role that the *canon plays in the overall interpretation of individual books, in particular how Obadiah's position within the collection of the Book of the *Twelve influences its reading.

4. Interpretation

1. Author.

Although the size and subject matter of the book of Obadiah have played a part in its partial neglect, the fact that it is a self-contained work has ensured that it has not lacked for contentious attention. Debates about the book reach as far back as Jerome, and many have long noted that "its difficulty is in inverse proportion to its length" (Mason, 87). One reason for this is the lack of authorial identity. Unlike other prophetic books, Obadiah's superscript (Obad 1:1a) is particularly sparse, noting nothing about the background of the prophet, the name of his father, the current king, or even his hometown (cf. Joel 1:1; Hab 1:1; Nah 1:1; Mal

1:1). The name "Obadiah" (Heb ʿōbadyā) derives from the participial form of ʿābad and means "one who worships/serves Yahweh." This varies slightly from the LXX Abdias and Vulgate Abdia pronunciation, which probably is based on the Hebrew noun form ʿebed and means "the servant of Yahweh." Because "Obadiah" is a common name, denoting twelve different people spread across different periods of OT history, it is unlikely that the name is symbolic or allegorical, as many suggest for "Malachi," though this is a possibility. The most famous Obadiah (Heb ʿōbadyāhū) was King Ahab's palace chamberlain (1 Kings 18:1-15) and a believer in Yahweh who hid a hundred of Yahweh's prophets from Ahab's and Jezebel's persecution. The Babylonian Talmud (b. Sanh. 39b) identifies this northern Obadiah as the one responsible for the prophecy that bears his name, though there is nothing in the story that indicates that this Obadiah was a prophet. This traditional identification has generally been rejected by modern scholars.

2. Historical Setting and Canonical Location.

2.1. Historical Setting. Israel's relationship with Edom is long and full of conflict, which allows Obadiah a wide range of possible historical settings. Edom is one of the first enemies that Israel encountered following the exodus events, when Edom's army prevented Israel from passing through their country on the way to Canaan (Num 20:14-21). Later, David was able to subjugate them (2 Sam 8:13-14), though the situation did not last (2 Kings 8:20), and Israel/Judah maintained various levels of control over Edom (2 Kings 3; 14:7) and the port city of Elath (2 Kings 14:22; cf. 2 Kings 16:6) throughout the period of the monarchy. During the postexilic period, Edom became associated with the burning of the *temple at the time of the Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem (Ps 137:7; 1 Esdr 4:45; cf. Lam 4:22; Ezek 25:12-14; 35:5-15), though Chronicles, Kings and Jeremiah are silent on the issue. Edom later occupied the Negev following the Nabatean invasion of their homeland in the fourth/third century BC.

Because of this continued conflict, the suggested dates for Obadiah span almost five hundred years and are generally relegated to a few specific biblical events (Raabe, 49-51): (1) The early ninth-century BC setting of Ahab's chamberlain Obadiah. This connection is sometimes expanded to include a possible Edomite invasion during the time of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron 20). (2) Edom's revolt against Jehoram king of Judah c. 845 BC (2 Kings 8:21-22). It is argued that this revolt should be understood in connection with the joint Philistine/Arab invasion mentioned in 2 Chronicles 21:16-17, thus implying a Philistine/Arab identity for Obadiah's "strangers/foreigners" (Obad 11). (3) The Edomite capture of Elath from Judah c. 735 BC during the reign of Ahaz (2 Kings 16:6). The parallel account in 2 Chronicles 28:17-18 mentions a simultaneous Edomite/Philistine invasion of Judah, when Edom "carried off prisoners." (4) A date close to the time of Malachi and Nehemiah, c. 450 BC. It is argued that both Obadiah (Obad 1-7) and Malachi (Mal 1:2-7) frame their prophecies as depictions of past events: the Nabatean invasion, destruction and occupation of the traditional Edomite homeland. (5) Sometime during the *exile. Luther and Calvin, among others, associate Obadiah with Edomite aggression during and soon after the fall of Jerusalem in 587/6 BC.

2.2. Canonical Context. The decision to read Obadiah as an individual work or as part of the collection of the Book of the Twelve can influence the implied historical setting of the book. When read on its own, Obadiah's language and subject matter parallels Jeremiah 49 and Psalm 137, which may hint at a postexilic setting. Additionally, although the text does not demand it, Obadiah's descriptive language of destruction and exile fits comfortably within the context of the years following the traumatic events of 587/6 BC and Edom's historical developments with the Nabateans. Furthermore, the destruction of the temple is such a significant event that even if Obadiah referred to some older Edomite atrocity that occurred centuries before, the book could be reinterpreted to fit the later setting. However, Obadiah's canonical location within the MT order of the Book of the Twelve implies a more symbolic and possibly much earlier reading in which the descriptions of destruction and exile could fit the general context of any of the aforementioned points in Israelite history. Such a reading recognizes the loose chronological organization to the MT canonical order (Sweeney 2000a), and that Obadiah is positioned in the eighth-century BC block (Hosea through Micah) between two historical eighth-century BC prophets Amos and Jonah. Because the LXX order of the Book of the Twelve does not follow this pattern, it seems possible that the MT editors understood Obadiah according to the traditional identification of the ninth-century BC figure.

Obadiah's position within the canon is far from random. In the English and MT orders of the Book of the Twelve, Obadiah follows Joel and Amos, both of which contain their own calls for Edom's destruction (Joel 3:19; Amos 1:11-12; 9:12). While Amos first mentions Edom within a small "oracles against the nations" setting, it is his use in Amos 9:12 that probably influenced Obadiah's final position. Amos 9:11-15 is a restoration section that looks forward to the reestablishment of the Davidic monarchy (Amos 9:11), the return of the exiles (Amos 9:14), Israel's possession of the nations in general (Amos 9:12b) and the "remnant of Edom" specifically (Amos 9:12a). When the Book of the Twelve is considered as a collection, Amos's call for Edom's possession serves as an introduction to Obadiah's own calls for destruction and possession. In this way, it becomes possible to understand the book of Obadiah as a detailed expansion of Amos 9:12. In the LXX, Obadiah is preceded by Joel, not Amos, a situation that is partially explained by the LXX's translation "men" (anthrōpōn) for the MT's "Edom" in Amos 9:12 (Jones). The LXX's Joel-Obadiah order instead highlights Joel's own call for the conquest of Edom (Joel 3:19), as well as the restoration of *Zion (Joel 2:32; Obad 17).

2.3. Parallels with Jeremiah 49. Obadiah shares obvious parallels with Jeremiah 49:7-22. The use of similar vocabulary and imagery between the two passages, particularly Obadiah 1-4 and Jeremiah 49:14-16 (cf. Obad 5 with Jer 49:9, and Obad 16 with Jer 49:12), is evident and has raised questions of authorial dependency that have yet to be resolved. While some have found various levels of influence (Nogalski, 61-74; Niehaus, 500-502; Renkema, 38; Sweeney 2000b, 282-85), others have argued that both prophets borrowed from independent sources (Allen, 132-33; Ben Zvi, 99-109).

Despite the similarities, some differences are notable. Jeremiah's oracle concerning Edom takes place within the broader context of the oracles against the nations (Jer 46—51), in which Edom is just one of a number of nations to receive a message of prophetic doom. This is similar to Amos's prophecies against Edom (Amos 1:11-12) and the surrounding nations (Amos 1—2) that precede Obadiah canonically. While it is possible to argue that Obadiah functions in a comparable manner within the context of the wider Book of the Twelve, taken on its own, Obadiah is a self-contained prophecy against Edom that later expands to include judgment against the nations as a whole (Obad 15-16). Because of this, the scope of Obadiah with its progression from Edom to the nations diverges from Jeremiah 49:7-22, which never turns away from its singular message of doom regarding Edom.

3. Content.

There is no universal agreement on the outline or organization of Obadiah. Often, a distinction is made between the poetry (Obad 1-18) and prose (Obad 19-21) sections, but this is not always reflected in the English translations (cf. NIV, REB). Internally, it is possible to use Yahweh's three speeches (Obad 1-4, 5-7, 8-18) and the phrases "Thus says the Lord Yahweh" (Obad 1), "declares Yahweh" (Obad 4, 8) and "For Yahweh has spoken" (Obad 18) to locate four main sections (Obad 1-4, 5-7, 8-18, and 19-21, which is a prophetic expansion) within the book. In terms of subject matter, however, the core of the book hinges on Obadiah 15 and the results of Yahweh's intervention on the Day of Yahweh, when he moves from calling for Edom's destruction (Obad 1b-14) to punishing Edom and the nations (Obad 15-16) and restoring Israel (Obad 17-21).

I. Introduction (Obad 1a)

II. The Call for Edom's Destruction

(Obad 1b-14)

A. Announcement of Destruction (Obad 1b-4)

B. Description of Destruction (Obad 5-9)

C. Reasons for Destruction (Obad 10-14)

III. The Occasion for Edom's

Destruction: the Day of Yahweh (Obad 15-21)

A. Day of Punishment for the Nations and for Edom (Obad 15-18)

B. Day of Restoration and Occupation (Obad 19-21)

The structure of Obadiah 15 has long been questioned. Some argue that the verse should be inverted (Barton; cf. Ben Zvi) because Obadiah 15b serves as a more appropriate conclusion for Obadiah 1-14 and the description of Edom's despicable acts, while Obadiah 15a serves as a better introduction to the broader discussion of the judgment of the nations that follows in Obadiah 16. Whether or not this is the case, it is in Obadiah 15 that the prophet transitions from recounting a historical situation and the actions of Edom at a time of national calamity (Obad 10-14) to speaking of an eschatological future wherein the offending nations are repaid for their deeds according to lex talionis (Obad 15b) (see Retribution), Zion is made safe (Obad 17, 21), the exiles are returned (Obad 20) and Edom is possessed by Israel (Obad 18-19, 21).

Following the introductory superscript, Obadiah begins his message with a summons to all nations to rise up and attack Edom. Obadiah 2-4 is rich in imagery that alludes to the height and rugged geography of the Edomite homeland. It is from this "height" and the false sense of security that it implies that Yahweh concludes with the promise of an ironic reversal to "bring you down" (Obad 5). Following the announcement, the totality of the destruction that faces Edom is described with the vivid metaphors of robbers and grape pickers (Obad 5) and is reinforced by the destruction of Edom's wise men (Obad 8) and complete slaughter of its warriors (Obad 9). Indeed, nothing will be left (Obad 6). The implication that this judgment will be the result of treachery by former friends and allies (Obad 7) is especially painful. Obadiah 10-14 depicts the results of actual historical events, though when these descriptions are examined closely, specific details prove elusive. The main charge against Edom is the “violence” (hāmās) committed against his “brother” Jacob (Obad 10). The other charges include passively allowing foreigners to sack Jerusalem (Obad 11), rejoicing in Jerusalem’s destruction (Obad 12, 13b), marching through the gates (Obad 13a), taking their wealth (Obad 13c) and killing/handling over Israelite fugitives (Obad 14). Most noteworthy is that there is no specific mention of any action against the temple, which gives some support for the possibility that Obadiah, or the original source behind the prophecy, is older than the exile and was only later reinterpreted in light of the temple’s destruction.

The constant use of “day” and “day of disaster/calamity/distress” saturates Obadiah 11-14 and prepares the reader for the dramatic reversal of the Day of Yahweh in Obadiah 15. Following Yahweh’s intervention and the humbling of the nations (Obad 16), a renewed Israel/Mount Zion (Obad 17-18, 21) is contrasted with the utter destruction of the house/mountains of Esau (Obad 18-19, 21). In Obadiah 19-21, the terrible situation of Israel’s day of calamity is gone, and the exiles will return to possess Esau (Obad 19, 21), the Negev (Obad 20) and the land of the Philistines (Obad 19). The book ends with the declarative statement that “the kingdom will be Yahweh’s.”

4. Interpretation.

The choice of interpretation once again depends on the decision to read Obadiah as an independent work or as part of the Book of the Twelve, and though such readings emphasize different theological aspects, they are not contradictory. When read on its own, Obadiah reflects the similar concerns of other passages that depict the destruction of Edom found throughout the OT (Is 21:11-12; 34; Jer 49:7-22; Ezek 25:12-14; 35; Joel 3:19-21; Amos 1:11-12; 9:12; Mal 1:2-5). It has long been noted that Edom receives an inordinate amount of attention from the biblical prophets, though the reasons for this are not clear. For such a small nation, Edom appears no more hostile than any of the smaller kingdoms that surround Israel, and yet Obadiah is an entire book devoted to its destruction, a distinction given only to the superpower Assyria in Nahum. Such emphasis seems to reflect a historical tension between Edom and Israel that arose following the destruction of Jerusalem. From the viewpoint of Israel during the period of the exile, Edom had something to do with the destruction of Jerusalem and possibly the temple, or at least did not come to Israel’s aid during this destruction. Once Israel was weakened and in exile, Edom took advantage of his “brother” and moved into the Negev and occupied traditional Israelite territory. It is possible that such actions struck at the theological heart of Israel’s special relationship with Yahweh (Assis) and contradicted Israel’s belief that Yahweh chose Israel over Esau (Mal 1:2-5; cf. Gen 25:19-34).

From Israel’s exilic/postexilic viewpoint, and in light of these historical circumstances, was *Israel really Yahweh’s chosen people, or was it Esau/Edom? Did Israel’s sin cause Yahweh to abandon his people? Did Jerusalem’s destruction and Edom’s occupation of the land mirror Israel’s destruction and occupation of Canaan under Joshua? Had Yahweh revoked his promise to Israel? Obadiah reassures Israel of Yahweh’s faithfulness and provides answers to these questions by describing a fast-approaching day of reversal in which Yahweh will set things right and judge both Edom and the nations. Edom in particular will be held accountable for its actions and will be destroyed; and Mount Zion, not the mountains of Esau, will be restored. The people of Israel not only will return to their own land, but also will actually occupy Edom. Such a prophecy certainly would have reassured an Israelite group that was struggling to understand their situation and Yahweh’s actions in the years following the Babylonian destruction.

When Obadiah is read as part of the collection of the Book of the Twelve, however, the book takes on a more symbolic meaning and emphasizes Yahweh’s broader plan and purpose for the nations as a whole. The ultimate aim of his actions is to bring about their eventual repentance and inclusion into the eschatological kingdom of Zion (Mic 4:1-5). In the Book of the Twelve as a whole, Joel is the first to specifically introduce the concept of the Day of Yahweh (Joel 1:15). In Joel, the Day of Yahweh comes first against Israel (Joel 2:11) before the arrival of an eschatological age (Joel 2:28-32) in which Yahweh turns his attention toward the judgment of the nations (Joel 3:1-21) and lex talionis (Joel 3:4, 7). This division in the Day of Yahweh between Israel and the nations is realized in Amos and Obadiah, as Amos discusses the Day of Yahweh against Israel (Amos 5:18-20), and Obadiah outlines its implications for the nations (specifically Obad 15-21). In this reading, Edom, one of Israel's oldest enemies, becomes a symbol for all of Israel's traditional enemies. The destruction that faces Edom is therefore symbolic of the judgment that will face all nations that oppose Yahweh and his people.

Within the collection of the Twelve, Obadiah's message of absolute judgment, however, is quickly mitigated by Jonah's offer of grace. In the balance between Obadiah and Jonah, the broader picture of Yahweh's dealings with the nations is made evident. When Obadiah is read in light of Jonah, Obadiah's dreadful judgment that awaits all nations is not a foregone conclusion, and the opportunity for repentance remains. However, when Jonah is read in light of Obadiah, Jonah's message of grace toward the nations cannot be understood as a type of universalism. This nuanced balance of judgment and grace prepares the way for a new eschatological age (Mic 3:12—4:5) when a destroyed Zion is rebuilt, the nations are peacefully incorporated into Jerusalem, and the implements of war are no longer needed (Mic 4:3). That Nahum's message of Assyrian destruction has been separated from Jonah in the MT and is located immediately after Micah serves to reemphasize the seriousness of Obadiah's judgment and shows that Yahweh's requirement for inclusion and national repentance is a continual necessity, not a one-time act. Finally, the concern for the fate of Edom specifically and the nations generally is such an important theme that it is repeated in Malachi (Mal 1:2-5), the Twelve's concluding book.

PEACE, REST

Peace and rest are closely interconnected ideas in the Prophetic Books. When depicting current social and political realities, they refer to a state of existence characterized by security and prosperity. They also play an important role in the prophetic description of the future. In such passages rest and peace are an integral part of Yahweh's eschatological gift of *salvation. Finally, they are used by the prophets to explore various aspects of the human response to God—that is, belief in his power and obedience to his will.

1. The Vocabulary of Rest and Peace
2. Rest, Peace and War
3. The Eschatological Vision of Rest and Peace
4. The Prince of Peace
5. Rest and Peace as a Call to Trust and Obedience

1. The Vocabulary of Rest and Peace.

There are a number of Hebrew words related to the notion of rest and peace: šqt, “to be at rest, be peaceful and quiet” (šeget, “peace”); nwh, “to settle, repose, wait” (mēnūhā, mānōah, “resting place, rest”; naḥat, “rest, calmness”); rg, “to come to rest, be quiet” (margōa, margēa, “rest, resting place”); š'n, “to be at ease, be untroubled” (šā'anān, “carefree, undisturbed”); šlh, “to be quiet, at ease” (šālēw, “undisturbed, secure, prosperous”; šalwā, “security, prosperity”). The motifs of safety (beṭaḥ, from bṭh, “to trust”; ēmet, “firmness, trustworthiness”) and healing (rp) play an important role in prophetic descriptions of peace. The Hebrew word traditionally translated as “peace” is šālōm. It denotes wholeness, harmony, well-being and more specifically wealth, physical health, security, a state of satisfaction and ease, relationships of friendliness and communion (Stendebach, 17-20). In some passages it comes close in meaning to “salvation” (yēšū'a).

2. Rest, Peace and War.

“Peace” (šālōm) is used in a political sense to describe absence of war and bondage (Is 39:8 [parallel to ēmet, “security”]; Jer 14:13) and the resulting state of general well-being (Jer 29:7) and safety (beṭaḥ in Ezek 34:25, 27, 28; šalwā in Jer 22:21). Sword, famine and oppression deprive people of šālōm (Jer 8:15; 14:19b [here in parallel to tōb, “good,” and marpē, “healing”]; 12:12; Ezek 7:25) and rest (rg in Jer 50:33-34; nwh and šqt in Is 14:7; 23:12). In the book of Jeremiah the term šālōm comes up often in the context of polemic against the prophets of peace (Jer 4:10; 6:14; 8:11; 14:13 [together with ēmet]; Jer 23:17 [contrasted with rā'a, “calamity”]; Jer 28:9; cf. Ezek 13:10, 16) who apparently promised security and restoration of Judah's well-being, possibly on the basis of a belief in Zion's inviolability (Sisson, 430-33, 437-38). Similar polemic is reflected in Micah 3:5, where false prophets are criticized for proclaiming messages of well-being and prosperity (šālōm) to all who pay them (see also 1 Kings 22).

The promise of a life of security and peace becomes prominent in prophetic texts during and after the exile. Return from exile will lead to a life of tranquility (šqt), quietness (š'n in Jer 30:10; 46:27) and safety (beṭaḥ in Ezek 28:26) free from the oppression of enemies and from the fear of new invasions. The rest of the redeemed remnant is portrayed with the help of the image of a grazing flock (Zeph 2:7; 3:13). In the postexilic situation the promise of peace (šālōm, parallel in Jer 33:9 to tōbā, “good”) involves restoration (ʿārūkā), rebuilding of the nation, healing (marpē) the wounds of war and enjoying a life of joy, praise and forgiveness (Jer 33:6-9).

3. The Eschatological Vision of Rest and Peace.

The Babylonian *exile forms the background of the message of peace in Isaiah 49–55, but the rich imagery of these chapters transcends the confines of their original historical situation and points toward “a new exodus, a fundamental new salvific event described in the categories of creation” (Stendebach, 35). *Zion’s šālôm is based on the establishment of God’s royal rule (Is 52:7), manifestation of his glory (kābôd [Is 40:5]) and the arrival of his presence in the city (Is 40:3-11) as its true king. It begins with the announcement of Yahweh’s victory or salvation (yěšûʿâ) over the oppressor (Is 52:1-7) and the destruction of the power of evil (Is 51:9-11) and culminates in the restoration of the city, where peace (šālôm) abounds (Is 54:13), whose walls are made of precious stones (Is 54:11-12) and whose enemies are powerless (Is 54:14-17). This new age of security, prosperity, mercy and fruitfulness is compared to the renewal of creation after the flood (Is 54:9) and is confirmed by a “covenant of peace” (bērit šālôm) (Is 54:10; cf. Ezek 34:25, 37:26; also Hos 2:18-23) (see Batto, 188-92). This covenant indicates Yahweh’s commitment to restore the relationship not only between his people and himself but also between humanity and the cosmos at large (Goldingay, 443-45), thus rebuilding the primeval harmony of the created order (Batto). Isaiah 55:12-13 concludes this part of the book with the promise that Zion’s children will be led back to her in joy (šimhâ) and peace (šālôm), picking up the theme of departure (from Babylon) from Isaiah 52:11-12. The exodus imagery of Isaiah 52:11-12, however, gives way here to a more extravagant description of the journey from slavery to freedom. Nature is personified and transformed to celebrate the deliverance of God’s people. Peace stems from God who is a creator, redeemer and warrior, and describes the reality of life of fullness and joy in his royal presence when evil is defeated and creation is renewed.

A picture of universal peace, including not just *Israel but all the *nations of the world, is further developed in Isaiah 2:2-4 (= Mic 4:1-3).

Although there might be some differences between Isaiah and Micah in the way Israel’s relationship to the nations is envisaged during the age of peace (Sweeney), it is clear that this would be a time of complete cessation of war (cf. Hos 2:18, see also 4 below; Wolff, 115-16), the establishment of God’s worldwide royal rule and the elevation of Mount Zion as a universal center of *worship. Connection between temple and peace (šālôm) is also present in Haggai 2:1-9 (see the link between rest and temple in 2 Sam 7:1-2, 9-10). Here the gift of peace is the climax of a restoration process that includes the shaking of the cosmos and the nations and the confirmation of God’s presence among his people by filling the temple with glory (kābôd) (building on Ex 24:15-16; 40:34-35; 1 Kings 8:10-11) (see Assis, 593-94). In Haggai 2:5, 9, like in Isaiah 32:15, 17 (on which, see next paragraph), the giving of šālôm is related to the presence/pouring out of Yahweh’s spirit (rūah) on the community. This connection with temple and the spirit of Yahweh underlines the fact that true peace is not the outcome of human efforts but rather stems from God and comes only as a result of God’s indwelling among people.

As in the Deuteronomistic literature (see Roth), the giving of rest (nwh) is sometimes connected in prophetic texts to the fulfillment of God’s promises and the gift of the land after the exodus (Is 63:14). When rest is portrayed as something in the future, it depicts God’s eschatological gift of salvation and renewal (Is 32:15-20). The primary force that brings about this reality is the pouring out of the spirit (Is 32:15 [spirit and rest are connected also in Is 63:14]). As a result, the *wilderness is transformed into an orchard, suggesting the notion of fertility and agricultural abundance (peace involves prosperity also in Is 60:11, 16-17). The product of this transformation in Isaiah 32:18 is the establishment of a “habitation of peace” (něwēh šālôm), “secure dwellings” (mīškēnôt mibṭahīm) and “undisturbed resting places” (mēnūhôt šaʿānannôt) for God’s people. Peace (šālôm), tranquility (šqt) and security (betah) are explicitly described as the result of righteousness (šēdāqā) dwelling among the community (Is 32:17 [for the close connection between righteousness and peace, see also Is 9:7; 48:18; 60:17]) (see Justice, Righteousness). *Chaos, manifested in *sin and devastation (Is 32:9-14), is removed from nature and society and substituted by peace, understood as flourishing of the natural world and proper exercise of human authority (Goldingay, 443). This connection not just with absence of military threat but also with fertility and justice points to a meaning of peace as part of the divinely created cosmic, life-sustaining order (Steck, 55-59) disrupted by human sin and reestablished by Yahweh in the new age.

4. The Prince of Peace.

The connection between peace and righteousness is also stressed in the description of the royal figure in Isaiah 9:1-7. The oracle begins with the promise that God will bring glory, light and joy to people who walk in humiliation, darkness and anguish. This is achieved through putting an end to foreign dominion and an end to war itself (Is 9:4-5). An important step in this development is the birth or enthronement of a new Davidic ruler, the "Prince of Peace" (šar šālôm) (see Messiah). Of the four titles of the child in Isaiah 9:6, this last one seems to be especially significant because the notion of everlasting peace (šālôm 'ên qēs) is picked up and developed in the following verse. In light of the context, "peace" must refer to absence of war and the freedom from oppression and may be an alternative way of expressing the "rest from the enemies" theme in the original Davidic oracle in 2 Samuel 7. However, peace involves more than that. It is a necessary precondition for the establishment of the throne and kingdom of David with justice (mšpāt) and righteousness (šēdāqā). It is indispensable to a life of joy, stability and order, which the king raised by Yahweh will be instrumental in establishing (Williamson, 40-42). Although historically this oracle might reflect the period of Assyria's oppression of Israel and Judah, within its present literary and canonical context it acquires an added eschatological meaning. This is confirmed by Isaiah 11:6-9, where the new Davidic ruler (the shoot from the stump of Jesse—i.e., the second David [Is 11:1]) brings peace to the whole of creation lifting the Edenic curse, transforming the innate destructive instincts of the animal world and creating harmony and security.

Peace (šālôm) is one of the fruits of the suffering of Yahweh's *servant in Isaiah 53. It stands here in parallel to the healing (rp') of wounds (see also Is 38:17; 57:18-19; Jer 6:14; 8:15; 33:6) and *forgiveness of transgressions (Is 53:4-5) and describes a condition of both physical and spiritual wholeness achieved through harmonious relationship with God and the removal of sin. "Healing is a wide-ranging image for God putting things right where they were wrong" (Goldingay, 377), and so here both healing and peace must be equivalent in meaning to "salvation." Undoubtedly, the most striking feature of this passage is the proclamation that this peace is achieved for the speakers through the suffering that the servant undertook on their behalf. Therefore, even to a greater extent than the Prince of Peace in Isaiah 9:1-7, the Suffering Servant is instrumental in achieving the eschatological vision of restoration and peace described in Isaiah 52—55. The achievement, however, comes not through the use of power or the rule of righteousness but rather through suffering for others.

Two other prophetic texts connect the idea of peace with the figure of an earthly ruler. In Zechariah 9:9-10 we see the Davidic king appearing after Yahweh has reincorporated the neighbors of Israel into what might be a reestablishment of the Davidic empire (Zech 9:1-7). Much like Isaiah 9:1-7, the figure of the king is subordinated to and overshadowed by the power of God and is connected to the ideas of righteousness, end of war and an offer of peace (šālôm), not just to Israel but to all the nations. This may be interpreted to mean freedom for Judah from foreign oppression, but it could also encompass the idea of just order and state of general well-being for all nations (Stendebach, 40).

The figure of a ruler (môšēl) providing victory and security appears also in Micah 5:2-6. This is a second David, who comes, like the first David, from Bethlehem of Ephrathah (Mic 5:2). The main focus of the oracle, in Micah 5:4, is his power and ability to deliver his people from the enemies. By the power of Yahweh he will "shepherd" (r'h, "to feed, protect, rule") the nation and will enable it to dwell in security (yšb [the notion of security is either implied in the verb or has fallen out of the text]). The opening phrase of Micah 5:5, wēhāyā zeh šālôm, often is rendered "He will be the One of Peace" and is taken as a messianic title, similar to the "Prince of Peace," which sums up the king's achievements and significance. However, the translation of the phrase and its relationship to the immediate context are disputed (it can alternatively be translated “and this will be our peace” and related to what follows).

5. Rest and Peace as a Call to Trust and Obedience.

Rest and peace are not only a gift from God; they can be used to express an appropriate human response to God (note “to walk in peace [šālôm]” with God [Mal 2:6; cf. Is 27:5]). Sometimes a state of rest is a reflection of an attitude of trust in Yahweh. In Isaiah 30:15 Judah is reproached for having rejected repentance (šūbā), calm (naḥat), quietness (šqt) and trust (bithā), which would have resulted in victory (yš') and power (gēbūrā). This verse is commonly believed to come from the time of Hezekiah's rebellion against Sennacherib (705-701 BC), in which case the rest and quietness would mean refraining from rebellion against Assyria and from seeking Egypt's help. This is confirmed by the following verse, which contrasts rest and trust in Yahweh to riding on horses (i.e., engaging in military activities). Similar is the situation in which Isaiah confronts King Ahaz with the command to be calm (šqt) when facing the challenge of northern Israel and Damascus during the Syro-Ephramite war (Is 7:4). This is not so much a call to political inactivity as an encouragement to believe ('mm) in Yahweh (Is 7:9) and to have confidence in his power to help. Ahaz's fear and his reliance on Assyria's assistance are expressions of his unbelief. The more general point is that on certain occasions human action may imply reliance on one's own strength and rejection of God's plans. In such situations rest, refraining from activity and waiting on God to intervene, is faith demonstrated in practice.

In other situations, however, being at ease can imply an attitude of complacency and therefore is condemned as sinful. This is the case with the leadership of Jerusalem and Samaria whose life of luxury betrays their arrogance and lack of concern for the welfare of their people. Being at ease (ša'ānān) and feeling secure (bth) results in indifference to the challenge of the prophetic message (Amos 6:1; cf. Zeph 1:12). The ease (ša'ānān) and security (bth) of the daughters of Zion in Isaiah 32:9-11 are in stark contrast to the ease (cf. the “untroubled resting places” [mēnūhōt ša'ānannōt] in Is 32:18) and security (betah [Is 32:17]; cf. the “secure dwellings” [mīškēnōt mibṭahīm] in Is 32:18) given by Yahweh to his people later on in the same passage. Sodom is also condemned for living a life of prosperity (“excess of food”), security (šalwā) and ease (šqt) without any concern for the poor (Ezek 16:49).

Obedience to God's commandments leads to a life of harmony and peace. In Zechariah people are called to render “judgment of peace” (mīšpat šālôm) (Zech 8:16) and to “love truth [ēmet] and peace [šālôm]” (Zech 8:19). The context shows that this involves striving to promote society where justice is practiced, where harmony and integrity characterize relationships, and where there is a passionate concern for the poor and the helpless (taking into account the parallel calls in Zech 7:9-10). In contrast, the wicked do not practice justice (mīšpāt), and so they do not know the way of peace (šālôm) (Is 59:8). Consequently, there is no šālôm for them (Is 48:22; cf. Jer 30:5), and they are “are unable to rest [šqt]” (Is 57:20-21). They will experience neither the redemption of the new exodus promised to Jacob (Is 48:20-21) nor the healing (rp') and peace (šālôm) given by God to his people (Is 57:18-19). Only those who trust (bth) in the Lord will find peace (šālôm), even in the midst of chaos and battle (Is 26:3), and those who are obedient to God's will and commandments will find rest (margōa') in the face of the difficulties and challenges of life (Jer 6:16).

PERFORMANCE CRITICISM

Performance criticism is a critical methodology used to analyze the way in which repeatable and socially recognizable events (e.g., theater, parade, graduation, political inauguration) use specific techniques to powerfully express social values and themes. The application of the methodology to the prophetic literature of the Old Testament is based on the premise that select portions of the OT are literary variations of originally oral compositions presented or recited before live audiences. "Thus says the LORD" and "Hear the word of the LORD" are two common introductions found throughout the Hebrew prophets that, in many important ways, symbolize the whole of the prophetic enterprise. Both phrases imply the oral delivery of an identifiable, repeatable message to an audience. Both phrases announce a performance.

Embedded in the prophetic literature of the OT are echoes of the prophetic performance, only now layered over and sometimes co-opted by a scribal performance. The media transferability (from oral to written or vice versa) of performative structures, conventions and characteristics results in the ghosting or echo of those original performances in the written form the material has now assumed within the pages of the biblical text. Performance criticism, applied to the Hebrew prophets, is designed to elucidate performance dynamics and the manner in which the prophetic performance was captured and reused in a scribal presentation.

1. Performance as Event
2. Performance Criticism and Its Relation to Other Methodologies
3. Performance Criticism's Building Blocks
4. Application to the Prophets of the OT

1. Performance as Event.

Performances are events that occur in a variety of forms and are not limited to stage or formal theater. Yet, in whatever venue presented, performance utilizes recognizable conventions and structures that are used to facilitate communication. Performative events (e.g., prophesying, singing, sermonizing, debating, memorializing) have left their mark on portions of the biblical text. And just as a playwright's script can give clues to the nature and event of the performance, so too select portions of the biblical text are imbued with communicative conventions and structures that are particularly susceptible to analysis by performance criticism. Performance criticism is concerned with identifying, describing and analyzing a performative event in which there is the presentation of character and event by actors using formal patterns that might include movement, gesture, costume and speech in order to create a shared imagined reality between actor and spectator.

Performance can be a particular type of orality, and so the first step in determining the applicability of performance criticism to a literary text (biblical or otherwise) is detecting the clues of orality that remain in the literary text. Those clues include the language of immediacy, dialogue, spontaneity and "face-to-face" constructions that employ a denser number of verbs when compared to more distant and formal linguistic characteristics common in literary texts. These linguistic characteristics point us to a way of organizing thought, orally conceived and orally presented, that is distinct from the organization of thought commonly expressed in written texts. Oral presentations follow conventions of composition, content, structure and style just as distinct as those characteristic of literary works. And just as literary works can be categorized into groupings, so too oral presentations can be classified into different types of orality.

One type of oral presentation is performance and is identifiable by the particular performative mode of thought in which performances were conveyed and characteristics of which still reside embedded in the written literature. A performative mode of thought is a way of thinking that engages both the cognitive and imaginative aspects of thought to conceive of reality not in propositions, but in actions and being. Similar to the notion of dramatic imagination, a performative mode of thought is the shared imaginative space of performance where the performer/presenter and the spectator meet. That shared imaginative space of performance often is used as a means of examining social conflict and crises, as well as an imaginative vision for social unity and conflict resolution. Prophetic performances are reiterated behaviors addressing periods of crisis or uncertainty that accompany individual or cultural transitions, often presenting an imagined resolution.

2. Performance Criticism and Its Relation to Other Methodologies.

Performance criticism takes its place alongside the methodologies within the historical-critical approach. As applied to the OT, performance criticism, in conjunction with *form criticism, *rhetorical criticism and, to some degree, narrative criticism, provide multiple lenses through which to see and understand better the dynamics of communication at work in particular texts, especially those texts with oral presentations at their origin. In some important ways, analysis done using performance criticism is similar to the types of discussions that take place in both form-critical and rhetorical-critical investigations. The major difference, however, between performance criticism and form or rhetorical criticism is that, as usually conducted, form and rhetorical criticisms are literary criticisms of structures, types or literary genres and the social settings in which they were used, whereas performance criticism focuses on the event or the dynamic complex of action of a performance and the social settings in which those events occurred. Performance criticism shares with rhetorical criticism an interest in the presumed audience of either the performed or literary material. Within this array of methodologies, performance criticism offers its own unique contribution. Whereas form criticism may identify legends, epics, hymnic types and the like, and rhetorical criticism focuses on the stylistic features of prose and poetry (again literary types) that help make the composition persuasive and influential, performance criticism considers movement, voice, costume, dialogue, activity and the way events play out in performative episodes built upon particular act-schemes.

Performance criticism is also linked to cognitive studies. Cognition, it is suggested, is itself an embodied action that contributes to the enactment of the surrounding world, helping to create that world and give it meaning on both the page and in the body. Performance, whether traditionally theatrical or not, mirrors this process of "embodied action," or our ability to represent what we perceive through some kind of embodied enactment: preaching, prophesying, oration, narration, singing and so on. The relationship between the performed and the real is at the heart of the prophetic experience.

3. Performance Criticism's Building Blocks.

As with other critical methodologies, there are several core principles that help to give performance criticism its shape and unique contribution. Below are brief descriptions of the more central concepts that have particularly useful applicability to the OT. This list by no means exhausts the possibilities; it simply creates a framework for understanding a performance-critical approach.

3.1. Medium Transferability. Medium transferability is the ability of communication conventions and structures to transfer between an oral and a written medium. Although not unique to a performance-critical analysis alone, the medium transferability of performative material is important for the application of performance criticism to the biblical text. Performative material is media transferable in two ways. First, performance is not a specific genre or form, such as play or mime, but is an event that occurs in a variety of forms. School graduations, sermons and political speeches are just as performative as are parades, plays and operas. Performative dynamics apply to all. Those performative dynamics were hard at work particularly in those parts of the OT tradition that began as oral presentation. Those performance dynamics helped to form the bundle of conventions enabling communication. A transference, of sorts, occurs when conventions used expressly for recognizable formal performance are transferred to events not formally performance (graduations, sermons, etc.).

There is a second manner in which medium transferability applies to the performance criticism of the OT. The echo of those performance conventions remains present in the text of the OT. Just as a playwright's script gives clues about the actual performance of the play, so too clues of oral presentation and performance remain embedded in the OT. The oral presentations that became the literary text of the OT follow conventions just as formal as those in the literary text. In fact, an appreciation of those performance conventions can help explain certain characteristics of the literary text. The manner in which performance conventions are media transferable (oral to written) allows for their continued presence in the pages of the OT.

Prophetic performers delivered speeches and other live presentations, the text of some now appearing in the prophetic literature. But, in the prophetic literature the text of the prophetic speech is recontextualized into the written drama now presented by the scribe. The media transference of the prophetic performance into a literary text causes the prophetic actor of the oral performance to become a prophetic character in the scribal performance of the literary text. The prophetic performance is past. The prophetic performer is gone. What remains are texts in which the prophetic actor lives on as a prophetic character in the drama fashioned by the scribe. With the transformation of prophetic actor into prophetic character, control over the prophetic message transfers from the prophet to the scribe.

3.2. Act-scheme. An act-scheme is the structural organization of the performance event. Dramatic structure is governed by a socially dynamic process of selection and feedback resulting in recognizable literary and performance structures that are shared by both performers and spectators. Act-schemes generally fall into one or more categories, such as acts of glorification, acts of illusion, acts of skill and acts of re-creation. Under these larger categories one may find specific articulations: parades, tragedies and comedies, gladiatorial combats and circuses, and reenactments. Each of these, in turn, relies on units of performed activity, the way prophetic literature ultimately relies on someone engaging in the act of prophesying. A simple example of an act of re-creation appears in 1 Kings 22, where Zedekiah sought to signify a military victory by donning horns of iron to perform before the kings of Judah and Israel. Prophetic oracles, visions and narratives often are constructed to form extended series of act-schemes. The dialogues early in Habakkuk or the narrative of domestic intrigue in Hosea are examples of act-schemes giving structure to performances. Act-schemes are the building blocks out of which a performance is formed. The logic applied to the structure and sequencing of the act-schemes is as recognizable as the logic that governs sentences and paragraphs in plot formation of a literary text. Patterns of repetition and variation of themes created by the act-scheme structure can be found in some portions of the biblical literature. Each of the visions in the series spanning Amos 7—8 has its own integrity, but together they form a progression of acts leading to a climax and resolution.

3.3. Audience, Act, Actor. The relationship between the audience and the act (the thing witnessed) is a critical component to performance criticism. As content and structure (act-scheme) come to life in performance, a dynamic exchange occurs between the act and the audience. Shapes, sounds, colors, movements, words, intonations, images—all swirl before the audience, giving the audience something to respond to. This something is both real and imagined. It is the place, in performance, where the audience unites with the performance by identification with shared or conflicting values and belief. This connection is most often brought about by the actor/presenter, whose human presence makes the event possible. The performer transcends the ordinary and real by calling the spectator into the realm of the imagined action of the performance. The transformation of a spectator into an audience occurs when performer and spectator meet in that imagined realm of performance. This meeting between audience and actor, in the place of performance, constitutes the powerful moment of transformation seen in the audience response formula during the temple dedication performance (2 Chron 7:3). Likewise, the rhetorical questions scattered throughout the prophetic oracles have the effect of creating an audience by drawing the spectator into the performance space. The anticipated and repeated audience response of “Lo! Lo!” (Heb for “No! No!”) to the rhetorical questions of Amos 6:12 becomes a moment of self-incrimination as the prophetic performer skillfully uses the audience’s own implied response to drive home his social judgment (the “Lo Debar” phrase of Amos 6:13). The same skill is apparent in the oracles against foreign *nations in Amos 1—2. Here, the prophetic performer wins a hearing before a hostile Israelite audience by first pronouncing judgment on surrounding people groups in a fashion that his immediate audience would have found quite appealing. Audience formation is, therefore, a major component of performance and performance criticism. This notion of audience formation is similar to the concerns of reader-response analysis and rhetorical criticism of literature. In that the audience formation dynamics are found in events, the echo of which resides in select portions of literature, the patterns and conventions examined by performance criticism are not the same as those analyzed by rhetorical criticism.

3.4. Iconic Presentation, Dialectic Presentation.

Content and structure (act-scheme), dynamically shaped through performance (act-audience relationship), are interchanges of either iconic or dialectic modes of presentation. These two modes of presentation are perhaps the most crucial concepts to the development of a performance-critical approach to the Bible. Understanding iconic and dialectic modes of presentations is essential to moving outside of the literary frame and into the realm of performance. Iconic modes of presentation stress being, while dialectic modes of presentation stress becoming. Iconic modes of presentation tend to present, celebrate and reify who we are, while dialectic modes of presentation stress conflict, tension and change. Under the iconic mode of presentation, a variety of celebratory forms and genres have emerged: parades, exhibitions, processions, promenades, demonstrations, pageants, liturgical celebrations and so on. Dialectic modes tend to be those forms and genres more closely associated with specific theater and drama traditions: tragedies, comedies, dramas, musicals and operas.

The two modes of presentation are not impermeable and often exist side by side or share performance events. The iconic can contain the dialectic, and vice versa. For example, in the midst of a military parade, a clearly iconic form of presentation, a small battle can be staged that brings about the demise of the enemy, suggesting the dialectical conflict and tension of achieving victory. The ways in which iconic and dialectic modes of presentation take form, or are manifest from age to age, are determined by the same social, religious, political and economic forces that shape so many other aspects of culture. Both modes can be found in the prophetic literature. Amos 7:10-14 presents a concise dialectic mode stressing the becoming of the tension between the prophet and the religious elite of Israel that gives power and force to the being of moral tension found in the iconic oracles of the same book (Amos 1-6). This technique of forcefully counterpositioning iconic and dialectic is scattered throughout the OT, illustrated clearly by songs found in prose contexts. The exodus narrative leading up to Exodus 15 tells a story, a becoming, that unfolds with the plot of the story. That becoming is interrupted by the song in Exodus 15, which stresses the being of those singing the song. In the singing of the song, the singers adopt the story as their own. The same is true of Deborah's song in Judges 5, and this juxtaposition of becoming and being helps explain the anachronistic or conflicting details between the songs and the prose.

3.5. Explicit and Implicit Activity. Explicit and implicit activity are patterns of activity (movement, behavior) embedded in many parts of the OT. Singing, prophesying, preaching, teaching, arguing and debating are examples of some of the explicit activities that form the basis of various performative patterns. Wherever explicit activity (such as prophesying or singing) is present, a series of implicit questions must be asked. How did the prophet prophesy? Where was the prophet standing? How was the prophet's voice altered in tone or pitch? When and where did the prophet move, gesture? We may not be able to definitively answer all these questions, but they provide a way into the oral and performed world of the Bible, which can impact our understanding of the text. They are questions that seek to draw out the nature of the activity (natural/artificial, real/virtual) embedded in the text. Often, clues to that implicit activity remain in the literary variation of the performance. For example, in the introduction to a series of oracles in Amos 1:2 the prophetic performance begins, "The LORD roars from Zion." It is unimaginable that this introduction was given in anything but the most powerful and intimidating tone of voice, in both volume and pitch. This implied performed activity, although still attested, loses its force of presence in the literary rendition. Clues to implied activity, like stage directions in a script, are still present in the biblical prophetic text.

3.6. Project. The project of a character is the concrete focal point of the character's energy. The project includes the character's intention and the activities or manners in which that intention is pursued. In fulfilling a project, a character meets with resistance, and tension is formed. The tension provides to the audience varying degrees of intensity that facilitate the audience's participation in the imagined space of shared values or beliefs intended by the performer. The series of visions in Amos 7-8, in-interrupted by the prophetic narrative of Amos 7:10-14, provides a good illustration of the varied levels of intensity employed to develop the prophetic character's project. Here the project is the announcement of punishment on Israel while maintaining empathetic identification with Israel. The threat of punishment ebbs and flows, drawing the audience ever deeper into the performance, while the resistance and tension in pursuing the project are given concrete dialectic expression in the conflict with Amaziah. The manner in which the project is given form in the act-schemes of the performance follows socially recognized conventions—conventions that may not be the same as those giving shape to literature. The media transference of the performed act-scheme into literature may account for the problematic duplications, inconsistencies and awkward transitions that sometimes occur in the prophetic literature. Here, in Amos 7, it explains the insertion of the prophetic narrative interrupting the vision sequence.

4. Application to the Prophets of the OT.

4.1. Preclassical Prophets. Moses and Miriam, both remembered as prophetic personages, perform songs—that is, iconic presentations—intended to help shape Israel's communal memory and identity. The extended story of Samuel interweaves the projects of Samuel, Eli and the Lord, changing the trajectory of Samuel and establishing an origin story for the Davidic monarchy. The oracles of Balaam (both in the biblical text and the Deir 'Alla texts) provide evidence of the performative mode of thought that, through prophetic embodiment, sought to bring together the real and imagined into moments of cultural transition, both within Israelite lore and without. The stories of Elijah and Elisha are replete with the recounting of acted-out events giving life and power to the message of the prophets.

4.2. Classical Prophets. The literature of the classical prophets in the OT has long been appreciated for its poetic elegance. The material flows majestically and abounds with signals, clues and explicit references to its original oral delivery. That oral quality has provided the springboard for performance-critical analysis. The literature of the classical prophets, most obviously the prophetic oracles and other recorded speech events, has provided a fertile field for performance-critical analysis resulting in a deeper understanding of the relationship between actor, character and audience as developed within the literature. Hosea, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Zephaniah, Isaiah and Amos have been considered through performance-critical analyses. For example, the oracles against the foreign nations of Amos 1:3—2:6 yield a rich understanding when considered through the performative concepts of explicit and implicit activity, iconic and dialectic modes of presentation, and project, resistance and tension. The oracles are, in performance-critical terms, the dialogue of an unfolding drama in which the actor (Amos) assumes a character (prophet of the Lord) in order to create a shared reality with the spectator in which the God of Israel invokes a shared identity of ethical obligation upon the audience.

Performance criticism is not limited to the speech events included in the prophetic literature. Hosea and Jonah are susceptible to new investigation as dramatic performances utilizing structures of act-schemes in the development of project. The mixture of narrative, oracle and prayer provide a balance of iconic and dialectic presentation that is especially powerful in creating a shared space between performer and audience.

In addition to providing a lens by which to view portions of the prophetic literature, performance criticism offers new suggestions concerning the social dynamics that produced the prophetic literature. The assumption of a smooth transition between the charismatic oration of the prophet and the scribal recording by the disciple has been challenged as a greater appreciation of the tension between performance event and written description or "script" suggests that the prophetic literature itself is a result of a social power struggle in which the prophetic performer lost control of the message, and prophecy came to an end. By some, at least, prophecy itself is viewed suspiciously (Zech 13:1-6). In the trajectory that led to the Hebrew prophetic literature, the Hebrew prophets leave their role of actor to become characters, given life in the presentation of another actor: the scribe with pen in hand.

PRAYER

In one important sense, prayer is understood as talking with *God. However, this description would include much of the process of divine revelation to and through those called by God to be his spokespersons—the prophets. Thus, we find many examples of the prophets talking with God in their vocational role.

More narrowly, one may look at prayer as the personal engagement with God that may include confession and *repentance, reflection and thanksgiving, praise and *worship, petition and intercession, and so on. Prayer is personal conversation with God, either individually or corporately—what S. Balentine calls "the drama of divine-human dialogue."

The English verb "pray" derives from the Latin precor, meaning "to beg, entreat, implore, plead." However, the practice of prayer in the OT in general and in the Prophetic Books in particular gives evidence of a much broader semantic range. For the prophets, "to pray" encompasses both various aspects of conversation with God and aspects of petition to God.

While a wide variety of individuals are presented as praying in the OT, the prophet often is presented in the role of praying for the welfare of the people. The priesthood was focused on cultic worship, while the prophet was the one who interceded in prayer (Johnson 1962, 58-60; 1979, 3, 68), Moses, Samuel, Elijah and Jeremiah being prime examples (see 6 below).

1. Terminology of Prayer
2. Basis of Prayer
3. Antecedents of Prayer
4. Types of Prayer
5. Auxiliaries of Prayer
6. Prophet as Intercessor

1. Terminology of Prayer.

The more common terms used in the OT for "prayer" are ṭēpillā (77x; 17x in the Prophetic Books [e.g., Is 1:15; 37:4; 56:7]) and the cognate verb pll Hithpael (e.g., Jer 29:12; 42:4), "to advocate, intercede." But other terms are used as well: ʿātar, "to plead, entreat" (e.g., Is 19:22); hānan, "to implore compassion" (e.g., Hos 12:4 [MT 12:5]; cf. Is 33:2); qārāʾ, "to call" upon God (e.g., 2 Sam 22:7; Ps 17:6; Jon 1:14); zāʿaq, "to cry out" (e.g., Ezek 11:13; Joel 1:14); šwʿ Piel, "to call for help" (e.g., Is 58:9; Jon 2:2 [MT 2:3]); dāraš, "to seek" God (Amos 5:4); and šāʿal, "to inquire, beg" (e.g., Is 7:11; Ezek 21:26; Jon 4:7). (For a helpful summary of the various forms of prayer found outside the Psalter, see Boda, 806-9.)

2. Basis of Prayer.

In the OT the basis of a conversation between persons or a people, on the one hand, and the supremely sovereign God of creation and history, on the other, is the *covenant relationship that God initiated by grace (see Deut 4:37; 7:6-8; 9:4-6; 10:15; Is 43:4; Jer 31:3). It is on the basis of this covenant that people are “known” by God as “my people” (e.g., Is 19:18-25; Hos 1:9-11) and they “know” God as “my God” (e.g., Hos 2:19-23). Thus, many of the recorded conversations demonstrate being grounded in the covenant and covenant expectations—for example, Hezekiah’s plea that God would “remember” (Is 38:3) how Hezekiah had faithfully lived in light of the Shema (Deut 6:4-9) and Jeremiah’s various wrestlings with God (Jer 11—20) as set against the consolation of covenant surety in Jeremiah 30—33 (esp. Jer 30:2, 22; 31:2-3, 31-34; 32:37-42; 33:3, 6-9, 14-18, 19-22, 25-26).

3. Antecedents of Prayer.

Examples of prayer in the period of the prophets reflect the influence of the five books of Moses—the Torah.

In their prayer conversations with God, Abraham and Sarah are challenged by Yahweh, “Is anything too difficult for Yahweh?” (Gen 18:14). Jeremiah picks up on this theme when he prays to Yahweh, “O Lord Yahweh! Look, it is you who made heaven and earth by your great power and by your outstretched arm! Nothing is too hard for you!” (Jer 32:17). Modeled after the intercessory roles of Abraham (Gen 18:23-32) and Moses (Ex 32:11-14; Deut 9:26), Jeremiah prays, “O great and mighty God” and rehearses key themes of the Torah narrative (Jer 32:17-22). And Yahweh replies, “Look here! I am Yahweh—God of all flesh—is anything too hard for me?” (Jer 32:27).

Anchored in the covenant promises to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and David, Daniel prays in *exile too, “O Lord, the great and awesome God who maintains the covenant and steadfast love,” as he confesses breach of covenant on the part of the covenant community (Dan 9:4). Similarly, in the setting of the public reading of Torah the Levites pray to the God of creation and of history and of covenant, “So now, our God, the great, the mighty and awesome God who keeps covenant and loyal love . . .” (Neh 9:32).

These examples reflect Moses’ reference to Yahweh as “God of gods and Lord of lords, the great, the mighty, the awesome God” of the covenant (Deut 10:17). In the face of Israel’s rebellion, Moses engages in candid dialogue with the Lord in Numbers 14:11-35, standing in, as it were, between Israel and the Lord, and pleads that the Lord’s “great power” and integrity (promise) (Num 14:17) be demonstrated by the Lord graciously being “slow to anger and abounding in steadfast love, forgiving iniquity and transgression” (cf. Ex 34:6-7) while holding the unrepentant accountable.

Beyond the Torah, the Psalter provides examples of prayer that can be seen reflected in a number of the prayers in the prophets (e.g., Jer 10:23-25 [cf. Ps 6:1; 38:1; 79:6-7]; Jer 17:12-18 [cf. Ps 54:1; 60:5; 88:15; 35:4, 8, 26]). W. Holladay notes that P. Bonnard argued that Jeremiah influenced thirty-three of the Psalms, but J. Bright concluded that Jeremiah was influenced by the psalmists. Holladay concludes that there is little reason not to think that influence may have been exerted in both ways (Holladay, 245-46). In the aftermath of his painful confrontation with the chief priest (Jer 20:1-6), Jeremiah prays and laments, “For I hear whispering of many, ‘Terror on every side!’” (Jer 20:10a), which echoes verbatim the line in the lament attributed to David in Ps 31:13.

4. Types of Prayer.

There are two main sorts of prayers exhibited in the prophets: (1) talking to God or conversation; (2) asking God for something or petition (Miller, 32-38).

Types of conversational prayer include reflection on God, his attributes and works; consecration to God; expressions of thanksgiving, adoration and praise. Types of petitionary prayer include confession and penitence, supplication, and intercession. Complaints or *laments include both talking to God and petitioning God for relief. Individual believers talked with God directly in a variety of settings and circumstances. But prayer was also an integral part of public worship, so that one of the designations of the *temple in Jerusalem was the “house of prayer” (e.g., Is 56:7; Jer 7:11; 32:16-25; Jon 2:2-9; Dan 9:3-19).

4.1. Reflection. In spite of the vicissitudes of life and fearful threats, prayers of the prophets demonstrate a conviction that, by his grace, Yahweh is the one-of-a-kind savior (e.g., Is 12:1-6). Even though God has cause to be angry, the believer reflects on God’s grace to turn his anger away: “Look! God is my salvation [yěšû‘ā]; I will trust and not fear, because my strength and my might is Yahweh God!" (Is 12:2).

The prophet Isaiah speaks with God, addressing him as an "everlasting rock" (Is 26:4) and the "upright one" (Is 26:7). And Jeremiah reflects on God and declares, "There is no one like you, O Yahweh! You are great, and great is your name in power! Who would not be afraid of you, O king of the nations, because it is your due! For among all the nations' sages and in all their kingdoms there is no one like you!" (Jer 10:6-7). Again, in Jeremiah 16:19-20 the prophet reflects on the uniqueness of God. And Daniel reflects on God's attributes: "O Lord, the great and awesome God who maintains the covenant and steadfast love with those who love him and who pay attention to his instructions" (Dan 9:4).

4.2. Consecration. The strong sense of being set apart to God is seen in the dialogue between the believer and God. As Isaiah is gripped by an awareness of God's "otherness," he is keenly aware of his personal need to be consecrated to God (Is 6:5). And to God's cleansing act and invitation to now take up a mission, the one forgiven and purified responds, "Here I am, send me!" (Is 6:8). Jeremiah 1:4-10 presents a dialogue between the prophet and God that focuses on consecration. Here, the claim is that God "consecrated" Jeremiah before he was even born, which consecration is bolstered by the affirmation "I am with you"—Emmanuel theology.

4.3. Thanksgiving. In the Prophetic Books are examples of the grateful spirit evidenced in the Psalter. As in the Psalter, so in the prophets, prayers of thanksgiving may be retrospective and also prospective. Isaiah, anticipating God's making all things right, anticipates a prayer of thanksgiving: "I will thank you, Yahweh, for though you were angry with me, your anger turned away, and you comforted me. Look! God is my salvation, I will trust and not fear. . . . Give thanks to Yahweh, call on his name; among the nations give exposure to his deeds; cause them to remember that his name is exalted" (Is 12:1, 4). Even under threat of death, Daniel challenges his compatriots, "Blessed be the name of God forever and ever. . . . To you, O God of my fathers, I give thanks and praise" (Dan 2:20, 23).

4.4. Adoration and Praise. Attributing worth to God, who alone deserves true worship, is a significant theme in the prophets (e.g., Is 2:5:16; 12:1-6; 33:5; 42:9-13; 63:6-8; Jer 17:12; 20:12-14; 33:8-10). Praise and adoration are themes of prophetic prayers. For example, Isaiah 25:1-12 begins with a prayer song in exaltation of God: "O Yahweh, you are my God; I will exalt you, I will praise your name because you have done marvelous things, plans made long ago with perfect faithfulness" (Is 25:1). In the context of Daniel's thanksgiving just mentioned, he expresses adoration and praise: "Wisdom and might belong to him [God]. It is he who changes times and seasons; he removes kings and raises kings up; he gives wisdom to the sages and knowledge to those who have understanding. It is he who reveals what is profoundly obscure; he knows what is in the dark, and light dwells with him" (Dan 2:20-22).

One important corollary to the themes of adoration and praise is the theme of God's reputation. The motivation for answering the prayer with grace is for the sake of God's good name. So, for example, Jeremiah prays for God to respond in grace in spite of Judah's sin: "Though our sins testify against us, O Yahweh, act for the sake of your own reputation" (Jer 14:7); "Do not reject us, for the sake of your own reputation; do not dishonor your glorious throne; remember and do not revoke your covenant" (Jer 14:21).

4.5. Confession and Penitence. From the Torah through the former prophets and especially in the Psalter the significance of a contrite and pure heart is highlighted. It is worth noting how the prophets, rather than wagging their finger at their audience, personally identify with their community in confessing and asking forgiveness. Perhaps the most striking example of prophetic identification with a people under judgment is found in Daniel 9, where Daniel confesses with, not for, his people: "We have sinned and done wrong and acted wickedly and revolted, even removing your instructions and your justice. And we would not listen to your servants the prophets who spoke in your name to our kings, our princes, to our fathers and to all the people of the land. . . . To us, O Lord, belongs humiliation just as this day—to the men of Judah, to the residents of Jerusalem and to all Israel, those who are near and those far away in all the countries to which you have driven them because of the infidelity that they committed against you" (Dan 9:5-7). And in Jeremiah 10:23-25 the prophet gives voice to the penitent confession of his flock: "Discipline me, O Yahweh, but with justice, not out of your anger, lest you bring me to nothing" (Jer 10:24).

4.6. Supplication. Earnest requests may be personal or vicarious. Deeply discouraged, Jeremiah pleads on his own behalf, "O Yahweh, heal me and I will be healed; save me and I will be saved, for you are my praise. . . . Do not be a terror to me; you are my refuge in the day of disaster. Let my persecutors be put to shame; do not let me be shamed" (Jer 17:14-18). And in Jeremiah 32 he pleads for understanding and wisdom. On the other hand, Isaiah 33:1-6 is an example of supplication on behalf of the community: "O Yahweh, be gracious to us; in you we hope! Be our strength every morning, our salvation in the time of trouble" (Is 33:2).

4.7. Intercession. In the face of Sennacherib's slander of Yahweh, Hezekiah intercedes for the sake of Yahweh's reputation, "so all the kingdoms of the earth will know that you alone are Yahweh" (Is 37:20). In 1 Kings 13:6 King Jeroboam asks the prophet from Judah, "Please appease the face of the LORD your God" on his behalf. Jeremiah reminds his audience that Hezekiah feared the Lord, and that he "appeased the face of the LORD, so the LORD changed his mind" (Jer 26:19). In Zechariah 7 the citizens of Bethel send emissaries to ask the priests and prophets to "appease the face of the LORD." Daniel, in his intercessory prayer, indicates that "appeasing the face of the LORD" involves "repentance from guiltiness," on the one hand, and "understanding [God's] truth," on the other (Dan 9:13) (see 6 below).

4.8. Lament. The prophets, following their brothers and sisters in the faith, prayed personal or individual laments. Rather than grousing about God behind his back, as it were, they candidly approached God directly with their complaint. For example, having recounted the evidence of Yahweh's steadfast love and grace in the past as he redeemed his people in order to establish for himself "a glorious name," Isaiah foresees a time when, although the exile has formally ended, God will seem distant and disinterested. Against this setting, the prophet gives voice in Isaiah 63:15—64:12 to the people's prayer of lament that their hearts had become hard, and begging that an intimate faith relationship be restored.

After an episode in Jeremiah's ministry that was particularly physically painful, emotionally humiliating and spiritually draining (Jer 20:1-6), Jeremiah confronts God directly in lamentation (Jer 20:7-13). The laments in Jeremiah, in keeping with the laments found in the Psalter, indicate that believers were not reticent to express their disappointments and to present, unvarnished, their complaints, even accusations. And God is not offended by the candor. And, as is typical of these lament prayers, in the process of laying it all out on the table before the God of the universe, the supplicant gains perspective that fosters confidence of faith. And then the hurting complainant confesses: "But Yahweh is with me like a dreaded warrior; therefore, my persecutors will be tripped up, they will not succeed. They will be deeply shamed because they will have failed with an everlasting humiliation that will never be forgotten. O LORD of the whole world, who examines the righteous, who sees heart and mind, let me see your retribution on them, because it is to you that I have disclosed my complaint! You all, sing to Yahweh! Praise Yahweh, you all! For he has rescued the life of the needy from the hand of evildoers!" (Jer 20:11-13). The conclusion: God, the "accused," is indeed trustworthy after all!

5. Auxiliaries of Prayer.

5.1. Body Language. In addition to the verbal expressions of prayer, supplicants often expressed themselves by body language. For example, the supplicants may humbly kneel before God (e.g., Dan 6:10) or fall on their face (e.g., Ezek 9:8; 11:13). They may imploringly raise their hands (e.g., Jer 4:31; Lam 1:17; 2:19; 3:41).

5.2. Fasting. Fasting may accompany prayer as an aspect of expressing grief and lament or of contrition and penance or of supplication, such as Daniel does: "I turned my face to the Lord God, seeking him in prayer and pleas for compassion with fasting, sackcloth and ashes. And I prayed to the LORD my God and confessed" (Dan 9:2-4 [cf. Joel 1:14; Jon 3:4-6]).

6. Prophet as Intercessor.

There is a sense in which the role of the prophet in Israel paralleled the role of the priest. In the case of the latter, the role was as sacerdotal mediator. In the case of the former, the role was communicative: speaking on God's behalf to the people and interceding with God on the people's behalf (Samuel [2 Sam 12:19, 23; 15:11]; Isaiah [2 Kings 19:1-7]; Jeremiah [Jer 7:16; 37:3; 42:2, 4, 20]; Ezekiel [Ezek 9:8; 11:13]; Amos [Amos 7:2, 5]) (see von Rad 1965, 2:51). This role filled by Moses and Samuel is contrasted with how the people's intransigence rendered ineffectual Jeremiah's exercise of the normative role (e.g., Jer 7:16; 11:14; 14:11; 15:1-4).

This role played out by the prophets during the Israelite monarchy is foreshadowed by the intercession earlier of prophets such as Abraham (e.g., Gen 18:16-33; 20:7) and Moses (e.g., Ex 32:11-14; Num 11:1-3), who "stood in the breach" between God and people (Ps 106:23). Intercession is a significant element of the prophetic ministries of Samuel (e.g., 1 Sam 7:5; 12:19, 23) and Elijah (e.g., 1 Kings 18:36-39). The prophet Isaiah's intercessory role can be seen in vignettes such as Sennacherib's siege of Judah (2 Kings 19:1-7; Is 37:1-7).

PROPHECY, HISTORY OF

Prophets and prophetesses in the OT were spokespersons for God who announced God's will or intentions for people, or predicted the future, or did both. The noun prophecy designates the contents of those utterances, and the verb prophesy designates the actions involved in receiving and delivering the divine messages. Prophesying in ancient Israel varied from actions performed by persons of diverse occupations to the actions of recognized functionaries associated with prophetic groups and/or with temples and royal houses. Israelite prophecy, moreover, had a history, which can be traced at least partially. In tracing that history, this article will situate prophecy within the context of the *canon and of ancient *Israel and then follow its development in the OT.

10. Conclusion: An End of Prophecy?

1. Prophets and the Canon.

The three divisions of the Jewish canon are Torah (Law), Nebiim (Prophets) and Ketubim (Writings). In this structure, the *Law stands at the heart of the revelation; the Prophets and the Writings surround and elaborate the Law but do not contradict it. The Prophets themselves are divided into two groups: Former (Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings) and Latter (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Book of the Twelve). The Christian canon, following the divisions of the LXX, differs in that it has a fivefold structure: the books of law, history (containing among other things the Former Prophets), poetry, the Major Prophets and the Minor Prophets. Its structure is temporal: past (Pentateuch and history books), present (poetic books) and future (prophetic books). The Major Prophets are Isaiah, Jeremiah, Lamentations, Ezekiel and Daniel; the Minor Prophets are (in the same order as the Book of the *Twelve in the Hebrew canon) Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi. The order of the first six books, or collections, within the Twelve in LXX, by contrast, is Hosea, Amos, Micah, Joel, Obadiah and Jonah. That order leaves together the eighth-century BC collections Hosea, Amos and Micah, whereas the MT intersperses them with three others. It is neither necessary nor possible to say which order is primary. Each serves its own purpose. One manuscript among the *Dead Sea Scrolls, 4QXIIa, places Jonah last, but M. A. Sweeney suggests that the people of Qumran arranged the order of biblical books to suit their own needs (Sweeney 1:xxviii37).

The canonical sequence of “the Law and the Prophets” goes back at least to the time of the writing of Malachi 4:4-6 (MT 3:22-24), which refers to the lawgiver Moses and the prophet Elijah. These references suggest that the Pentateuch and the prophetic corpus (both Former and Latter Prophets), and probably including the Twelve as a whole, was seen as constituting a line of inspired writings. The date of Malachi 4:4-6 is debated, but it cannot be earlier than the writing of Malachi, traditionally placed in the mid-fifth century BC, nor later than about the beginning of the second century BC (Schmid, 207). The rabbinic writing Pirke ’Abot describes the relationship between Torah and Nebiim as follows: “Moses received Torah from Sinai and delivered it to the elders, the elders to the prophets, and the prophets delivered it to the men of the Great Assembly.” In other words, the prophets bridged the gap between the revelation at Sinai to Moses and the rabbis (Blenkinsopp, 24). Even so, that distinction is too neat; the pentateuchal texts themselves speak occasionally of prophets, and the Prophetic Books quote and allude to the Pentateuch. Prophets, moreover, were not unique to Israel. They flourished also in ancient Egypt, Mesopotamia and Mari, beginning before the patriarchal period, in fact (see Ancient Near Eastern Prophecy).

2. Prophets, Prophetesses and Their Relationships to Other Groups in Ancient Israel.

An old saying goes, “No one lives in a vacuum, let alone prophesies in one.” Even the messages of a prophet or prophetess are contextualized by their own experiences and thought processes, the language they use, the world they try to interpret, and the audience(s) to or for whom they speak and with whom they otherwise interact. It is useful, therefore, to survey the terms and phrases used in the HB to designate people who seem to have fallen under the general heading of “prophet.”

2.1. Major Terms Denoting Prophets. The most important term for such intermediaries in the OT is *nābî*⁷. The word is used about four hundred times, and the verb *nābā*⁷ (“to prophesy”) over one hundred times, frequently in connection with someone delivering a message. The noun *nābî*⁷ appears especially frequently in 1–2 Samuel, 1–2 Kings, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, often in connection with someone delivering a message. It is thus consistent with the conclusion that prophets modeled their phrase “Thus says Yahweh” after the style of messengers of kings, and that their action was comparable to the practice of earlier prophets at Mari (Westermann, 98-128). The term could be used even in connection with someone deemed a false prophet (note esp. 1 Kings 22:22).

Two other titles also deserve mention here. One is hōzeh, usually translated as “seer,” which is used more than a dozen times. It derives from the verb hāzā, meaning “to see,” and typically designates something a prophet “saw,” perhaps a *vision. Numbers 24:4 uses the term in connection with Balaam’s third oracle, in which he blessed Israel, to the dismay of Balak, and Numbers 24:16 employs it in Balaam’s fourth oracle, in which he predicts Balak’s demise. Ezekiel 13:16, 23 use the verb in a context where what the “prophets of Israel” saw (namely, a peaceful future) was wrong. The second title, rō’eh, designates someone that today might be called a “diviner,” one who could discover things that were hidden (see Divination, Magic). The term is used famously in 1 Samuel 9:9, where Saul’s servant suggests that they consult Samuel to help find the missing donkeys that the two men were seeking. The narrator observes that the one who was formerly called a rō’eh was now called a nābī’. In other words, terms fell in and out of favor with various traditions and writers in the OT and overlapped in meaning.

2.2. Other Titles Denoting Prophets. The three aforementioned terms were by no means the only ways by which the OT denoted and described prophets. Samuel is called a “man of God” in 1 Samuel 9:6-10, and Elisha is also in 2 Kings 5:8, 14-15. God says to Amos that God never does anything to punish people without first divulging the divine intentions to them through God’s “servants the prophets” (Amos 3:7). In addition, a prophet is compared to a sentinel (Jer 6:17), a watchman (Ezek 3:16-21; 33:1-9), a lookout (Is 21:6) and a refiner (Jer 6:27-30). The OT also speaks of groups of prophets—for example, the band or company of prophets around Samuel (1 Sam 10:5, 10; 19:20), and the one that accompanied Elijah at the time of his ascension (2 Kings 2:3-15).

2.3. Cultic and Noncultic Prophets. The distinction that scholars sometimes make between official (or cultic) and unofficial (or noncultic) prophets helps differentiate prophets at times, but care must be taken with such terms. Anthropologists note that all prophets depend on a group of followers to validate their experience or message. That validation can also be withdrawn by the group that gives it (Wilson, 56). Even prophets attached to a palace or a temple must maintain the confidence of those to whom they deliver their message.

The prophets of the OT constitute a mixed group. In a famous confrontation with a priest at the temple in Bethel, Amos denied that he was a prophet or even a son of (i.e., an apprentice to) a prophet (Amos 7:14). He apparently meant he was not attached to any temple or prophetic guild. Likewise, Micah is nowhere termed a prophet in the book bearing his name, and the only place that book mentions prophets is in a derisive attack against (false?) prophets (Mic 2:11). Still, Jeremiah 26:18 explicitly identifies Micah as a prophet. There a crowd witnessing the arrest of Jeremiah recalls that the prophet Micah of Moresheth made charges like Jeremiah’s against Jerusalem, and that members of his audience repented and were spared destruction by God. Other OT prophets, by contrast, do appear to have been closely associated with temples. For example, Isaiah appears to have been connected to the temple in Jerusalem, and Haggai and Zechariah championed the building of the second temple.

2.4. Prophets and Prophetesses. Most of those who prophesied in the OT were men, but four texts speak of prophetesses. Judges 4:4 says that Deborah, a prophetess, was a judge in Israel who sat under a palm tree between Ramah and Bethel to hear cases. She also took the initiative in summoning Barak and directing him to take his troops to Mount Tabor and prepare for battle against Sisera. In that narrative, of course, Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, killed the defeated and fleeing Sisera in her tent, where she had bidden him to take refuge. That sequence of events is without parallel in the OT for the roles played by women. Still, prophetesses are mentioned three other places. 2 Kings 22:14-20 narrates an incident when Hilkiah (the high priest), Ahikam (the son of Shaphan and a key figure in the restoration of the temple and reading of the law under Josiah), Achbor (the son of a man named Micaiah) and Asaiah (otherwise unknown) went to the prophetess Huldah to ask what action to take with regard to the requirements concerning the temple found in the newly discovered law code (most likely Deuteronomy). In view of the prominence of at least the first two men named, she must have had a high reputation for discerning that which was hidden. Nehemiah 6:14 includes a prophetess, Noadiah, along with Tobiah, Sanballat and other people who wished to scare Nehemiah away from the task of repairing the walls of Jerusalem. Finally, Isaiah 8:3 mentions a prophetess who was the wife of Isaiah and conceived the child named “Maher-shalal-hash-baz” (meaning “the spoil speeds, the prey hastens”). It is not clear whether bearing the child was her only prophetic act. The slim number of prophetesses mentioned probably reflects male domination in ancient Israel, but that they are mentioned gives evidence that some women did prophesy. There is no way, however, to assess their number.

2.5. Prophets and Other Groups. Prophets were not the only identifiable groups in ancient Israel. Others with whom prophets interacted included priests, kings, the wise and the populace at large. It will be useful to survey the relationship of prophets with each.

2.5.1. The Relationship Between Prophets and Priests. The relationship between these two groups is especially important for at least two reasons. First, the Major Prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel seem to have been priests themselves, and the report of Isaiah's "call vision" is set inside the temple, suggesting at least that he was attached to the temple as a prophet. Among the Minor Prophets, Joel 1:1–2:17, with its twofold call for people to repent at the altar, reads like sentiments from the lips of an official at the temple (Redditt 1986, 231–33). The book of Habakkuk ends with a "prayer," complete with the name of a tune to accompany the prayer when sung. Almost surely it was a temple hymn (Hab 3:1–19). Haggai and Zechariah 1–8 have as their main concern the rebuilding of the temple in Jerusalem, and Malachi reads like a dispute between priestly groups (Redditt 1994, 251–54).

2.5.2. The Relationship Between Prophets and Kings. No relationship, perhaps, was chancier than the relationship between a prophet and his king. In an uncertain world, some kings wished to avail themselves of a person whom they trusted to be in touch with God. Illustrations abound. (1) Samuel at one point chose and anointed Saul to be king (1 Sam 9:1–10:16), though later he turned against Saul. Even on the last night of his life, however, the king attempted to consult the dead prophet by means of a séance (1 Sam 28:3–25) and went to his fate fully aware he would die in battle. (2) Nathan was a prophet in the court of David, and he remained such even when he chastised David for his actions in regard to Bathsheba and her husband (2 Sam 12:1–15; see the heading of Ps 51). (3) King Ahab consulted his prophets about a proposed attack against the king of Aram at Ramath-gilead. Prophets for hire, they assured him that his proposed attack would be successful. King Jehoshaphat of Judah was suspicious of such unanimity and asked for another opinion. After lying at first, Micaiah ben Imlah relayed God's message, namely that God had put a "lying spirit in the mouth" of all the prophets of Ahab. So warned and wearing a disguise, Ahab launched an attack and in a case of mistaken identity was killed anyway (1 Kings 22:1–40). (4) Isaiah seems to have had access to the temple and the palace, and he gave advice. (5) The prophet Jeremiah, by contrast, suffered at the hands of several monarchs, though he managed to outlast them all in Jerusalem.

2.5.3. The Relationship Between Prophets and the Teachers of Wisdom. The prophets receive no mention in the Wisdom literature of the OT: Job, Proverbs and Ecclesiastes (see Prophecy and Wisdom). J. L. Crenshaw addresses this issue, resisting what he called "pan-sapientialism" among twentieth-century scholars who saw wisdom influence on Genesis 1–11; 37–50, Deuteronomy, Ruth, 2 Samuel 9–20 + 1 Kings 1–2, Psalms, Micah and Jonah. One can concede that prophets and wise men faced some of the same problems without concluding that one stream drew from another. Still, Crenshaw saw one passage, Jeremiah 17:5–11, that seemed to him to resemble "The Instruction of Amen-em-opet." The similarities led him to the conclusion that the author clearly knew the Egyptian text. Still, Crenshaw understood the passage to condemn any pretense to possess knowledge of the divine mystery. "Precisely because the human intellect is perverse, claims like these cannot be trusted" (Crenshaw, 82). In view of Crenshaw's argument, one is wise to downplay suggestions of direct wisdom influence on the OT prophets.

In the apocalyptic book of Daniel, however, the book's hero not only interprets the dreams of Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar and the writing on the wall, but also sees visions that require an angelic interpreter. Neither the ability to interpret the dreams of others (like Joseph) nor to see visions (like Amos, Isaiah and other prophets) is sufficient in the end. Ultimately, in Daniel the mysteries of God require an angelic interpreter to explain them.

2.5.4. The Relationship Between Prophets and the People at Large. Many, though by no means all, of the prophets' messages and actions were aimed at kings, priests and other leaders, and those messages and actions generated quite diverse reactions. Some texts, however, describe interactions between prophets and the general population. According to 1 Kings 17:8–24, God directed Elijah to go to the town of Zarephath, where the prophet performed a miracle for a widow by causing her meal jar to rejuvenate daily. Then Elijah resuscitated her dead son. In 2 Kings 4:8-37 a similar resuscitation is reported of Elisha, who also saw to the restoration of a woman's land to her when she returned after living elsewhere for seven years (2 Kings 8:1-6). These narratives are reported, however, to enhance the reputation of the prophets rather than to illuminate relations between prophets and the people at large.

Reports about other prophets, however, suggest that people both knew them and in some cases even remembered them after their death. The most obvious example concerns Micah, who condemned the wealthy for their mistreatment of the poor (see Mic 2:1-11) (see Wealth and Poverty). Jeremiah 26 reports that people remembered Micah and quoted his words a century or so later when Jeremiah was arrested. Several other prophets demanded fair treatment of the poor and not simply correctly following ritual (see Is 1:21-26; 5:8; 10:1-4; Jer 22:13-17; Amos 4:1-3; Mic 6:8). Others focused on the collective *sins of the whole nation, especially in connection with the worship of other gods. Zechariah made it clear that preexilic people had failed to show justice, kindness and mercy to the poor (Zech 7:8-14). Trito-Isaiah painted a verbal picture of the future Judah, which would have a place for all sorts of people: the foreigner, the eunuch, the outcasts of Israel (Is 56:3-8), and the oppressed, the brokenhearted, the captives (Is 61:1-6). The people must have felt a wide range of emotions toward the prophets: anger over their criticism, gratitude for being defended, fear over the predicted future, and even the conviction that the prophets were wrong. Still, some, maybe most, of the people wanted a word from God, especially when they were in distress. Prophets of all stripes filled that need.

3. Nonwriting and Writing Prophets.

The idea that there were "nonwriting" and "writing" prophets is a distinction brought about at least partly through the process of *canonization. For readers of the OT who know of the collections gathered under the names Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel and the so-called Minor Prophets, the people called "prophets" are broadly characterized by their words. In the Pentateuch and Former Prophets, however, the prophets are largely discussed through their actions. To be sure, accounts of their deeds may include short sayings. Still, the existence of a book like Amos, which describes only one episode in the prophet's life (see Amos 7:10-17), or Hosea, which contains only two prose narratives (whose relationship to the message is not explained), not to mention books such as Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk and Zephaniah (which contain only sayings of the prophets), all point to a basic difference in the conceptions of those prophets. Simply put, a number of prophets, and especially early prophets, are known more for what they did (note Elijah, Elisha, Jonah), while others, especially later ones, are known more or even exclusively for what they said. Due to the variations, it is useful to see the categories "writing prophets" and "nonwriting prophets" as forming not a polarity but a continuum along which to position the variety of prophets in the OT.

3.1. Nonwriting Prophets. Major nonwriting prophets included Balaam and various unnamed prophets in Deuteronomy as well as Samuel, Nathan, Elijah and Elisha. Numbers 22:1—24:25 is a carefully and humorously crafted narrative designed to ridicule Balak the king of Moab for his attempt to thwart the actions of God in guiding Israel to Canaan. It also, however, involves a delightful spoof on prophets, at least on Balaam, a "seer" for hire whose donkey could see what he could not: a menacing angel barring the road as he was en route as a prophet for hire to pronounce a curse on the people of Israel.

The discussion of prophets in Deuteronomy is carefully nuanced. Like the rest of Deuteronomy, its literary setting is east of the Jordan River in the land of Moab, where Moses delivers a sermon for the generation about to enter Canaan. The concern of the book is to reveal afresh for that generation the laws revealed earlier on Mount Sinai and thus to remind all future generations of their obligations in Canaan. Deuteronomy 13:1-5 warns against following prophets who divined by interpreting dreams, and Deuteronomy 18:21-22 offers two criteria for determining whether a prophet is genuine. First, a prophet must speak in the name of Yahweh (and not some other god), and second, what the prophet predicts must come to pass. How, though, was one to know what to do if prophets speaking in the name of Yahweh disagreed and one could not wait to see which prophet was correct? In such a case, Jeremiah counsels following the prophet predicting misfortune rather than good times (Jer 28:8-9), until, that is, the prediction of good comes true.

The depiction of the late eleventh-century BC figure Samuel as a prophet offers a different perspective. Samuel is depicted also as a priest, a kingmaker, an adviser to King Saul and a traveling judge. In other words, the narratives about Samuel do not reflect a situation in which Samuel held but one office. One might speak instead of various roles played by Samuel, one of which was prophet or seer, in connection with which he headed a group of apprentices called a "band of prophets." They were deemed useful for discerning hidden information—for example, the location of the lost donkeys belonging to Saul's father, Kish (1 Sam 9:1-14). Seances, however, were ruled off limits for legitimate prophets, their use being left to witches (see 1 Sam 28:3-25).

Nathan (early tenth century BC) is portrayed as a prophet at the side of David as an adviser. It was he who delivered to David the message that the king was not to build a temple for God; the tabernacle would suffice (2 Sam 7:8-11). David's son Solomon would build the new temple. The text is widely viewed by scholars as apologetic, but the issue here is its portrayal of Nathan's role as a prophetic adviser to the king. Nathan also seized the right of royal review by calling David to account for his adultery with Bathsheba (2 Sam 12:1-15).

Finally, mention should be made of Elijah and Elisha (mid-to-late ninth century BC), about whom 1-2 Kings has much to say. Elijah headed a band or school of prophets, and Elisha, one of his pupils, succeeded him. Elijah is shown predicting the future (e.g., 1 Kings 17:1-7), performing miracles (1 Kings 17:8-24), defeating the priests of Baal in a contest of rain-making (1 Kings 18:40), predicting the death of Ahab (1 Kings 21:17-29) and ascending into heaven without dying (2 Kings 2:1-12). His roles combine wonder worker, adviser to the king, and defender of Yahwism. The same can be said for his successor, Elisha (2 Kings 2:19-25; 4:1—5:19; 6:1-7; 8:1-6). Like Samuel, he anointed a king, Jehu (2 Kings 9:13), but he also delivered the news to Hazael of Damascus that his king, Ben-hadad, would die and counseled Hazael to lie about the seriousness of Ben-hadad's condition (2 Kings 8:7-15).

Although these figures are dated from the late eleventh to the late ninth centuries BC, many scholars set the time of the writing of these accounts later (see Schmid, 69-72). Ultimately, the accounts were utilized by the so-called Deuteronomistic Historian or School, which seems to have flourished at least by the reign of Josiah (640-609 BC), and which probably continued until after the fall of Jerusalem (586 BC), perhaps as late as the elevation of the Judean king Jehoiachin in exile in 560 BC (see 2 Kings 25:27-30). While the accounts of these prophets may have been shaped by the Deuteronomistic scribes, they may have utilized older traditions without significant distortions.

3.2. Writing Prophets. By far the larger percentage of prophetic sayings, however, was amassed in extended collections (the Major and the Minor Prophets) under the names of particular prophets. Only Jonah is an exception. His message is summarized thus: "In forty more days Nineveh will be destroyed" (Jon 3:4). Many scholars think most of those collections grew over time and contain sayings and other information from different periods and from different persons. More will be said about them below, but here it is important to notice the change in Israelite/Judean society in the mid-eighth century BC. Simply stated, public writing in the form of public inscriptions blossomed. K. Schmid (69-72) provides information from archaeological digs about that increase. From the tenth century there are only four; from the ninth, 18; from the first half of the eighth, 16; from the last half of the eighth, 129; from the first half of the seventh, 50; from the last half of the seventh, 52; and from the beginning of the sixth, 65. In other words, the explosion of public documents coincided with the rise of the "writing prophets." That was surely no accident (see Writing and Prophecy).

Many of the Prophetic Books provide a date of some sort in their superscription and/or refer to events datable from ancient records from Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, Persia or Greece. The starting place for dating a prophet and the work bearing his name is such data. These data provide only a starting place, however, because some (maybe all) the books contain sayings that appear to address later periods than the one in which the titular prophet lived. One good example from the early prophet Amos is the ending of the book. No careful reader can fail to notice that Amos 1:1—9:10 contains only threats, warnings and predictions of doom. Amos 9:11-15, by contrast, is entirely positive. Could Amos have looked past the imminent doom to a brighter day? Of course. Is that what happened? Many scholars think not. Amos 9:11 quotes God as promising, "On that day I will raise up the fallen tent of David." Most likely the reference to the fallen state of the Davidic monarchy indicates that the author of Amos 9:11-15 is looking back at the fall of the Davidic dynasty in 586 BC and predicting its future renewal, along with that of Israel (Amos 9:15, which, by the way, is reminiscent of Jer 1:10).

Thus, a second way to arrive at the date for a passage or a collection is to determine from what one knows of the history of ancient Israel and the surrounding ancient Near East a plausible time at which particular traditions might be especially meaningful (see Israelite History). The book of Isaiah, for example, seems—to many scholars—to have grown over a significant period of time stretching from the eighth to the sixth centuries BC or later. For example, O. H. Steck argues that Isaiah 1–55 + Isaiah 60–62 reached its basic form in the Persian period, but that numerous passages within those chapters plus Isaiah 56–59 and Isaiah 62–66 were added in three basic expansions during the Greek period, concluding around 253 BC.

3.3. Ascriptions of the Title "Prophet" to Penta-teuchal Figures. Before leaving this topic, it would be helpful to look briefly at the Penta-teuch. There, the ancient figures Abraham, Moses and Aaron are called prophets, and Miriam (Moses' sister) is called a "prophetess" (Ex 15:20). In such cases, readers need to recognize that the terms are being applied retroactively and descriptively. That is, these figures at times played roles later generations saw as prophetic. An example may be found in Numbers 11:16-30. At God's instruction, Moses took seventy of the elders of Israel to the tent of meeting to receive a portion of his "spirit" (or "charisma"). This spirit would allow them to bear part of Moses' burden, so a good modern term to describe them might be "deputies." Two elders who remained in the camp while Moses and the others were gone began prophesying when the spirit rested on them. Word of their conduct reached the tent, causing Joshua, who reacted jealously, to implore Moses to stop them. Moses declined, saying, "If only all Yahweh's people were prophets" (Num 11:29). That is, Moses wished all the people of Israel would heed and spread God's commands.

Numbers 12:6-8, however, seems different. It is a later narrative calculated to emphasize the superiority of the commands of God to and through Moses over the sayings of prophets. It presupposes clashes between the law as propagated and passed down and more laissez-faire prophets, and it attempts to reign in the influence of the latter. Whether those verses had in view any prophets included among the Nebiim remains an open question.

4. Scribes and Editors.

If the record of prophecy in Israel underwent a profound change beginning in the eighth century BC in connection with the rise of public writing, one of the causes lay with the availability of scribes to write down messages and to collect, arrange and preserve them. For the most part people labored unknown and behind the scenes. Is it possible that some of the prophets (e.g., the temple prophet Isaiah) were literate? Yes, though literacy rates in the ancient world were so low the likelihood is not high, and a high degree of literacy was necessary to craft that work or others. With regard to Jeremiah, the answer seems to be affirmative. Jeremiah 51:59-64 records an event in which Jeremiah himself "wrote in a scroll all the things that would come upon Babylon" and gave the scroll to a man named Seriah to carry to Babylon. Regardless of the circumstances behind those verses, they clearly indicate that Jeremiah was literate, though the book bearing his name gives ample evidence that he used the scribe Baruch to write it down. Is it likely, however, the shepherd/farmer Amos was literate? Not really. In any case, the Prophetic Books almost never record the prophets as writing, and sooner or later their words and descriptions of their deeds passed into the hand of scribes.

The manuscripts themselves then took on a life of their own. Whether the scribes responsible for the creation of the manuscripts belonged to one or more schools is a matter of speculation. The major exception is the book of Jeremiah, the prose in which is so similar to that of Deuteronomy through Kings as to make it probable that Jeremiah's scribe(s) belonged to or had been trained by Deuteronomists.

A brief review of the work of scribes in the Latter Prophets is in order. Scholars often suppose that the book of Isaiah underwent a period of growth from the eighth to sixth centuries BC at least. Narratives about Isaiah appear in Isaiah 7:1—9:1, and Isaiah 36—39 is substantially the same as 2 Kings 18:13, 17—20:19, from which it was likely taken and to which it added the prayer in Isa 38:9-20 and a brief narrative of Isaiah's healing the king. No scribe, however, is named in the entire book of Isaiah. In the case of Jeremiah, as mentioned, Baruch seems to have recorded the sayings of the prophet (see Jer 36:1-32; 45:1) in addition to recording a transaction for him (Jer 32:12-16). It is difficult to judge how much of the extensive prose material is from Baruch.

It is possible that Ezekiel wrote (or employed someone to write) some of his messages, perhaps with the intention that Ezekiel or someone read them aloud. Regardless, the hand of a redactor is obvious in the elaborate dating system attached to a number of Ezekiel's messages. That the dating system is secondary is clear from the opening three verses. Ezekiel 1:1 is written in the first-person singular and appears to be original. Ezekiel 1:2-3, written in the third person, restates the date, employing the dating system used for a number of other messages scattered through the book (see Ezek 8:1; 20:1; 24:1; 26:1; 29:1; 30:20; 31:1; 32:1, 17; 33:21; 40:1). It appears, then, as if the dates were used as a redactional device (arrangement in chronological order), overridden only in the final version of the book by the familiar scheme of doom against Judah and Jerusalem (in Ezek 1—24), doom against foreign nations (in Ezek 25—32) and hope (in Ezek 33—48) (see Redaction/Editorial Criticism).

Finally, the Book of the *Twelve appears to have undergone its own history, roughly parallel to that of Isaiah. A number of scholars have proposed a process that began with edited collections of the sayings of Amos and Hosea in Israel plus Micah and Zephaniah in Judah, a so-called Book of the Four. Haggai and Zechariah 1—8 underwent an obvious common redaction with unique, dated introductions to the sayings of the two prophets. On the prior existence of those two collections there is widespread agreement. In addition, D. L. Christensen has argued that Nahum and Habakkuk were edited together as well, creating a chiasmus (Christensen, 193):

- (A) Hymn of theophany (Nah 1)
- (B) Taunt song against Nineveh (Nah 2—3)
- (X) The problem of theodicy (Hab 1)
- (B') Taunt song against the "wicked one" (Hab 2)
- (A') Hymn of theophany (Hab 3)

Eventually, three other prophetic collections (Joel, Obadiah, Malachi), plus the narrative about Jonah, were added, creating the Twelve. The debate about the nature of that creation has not yet reached a resolution. (Redditt 2003, 1-26, summarizes the discussion. Nogalski and Zvi 2009 articulate the pros and cons in more depth.)

5. Eighth-Century BC Prophets.

The earliest of the writing prophets (Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Micah) flourished in the eighth century BC. The superscription (or heading) dates Amos's ministry during the reigns of Uzziah of Judah (ca. 783-742 BC) and Jeroboam son of Joash of Israel (ca. 786-746 BC). Those kings provided political stability for Judah and Israel at a time when the Assyrian emperors displayed little interest in sending armies there to demand tribute. As noted above, public writing blossomed, proof of a rising class of scribes. Hosea flourished during the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, kings of the south, and Jeroboam of the north.

Unfortunately, there is a problem in determining the dates of Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah. Uzziah (also called "Azariah") died in 743/2 BC, but he was leprous much of his reign. His successors were Jotham (said to have reigned sixteen years), Ahaz (sixteen years), and Hezekiah (twenty-nine years), for a total of sixty-one years—that is, until 682 BC. Added together, however, the numbers are somewhat off, since according to Assyrian annals, the Assyrian king Sennacherib invaded Judah in 701 BC, while 2 Kings 18:13 ascribes that invasion to the fourteenth year of Hezekiah, which would be about 697 BC, using its chronology. Hezekiah then suffered a serious illness that threatened his life, after which Hezekiah is said to have lived and reigned fifteen more years (2 Kings 20:6). Moreover, Hezekiah's successor, Manasseh, is said to have taken the throne when he was twelve, and his reign is said to have lasted fifty-five years. It ended in 642 BC. The numbers add up only if Manasseh served as a co-regent with his father over a period, perhaps the last fifteen years, and both kings were ascribed the years of their co-regency.

The fact that a northern prophet is dated in terms of kings of the north and the south suggests that the words of Hosea were carried south, perhaps after the fall of Samaria in 723 BC. In any case, the books of Amos (see Amos 9:11-15, but also Amos 2:4-5) and Hosea (in fourteen different verses spread throughout the book) direct their message to Judah as well. Since Amos was from the Judean city of Tekoa and was ordered to leave by the priest Amaziah (Amos 7:12-13), readers should not be surprised if that work took its written shape in Judah. Moreover, the flight of persons in Israel south to Judah when the Assyrians crushed Israel provides a ready explanation for the words of Hosea, though not necessarily the prophet himself, to have traveled there too.

5.1. Amos and Hosea. In any case, the words of the prophets, not their deeds, now stand front and center in the prophetic movement. The book of Amos relates one incident in that prophet's life (Amos 7:10-17), and the book of Hosea relates two accounts of the prophet's home life, but only one (Hos 3:1-3) is written in the first person. The actions of the prophets were of far less importance than the words ascribed to them. Moreover, the words give evidence, even in Hosea and Amos, of sometimes addressing audiences later than the careers of the two. Critical scholars have long argued that Hosea, Amos and indeed all the collections in the Latter Prophets grew over time as later tradition bearers kept the ancient words alive by stripping them of much of their specificity concerning their time and place of origin and by adding words of later prophets (including their own words) to update them.

5.2. Isaiah. If a process of collecting, preserving and expanding the words of prophets was true in connection with Amos and Hosea, the process also stood behind the collection ascribed to Isaiah. In his case, of course, there are more narratives. First, there was a collection of narratives that some scholars consider to have been the original part of the book: a first-person account of his calling as a prophet (Is 6:1-13), a third-person narrative about an audience he had with King Ahaz (Is 7:1-25), a first-person narrative of a prophetic sign (Is 8:1-4), a first-person narrative about Isaiah's reception of instructions from God (Is 8:11-15) and a concluding instruction (apparently to Isaiah's disciples) to write down what he had told them (Is 8:16-22). Some of these prose accounts appear to be composite in nature, but they do seem to include early words and actions of Isaiah. Second, another biographical account appears in Isaiah 20:1-6, describing a prophetic sign acted out by Isaiah and explaining it. Third, the final narrative appears in Isaiah 36-39, all but Isaiah 38:9-20 of which was taken from 2 Kings 18:13, 17-20:19. (The borrowing almost surely did not go the other way; the literary style is that of Kings.)

This episode, by the way, marks the last place in Samuel-Kings that speaks of a named prophet. 2 Kings 23:17-18 does mention an anonymous "prophet who came of Samaria," whose tomb King Josiah ordered to be left undisturbed. The Chronicler, for his part, mentions a prophet only once. 2 Chronicles 34:22 mentions "Huldah the prophet, the wife of Shallum son of Tokhath," whom Josiah consulted. She confirmed that threats against Judah and Jerusalem contained in Deuteronomy would come to pass, though after the death of Josiah. If the actions of prophets were important to those responsible for the Former Prophets in their present form, they nevertheless left the words of the Latter Prophets to their own scribes.

The rest of Isaiah 1-39 is taken up by a rich collection of diverse literary genres, often so devoid of names and historical allusions as to become almost timeless. Scholars vary in their judgment about how many and which of these messages originated with Isaiah. Isaiah 19 will illustrate the difficulty of determining a date. It refers to Egypt, predicting its overthrow, but the conqueror is not named. Even if, therefore, the passage originated with Isaiah in the Assyrian period, one can no longer be certain of that. It would fit equally well during the Babylonian period. O. Kaiser's analysis of Isaiah 1-39 (Kaiser, ix-xii) may be taken as an example of mid-to-late twentieth-century scholars concerning the growth of Isaiah 1-39. The preponderance of authentic sayings appeared in Isaiah 1-12; 28-31. The so-called Isaiah Apocalypse (Is 24-27) and the passage contrasting Israel and Moab (Is 34-35) join Isaiah 36—39 as whole sections added to the growing corpus, with the oracles against the foreign nations being added as late as the turn from the fourth to the third centuries BC. B. S. Childs reacted against that kind of splintering of the text and argued instead for a canonical reading (Childs, 3-8). Still, he did not deny that the text was composite. What remains clear, moreover, is that the sayings ascribed to Isaiah grew exponentially. That process seems to have continued through the exile and beyond (see 7.4 below).

5.3. Micah. The last of the four famous prophets from the eighth century BC is Micah. Almost nothing is known about him personally except that he lived in the small town of Moresheth near the Philistine city of Gath, to which it would have been economically tied. Micah's criticism of the urban elite (in Samaria, Jerusalem, Lachish and elsewhere) seems understandable against the background of a man whose town and perhaps his own fortunes were adversely affected by the control ancient cities could hold over the "daughter" villages around them (see Mic 1:1-7; 2:1-11; 3:1-12). Juxtaposed to those verses, however, are pictures of peace and future prosperity (see Mic 4:1-8) and God's future blessing (Mic 7:11-20), including a reunion of Israel and Judah and the restitution of the Davidic king (Mic 5:2-5; MT 5:1-4) (Redditt 2008, 69-73). Parts of Micah, therefore, looked back on the fall of Jerusalem, so the book of Micah did not reach its final form until at least the exilic period.

6. Seventh-Century BC Prophets.

The seventh century BC saw the rise of more "writing" prophets: Nahum, Habakkuk and Zephaniah. Three other prophetic books appear prior to them in the LXX Twelve: Joel, Obadiah and Jonah. Those same three appear interspersed among Hosea, Amos and Micah in order of the first half of the MT Twelve: Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah and Micah. Either way, canonically, Joel, Obadiah and Jonah appear before Nahum, Habakkuk and Zephaniah in what perhaps was intended as chronological order. Consequently, though Joel and Jonah are often dated later, they will be treated first in what follows. Obadiah looks back on the fall of Jerusalem, so it will be treated with prophets of the sixth-century BC.

6.1. Joel and Jonah. The book of Joel is devoid of allusions to Israelite, Judean, Mesopotamian and/or Egyptian figures who might be used to determine an approximate date for the prophet. Hence, Joel has been dated anywhere from the ninth to the third centuries. The book is a classic example of having been shorn of historical allusions (or, perhaps, written without them) so that it speaks to many ages and peoples. The first half of the book (Joel 1:2—2:17) threatens *destruction on Jerusalem and surrounding rural Judah, while the second half describes (as a past action) God turning in jealousy toward God's people and *blessing them. As a result, all God's people (male and female, old and young, owner and slave) will receive the charisma of prophecy, the nations will gather for battle against Judah, and God will defeat them.

Jonah is the sole book among the Latter Prophets that is substantially prose. It does contain a song of thanksgiving for God's rescuing the singer from the clutches of death, but that song comes while Jonah is still inside the fish. Perhaps the song was sung in anticipation of God's rescuing Jonah, but the text does not say so. The book contains only the gist of Jonah's message to Nineveh: "There are forty more days until Nineveh is overthrown." Scholars have sometimes suggested, plausibly, that the book of Jonah was included to bring the number of Minor Prophets to a dozen. That suggestion also recognizes implicitly that the book was written in the postexilic period despite its place in the Twelve. Its genre also is debated, except that it is a narrative.

The book's setting is the city of Nineveh at the peak of its power. The name of its hero perhaps was taken from the eighth-century BC prophet Jonah the son of Amittai, mentioned in 2 Kings 14:25. If so, the statement in Jonah 3:6-9 that the king of Assyria dwelled in Nineveh was anachronistic, since Nineveh became the capital during the reign of Sennacherib (r. 704-681 BC). Regardless, in contending that God wanted to spare the cruel Assyrians, the book itself articulated an openness to foreigners not always seen among the prophets.

6.2. Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah. There is good evidence that Nahum and Habakkuk were redacted together, forming an inclusion device that opened and closed with a song of theophany (Nah 1:1-8 and Hab 3:1-19), surrounding taunts (Nah 2—3 and Hab 2:6-20), with the issue of theodicy standing in the middle (see the argument in 4 above). Placing the three prophets in apparent chronological order would have required dividing the redacted pair and placing Zephaniah between them. Nahum, with its prediction of the fall of Assyria (which occurred in 605), came earliest chronologically. Habakkuk itself may have undergone several stages of growth, but as it stands, one of its key emphases is the power of Babylon to exact its will on Judah (Hab 1:6-11). It does not, however, anticipate the fall of Jerusalem (in 586). Zephaniah opens with God's hyperbolic threat to destroy everything on the face of the earth (Zeph 1:2—2:15), including Judah and Jerusalem, but it closes, as it now stands, with thirteen verses (Zeph 3:1-13) that castigate Jerusalem for its sinfulness and seven (Zeph 3:14-20) that anticipate God's *forgiveness of the sins of the city and the return of the exiles. Its conclusion appears, therefore, to have been shaped to lead into the postexilic words of Haggai and Zechariah.

7. Sixth-Century BC Prophets Down to the Fall of Jerusalem.

The sixth century BC witnessed the careers of Jeremiah, Obadiah, Ezekiel, Haggai and Zechariah, not to mention redactional additions to earlier prophetic collections, especially Isaiah 40—66. Many scholars argue that Jeremiah's career began as early as 626 BC, the thirteenth year of the reign of Josiah (see Jer 1:2), but it is difficult to date passages in the book earlier than the reign of Jehoiakim, specifically the fall of Assyria to Babylon in 605 BC (Hyatt, 779-780). In any case, since the overwhelming percentage of his messages related to the early sixth century BC, he will be treated here as the first of the sixth-century prophets. The background of all these books was the rise and fall of the *Babylonian Empire and its replacement by the Persian Empire. The Babylonian Empire did not last as long as either the Assyrian or the Persian, flourishing only in the years 605-539 BC, but it burst on the scene under the powerful Nebuchadnezzar (d. 562 BC). It lasted just over two decades after his death, until its powerful neighbor to the east (Persia) took it over.

7.1. Jeremiah. In addition to prose and poetic sermons attributed to Jeremiah, the book bearing his name also contains narratives and reflections concerning the career of Jeremiah, the condition of Judah before and during the exile, and the nature of prophecy itself. The book bears testimony that Jeremiah was literate (Jer 51:60), but the style of the prose sections of the book resembles closely the style of Deuteronomy. Was that perhaps an "official" style used by many scribes? Prophets who proclaimed bad times or punishment for wrong conduct were often ignored and at times even challenged by their hearers, a fate that befell Jeremiah. He was at various times arrested, tried and sentenced for what he said or did (see Jer 26:10-24; 37:11-21; 38:1-13). He was even threatened with death by the people of his own village, Anathoth (Jer 11:18-23). At the end of his career he was seized by the assassins of Gedaliah and taken to Egypt (Jer 43:1-7). Nevertheless, Judean kings and others who opposed what he said still sought out his counsel.

What was his message? Simply stated, he predicted the fall of Jerusalem and Judah for the sinfulness of their people, in particular their *idolatry. That message seemed to his audience to be unfounded, so wherein lay the dispute? They apparently recognized Yahweh as God, but not as the sole God in Judah, the only God to be worshiped (cf. Ezek 8:1-18, which lists various gods worshiped in Jerusalem itself in the years leading up to the fall of the city). Foreigners, of course, would have worshiped their own gods, but various prophets charge both Israel and Judah with worshiping other gods than Yahweh. Those gods would have been traditional divinities, and perhaps the people saw them as inferior to Yahweh but not without the ability to help in a time of need. Other Judeans may have found it expedient to worship the gods of the major powers. Jeremiah 2:11 appears to have rejected them all: "Has a nation changed its gods, even though they are no gods?" The people, of course, would have denied that they had abandoned God at all. Jeremiah, however, quoted God's condemnatory rejoinder: "But my people have changed their glory for something that does not profit" (Jer 2:11).

These two lines from Jeremiah require further theological exploration. If monotheism is defined as belief in the existence of one *God only, combined with the denial of the existence of all other gods, Jeremiah qualifies as a monotheist. Usually, scholars say that Deutero-Isaiah was the first monotheist, and a monotheist he was (see Is 45:18-19; 46:8-13), but Jeremiah seems to have been the first in the OT.

The book of Jeremiah also contains remarkable language about the future of God's covenant with Judah. It set forth a new covenant, one that is explicitly contrasted with the old covenant given by God to Moses on Mount Sinai (Jer 31:31-34). First, the old *covenant was breakable; Israel had proved that over and over. The new covenant would be unbreakable. Second, the old covenant was external, written on stone, but the new covenant would be internal, written on the heart. Third, the old covenant had been mediated through Moses, but the new covenant would be mediated by God directly to the people, whether individually or collectively.

7.2. Lamentations and Obadiah. In the OT *Lamentations appears among the Writings, but both the LXX and the Christian Bible place it directly after Jeremiah. It appears to be a collection of five *laments over the fall of Jerusalem rather than a collection of prophetic sayings, and it is anonymous. If the prophet Jeremiah anticipated the fall of Jerusalem, Lamentations reacted to it (see, e.g., Lam 1). It did so, moreover, out of deep fear that God had permanently destroyed the city (see esp. Lam 5:20-22), which possibility is denied, however, in Lamentations 3:31-33. It also mourned the end of the monarchy (Lam 4:20), but it says nothing explicit about the misery of the people in the surrounding countryside and their losses. Obadiah, by contrast, is angry about the role of Edom, Judah's nearest kinsmen, during the destruction of the city, and predicts that the treachery of its people will rebound against them (Obad 1-14). By contrast, God will restore Judah (Obad 15-21). Lamentations and Obadiah, then, articulate the most disparate views in the OT for the future of Jerusalem.

7.3. Ezekiel. Very little of Ezekiel is written in poetry (but see Ezek 7:1-9a, 10-19, 21-27 as one of several exceptions), often considered a hallmark of authentic prophecies. Instead, much of the book is presented as prose narratives of visions (e.g., Ezek 1-3; 8-11; 37-48). It has even been suggested that Ezekiel was written down for public reading by Ezekiel, and some scholars think its repetitive style is the result of a long process of growth. Regardless, it is a lengthy work explaining the fall of Jerusalem to the Babylonians (Ezek 1-34) and predicting a new covenant between God and Judah (Ezek 34:25). It also anticipates God's defeat of the king and kingdom of Babylon (represented by Gog and Magog in Ezek 38-39), followed by the restitution of the land of the twelve tribes of Israel (Ezek 40-48), beginning with the prediction of the restitution of the temple and the Zadokite priesthood. The book also envisions a new Davidic king (Ezek 34:22-24), also referred to as a "prince" (Ezek 37:25; 44:3; 45:7; 46:16-18; 48:21-22), as someone lower in prestige than the priests. Because of its visionary style and extended and obscure symbolism, it is sometimes considered a precursor to apocalypses, though not an apocalypse itself.

7.4. Deutero-Isaiah and Trito-Isaiah. Isaiah 40 marks a change to a more positive view of the future of Israel than the one found for the most part in Isaiah 1-39. Isaiah 40-55 address exiles in Babylon and promises that Yahweh, the only God, would bring them back home. The exile was their punishment for worshiping other gods, and they had paid double what their sins deserved (Is 40:2). Moreover, God would use the Persian conqueror Cyrus as an instrument for punishing Babylon (Is 44:24-45:8). The chapters often speak of God's servant(s), and no consensus about his identity exists among scholars. One of the most carefully argued views is that of J. Blenkinsopp, who thinks that the servant in Isaiah 44:1-4 is Cyrus, while the servant in the remaining occurrences of the word in Isaiah 40-48 is Jacob, the ancestor of the people of Israel (Blenkinsopp 78, 118-19). In the Suffering Servant passages of Isaiah 49-55, however, the servant is a prophet predestined by God for a mission before birth (Is 49:1), who lived his early life under the providence of God (Is 53:2a), who was equipped for a mission involving prophetic speech and instruction (Is 49:2; 50:4), and who received divinely revealed knowledge and guidance (Is 50:4b). His mission was directed both to Israel and to the nations (Is 49:5-6). A sense of foreboding about him gives way to an assurance of vindication (Is 50:7-9), but opposition increases, resulting in his death (Is 53:7-12). Deutero-Isaiah was mediated by the disciples of that prophet. Christian thought, of course, has often identified the servant as Jesus, a view based on the NT writers' interpretation of Isaiah, however, not on the book of Isaiah itself (see Servant of Yahweh).

Blenkinsopp argues further that Isaiah 40-55 was mediated by the disciples of Deutero-Isaiah, and that Isaiah 60-62, the oldest part of Trito-Isaiah, shows close affinity with Deutero-Isaiah (Blenkinsopp, 77-78). All of these chapters, moreover, betray influence by the Deuteronomistic school (see esp. Is 48:17-19; 58:1-14). Prophecy was becoming much less oral and much more literary. Strongly eschatological, but not *apocalyptic (Blenkinsopp, 88-89), the chapters promise a better future for penitent Judeans through God's grace (Is 59), the rebuilding of ruined Jerusalem (Is 61:1-7), its preservation by God (Is 65:6-16) and vengeance on Edom (Is 63:1-6), all dependent on the people's true *worship of God (Is 66:1-5).

7.5. Haggai and Zechariah 1—8. As mentioned earlier, these two books underwent a common redaction, with sections introduced by a phrase unique to them: "In the X year of King Darius, in the Y month, on the Z day of the month." Haggai fastened his hope for the future on the rebuilding of the temple and the restitution of the monarchy under the Davidide Zerubbabel (which restitution, obviously, never occurred). Zechariah 1:7—6:15 consists of a series of eight visions and two exhortations (Zech 2:6-13; 6:9-15). The visions reveal God's future plans for the Judean community, and the exhortations urge people to take up the demands inherent in those visions. Zechariah 7—8 opens (Zech 7:1-3) with a question about the necessity of fasting for the temple after it was rebuilt, and the chapters close (Zech 8:18-19) stating that those fasts plus two others will be turned into feasts. In between stands a variety of passages addressing the postexilic community.

8. Fifth- and Fourth-Century BC Prophets.

The last two collections within the Book of the Twelve are Zechariah 9—14 and Malachi. Critical scholars typically separate Zechariah 9—14 from Zechariah 1—8, though some of them adopt the strategy of reading Zechariah 7—14 as a unified collection (see Conrad, 16-22), and B. G. Curtis argues that Zechariah himself wrote the whole book within about twenty years (Curtis, 1-23). R. F. Person, by contrast, argues that Zechariah 10—14 possibly derived from the Deuteronomistic school responsible for Jeremiah (Person, 205). Zechariah 9 does seem to fit well around the turn of the sixth to fifth century BC, but no further hope for a king appears in Zechariah 10—14. Indeed, in Zechariah 11 the primary focus is on excoriating the ruling families in Jerusalem. Zechariah 14 anticipates no new David, but the reign of God in Jerusalem. Many scholars think that Zechariah 13:2-6 announces the end of prophecy in Judah, but it does not. Rather, it condemns false prophets for deceiving people, but the struggle between false and true prophets had been a recurring theme in the OT. Malachi is no less discontent with priests of his day. He charged them with the worst offense of all for religious leaders: insincerity and indifference in carrying out the duties of their office.

Malachi does end, however, with Malachi 4:4-6, a passage usually considered secondary, though B. Glazier-McDonald argues that the verses are authentic to Malachi (Glazier-McDonald, 243-52). The verses mention both Moses and Elijah. Moses had been mentioned only once before in the Book of the Twelve, in Micah 6:4, where he is listed with Aaron and Miriam as a hero of the exodus. Elijah had not been mentioned at all. In fact, Elijah is mentioned nowhere else in the Latter Prophets. Why, then, are these two men suddenly mentioned at the end of Malachi? The best answer seems to be that the verses look back to the Law (represented by Moses) and the Prophets (represented by the earlier prophet Elijah) and form a fitting conclusion to the first two parts of the Hebrew canon: the Law and the Prophets.

9. Daniel.

The book of Daniel is, technically speaking, an *apocalypse, not a prophetic book. An apocalypse "is a genre of revelatory literature with a narrative framework, in which a revelation is mediated by an otherworldly being to a human recipient, disclosing a transcendent reality which is both temporal, insofar as it envisages eschatological salvation, and spatial insofar as it invokes another temporal world" (J. J. Collins, 9). Moreover, that revelation is "intended to interpret present, earthly circumstances in light of the supernatural world and of the future, and to influence both the understanding and the behavior of the audience by means of divine authority" (A. Yarbro Collins, 7). The LXX and the Christian canon, nevertheless, placed Daniel among the Prophets. Hence, it will be treated here. In addition, modern scholars have often treated apocalyptic literature as "the child of prophecy," and no doubt it drew upon prophetic books. Its structure, in which a revelatory being communicates with a human and explains what the human had seen, is evidenced as early as Zechariah 1—6. Some, even much of its subject matter, drew upon prophetic literature too, so its inclusion in the present article seems justified.

The issue of history stands front and center in the book of Daniel. For one thing, the book includes five revelations that survey a sweep of time: Daniel 2:31-35 (interpreted by Daniel in Dan 2:37-45); Daniel 7:2-14 (interpreted by an angel in Dan 7:23-27); Daniel 8:3-14 (interpreted by an angel in Dan 8:20-26); Daniel 9:24-27 (a revelation from Gabriel); and Daniel 11:2—12:3 (the last vision of Daniel). In those visions, Daniel sees strange beasts or receives coded information about the end of the time of evil and the institution of God's new kingdom on earth. The images are vague enough that readers of the Bible for centuries have seen their own history anticipated in the visions of Daniel. It is quite likely, however, that those visions anticipated the end of the Babylonian Empire (Dan 2:37-38) as well as the Median, Persian and Greek Empires (Dan 8:20-21), and the phrase "the transgression that makes desolate" (Dan 8:13) referred to the actions of Antiochus IV Epiphanes when he defiled the temple in Jerusalem in 167 BC (see 1 Macc 1:41-61).

Traditional scholars often date the book during and at the end of the exile, but critical scholars typically calculate the date of the book of Daniel around 164 BC, based on a few misstatements of history. First, the book dates Nebuchadnezzar's initial defeat of Jerusalem in the third year of Jehoiakim, 606 BC, though that defeat did not occur until after the end of Jehoiakim's reign in 598 BC and the three-month reign of Jehoiachin, according to 2 Kings 23:36—24:17. Second, Daniel 11:40-45 depicts the death of Antiochus as occurring in Palestine, when in fact he died in Persia. Still, the seer behind the book about Daniel predicted correctly the death of the tyrant. Scholars often argue, therefore, that the author's presentation of events down close to Antiochus's death actually constitutes a recitation of history, but his prediction of the king's death was genuine prophecy.

A third alleged error, however, probably is not an error at all but instead a deliberate reinterpretation of an inherited symbol. The sequence of the four nations in Daniel 7—Babylon, Media, Persia, Greece—is said to have derived from an original Mesopotamian scheme listing Assyria, Media and Persia, later supplemented by Greece. The seer behind Daniel 7 used the available figure but reinterpreted the first animal (the lion) as Babylon, not Assyria. He did so for obvious reasons. The first was that his narrative was set in Babylon, and the second was that Babylon, not Assyria, had proved to be the deadly nemesis of Judah. The book of Daniel, moreover, employs that reinterpretation already in Daniel 2, where again the first of the four world empires is Babylon in the person of Nebuchadnezzar.

10. Conclusion: An End of Prophecy?

Psalms 74:9 bewails the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar and the lack of any prophets therein. No one, therefore, could tell people how long the desolation of the city would last. The verse is haunting because it makes manifest the hopelessness of exilic Jerusalem and the people of Judah. The reality as seen in this study, of course, is that early in the exile Jeremiah still flourished (at least until after the death of Gedaliah [see Jer 43—44]), though many in Judah still refused to listen. In addition, Ezekiel was active in Babylon, Isaiah 40—55 addressed the conditions of exile and promised its end, and Isaiah 56—66, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi and a number of anonymous prophets continued both orally and in writing to function as prophets. Daniel too was called a prophet, though modern scholars would consider the book apocalyptic and a product of the second century BC in its present form. Still, this ongoing flow of prophetic voices, however obscure the prophetic writers may have been behind the identities of well-known names, shows that prophecy did not so much die as become transformed. Christian readers will recall that according to the Gospels, the birth of Christianity was accompanied by prophetic activity, which continued on. One has reason to say, then, that prophetic activity did not die in the postexilic period. The emphasis on earlier prophets was part of a process that valued the received traditions—prophetic and otherwise—as the surest guide to understanding and pleasing God. An old text in the hands of a later exegete (e.g., a prophet's disciple or a rabbi) could be as timely and prophetic (broadly conceived) as anything that Isaiah said.

PROPHECY AND ESCHATOLOGY IN CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY

For many Christian theologians and NT scholars, the field of eschatology is a critical, even foundational, component of Christian theology. The influential twentieth-century theologian J. Moltmann, for example, writes, "Eschatology cannot be only a part of Christian doctrine. Rather, the eschatological outlook is characteristic of all Christian proclamation, of every Christian existence and of the whole Church" (Moltmann 1967, 16). While not all scholars maintain that eschatology is as all-encompassing as Moltmann does, most acknowledge that eschatology is an important doctrine in the Christian faith. The goal of this article is to address the manner in which OT prophecy relates to the larger field of Christian theology, especially in regard to the various different schools of eschatological understanding within Christian theology.

1. Definition of Eschatology
2. Eschatology and Old Testament Scholarship
3. Primary Elements in the Old Testament Prophetic View of the Future
4. Interpretive Challenges
5. Theological Interpretive Systems and the Old Testament Prophets

1. Definition of Eschatology.

The word eschatology is derived from the Greek word eschatos ("last"), and thus in a very narrow sense it refers to the study of "last things," "final things," or even the "end of things."

G. Thomas provides a helpful qualification, suggesting that eschatology is not so much about “last things” as it is about “ultimate things” (Thomas, 55). Eschatology is a study of how God’s purpose and direction for history are revealed in Scripture. It is a study not of how the world ends or how time ends but rather of how the story ends—how God brings the biblical story to a climactic end (Hays, 78).

2. Eschatology and Old Testament Scholarship.

Contemporary OT scholarship remains divided on several basic issues relating to eschatology, even including the basic definition given above. Much of the diversity stems from the issues connected to the relationship between prophetic literature and apocalyptic literature. Indeed, eschatology is at heart of the complex issue of determining the relationship between prophecy and apocalyptic (see Apocalypticism, Apocalyptic Literature). On one end of the spectrum is the approach that defines eschatology narrowly, limiting it to concepts associated with a future but ahistorical radical transformation of the cosmos. Thus, almost by definition they locate OT eschatology squarely within apocalyptic literature and see little evidence of eschatology within the “this-world” emphasis of prophetic literature. On the other end of the spectrum, as described in the definition given above, is the understanding that eschatology is intertwined with the future hope proclaimed by the OT prophets, the time when God’s actions in history climax into a spectacular and ultimate restoration. Thus, this view maintains that eschatology is the broader theological field that draws on both prophetic literature and apocalyptic literature (see Boda, 39-43; Arnold, 23-39).

Another central issue within OT scholarship that spawns diversity is that of messianic prophecy. Most Christian theologians and NT scholars would argue that the life, death, resurrection and return of Jesus Christ (i.e., the OT *Messiah) stand at the heart of eschatology. OT scholarship, on the other hand, is highly divided on this issue. In summarizing the history of this division, R. Clements writes, “The conservative and critical paths of interpretation became widely divergent, so much so that by the end of the nineteenth century the more critical expositions of biblical prophecy had almost entirely lost interest in the question of its messianic significance” (Clements, 19). At issue is the relationship between the OT and the NT, as well as the relationship between the church and the synagogue. Within the broad academy of OT scholarship there is no consensus on how to interact with Christian theology, or even if such interaction is a valid endeavor. Few critical studies on the OT prophets produced in the last hundred years even address the messianic connection to the NT, much less the connection to the broader field of Christian eschatology. Most of the recent serious studies of messianism in the OT and its connection to Christ in the NT have been conducted by conservative/evangelical scholars and generally fall into two groups. Either they tend to have an apologetic tone, seeking to persuade the academy that the study of messianism is indeed a valid field of critical study (e.g., McConville), or they simply embrace the conservative/evangelical presupposition that Jesus is the Messiah of the OT, thus addressing only the conservative/evangelical community (Hess and Carroll R.). If messianism itself is a questionably valid issue for critical scholarship, it is no surprise that most recent critical works on the OT prophets reflect very little interest in how the message of the prophets connects to Christian theology, especially eschatology.

There are, of course, exceptions. D. Gowan devotes an entire book to the topic of eschatology in the OT, and he cautiously and briefly explores how some of the central themes of the prophetic hope are continued and developed within later Christian (and Jewish) tradition. But in general, in order to find a good discussion on how the OT prophets relate to Christian eschatology, one must look to conservative/evangelical scholars (see esp. Goldingay, 350-516).

3. Primary Elements in the Old Testament Prophetic View of the Future.

Most of the material in the OT prophets deals with issues and events of their day and time (e.g., covenant violation; idolatry; injustice; call to repentance; warnings of judgment, especially brought about by the Assyrians and Babylonians). G. Fee and D. Stuart observe, “Less than 2 percent of OT prophecy is messianic. Less than 5 percent specifically describes the new-covenant age. Less than 1 percent concerns events yet to come in our time” (Fee and Stuart, 182). These estimates probably are low, yet for Christians seeking to formulate Christian theology regarding the kingdom of God and the unfolding of God's plan for the future, even one percent (still a lot of text!) is very important.

Gowan distills the core of the prophets' special hope for the future (i.e., eschatology) to three basic transformations: (1) God will transform the human person by providing a new spirit and heart; (2) God will transform human society, especially seen in the restoration of Israel and focused on the reemergence of Jerusalem/Zion (this includes a righteous king who will replace the present evil times with justice); (3) God will transform nature itself into a "new creation," abolishing hunger forever (Gowan, 2-3). Preferring the term "hope" over the term "eschatology," J. Goldingay nonetheless stresses the centrality of eschatology/hope to the Christian faith (Goldingay, 350-51). His discussion of the OT prophetic hope, much more thorough and extensive than Gowan's, is organized into ninety-four category headings, including such significant topics as "Yhwh's Longstanding Purpose," "Yhwh's Holiness," "Yhwh's Reign," "Fortunes Restored," "A Greater Exodus," "A United People," "A Permanent Covenant" and "Where Breath/Wind/Spirit Is Poured Out" (Goldingay, 350-516).

For a brief overview, this article has synthesized the major components of OT prophecy relating to eschatology into six central categories: the historical pattern, the covenants, the restoration of Israel, the nations, the Day of Yahweh and the postexilic clarification.

3.1. The Historical Pattern. Much of the OT prophetic material is set in the context of either the Assyrian invasion of Israel or the *Babylonian invasion of Judah. Drawing primarily from Deuteronomy, the prophets announce judgment on Israel and Judah for abandoning Yahweh and his law. The future prophetic aspects of the prophets come in this context, as the prophets look beyond the terrible destruction brought on by the Assyrians and Babylonians to a new, glorious restoration. Many of the terms and concepts used by the prophets to describe the wonderful time of blessing in the future are exact reversals of the terms and concepts used for judgment. For example, practically all of the blessings promised in Jeremiah 30—33 are reversals of the judgments proclaimed in Jeremiah 1—29 (e.g., sickness to healing; scattering to gathering; weeping to joy; uprooting to planting; destruction of Jerusalem to rebuilding Jerusalem; harlot to virgin) (Hays, 175). In striving to understand these images of future restoration (healing, gathering, joy, planting, rebuilding, virgin, etc.) and to relate them to NT eschatology, it is important to keep their negative (historical) counterparts of judgment in view.

The NT parallels the OT prophets in the sense that NT eschatological texts likewise proclaim the coming reign of Christ within a context of coming judgment upon unbelieving Israel (e.g., Mk 13), following the OT prophetic pattern.

3.2. The Covenants. Israel's covenants are deeply imbedded into the OT prophetic message. The prophets proclaim judgment on Israel and Judah because they have seriously violated the *covenant that Yahweh made with them at Sinai. Yet when the prophets look hopefully toward the new glorious restoration, they base much of that hope on the promises/covenants that God made with David (promise of king) and Abraham (promise of land, descendants, blessings on nations) (e.g., Is 2:2-4; 9:7; 41:8-13; 51:1-6; 55:3; Jer 3:14-18; 16:14-15; 23:5-8; 30:9; 33:14-26; Ezek 34:23-24; 37:24; Hos 3:5; Amos 9:11; Mic 7:20; Zech 8:12-23). Jeremiah goes even further, declaring that God will inaugurate a "new covenant," one that will work better than the old covenant made at Sinai (Jer 31:30-34) (Goldingay, 382-84, 431-33, 486-90; Hays, 62-69). The NT continues this understanding of the covenants, clearly presenting Jesus Christ as the fulfillment of the Abrahamic and Davidic covenants as well as the one who inaugurates the new covenant.

3.3. The Restoration of Israel. A central feature of the OT prophets is that they look beyond the terrible judgment and destruction that the Assyrians and Babylonians will bring, and they describe a wonderful time of glorious restoration for Israel (merged with Judah, Jerusalem, Zion, etc.) (e.g., Is 11:10-16; 49:8-26; 54:1-17; 60:1-22; Jer 30—33; Ezek 40—48; Amos 9:11-15; Mic 4:1-8). This restoration will be brought about by the coming of a glorious and righteous Davidic king who will rule with power, justice and compassion. As mentioned above, all of the terrible images of destruction are reversed in this spectacular picture of hope: rebuilt city, regathered people, peace, safety, justice, population increase, planting and harvesting, joy, proper worship of God, deliverance of the poor, forgiveness, experiencing the presence of God, establishment of the new covenant, and so forth. This is the most central feature of the OT prophets' view of the future. Even images of "new creation" (Is 65:17-25) are set within the context of a restored *Israel (and rebuilt Jerusalem [note Is 65:18-19]).

Recently, J. Levenson has argued that the theme of resurrection is likewise integrally connected to the restoration of Israel. The concept of resurrection is a critical component of NT eschatology, but most scholars maintain that the concept is absent (or faint at best) in the OT prophetic literature, appearing only very late in the OT along with the rise of apocalypticism (e.g., Dan 12:2). Levenson, however, maintains that prophetic books such as Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel contain intimations and implications pointing to the tight connection between resurrection of individuals and the restoration of Israel.

NT eschatology connects to most of the OT prophetic imagery regarding the restoration of Israel, especially the establishment of a powerful and just Davidic king and a rebuilt Jerusalem. However, the nature of this connection, especially in regard to whether the reference is literal, symbolic or a mixture, is highly debated (see 4.3 below).

3.4. The Nations. The prophets proclaim judgment on the *nations, just as they proclaim judgment on Israel and Judah. Likewise, as the prophets describe the future regathering and deliverance of Israel and Judah, they often include the nations, depicting them as streaming to Jerusalem to *worship God in truth (e.g., Is 2:2-4; 11:10-12; 18:7; 56:6-8; 66:18; Jer 3:17-18; Mic 4:1-3). At the heart of this feature of the prophetic picture is Genesis 12:3 and the promise that in Abraham all nations of the world would be blessed. In the NT the nations (or Gentiles) move from the prophetic periphery to center stage.

3.5. The Day of Yahweh. The OT prophets frequently speak of the time of God's dramatic intervention into human history as the "Day of Yahweh" (e.g., Is 13:6, 9; 30:3; Ezek 30:3; Joel 2:31; 3:14; Obad 15; Zeph 1:7-18) (see Day of the Lord). They use this term when describing both God's judgment and his deliverance. Likewise, in the prophetic literature the "Day of Yahweh" can refer to "near view" (i.e., imminent) events such as the Babylonian invasion, as well as future ("far view") events such as the restoration and regathering of Israel. Numerous other similar terms such as "the day" or "that day" are also used by the prophets in the same sense (e.g., Is 2:2, 11, 17; 4:2; 12:1; 34:8; Ezek 30:2-3; Hos 2:16-21; Joel 1:15; Amos 9:11; Zeph 1:9-10, 15).

The NT writers use this term ("day of the Lord") often to refer to the second coming of Christ. Likewise, they use similar terms such as "that day," "those days," and "the day of our Lord Jesus" as synonyms for "the day of the Lord."

3.6. Postexilic Clarification. The postexilic prophets (Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi), along with Ezra-Nehemiah, play an important role in that they testify to the fact that the return of the exiles back to the land under the leadership of Zerubbabel, Ezra and Nehemiah did not fulfill the great promises of restoration made by the preexilic prophets. This return was perhaps a start, or a glimpse, of the coming restoration (e.g., Hag 2:1-9; Zech 8:1-23; Mal 3:6-18), but the continued mention of Persian kings throughout the postexilic literature was a strong reminder that Israel did not have a Davidic king on the throne, a central component of the glorious restoration described by Isaiah, Jeremiah and the rest of the preexilic prophets (Hag 1:1; 2:10; Zech 1:1, 7; 7:1).

Similarly, several NT scholars recently have noted that in the first century AD the "still in exile" thinking was an important strand of theological thought among the Jews and thus played an important role in NT eschatology (e.g., Wright 1992, 243, 268-71). Furthermore, one of the interests in recent NT scholarship has been to explore the interaction between the NT writers and Roman rule. This interaction bears similarity at several points to the frequent mention of the Persian Kings in the postexilic OT writers.

4. Interpretive Challenges.

Even among evangelical scholars there is widespread disagreement regarding how to appropriate the future promises of the OT prophets into a broader, biblical Christian eschatology. The absence of a consensus approach is not surprising because OT prophecy, especially the predictive components of OT prophecy, can be extremely complex. For example, in order to gain insight into just how OT predictive prophecy finds fulfillment, D. B. Sandy examined prophecies within the former prophets (Joshua through 2 Kings) that were made and declared as fulfilled within this corpus. From this prediction/fulfillment within the OT he made the following observations. OT prophecies may (1) have a measure of uncertainty about fulfillment; (2) be inherently translucent; (3) give incomplete or enigmatic information; (4) employ stereotypical language; (5) conceal long spans of time; (6) predict something that does not happen as expected; (7) be given in poetic verse; (8) be fulfilled transparently (Sandy, 129-54). Without doubt, OT prophetic passages that look to the future confront interpreters with numerous hermeneutical* challenges. The major challenges include poetry and figurative language; the phenomenon of “near view/far view” imagery; the nature of the future kingdom; the relationship between Israel and the church; the land*; and conditional prophecy.

4.1. Poetry and Figurative Language. Much of the prophetic material in the OT is written in poetry and is characterized by parallelism and the extensive use of figurative language. Likewise, even in the prose sections figures of speech abound. The prophets paint a picture of the glorious future restoration using colorful imagery. A major challenge for interpreters in connecting these images to NT texts on eschatology is determining what these images mean. Is the prophetic picture of the future (often couched in figurative language) to be understood literally, symbolically, both, or somewhere in between? This is a very complex question. For example, Isaiah looks to the future and proclaims, “The wolf will live with the lamb, the leopard will lie down with the goat” (Is 11:6 niv). Clearly, these are figures of speech, but how should they be understood? Taken rather literally (but still understanding “wolf” and “lamb” figuratively to represent a wider category of animals), this might refer to the future transformation of nature in which peace reigns supreme, even to the extent that carnivores will no longer hunt other animals (see Animal Imagery). Or is Isaiah perhaps using these images to refer to political enemies? That is, do “wolf” and “lamb” refer to nations? Clearly, Isaiah is proclaiming that the future restoration will be characterized by peace, but is he referring to the end of war or to the end of carnivores?

Looking to the NT does not necessarily clarify whether one should lean toward the literal side or the symbolic side in interpreting OT prophetic texts. Some OT prophecies are fulfilled quite literally (e.g., Jesus actually was born in the literal town of Bethlehem, in fulfillment of Mic 5:2). Many others are symbolic and quite complex, as is the NT citation and usage of these prophecies (Beale and Carson, xxiii-xxviii).

The decision of whether to approach the OT prophetic promise of the future as primarily literal or as primarily symbolic is a watershed decision in connecting these promises into Christian eschatology.

4.2. Near View/Far View. Another complication in interpreting the OT prophetic view of the future is that as the prophets paint the picture of the future, they do not always distinguish clearly between the near future (e.g., the imminent Babylonian invasion) and events in the far or even farther future (e.g., return of the exiles, the first coming of Christ, the final coming of Christ). The prophets seem to go back and forth from near future events to far future events and then back to near future events. Indeed, often their images seem to be quite fluid in regard to time. A similar situation occurs in the NT in regard to the “already/not yet” aspects of the kingdom of God (Beasley-Murray; Kreitzer). Indeed, there appears to be a connection between the “near view/far view” of the OT prophets and the “already/not yet” NT presentation of the kingdom.

4.3. The Nature of the Future Kingdom. The prophets paint a picture of a glorious restoration in which a Davidic king sits on the throne in Jerusalem, ruling with justice over the world, as the nations stream into the city to worship Yahweh alongside regathered Israel. The interpretive challenge here relates both to the “near view/far view” issue as well as the “literal versus symbolic” issue in figurative/poetic language. How much of this prophetic picture was fulfilled by the first coming of Christ, and how much remains future? If some aspects are still future, how are they to be understood, and how literal are they? Some interpreters maintain that Jesus will return and literally reign from a throne in Jerusalem. Others view the reign of Christ in a symbolic fashion, arguing that he reigns even now over his kingdom and among his people. Some interpreters see almost total fulfillment in the first coming of Christ, others stress a millennial kingdom, while yet others posit that much of the fulfillment will come in the final new heavens, new earth and new Jerusalem described in Revelation 21–22.

4.4. Israel and the Church. This issue is tightly intertwined with one's understanding of the nature of the future kingdom as well as one's approach to the "literal versus symbolic" challenge of figurative language. The OT prophets describe the future blessings of God and the new kingdom of God in terms of restored *Israel. They do not mention the church. In the NT, however, the church quickly becomes a central entity in the unfolding of God's plan. How does the OT prophetic picture of restored Israel relate to the NT church? This also is a watershed issue in Christian eschatology. Do Israel and the church remain totally separate? That is, will the prophecies about Israel be literally fulfilled in the future by the nation of Israel? Or does the church replace Israel and thus fulfill these prophecies symbolically? Or is there some kind of mixture whereby the two are combined into a broad category of "people of God," sometimes identical and sometimes separate?

4.5. The Land. A closely related interpretive challenge is in regard to the many prophetic promises about "the *land." In much of the OT (from Abraham to Ezra-Nehemiah) the land plays a very important theological role and is mentioned repeatedly. As W. Brueggemann observes, "Land is a central, if not the central theme of biblical faith" (Brueggemann, 3). Whereas almost all other prophetic themes carry over into the NT, the land as a theological theme disappears from the NT almost completely. What should Christian theologians do with the OT prophecy about the land? Does the NT "spiritualize" or "redefine" the land, shifting the source of divine blessing from "life in Canaan" to "life in Christ" (Waltke, 560)? Or does the silence of the NT regarding the land imply that the OT prophetic trajectory of the land should be carried directly into NT eschatology in a literal fashion even though the NT rarely mentions it?

4.6. Conditional Prophecy. In Jeremiah 18:7–10 Yahweh declares that what will actually happen in the future depends on how people respond to the prophetic word. Thus, the prophets imply rather strongly that often there is a conditional component to the fulfillment of their prophecies. The story of Jonah provides another clear example: the impending judgment that he proclaimed on Nineveh was averted due to the repentance of the Ninevites. The possibility of conditionality in OT prophecy should suggest some tentativeness and caution against absolute certainty when one tries to explain exactly how these prophecies will be fulfilled in the future.

5. Theological Interpretive Systems and the Old Testament Prophets.

Eschatology is a more prominent feature in the NT than in the OT; thus, most theologians lean heavily on NT texts for shaping their doctrine of eschatology. Central to the discussion in the NT is the nature of the kingdom of God and the thousand-year reign of the coming righteous king described in Revelation 20:1–6 (referred to as the "millennial kingdom"). There is no consensus, even among theologians who otherwise have similar approaches to Scripture (such as evangelicals). Thus, several systems or approaches to Christian eschatology are popular today, and these differing systems likewise interpret OT prophecy in differing ways, particularly in regard to the interpretive challenges discussed above. The four major eschatological systems are amillennialism, premillennialism (with several variations), postmillennialism and eclectic (for overviews of these systems, see Pate; Grenz; Bock).

5.1. Amillennialism. The amillennial view tends to stress the symbolic and figurative nature of prophecy. Amillennialists interpret Revelation 20 figuratively as describing a spiritual kingdom of Christ's reign in the present. They adhere to the "already/not yet" understanding of the kingdom (the kingdom is here, but not yet complete), but they see the completion as occurring when Christ comes at the end of the age, followed immediately by a general resurrection, the last judgment, and the eternal state. According to amillennialism, there will not be a literal earthly millennial kingdom. Thus, amillennialists interpret much of OT prophecy figuratively and symbolically. Typically, they maintain that all of the OT prophecies about the restoration of Israel are fulfilled in the church, which in essence replaces Israel. Many of these prophecies, they argue, were fulfilled at the first coming of Christ. The rest of these prophecies will be fulfilled symbolically at the final coming of Christ and in the eternal state.

5.2. Premillennialism. The premillennial view tends to interpret prophecy (both NT and OT) more literally than amillennialism. The prefix pre means “before,” indicating that premillennialists believe that Christ will return before the millennial kingdom. Indeed, Christ will establish the millennial kingdom, and it is within this millennial kingdom that many of the OT prophecies about Israel and the nations will be fulfilled. Within premillennialism are three major subgroups: classic dispensational premillennialism, progressive dispensational premillennialism and historic premillennialism. These three views can be placed on a spectrum, classified as to how literally or how symbolically they interpret prophecy. Classic dispensational premillennialism is the most literal in its approach, and historic premillennialism is the least literal (although still fairly literal). The progressive dispensational premillennial view lies in the middle.

5.2.1. Classic Dispensational Premillennialism. Dispensationalists believe that God deals with people differently throughout history, and that these different “administrations” or “dispensations” are identifiable as eras of biblical history. Of the three premillennial views, classic dispensationalism is the most literal in its interpretation of prophecy. In regard to OT prophecy, classic dispensationalists maintain a sharp and clear distinction between Israel and the church. Thus, they underscore that the new covenant in Jeremiah 31:31-33 was made with Israel and Judah, not the church (which enjoys the benefits of this covenant but is not a recipient of it). They interpret the OT prophecies about the future restoration of Israel in as literal a manner as possible, including the restoration of the temple and the worship system (as described in Ezekiel). In classic dispensational premillennialism many of the OT prophecies about the restoration of Israel will take place during the millennial kingdom.

5.2.2. Progressive Dispensational Premillennialism. Toward the end of the twentieth century a significant segment of dispensational premillennialists moved away from some aspects of classic dispensationalism, developing a modified view now known as progressive dispensationalism. This system still leans toward a literal view of prophecy, but its adherents give more attention to the figurative aspect and complexities of prophecy than classic dispensationalists do. At the heart of the progressive dispensational movement is the “already/not yet” understanding of the kingdom. This view argues that Christ did indeed inaugurate the kingdom of God at his first coming (the “already”), but that he will not consummate or establish fully the kingdom of God until he returns and reigns over his millennial kingdom (the “not yet”). Thus, progressive dispensational premillennialists maintain that some OT prophecies about the kingdom were partially fulfilled by the first coming of Christ, but that many of them still await fulfillment in the millennial kingdom. Progressive dispensational premillennialists likewise maintain a distinction between Israel and the NT church, but they do not tend to see this difference as universally present in the OT prophetic material. While views vary to some extent, some within progressive dispensationalism argue that Israel and the church are “mostly separate,” but that some promises made to Israel are at least “partially” fulfilled in the church. On the other hand, progressive dispensationalists agree with classic dispensationalists in maintaining that there will be a future restoration for national (literal) Israel.

5.2.3. Historic Premillennialism. Similar to the other premillennial systems, the historic premillennial system posits that Christ will return to earth and establish a literal millennial kingdom. This view derives its name (“historic”) from seeking to connect to the millennial views of the early church fathers (i.e., the “historic” millennial view). Historic premillennialism tends to be less literal than the dispensational premillennial views but not completely symbolic like amillennialism. Like the progressive dispensationalists, the historic premillennialists understand the kingdom of God according to the concept of “already/not yet.” Thus, they maintain that while Christ did indeed inaugurate the kingdom at his first coming, the ultimate consummation of the kingdom, along with fulfillment of many OT prophecies, will come through the future millennial kingdom. Unlike the dispensational premillennialists, the historic premillennialists do not maintain a sharp distinction between Israel and the church. Most historical premillennialists understand the church to be the “true Israel,” thus fulfilling many of the promises made to Israel. Likewise, although many historical premillennialists recognize the possibility of many Jews converting to Christianity at the end of the age, they do not generally see a unique role for the literal nation of Israel.

5.3.1. Classic Postmillennialism. In the term postmillennial, the prefix post means “after” and is used to indicate the view that Christ will return in glory after the millennial reign. Postmillennialists, however, understand the millennial reign quite differently than the premillennialists do. Classic postmillennialism maintains that through the proclamation of the gospel and through the general progress of “Christian” civilization, the majority of people in this present age will come to saving faith, thus ushering in a “kingdom-like” era (the millennium) in which the prophecies about righteousness, peace and prosperity will be fulfilled. Some postmillennialists view the ushering in of the kingdom as a gradual development that includes all of church history. Postmillennialism was very popular within the English-speaking church at the end of the nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth, but its optimistic view of ushering in the kingdom of peace was largely shattered in the twentieth century by the two world wars and the Holocaust. Today, postmillennialism in its classic formulation is very much a minority view, especially in comparison with amillennialism and premillennialism.

5.3.2. Modern (Preterit) Postmillennialism. In recent years many NT scholars and Christian theologians have underscored the importance of the destruction of Jerusalem in AD 70 for interpreting NT prophecy (e.g., Wright 1996). This same conclusion has led a group of others to a radically different understanding of the kingdom of God. Preteritism (and its related system, Christian reconstructionism/theonomic postmillennialism), argues that the parousia (coming) of Christ to judge the world and to establish his kingdom actually happened in AD 70 at the fall of Jerusalem (and through other associated events). This view interprets the fulfillment of central NT texts such as the Olivet discourse (Mt 24; Mk 13; Lk 21) and Revelation 1–20 as a past event (“preterit” means “past”) through which the kingdom began. Christian reconstructionism/theonomic postmillennialism posits that as the kingdom is ushered in, there will be a gradual return to the OT norms of civil justice through missions, evangelism and education. Furthermore, modern postmillennialists believe that the vast majority of the world’s population will convert to Christ through the proclamation of the gospel (Gentry, 13-25; Pate, 55-73).

In regard to OT prophecies, modern postmillennialists take a symbolic approach, interpreting Israel as representing the people of God (i.e., the church). Likewise, the OT images of the nations of the world streaming to Jerusalem to worship God are viewed as a picture of world evangelism, as the peoples of the world stream into the church to find salvation (Gentry, 36-38).

5.4. The Eclectic View. In recent years J. Duvall, followed by C. Pate, has put forward a hybrid view dubbed simply “eclectic” (Duvall, 288-94; Pate, 129). Pate, for example, acknowledges that the fall of Jerusalem played an important role in the fulfillment of prophecy (the emphasis of preterist postmillennialism), but he also embraces the “already/not yet” nature of the kingdom and wants to stress the presence of the kingdom here today (similar to amillennialism). On the other hand, he still sees a future climax of the kingdom in the millennium and thus retains a premillennial view of Revelation 20 (Pate, 129-31). Although Duvall appears to be one of the first to use the actual term “eclectic” for this approach, this mixture of views is not unique to him or Pate. D. Bloesch held a similar position, labeling it “historical-symbolic” (Bloesch, 111). In fact, under the “already/not yet” umbrella there appears to be a place on the spectrum where premillennialism overlaps to some degree with amillennialism, and the eclectic view appears to describe this part of the spectrum. In this regard, R. Moore argues that the near consensus view among evangelicals regarding the “already/not yet” feature of the kingdom of God stretches across the line between premillennialism and amillennialism and thus provides common ground for understanding eschatology and its implications for the church today.

Those advocating the “eclectic” view have not yet developed a thoroughgoing approach to OT prophecy. In all likelihood, those holding this view will maintain a cautious, nondogmatic mixture of literal and symbolic interpretations, probably similar to the historical premillennial position.

5.5. Other Views and Trends. In his books Theology of Hope and The Coming of God, Jürgen Moltmann, an influential Christian theologian of the latter half of the twentieth century, espouses a millennial view that does not quite fit into any of the mainline positions described above, although perhaps it could be considered another “eclectic” view. Placing a strong emphasis on Christian hope, as well as on the OT prophetic themes of social justice and new creation, Moltmann’s millennial view combines aspects of traditional postmillennialism and premillennialism “in order to construct a socio-dynamic view of the future that heralds justice and peace for the whole creation” (Bloesch, 106 [see also the discussion and critique in Bauckham 1997, 261-77]). Moltmann posits that Christ will indeed come and establish his kingdom in a visible way, but Moltmann consciously shifts the focus from the future to the implications that this hope creates in the life of the church now. Eschatology, Moltmann argues, includes both aspects.

Numerous other theological systems (e.g., liberation theology, feminist theology, ecological theology, postcolonial theology, black theology), reflecting a wide range of approaches to Scripture, likewise shift much of their discussion regarding eschatology from the future to the present. Many of these approaches developed and are being articulated out of a context of sociopolitical oppression, suffering and marginalization. Thus, the OT prophetic vision of social justice, often along with the prophetic image of a new creation, frequently plays a foundational role in their formulation of eschatology, even amid frequent skepticism among some of those holding these views regarding personal immortality or the final triumph of good over evil (Ruether, 334-39; Westhelle, 311-23). For discussions of these views, see Schwarz, 152-72; Pate 97-128.

Even in recent eschatological discussions among evangelicals there has been a growing concern to project the relevance of eschatological faith back into the praxis of the church. This is particularly true in the area of ecology, where the OT promise of a new creation, expanded by Paul in Galatians 6:15; 2 Corinthians 5:17, is being connected both to the future new creation and to “creation care” or “creation stewardship” in the here and now (e.g., Moo, 39-60).

PROPHECY AND PSYCHOLOGY

For well over a century and a half biblical scholars have authored treatments on the relationship between prophecy and psychology (see, e.g., Delitzsch [1st ed. 1855]; Foster; Beck [German original, 1843]; Kurtz; Kaplan 1908; 1919; Fletcher; Povah). The connection is due, on the one hand, to the nature of psychology itself, which is the study of the relationship between mental processes and behavior, including, but not limited to, matters of personhood and selfhood, consciousness and the will. (Since psychology has many branches, including experimental, clinical, social, developmental, etc., one must be careful about speaking of "psychology as a whole"; it is best to be clear whenever possible about the specific branch of psychology that one is speaking of when referring to the discipline.) It is also due, on the other hand, to the nature of the prophets themselves, several of whom manifest characteristics that have struck many readers as extraordinary if not abnormal and pathological. Until relatively recently, however, the psychological study of biblical prophecy (as well as other parts of the Bible) has been in bad repute. This is the unfortunate result of several factors, one of which is terminological, another of which is misunderstanding between the disciplines of psychology and biblical studies, especially the misunderstanding of psychology by biblical scholars. An antagonistic relationship need no longer obtain, since both disciplines have changed, with the study of psychology now far developed beyond Freud and Jung (foundational though they remain), let alone pre-Freudian days (see Mitchell and Black), and the study of the Bible now enlarged far beyond historical-critical research only (especially as that was practiced in particularly staid and unimaginative modes).

The sea changes evident in the study of psychology, in particular, should impact studies of "prophecy and psychology," though realization of such changes has come too slowly to biblical scholars, who have, again until fairly recently, either eschewed (contemporary) psychological approaches or offered only “older” style analyses à la Freud and Jung (for overviews, see Bucher; Rollins, DBInt 2:337-41; 1999; Kille 2001; Rollins and Kille). The present article reviews the history of the study of prophecy and psychology before focusing attention on the psychological affect of the prophets themselves as described in the biblical text, the psychological effect of the prophets on their audiences, and finally the psychology of God according to the prophets.

1. The Prophets and the “Old (Biblical) Psychology”
2. The Prophets and the “New (Modern) Psychology”
3. The Psychological Affect of the Prophets (The Psychology of the Prophets Themselves)
4. The Psychological Effect of the Prophets (The Psychology of the Prophets’ Audience)
5. The Psychology of God (According to the Prophets)

1. The Prophets and the “Old (Biblical) Psychology.”

Already in the first edition of his System of Biblical Psychology (1855), F. Delitzsch spoke of “the immensely wide range of psychological literature” available to him (Delitzsch, ix). He begins his work proper by writing, “Biblical psychology is no science of yesterday. It is one of the oldest sciences of the church” (Delitzsch, 3), and he traces that “science” as far back as the second and third centuries AD via a work by Melito of Sardis (d. ca. AD 180) entitled “Concerning the Soul and the Body and the Mind,” and via Tertullian’s (d. ca. AD 220) treatise “On the Soul.” These works, like Delitzsch’s own and others from this era of scholarship, study the notion of the “soul” (Gk psychē; cf. Heb nepeš) in Scripture—where it appears, what it means, how it relates to other aspects of the human being mentioned by the biblical authors (often divided by Testament [see Fletcher]), and so forth. These sorts of studies, from classical antiquity up through the early-twentieth century, might be termed the “old (biblical) psychology,” since the beginning of modern psychology customarily is dated to 1879, the year when W. Wundt established a laboratory in Leipzig for experimental research (Rollins and Kille, 4). The first major breakthroughs of Freud and his colleagues and pupils followed only a few decades later (see 2 below).

In this “old” era, the concept of “biblical psychology” was closely aligned with biblical theology, on the one hand, and with the classical topics of dogmatic/systematic theology, on the other hand. So, one finds in these works treatments of the nature and states of the soul (creation, life, death) along with the doctrine of the resurrection, sometimes with extensive interaction with systematic theological works of the day (see Foster; Delitzsch; cf. Rollins, DBInt 2:338).

Two further aspects of research in this period should be noted. First, it was not uncommon for many writers working within this older paradigm to move quickly and easily from discussing the “soul” to discussing the specific personalities or personality traits of specific biblical personages; hence, studies of “the prophetic mind” (Kaplan 1908; 1919; cf. Scott) or “prophetic spirit” (Kurtz) are not uncommon. Second, studies of prophecy and psychology in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries often referenced comparable psychological phenomena in other parts of the world, whether those were of ancient or modern vintage (e.g., Delitzsch; Kaplan 1908). Both of these aspects had direct impact on the studies that followed. The study of prophetic “personalities” would be severely critiqued in historical-critical circles (see 2 below). The comparative bent, however, has been widely employed in subsequent study of the prophets, though not always with psychological interest (see, e.g., Widengren, 94-120; Lindblom; cf. Wilson 1980; Overholt 1986; 1989). Among other things, the comparative work raises large questions regarding what, if anything, is psychologically “universal” and what is or is not culturally distinctive. One must also constantly worry about cultural difference, temporal distance, and the constant threat of reductionism (Miell, 571; cf. Gunkel 1924a, 366).

2. The Prophets and the “New (Modern) Psychology.”

Psychology changed forever and entered the modern period with the work of S. Freud (1856-1939) and C. Jung (1875-1961). The first psychoanalytic essay was written by Freud and J. Breuer, a Viennese internist, in 1893. Their coauthored Studies in Hysteria (1895) served to inaugurate the modern discipline of psychology (Mitchell and Black, 3-4). Although Freud was not the first to “discover” or mention the unconscious, he was the first to “excavate” it in such fashion and to such an extent, and his theories regarding (1) the structure of the psyche (especially id, ego, superego), (2) the therapeutic techniques of free association, transference and dream interpretation and (3) sexual development (especially the Oedipus complex) and instinctual drives (especially repetition compulsion, the pleasure principle and the death instinct) are widely known (see Mitchell and Black, 1-22).

Also well known is the early, acrimonious split between Freud and Jung. Generally speaking, Jung was far more open to the role of religion than was Freud, and so Jung’s work was more easily (and directly, if not immediately) adapted by scholars in religion and the Bible (see, e.g., Povah; Rollins 1983; DBInt 2:339; Kille 2004). Jung’s contributions include his work on symbolism and the collective unconscious, both of which were utilized in subsequent work on the prophets. F. Haeussermann’s 1932 book, for example, notably subtitled “An Investigation of the Psychology of Prophetic Experience,” discusses both the individual and collective unconscious (Haeussermann, 41-42) and is especially concerned with Yahweh’s work in its different symbolic forms (die Gestalt des Symbols), including water, fire, light, snakes, mother/father, king, and so forth (Haeussermann, 28-102).

Despite Freud’s aversion to many religious matters, his work also often engages religion and religious issues (notably in his “trilogy” on religion: Freud 1939, 1950; 1989 [see Rollins 1999]). Regardless, his understanding of the psyche and the instinctual drives, particularly the sexual drives, was quickly picked up by scholars of literature. This was due in part to the fact that Freud himself illustrated his work via literary characters. The Oedipus complex above all, of course, derives from Sophocles’ play Oedipus Rex, but Shakespeare’s Hamlet is another favorite example of the oedipal complex at work in literature (see, famously, Jones 1949 [original, 1910]; Holland, Kugler and Grimaud, 998). Freudian readings were thus received into literary-critical studies of the mid-twentieth century (Guerin et al., 152-81; Barry, 96-108), though not always appreciatively (Holland, Kugler and Grimaud, 998; Guerin et al., 153-54; Rashkow, DBInt 2:335-36), and eventually they found their way into biblical studies as well, including the study of prophecy proper (see the early work of Povah; and the later work of Halperin on Ezekiel). The same was true for Jungian approaches to literature (see Holland, Kugler and Grimaud, 1000). Notably, some of this work was done by psychologists, not biblical scholars (Fingert; Cohen; Nussbaum).

Psychology, however, is no monolithic discipline. Indeed, contemporary psychology—even just one of its branches, such as clinical psychology—is like any other field: highly fractious, marked by many different and competing schools of thought, even if there is considerable overlap and agreement among many of these (see Brueggemann 2009). In a word, then, “classical” Freudian readings and Jungian readings—whether of Hamlet or Ezekiel, however insightful these might be—are now severely dated, especially in light of the fact that today even the “Freudians” are significantly post-Freud, and Jungians are few and far between. Advances in both empirical and clinical psychology have moved the discussion far from the id, ego and superego, and far from the collective unconscious. So, again, although the work of Freud and Jung remains foundational on many levels (Freud more so than Jung), that work has been further developed and superseded by theorists and clinicians working in self, object relations and relational psychology. This listing does not include still “larger” psychological subjects, such as group- or social-psychological investigations (see Buss; Wilson 1980; Overholt 1989). Nor does it mention the fastest-growing area of psychology: brain research, including neuropsychology and cognitive science. Advances in these areas have confirmed long-held beliefs of psychology such as the existence of the unconscious (what cognitive scientists call the “cognitive unconscious”) and certain aspects of learning theory (e.g., the discovery of mirror neurons, which helps to explain why we learn through imitation behavior). Another rapidly growing area, also finding major support via brain research, is in attachment theory, which studies how human infants attach to their caregivers (parents) and develop affect regulation and relational patterns that prove to be fairly consistent throughout the lifespan. Attachment theory is thus becoming an important lens through which to understand psychopathology and therapeutic efficacy. Finally, newer understandings of human motivation (e.g., moving from Freud's instinctual drives to the drive for human relations via object relations psychology) has opened new vistas for understanding religious experience as well (see Brueggemann 2009).

An obvious point that should nevertheless be stressed is that these developments in psychology indicate that psychological approaches to biblical prophecy need not be condemned because of problems with Freud (or Jung). To put it differently, many of the critiques of "prophecy and psychology" simply no longer apply because they often concern only the "new psychology" of Freud, which is now, in turn, quite old (W. Brueggemann observes that "these studies make for interesting reading, but seldom . . . do they illuminate the text," and that much in them strikes the reader as "self-indulgent and misleading" [Brueggemann 2009, 228]).

The substance of these criticisms typically came from the historical-critical tradition of biblical study. Once a book like Amos, for example, was deemed the end result of a long process of composition, editing and transmitting—with multiple, typically anonymous hands playing a part in the process—gone was the possibility of psychoanalyzing Amos. Which Amos would one psychoanalyze: the eighth-century BC prophet or his disciples and redactors? What Amos? Was there a real person by that name responsible for the book as opposed to, say, "Amos" being a nom de plume or literary creation (see Jobling 2004, 204-5)? Historical criticism's interest in the world behind the text, coupled with arguments from form, source, tradition and redaction criticism (among others), effectively eliminated most biblical personas from direct "analysis" (in the technical psychoanalytic sense). As J. Lindblom puts it, "Literary documents from so remote a time cannot yield much to the psycho-analyst" (Lindblom, 219); or as P. M. Joyce says, "It must be concluded that we can know next to nothing of Amos's own personality, let alone his psychology" (Joyce 2011, 108). The same position marked biblical theological approaches, which until recently often proceeded lockstep with historical-critical research. Biblical theology too, that is, "put psychological considerations into the background" (Barr, 171). The work of W. C. Klein may be taken as exemplary. In his 1956 monograph The Psychological Pattern of Old Testament Prophecy he concludes that none of the main trends of then-contemporary psychology is useful in illuminating the OT prophets and vice versa—again, mostly because of historical-critical considerations such as temporal distance (but see further 3 below).

What, then, might explain the recent revival of interest in psychology and the Bible more generally, and psychology and the prophets more specifically, both of which are so contrary to this council of despair (for a major turning point, see Grant)? One factor surely is the explosion of research in psychological circles, much of it empirical, which has demonstrated the validity of this discipline and the accuracy of its insights; subsequently, psychology, along with its main tenets and conclusions, has been widely adopted both intellectually and culturally. Unfortunately, this progress in the study of psychology has taken place so quickly and its (sub)disciplines are so complex that "the application of these methods demands special qualifications which cannot reasonably be expected of a Biblical exegete" (Lindblom, 219; cf. Klein, v; Brueggemann 2009). It is not surprising, then, that most exegetes and biblical studies as a whole have proven incapable of "keeping up"; hence, knowledge of the newer trends and developments in psychology, let alone their application, has lagged significantly behind. Happily, that has begun to change due to the careful work of several scholars, most notably D. A. Kille (Kille 2001) and W. G. Rollins (Rollins 1999; see also Rollins and Kille; Ellens and Rollins).

Already mentioned earlier is a second important factor explaining the recent revival of interest in the Bible and psychology: the gradual inclusion of other, nonexclusively historical-critical approaches in biblical studies. Many of these approaches derived from the study of literature, which had both influenced early Freudian theories (see above) and quickly adopted psychological insights. Although this development is positive, when it combined with the problems besetting the first one, the unfortunate result has been a plethora of works from the side of biblical studies that are overly beholden to outmoded Freudian (and Jungian) perspectives.

Other important items relating to the rapprochement of psychology and biblical studies that should be mentioned include the close tying together of the study of literature, language and psychology as evidenced in, for instance, the work of J. Lacan, much of which views psychotherapy as a kind of textual analysis (see his “Seminar on ‘The Purloined Letter,’” in Lacan, 6-48 [cf. Barry, 108-18]), or in the field of psycholinguistics. In fact, Lacan and others have argued that the unconscious is structured like a language so that literature, properly interpreted, can be used to illustrate “the major concepts of . . . psychology” (Rashkow 2000, 153 [cf. Barry, 111]). Perhaps most important is the widely held belief in the unconscious itself. If such exists—and it is the sine qua non of most modern psychology and established by recent studies in cognitive science and neuropsychology—then it is everywhere operative: now and in the past; in this culture and in every other culture; in the authors of texts, in the texts themselves, and in any and all subsequent interpreters of the texts (see Sherman; Johnson; Clines and Exum, 18; Rashkow, DBInt 2:335; Jobling 2004, 206; Joyce 2011, esp. 114-16). Finally, just as there is no one psychological school of thought, it is important to stress that there is no (and should be no) one psychology of the prophets. As D. K. Miell observes, “After rigorous empirical testing, psychology . . . [has been shown to] yield non-obvious and counter-intuitive insights into . . . fundamental aspects of individual and social behavior . . . [so] one would expect them to throw new light on the biblical text” (Miell, 572). We will have to reckon, then, with many different “psychologies,” each of which may be productive in the study of the several different prophets, prophetic books, prophetic traditions, and so on (see Ellens and Rollins). The remainder of this article highlights a few ways that research has proceeded and how it may proceed in the future.

3. The Psychological Affect of the Prophets (The Psychology of the Prophets Themselves).

In light of the developments recounted above, gone are the days when one could confidently state that “the average prophet was tall, spare, and nervous” (Klein, 75) or remark that the prophets were “not ordinary . . . but strong enthusiastic personalities . . . of powerful passionate nature . . . young men, with blood still warm . . . men of religion, in whom faith burned, not with a cheerful homely glow, but with mighty destroying flame” (Gunkel 1924b, 25), men “in whom two things met—powerful religious exci-tation, which threw them into amaze, and noble religious thoughts which took entire possession of them” (Gunkel 1924b, 24) (In another place, Gunkel speaks of Jeremiah as “a man of tender nature, much too soft for his frightful vocation, suffering bitterly in having to do battle with his people, indeed, even with members of his own family” [Gunkel 2001, 118]). We must begin more generally when it comes to the psychological affect of the prophets.

Several different terms are used to describe prophets and/or prophecy in the OT, and each occurs numerous times (rōʾeh [“seer”], nābīʾ [“prophet”], hōzeh [“visionary”], ʾīs-ʾelohīm [“man of God”]). Apart from a few brief references to prophets or prophecy in the Pentateuch (Gen 20:7 [of Abraham]; Ex 7:1 [of Aaron]; Ex 15:20 [of Miriam]; Deut 34:10 [of Moses]; note also Num 11:24-30 [of the seventy elders, including Eldad and Medad]; Num 12:6; Deut 13:1-5; 18:15-22), our first extensive information about prophets is provided in Samuel and Kings (cf. the mention of an anonymous prophet in Judg 6:7-10, a passage that seems out of place and is missing in 4Q49). Here we hear of several prophets by name, including Samuel (1 Sam 3:20), Gad (1 Sam 22:5) and Nathan (2 Sam 7:2), and also learn that at different points in Israel’s history prophets were called by different terms (“prophet” versus “seer” [1 Sam 9:9]). Still, many of these passages are rather innocuous. To be sure, prophets can “see” things—something about the future, what will happen, which way to go, or where lost donkeys are to be located (see 1 Sam 9:6, 15-17, 20; cf. 1 Sam 9:27—10:8)—but most of these texts do not present prophets behaving “abnormally.”

The narrative about the “band of prophets” (NRSV) in 1 Samuel 10 changes all that. Here we hear of a group of prophets who, when coming from a shrine and accompanied by music (which may be related to trance inducement [see Wilson 1979, 332; Gunkel 1924a, 359-60]), are said to be “in a prophetic frenzy” (1 Sam 10:5). Saul is said to be possessed by the Lord’s spirit, caught up in the prophetic frenzy as well, and “turned into a different person” (1 Sam 10:6), though apparently this frenzy is short-lived (1 Sam 10:13). Those who observed it, however, wondered if Saul too was a prophet (1 Sam 10:11-12). A similar, though less positive, story is found in 1 Samuel 19:18-24 (see Wilson 1979, 334-35; Gunkel 1924a, 364).

There, three sets of Saul's servants are caught up in prophetic frenzy, which prevents them from seizing David. Finally, Saul himself is similarly incapacitated and ends up lying naked before Samuel. These two narratives, though in tension on several points (Wilson 1979, 333)—for example, with regard to the origin of the proverb "Is Saul also among the prophets?"—are fascinating because they give tantalizing glimpses into the ecstatic states that at least some prophets (or types of prophets) experienced. Moreover, although abnormality is certainly a culturally defined datum (see Van Nuys, 245; Klein, 5), both narratives indicate that the audience also viewed them as atypical in some fashion. At the very least, the texts reflect awareness that Saul's participation in prophetic activity was unusual.

Attempts to correlate types of prophetic activity (especially ecstatic frenzy) with particular terms used for the prophets have been largely unsuccessful. It does seem clear that two of the main terms used for prophets speak to their ability to "see" (r'h, hzh) things. Numbers 12:6 indicates that *visions and dreams are given to prophets by God (or not given [see 1 Sam 28:6])—a point that the writing prophets confirm via the vision reports recounted there (e.g., Amos 7:1-9; 8:1-3; Ezek 1—2). Direct divine revelation via a vision or dream would count as abnormal behavior for many, if not most, modern people, and despite the widespread phenomena of ancient prophecy, the fact that most people were not prophets (cf. Num 11:29) indicates that the same probably held true for antiquity. Hosea 9:7 is especially intriguing in this regard when it states that "the prophet is a fool, the man of the spirit is mad [mēšuggā']" (cf. 2 Kings 9:11; Jer 29:26; see Widengren 96, 113). At this point it is instructive to note that one of the main terms for prophets in Akkadian is mahhū(m)/muḥhū(m), which is derived from the verb "to rave, become frenzied, act crazy" (mahū). It is sometimes posited that the main Hebrew verb "to prophesy" (nb'), which often occurs in the reflexive-reciprocal stem (Hithpael), has similar valence (see Wilson 1979, 330-36; Parker; Heschel, 505-6). This is debated, but what is incontrovertible is that the Hithpael of nb' is used to describe Saul's madness in 1 Samuel 18:10.

Abnormal prophetic psychology may be signaled not only by the experience of vision and dreams or by ecstatic frenzy/trance/speech (a heavily debated point [see Parker; Wilson 1979; Petersen 1981]), but also by other aspects, especially certain behaviors. The prophetic *sign acts are especially important in this regard (Friebel), and the most famous prophet, psychologically speaking, is far and away Ezekiel (Klostermann; Gunkel 1924a, 363-64; Broome; Koch, 92-93; Halperin; see also Wiener [on Elijah]; Fingert and Lacocque/Lacocque 1990 [on Jonah]). In 1877 A. Klostermann diagnosed Ezekiel as suffering from the psychiatric disorder catalepsy. E. C. Broome later argued (1946) that the cumulative effect of the data—especially the claim that Ezekiel was mute for seven years (Ezek 3:22-27; 24:25-27; 33:21-22) and the notice that he laid for 390 days on his left side and then forty days on his right side (Ezek 4:4-6)—indicated that this prophet was a paranoid schizophrenic, with periods of catatonia, hallucinations, delusions of persecution and grandeur, narcissistic-masochistic conflict and withdrawal/anxiety, some of which were directly related to certain Freudian stages (especially the oral and anal). For Broome, Ezekiel was "a true psychotic," though this was unrecognized in Ezekiel's day, and he was merely seen as an ecstatic (Broome, 291; for critique, see Cassem; for a defense, see Halperin).

This diagnosis of Ezekiel, clearly in the "old psychological" mode, was given fullest expression in a 1993 study by D. J. Halperin, who, among other things, traced the prophet's condition back to childhood sexual abuse. Few scholars have followed Halperin's lead, with many, though not all (see Jobling 1995; 2004; Smith-Christopher 1999; cf. Cassem; Heschel, 508-9), of the criticisms coming from historical-critical quarters that questioned the validity of analysis of dead individuals who, moreover, may be literary creations, to some degree, or who at least are presented in literary works as opposed to, say, direct interview, (auto)biography, and so forth (see 2 above). In the "new psychological" mode several scholars have profitably studied Ezekiel—both the prophet and especially the book (see 4 below)—in the light of trauma theory, whether that is literature about trauma and trauma survivors or the actual diagnostics of posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) (see Smith-Christopher 2002; Garber 2004; 2005; Bowen; cf. Morrow [on Second Isaiah]).

Several things should be noted in concluding this section on the psychological affect of the prophets themselves. First, behavior every bit as bizarre as what one finds in the OT prophets is attested elsewhere in the ancient Near East. For example, in an Akkadian letter found at Mari a prophet (muḫḫum) of the god Dagan is said to have devoured (akālum) a lamb raw in front of the city gate, adding “A devouring [ukultum] will take place” (Nissinen, 38). This document conjoins a strange prophetic sign act with oracular content, connected via a rhetorical device (word play), in a complex that is quite similar to what one finds in the OT. Indeed, the oracular content with literary troping indicates that even the most egregiously “abnormal” prophetic acts or words were in service to a larger communicative agenda. So, with reference to Jeremiah’s and Ezekiel’s sign acts, K. G. Friebel makes the case that they are intentionally chosen nonverbal behaviors designed to communicate specific messages to an audience. They are thus evidence not of the prophets’ abnormality, but rather of their high skill as communicators and rhetors.

Second, although the historical-critical concerns are quite valid—the prophets are, after all, long dead and gone—one should not rule out completely the possibility of psychohistory, especially if that is carefully and appropriately done. Psychohistory (analysis of dead individuals, even literary characters, or a synthesis of the two: analysis of literary characters so as to analyze dead authors) has a long history stretching back to Freud (who analyzed Leonardo da Vinci [Freud 1961]) and continues to be practiced (A. Miller 2006; cf. Stiebert [on Ezekiel’s wife]). E. H. Erikson famously analyzed Luther (Erikson 1993) and Ghandi (Erikson 1969), and others have done the same with Jesus (Capps 2000) or with important figures in religion and psychology (Capps 1997; cf. James). To be sure, not all of this work is well received, and many psychologists would disparage psychohistorical approaches by highlighting their real limitations (the critique here is not far different from the historical-critical concerns noted in 2 above). Still, psychohistorical works continue to be produced, and the biographical genre itself typically traffics in psychohistorical arenas (see Breger). Even more importantly it should be noted that, to some degree at least, the shift in recent work from the psychological study of the prophetic individual to the prophetic book (see below and, further, 4 below) is still very much within the realm of psychohistory. It simply relocates the subject (psyche) that is being interpreted. An important point here is a neuroscientific one: the human brain has changed very little for thousands of years, which means that we can compare ancient brains, “which were not directly studied, with modern ones, which have been probed and catalogued in normal, injured, and surgical conditions” (Shantz, 108 [see further O’Shea; more generally, Joyce 2011, 112, on Troeltsch’s historical principle of analogy]).

Third, even if many of the prophetic literary forms (e.g., call narrative, prophetic lawsuit) are conventional, this need not be understood as negating the psychological significance of the form in question for the prophet or the prophet’s audience. The basic form-critical insight, after all, is that there is a life experience or event (Sitz im Leben) behind the literary form. Moreover, formal conventionality need not be indication that the form itself is not “abnormal” or unusual in some sense, at least by modern standards. Anthropological evidence indicates that even trance behavior is often quite rational and understandable by those witnessing it, and that “traditional prophetic speech forms are in reality simply manifestations of stereotypical prophetic possession behavior” (Wilson 1979, 329).

Fourth, even those who would eschew psychological analysis of specific prophetic individuals or personalities have, of late, not shied away from thinking about the psychological dynamics of the prophetic book (see, e.g., Clines and Exum, 18; Garber 2004; 2005; Bowen). Such approaches are less interested in diagnosing the prophet Ezekiel as having PTSD as they are interested in speaking of the book of Ezekiel as an example of literature that reflects the traumatic experience of *exile and is a way the exilic community coped with that trauma (see further 4 below). This is an acceptable move, but is not in the least bit a nonpsychological one. As already indicated, at most it simply shifts the subject from the psychology of the prophetic individual to the psychology of the prophetic audience/prophet’s community. But this move (and the latter subjects) is no less hampered, historically-critically speaking, than the former subject (the prophetic individual) when it comes to data suitable for psychological study. That is to say that just as the prophetic individual is long dead and gone, so is the original audience and the vast majority of subsequent audiences. Or, to reverse the formulation: the data that would permit a scholar to speak of the psychology of a prophetic book could equally well be applied to the psychology of a prophetic individual, assuming that one existed. Here the point is that when critics speak of the effect of literature on a reader or (only slightly less overtly) speak of the rhetorical purpose or function of a unit, even without mention of author or receiver, they are very much making psychological statements (see Holland, Kugler and Grimaud, 1997). Indeed, it could be said that “[a]ll crit[icism] is in a sense psych[ological] crit[icism], since all crit[icism] and theory proceed from assumptions about the psychology of humans who make or experience or are portrayed in lit[erature]” (Holland, Kugler and Grimaud, 1997; cf. Guerin et al., 153).

Fifth, a major subtext in the discussion of the psychology of prophetic affect has been whether or not the prophet’s ideas can be trusted if they stem from someone who is neurotic or psychotic (see Widengren, 119; Van Nuys; Cassem; Wilson 1979). Is the cogency of the prophet and the message affected if the prophet is, in fact, pathological? Scholars have been at pains to say no. So, for example, K. Koch contends that “at no point do Ezekiel’s mental powers appear to be in any way clouded” (Koch, 92), and earlier Broome wrote that “even in paranoia . . . the patient’s powers of observation, intellect, and native shrewdness are frequently unimpaired” (Broome, 290). Broome’s conclusion is thus that Ezekiel’s “religious significance is by no means impaired by our diagnosis of a paranoid condition, as William James convincingly argued in the case of other great spiritual leaders” (Broome, 292; see James). Such remarks are clearly reacting against those who would say that ecstasy is irrational in some way. These comments are also engaged with the legacy of, among others, G. Hölscher, who claimed that all Israelite prophets were ecstatic (see Gunkel 1924a, 358-59, 427-29; Widengren, 97). R. R. Wilson points out that scholars have responded to Hölscher in several different ways, one of which is to deny the ecstatic experience altogether (Wilson 1979). But Koch is certainly right: “Our modern rational way of looking at things may protest as it likes: the parapsychological riddle of prophetic clairvoyance can only be eliminated from this writing [i.e., Ezekiel] at the cost of an exegetical act of violence” (Koch, 94). One must beware, in other words, of a kind of “unintentional linguistic reductionism” wherein all that biblical scholars care about is “textuality” or “rationality” at the expense of religious experience and the embodiment of knowing (Shantz, 208-9). Texts such as Jeremiah 4:19; 23:9, among many others, simply will not permit complete elimination of elements of ecstasy from at least some ancient Israelite prophecy, though all of that was of one piece and so it must be carefully nuanced or filleted appropriately (Wilson 1979; Petersen 1981). Whatever the case, K. Van Nuys is not alone in arguing that what he calls the “creative reorganization of experience” ultimately enhances the greatness of the prophets, and he notes that in modern times madness and genius often have been linked (Van Nuys, 244-46; cf. Heschel, 498-523; see also Jamison). Furthermore, the fact that abnormal affect, ecstasy, spirit-possession, trance, and so forth do not automatically translate into deviant pathology is demonstrated by both anthropological data and neuroscientific studies. The former indicate that even trance behavior is often fully controlled (rational?) and completely understandable to observers (Wilson 1979). The latter reveal that “religious ecstasy . . . is a means of coming to know as well as the source of some of the content of what is known” (Shantz, 205). The fact that the prophets were not pathological or considered to be so by others (at least not always), regardless of their often unusual affect, speech and deeds, receives further and perhaps definitive support by the obvious (psychological) effect that the prophets apparently had on their audiences—a point to which we now turn.

4. The Psychological Effect of the Prophets (The Psychology of the Prophets’ Audience).

The Mari letter mentioned above includes the notice that the bizarre act of eating the lamb raw and delivering the associated oracle was not done in private, but was rather done “in the assembly of the elders” (Nissinen, 38). This information is explicitly noted for the king, the letter’s addressee, indicating that the public nature of the oracle was both significant and possibly worrisome. Again, then, as already noted above, even the “abnormal” aspects of prophecy had an audience in view that was affected by things prophetic. Prophetic things, that is, had (and still do have) rhetorical force and function (Friebel; Lundbom). So, for example, after God forbids Ezekiel to conduct mourning rituals after the death of his wife (Ezek 24:15-17), the prophet states, “So I spoke to the people in the morning” (Ezek 24:18a).

There can be little doubt that audiences were often troubled by the prophetic word or deed. In Ezekiel 24, when the prophet does what he is commanded the morning after his wife’s death, the people ask, “Will you not tell us what these things mean for us, that you are acting this way?” (Ezek 24:18). Here the audience appears to be disturbed. At other times, the prophets seem to have elicited anger from their audiences; at yet other times, indifference.

A possible explanation for different audience reactions also raises a crucial aspect of audience psychology: audiences enable and support (or not) prophetic activity (see Wilson 1979; 1980; Petersen 1981; Overholt 1986; 1989). As T. W. Overholt remarks, “In the case of a social process like prophecy no performance at all can take place—and, consequently, no players (in this case, prophets) can be identified—apart from a conceptual program in the collective consciousness of a society. Such a program allows a given performance to be recognized and therefore authorizes it” (Overholt, 150). So, in Ezekiel 24:18 the audience assumes that Ezekiel’s bizarre behavior after the death of his wife means something for them. Or, in Ezekiel 8:1 (similarly Ezek 14:1; 20:1-3), before Ezekiel’s vision of the desecrated *temple and the departure of God’s glory, we hear that “the elders of Judah” were sitting before him, evidently waiting for prophetic insight, though probably not of the kind that they received! Authorization of a prophet allows the prophet “to be” a prophet and requires the audience to attend to the prophetic word. Nonauthorization means that the prophetic word will be ignored and/or the prophet will be viewed as irrelevant, if not, in some cases, completely insane (Wilson 1979, 333n25, 334-35, 337; cf. Heschel, xxv-xxvii).

At least two different prophetic audiences (with respective psychologies) should be distinguished. The first is the original, ancient audience (as reflected in the literature itself); the second audience, which in truth is legion, is comprised of all subsequent readers/listeners. The prophets’ affect, words and deeds influence these different audiences and their psychologies differently. Part of that is the result of historical distance: ancient audiences, even if not contemporary with a particular prophet, were more accustomed to the prophetic milieu than many (though certainly not all) modern audiences, especially in the industrialized West (Wilson 1979; 1980). What is inescapable, regardless, is that psychological effects are taking place in the working of the literature itself, in both its writing and its reading: “Consciousness is continually being imagined (imaged, in-formed) by the metaphors in the very text it is writing or reading” (Holland, Kugler and Grimaud, 1000; cf. Clines and Exum, 18; Rashkow, DBInt 2:336; Rollins, DBInt 2:339).

A noteworthy development in this regard is the recent interest in what might be identified as the psychodynamics of prophetic books, as opposed to prophetic individuals. The book of Ezekiel as trauma literature has already been mentioned in this regard above (see 3 above). Such approaches often are portrayed as primarily literary-critical in orientation (Garber 2004, 222; 2005, 44; Bowen, xviii), and this seems to function as a way to evade some of the real historical problems besetting old psychological approaches if not psychohistory more broadly. While that is understandable, even laudable to some degree, we have already noted that these approaches are not, in fact, nonpsychological, and that every interpretive act is to some degree irreducibly psychological insofar as it involves the psyche of the individual interpreter. Indeed, it is somewhat ironic, as D. Jobling has noted, that the problems facing psychological approaches to the Bible are due not only to its nature as ancient literature, but also to its nature as sacred (canonical) literature, which means, among other things, that the Bible has been heavily “curated” (Jobling 2004, 204). Primacy should be given to social psychology, then, because many psyches have contributed to the composition, transmission and preservation of canonical literature. The irony is that while such curation complicates direct psychological analysis, the very canonical nature of the sacred literature simultaneously lends psychological credibility to the text at hand (Jobling 2004, 205; cf. Bowen, xix). As abnormal as Ezekiel (the prophet and the book) may be, it is apparently instructive "for us."

In the case of Ezekiel and/as trauma literature, the book becomes a way of witnessing to a trauma that cannot be fully grasped, whether by the ancient community or by subsequent ones. This testimony "helps the community re-experience the event of their catastrophe" (Garber 2004, 223). While this is a painful and difficult process, it also seems to be the case that "the only way for the audience of Ezekiel to appreciate the magnificence of the resurrection that occurs in Chapter 37 is to travel through the haunting images of death in the first twenty-four chapters, in a sense reexperiencing the trauma of Jerusalem's destruction in each reading" (Garber 2004, 228). According to Wilson, then, "Interpreters must explore the possibility that the aberrant characteristics of the book are not primarily the result of the prophet's 'abnormal' personality . . . but are themselves part of the message which the prophet and his disciples sought to deliver to concrete Israelite communities facing specific theological and social problems" (Wilson 1984, 119).

Of course the psychological effect of the prophets' words and metaphors may not always be salutary (e.g., on problematic marriage metaphors and sexual violence in the prophets, see Weems; Sherwood): the effect may be pathogenic as well as therapeutic. Either way, the precise effect of the prophets has as much, if not far more, to do with audience psychology as it does with the texts themselves ("Many texts . . . are powerfully shaped by assumptions that no one involved in the production of the text was consciously making" [Jobling 2004, 206]). In other words, to attribute possible pathogenesis to the text (or author) may be to commit the intentional fallacy and underestimate the agency of the receiving audience for good or for ill. According to Jobling, "It is meaningless to psychoanalyze some historical 'Ezekiel'; even if we managed to diagnose him we could not heal him or make him understand. Any understanding or healing that happens through our work as psychocritics of the Bible must be of our world, and of ourselves" (Jobling 2004, 207). To be sure, reckoning with traumatic aspects or deleterious, pathogenic outcomes may be part of any such healing process.

5. The Psychology of God (According to the Prophets).

Finally, one might ask about the psychology of *God according to the prophets. They did, after all, claim to speak for God and often did so using first-person speech forms. This would seem to have at least some bearing on the prophetic self-consciousness (Gunkel 1924a, 431-32; 1924b, 29; Scott; Heschel), but it is also the case that this was common messenger speech in antiquity. If the prophets are understood primarily as intermediaries between the divine and human realms (Petersen 2002), how does what they say for and about God relate to psychology?

This is, obviously, a large topic. Here there is space only to highlight three important points: (1) the God of the prophets is one who is prone to *wrath and judgment; (2) the God of the prophets is also one who is prone to *forgiveness and *mercy; (3) the God of the prophets is both of these things at one and the same time (at least according to the prophets' divine psychology writ large on the canonical level). What can be said about these three points, especially the interrelation of the first two, which is encapsulated in the third?

Perhaps both the first and the last thing that should be said is that the God of the prophets is, psychologically speaking, complex. The texts witness to "Yahweh's rich, unsettled interior life" (Brueggemann 1997, 328), one that cannot be simplistically reduced to either wrath or mercy. Rather, God's self, according to the prophets, is no less complex, even multiple, as are human selves. That the divine self is complex and highly variegated should come as no surprise, since we have comparable knowledge about our own selves (see Cooper-White; Gunkel comments, "What . . . [the prophets] conceive their God to be, overwhelming in His anger and in His love, they themselves are—all temperamental, at full tension" [Gunkel 1924a, 427]). Among other things, then, the complex psychology of God means that one cannot reduce the deity to just one or another quality but instead must reckon with multiple temperaments, "at full tension," and, armed with that knowledge, read prophetic theology accordingly.

The second thing that should be said is that when it comes to wrath/judgment and forgiveness/mercy, God's complex self is not equally divided in some sort of 50/50 split or paralyzed between the two options as if in a state of catatonic schizophrenia. To be sure, God's actions (and thus, inferentially, the internal divine psyche), according to the prophets (and all of Scripture for that matter), can often seem to be inconsistent if not downright capricious. But that need not be viewed as all bad: such "inconsistency" demonstrates, among other things, God's freedom to be God, and that freedom can translate into God's free extension of mercy, even to those deemed beyond the pale (so Jer 18:7-10; Jon 3:10; see Cooper; P. Miller 2004).

This is not to sugarcoat portraits of divine wrath in the prophets. God's anger and judgment are a large part of the prophetic message (Heschel, 359). Passages such as Ezekiel 5:13-17 (and they are legion) can create a "picture of God as cruel and unbending, as jealous and vindictive," leaving "the hearers of the word disturbed" (P. Miller 2004, 270)—certainly a very real and very negative psychological outcome. And yet such disturbance may have been part and parcel of the intended prophetic message, a shrewd though still troubling rhetorical device to arrest audience attention. It must be stressed again, however, that God's wrath is only one part of God's complex psyche in the prophets. Texts such as Jeremiah 9:24 (and they too are legion) highlight God's acts of "steadfast love, justice, and righteousness" because, as God says, "In these things I delight."

God's wrath and judgment must somehow be reconciled and correlated with God's concern for justice and righteousness. It appears that the former is produced by human sin—the failure to manifest justice and righteousness (cf. Is 5:1-7; Amos 5:21-24); divine judgment often is presented in direct contrast with and in equal measure to human *sin (see P. Miller 1982). This means that one must reckon not with a Deus irae (God of wrath) but rather with the ira Dei (wrath of God). God's wrath is instrumental, intended to bring about a result: *repentance and reform. In linguistic terms, God's wrath is not stative (such that God is angry, ontologically or dispositionally, especially not always) but rather is transitive, which means that it takes an object (God is angry about something). But when the object of wrath is tended to—the offending sin or circumstance removed—the wrath disappears as well (see Heschel, 358-92).

Such a "best case" portrayal of God's wrath still acknowledges anger in the divine psyche but sees it as an anthropomorphism (or anthropopathism) that is best understood vis-à-vis human wickedness. It is thus a way to account for God's wrath and punishment—a kind of theodicy, as it were (P. Miller 2004, 271-72; Heschel, 358-82). One should be careful not to overdo such a theodicy—the difficult texts are still there, and they are often ferocious—but other texts deserve equal attention if one wishes to capture the full range of the divine self in the prophets. Jeremiah 14:11, for example, seems to give the sense that "God is afraid for Jeremiah to pray for the people because the Lord knows there is an inclination within the heart of God to be moved to mercy by the prayers of the prophets" (P. Miller 2004, 274). Then there is Jeremiah 15:6, which states that God is "weary of relenting," apparently indicating "that such relenting is the operative tendency, enough so as to wear out God because circumstances, that is, the people's sin and stubbornness, bring such [divine] change of mind into play so often" (P. Miller 2004, 275-76).

In sum, then, "The wrath and judgment of God are . . . marked by considerable ambivalence and resistance on God's part" (P. Miller 2004, 276). Thus, divine wrath and judgment are never simplistic but rather are "the outcome of a complex process of divine wrestling, anguish, attempted overtures to the people, calls for repentance, warnings that keep the door open, and the like" (P. Miller 2004, 276). Note that this complexity highlights only the pole of God's wrath, and one must not forget the pole of God's mercy; but again, these poles are not perfectly balanced or divided. Rather, the prophetic texts writ large suggest that "the Lord's bent toward compassion is a part of what it means to be God, not just an option among other possibilities. . . . Reticence to wrath in favor of compassion is what it means to be the Lord" (P. Miller 2004, 276). In the words of Isaiah 54:7-8, "For a brief moment I abandoned you, but with great compassion I will gather you. In overflowing wrath for a moment I hid my face from you but with everlasting love I will have compassion on you, says the LORD, your Redeemer" (NRSV). Judgment, then, "does not come easily for the Lord of Israel," and it "is no less unsettling for God than it is for those who view [or experience] it" (P. Miller 2004, 277) (or as Heschel says, "The wrath of God is a lamentation" [Heschel, 365]). Surely these are important aspects of God's psychology according to the prophets.

Indeed, P. D. Miller argues that the very reason so much judgment prophecy is preserved in the OT is to make the case for the importance of "justice and compassion over wrath and anger, to make the point that again and again the people went their own way, did not do the will of the Lord, said no when reproved, continued in their sinful ways when specifically called to obedience by the prophets" (P. Miller 2004, 279). Ultimately, then, Miller sees God's judgment as "a part of renewing and reshaping a people for God's own way" (P. Miller 2004, 281). Even so negative an affect as anger thus has a positive, salutary effect.

Again, however, let it be stressed that the divine psychology is both complex and complicated in the prophets. Even if God's wrath is instrumental, it is nevertheless wrath and it belongs to God. But then again there is the divine mercy and love (cf. Hos 11:1-9). So, "The Lord is long-suffering, compassionate, loving, and faithful, but He is also demanding, insistent, terrible, and dangerous" (Heschel, 366), and vice versa. How these sentiments, their interrelation and correlation, can, do, will and/or should affect contemporary readers (just the latest audience with attendant psychology/psychologies) are large questions indeed. It must suffice to say that (1) these elements of the divine psychology will indeed affect readers because the reading process is psychologically charged; and (2) they will affect readers differently precisely because of different readerly psychologies. This, no doubt, is what leads so many readers to focus on only one or the other aspect of God's psyche according to the prophets. While that may be expected psychologically speaking, the texts as a whole resist such splitting off and recommend (re)integration, as difficult as that is. So, any position that writes off the difficult parts of the prophets (or the prophets as a whole precisely because they are difficult) in favor of some sort of univocal, overly simplistic and altogether syrupy sweet interpretation of God and God's ways in the world—whether that is motivated by concern for human psychological benefit or not—is seriously misguided if not, in fact, unhealthy. In the opinion of one early church writer, such a position is even heretical (see Tertullian, Marc. 1.25-26; cf. Heschel, 383-92).

PROPHECY AND SOCIETY

Israelite society was centered on adherence to the collective obligations of kinship ties, a sense of *honor and shame that governed behavior and speech, a social and economic strategy of reciprocity, and a firm recognition of divine presence in their lives. These social principles are common to other peoples in the ancient Near East, and what set the Israelites apart from other nations was the *covenant with Yahweh and the intricate legal system (see Law) that developed to quantify its meaning and obligations. Social order initially was maintained through local and later through national authority figures and by the force of public opinion that overtly or subliminally served as a check on the actions of each member of the community (Crook, 598-99). The social, economic and political forces that gradually transformed Israel from a loosely affiliated group of tribes centered on extended houses and clans into a nation and then into a remnant striving to survive in the midst of international empires are chronicled in what has survived of their recorded history and in the poetic traditions of the prophets (Peckham, 1-12). To understand how these events shaped the nation, it is necessary to explore how the prophets fit into the social mix in each of Israel's historic periods, and not just focus on their message in times of crisis.

1. Historical and Social Context.

Within the social context of the world of the ancient Near East, ancient Israel developed a sense of identity based on the exodus event and reinforced by a set of legal codes keyed to the establishment of a covenant with their God, Yahweh. For most of their history, the majority of Israelites lived in small agricultural villages that governed themselves through consensus in the gate court with the assistance of their local elders (Willis, 8-13). The local system of governance was superseded to some extent by the establishment of the monarchy and the growth of its bureaucratic extensions that were designed to collect taxes from the villages, draft men into the military and co-opt others into the corvée to complete capital projects (1 Sam 8:11-18). However, it should be understood that law codes and political developments do not completely answer the question of governance, and it should be expected that there were social expectations regarding behavior that remained uncoded while still being enforced in informal ways (McNutt, 175). The transition from tribal structure to a chiefdom occurs in the time of Saul and David and to a bureaucratic state starting with Solomon. These social transformations placed stress on Israelite society and led to the evolution of its legal and social system in order to meet these new challenges without entirely dispensing with concepts such as tribal identity and kinship and also a sense of place associated with particular regions of the country (Levinson, 3-6).

Although the monarchy helped to solidify the concept of national identity, it also removed a level of local autonomy and contributed to the process of cultural borrowing that took place as Israel and Judah became subject to the hegemony of either Egypt or the various Mesopotamian empires over the centuries. Still, the social values that had been developed during the pre-monarchic period and that continued to be invoked throughout the nation's history provided a continuing ideological underpinning for their community. With that in mind, this article explores how the message of the Hebrew prophets reflects both the shifting social context and the cultural ideology of ancient Israel as it evolved from the time of the monarchy into the postexilic period (see Israelite History).

2. The Role of the Prophet.

Belief in a covenantal relationship and service to the deity helped to shape and influence the lives of the ancient Israelites, although it must be noted that there is a distinction to be made between Israelite religion and the theology found in the received text (Hess, 16-17). There was also a basic difference in focus between the northern and southern kingdoms once the division occurred, since Jerusalem contained the *temple of Solomon and was heralded by the Deuteronomistic tradition as the site where God's name dwelled. The shrines at Dan and Bethel in the north, along with the continued use of high places, allowed for a more diverse set of religious rituals and beliefs. In both kingdoms, however, devotion to Yahweh included identification with sacred space and sacred objects, the formulation of religious practices and rituals, and the development of a corps of religious practitioners, priests and prophets. These individuals were social reflections of the people's need to interact with the divine, and they had the important role in society of serving as intermediaries and spokespersons for God. Priests functioned as officials in local or national shrines and temples and thus were associated with maintaining the status quo as members of the elite. They performed sacrifices that were designed to recognize God's power and give thanks for the blessings of the covenant.

Prophets, in their capacity as spokespersons for Yahweh, operated independently of the cult centers, although some of them were also priests (see Prophecy, History of). There are echoes of liturgic themes and language in the message of many of the exilic and postexilic prophetic figures (esp. Ezekiel, Haggai, Malachi), but they also function as critics rather than as exponents of the cultic community (Murray, 202-3). They are associated with the centers of power (Samuel anoints both Saul and David as king), but they generally maintain their independence when it comes to their message. While some, like Nathan in David's time, served as court prophets and royal advisers, they were not bound to an official political regime or the protection of the king's position in the face of civil and covenant violations (2 Sam 12:1-15). It was this independence that gave the prophets the singular opportunity to transcend power structures and labels (see Amos 7:14) and to serve as social critics when the necessity arose. It may also explain why both men and women are called as prophets, while priests are exclusively male.

Having a distinctive role within society also raises certain expectations for these individuals. While that means speaking for the deity and occasionally interceding for the people (Amos 7:2-3), the social and political character of the times often determines the message. Shifting power structures and social realities may leave prophets on the margins of society, dependent upon the aid and goodwill of their own support groups, as with Elijah and Elisha (Wilson, 76-83), or a prophet, such as Isaiah, may be able to speak on the same social level with a king and demand a hearing, if not the compliance of the monarch (Pleins, 222-23). The problem with expectations for the power and effectiveness of the intermediary prophets is that the words spoken in the name of the Deity may not match the hopes or the expectations of the audience (Petersen, 93-94). As a result, the prophet may be cheered when announcing the defeat of Israel's enemies (Amos 1:3—2:5) or provide comfort and reassurance that God's wrath has an end and the nation will be restored (Is 40:1-2; Joel 3:1-3). However, prophets would receive a much chillier reception when the message reminds the people of their own covenantal failings (Hos 8:4-6; Mic 6:9-16) or exhorts them to return to compliance with the law (Jer 7:3-7).

2.1. Spokesperson for the Deity. The cultures of the ancient Near East included a class of diviners whose role was to determine through a variety of means the will of the gods (Grabbe, 119-20). In ancient Israel there are occasions when inquiries were made by casting lots (Num 27:21) or by some other mechanical means of *divination, as with Joseph's divining cup (Gen 44:5). In other instances (Judg 1:1; 20:18) the narrative suggests that some means of divination may have been employed without specifically describing the means of questioning the deity.

When it became necessary to seek divine direction without engaging in extispicy or other physical means of detection, prophets were called on to interpret dreams (Jer 23:28), pray for guidance or simply open themselves up to divinely inspired direction (Balaam in Num 22:38). This role that distinguishes them from cultic personnel or diviners dependent upon omen texts and physical examination of phenomena points to their task as divine intermediaries. Their identity as prophet would have been a recognized fact in their community (Overholt, 11). That is made clear by the very explicit method of determining who is a true prophet (Deut 18:15-22): the prophet must speak in the name of the Lord, and what the prophet says must prove to be true (see True and False Prophecy).

Still, some of the court prophets become associated too closely with the establishment and thus are more likely to promote the current administration and the status quo (note Ahab's four hundred court prophets in 1 Kings 22:6). However, not all court prophets are so quick to please their employer. Nathan, for instance, is not constrained from criticizing King David for his unjust behavior and adultery with Bathsheba (2 Sam 12:1-15).

On those occasions when prophets are consulted by high officials, the most common questions involve whether to go to war (1 Kings 22:5-8) or whether God will protect the people in a crisis (Jer 37:4-10). Because the assumption is that disease and other calamities are inflicted by God, prophets sometimes are consulted on matters of health (Elisha in 2 Kings 5:1-19). Their authority as conduits for divine response also led to questions on the authenticity of documents (Huldah in 2 Kings 22:13-20) or even of the statements made by other prophets (1 Kings 22; Jer 28).

2.2. Prophets and the Covenant. Since the ancient *covenantal relationship between Yahweh and the people of Israel is such a distinctive characteristic of the society, it is not surprising that one of the Israelite prophets plays on the people's obligation to their God and the legal stipulations and traditions of the covenant (Kapelrud, 180-81). After all, there would be no need for them to be called as prophets or for them to remind the people of their covenantal obligation if there has been no violation of its basic character. Rulers of an unjust society who are indifferent to the plight of the poor, who pervert the courts for their own gain (see Amos 4:1; 5:7, 10-11), fly in the face of the legal tradition of righteous behavior first outlined in the covenant code (Ex 22:20-26; 23:1-3, 6-9), which has as much to do with social values as it does with the *law (Mays, 66). For the prophets, it is the reality of injustice and the spirit of the law rather than specific legal injunctions that are paramount (Phillips, 221-23). The rich may well use their influence and apparently legal means to displace the poor from their land or cheat a widow in the courts, but that may still be condemned as oppression and unrighteousness (Is 1:21-23; Mic 2:1-5) (see Wealth and Poverty; Social Justice).

The perception that many prophets operated on the periphery of society, as "voices in the wilderness," does fit individuals such as Elijah and Elisha (1 Kings 18; 21:17-29; 2 Kings 6) (Wilson, 72-73). But their calls for religious reform (i.e., a return to Yahweh worship) and an end to the idolatrous practices of Ahab's administration still contain within them the same message found in other prophetic literature: a return to compliance with the covenant, an end to all forms of *idolatry, and a commitment to seek Yahweh alone for help in times of crises. What all of the prophets share, whether they are classic outsiders like Elijah and Micah or members of the cultic establishment like *Isaiah and *Ezekiel, is an effort to get those in authority or the agents of change to recognize their failings with respect to the covenant and the very principle of justice. That in turn sets up confrontations in which both prophet and powerbroker attempt to manage their own emotions and those of the people (Goffman, 110).

Furthermore, since most of the prophets speak during times of national crisis, their message tends to center on (1) a theodicy explaining why the nation was being punished by their God (see Is 5:1-7; Ezek 8); (2) a reassurance that a righteous remnant would survive to rebuild the nation and restore the people's relationship with God (Is 10:22-23; Jer 50:17-20). In responding to these crises, all of the prophets exercised their power as the monarchs' loyal opposition. Such a sociologically important role, independent of human power structures, brought them repeatedly to challenge the diplomatic policies of the state that had derailed the people's dependence on Yahweh (Lang, 63-68; Matthews and Benjamin 1993, 214). For instance, it is clear in Isaiah's approach to national identity that the very idea of nationhood is based on the sovereign covenantal relationship with Yahweh, the conditions of that compact, and the need for explicit and total loyalty to the will of God (Hanson, 217). In the process of delivering their message, the prophets also championed the cause of the weak in society and reminded the nation's leaders of their primary duty to serve and protect the people and to recognize God's role in maintaining the well-being of the nation.

Even after the monarchy ended and the people had been forced into *exile, the prophets continue to use the covenant as the basis for their exhortations. In that sense, the covenant forms a social glue or compass point that holds the people together, provides them with a form of identity, and draws them back to the promise of land and children that had brought Abraham to the promised land (Is 42:5-9; 49:8-21). Then, on their return from exile, the prophets continue to draw on earlier traditions of the covenant and its obligations to challenge the people to remain obedient to Yahweh (Mal 2:10-12) and to recognize the saving power of Yahweh (Zech 9:11-13).

3. Prophetic Message.

It is a basic axiom that no society can escape anarchy and dissolution if it chooses to ignore the established tenets of law and accepted social order. These legal principles and commonly recognized rules of social interaction develop over time and evolve to meet changing social situations and growing complexities in political structure and economic activity. In this way, things such as property rights, marriage contracts, personal honor and safety, liability issues, judicial practices and sexual norms (e.g., incest taboos) are maintained and upheld. Some, such as the determination of honorable and shameful actions, can be enforced through the court of public opinion. Others require the intervention of authority figures or their delegates. However, when a society experiences tensions, both internal and external, these basic social values and legal guarantees can break down. When that happened in ancient Israel, prophets arose to champion a return to adherence to the covenant made with Yahweh and to the law that further defined that relationship and social bond.

3.1. Social Values. Although what we know about prophets and prophetic pronouncements in ancient Israel is based solely on what has come down to us in the biblical text (Nissinen, 153-55), it is still possible to filter this material (whether it consists of the original words of the prophets themselves or of the scribal culture that edited the message into its written form) in such a way as to identify basic social values that mattered to and helped to govern social interaction in that ancient society (Wilson, 16-18). There is enough consistency in the message of each of the prophets to indicate that certain social expectations were present that resonated with the community when they were expressed by these prophetic figures, and there is no greater principle than justice in their vocabulary (see Is 1:17; Amos 5:15).

In other words, the prophets did not invent new social values or attempt to initiate a social revolution based on divine revelation. Instead, their goal, the very reason why prophets continuously appear in ancient Israel and Judah, is to defend an already existing social system, embodied in the covenant, against rampant innovation and cultural assimilation. Their very purpose is to defend the covenant between God and the "chosen people" against cultural assaults and the continuous desire to worship other gods as these two tiny nations struggled to maintain their identity amidst a maelstrom of encroaching Mesopotamian and Egyptian hegemonic overtures in the period 850-550 BC. In the course of fast-moving political events, it is clear that prophets represented continuity with previous tradition and decried unwarranted change or accommodation to the wider culture of the ancient Near East. They employed a variety of methods to convey their message in such a way as to override the temptations of assimilation and acculturation that were being voiced continuously by neighboring nations and foreign powers and call on the people to "return" (Heb šûb) to their devotion to the covenant (Is 31:6; Joel 2:13). Of course, a certain amount of adaptation would have been necessary among the returned community of Yehud to accommodate to life under the rule of the Persians. Once the temple is restored (515 BC), some prophets, such as Joel, speak from a cultic perspective with emphasis on the regularized cultic functions of the *temple community and *Zion theology (Cook, 189-92).

3.2. Relationship to the Law. If the assumption can be made that the Hebrew prophets represent and voice genuine aspects of their society and social context, then their message can be used to analyze and reconstruct that ancient society. As noted above, that places the prophets in the position of defending and advocating for a just society and revolves on the principles of righteous behavior and ethical leadership. In addition to the Decalogue (Ex 20:1-17) and the various law codes, one place to start in examining the essence of covenant and the law is Deuteronomy 10:12-22. In this passage the Deuteronomist exhorts the Israelites to right behavior by first noting that Yahweh is a God who (1) is "not partial and takes no bribe"; (2) "executes justice for the orphan and the widow"; (3) "loves the strangers, providing them with food and clothing" (Deut 10:17-18). They are reminded to worship Yahweh alone among the gods of the nations and to "swear by his name" (Deut 10:20).

Working with a fairly coherent, preexistent and straightforward set of legal principles and social values such as this, it becomes the task of the prophets to champion these elements of basic social ethics and to set aside those things that either mask or contradict them. For example, Amos condemns the wealthy landowners who abuse their day laborers by refusing to return their cloaks at the end of the workday and leave them to shiver through the night (Amos 2:8; cf. Ex 22:26-27). Not only does his statement echo a legal principle advocating a just society, but also it speaks to basic human compassion for the poor (see Is 3:14-15) (Mays, 68). In a similar vein, there are many instances in prophetic pronouncements in which a statement is made citing a basic social value, but in a negative context. Thus, in Isaiah 1:23 the prophet charges that “everyone loves a bribe,” while that practice is prohibited in Exodus 23:8, “for a bribe blinds the officials,” and Deuteronomy 16:19 notes that “a bribe blinds of the eye of the wise.” Conversely, the prophet applauds those who “wave away a bribe” and uphold the basic social value of maintaining justice for all (Is 33:15).

In several cases, a prophet expands on simple statements of law and proper behavior and provides a formal bill of particulars indicting Israel for failure to comply with the terms of the covenant as outlined in a Deuteronomistic recitation of the Decalogue and the ancillary law codes and as evidence of the people’s rejection of Yahweh as their God (Phillips, 229). Perhaps the most spectacular of these indictments is found in a staged performance by Jeremiah in his so-called temple sermon, delivered before the gate of the Jerusalem temple during the early reign of King Jehoiakim (c. 604 BC). Having chosen a venue (sacred space) that would give him maximum exposure for his message, Jeremiah harangues a festival day crowd with emphasis on two important points. First, he targets the belief that the physical presence of God’s temple ensures that Jerusalem will never be destroyed. This myth of inviolability had been growing since the time of Hezekiah when the Assyrians had failed to capture Jerusalem. It had been reinforced by the reforms instituted by Josiah, which centralized sacrificial and festival practices in Jerusalem as the place that God had chosen “as a dwelling for his name” (Deut 14:23; 16:2; 26:2). Second, Jeremiah makes the point that only strict obedience to the covenant and to the stipulations of the Ten Commandments will prevent Yahweh’s abandonment of the unfaithful people of Judah and Jerusalem to their destruction.

The framework for this message consists of two opposing slogans. Jeremiah warns the assembled crowd, “Amend your ways and your doings” (Jer 7:3, 5), if they expect God to continue to dwell in their midst. He then parodies the threefold popular liturgic chant “the temple of the LORD” (Jer 7:4). It apparently served both as a common ritual utterance and a religious slogan designed to reassure the people of Yahweh’s protection. As a ritual formula, it may have been used to protect people as they entered the temple. Now as the people push forward toward the temple’s entrance, Jeremiah mocks their slogan and declares that no chant will cast a protective spell over them. This building can be called the “temple of the LORD” only if the people obey the covenant and treat each other in a fair and just manner.

To reinforce his argument, Jeremiah points to the now ruined shrine at Shiloh, about twenty miles north of Jerusalem, as an example of a sacred site that has been abandoned by God. Although it had once served as the seat of Yahweh worship (1 Sam 1–4), the unfaithfulness of Eli’s sons and their corruption of the cult (1 Sam 2:12-17) had given God cause to allow it to be destroyed. That charge echoes Jeremiah’s indictment of the Jerusalemite cult community for abandoning Deuteronomic principles of sole adherence to Yahweh (Wilson, 246). No amount of ritual performance or sacrificial offerings could save them or that place (1 Sam 3:11–14) because, without due respect for Yahweh’s covenant, it constituted “hollow” worship (Is 1:11; Amos 5:21-24).

Like Micah (Mic 6:6-8) in the previous century, Jeremiah negates the effectiveness of rote ritual behavior that also does not reinforce the desire to obey Yahweh’s covenant (Jer 7:23). This declaration, that sacrifice is worthless without the abiding love (Heb hesed) for Yahweh and the covenant, is a familiar prophetic theme. It is also found in the tension-filled confrontation between Samuel and Saul over the king’s failure to complete the herem (holy war) against the Amalekites (1 Sam 15:22-23) and in Hosea’s poignant charge against the non-Levitical priests in Israel: “For I desire steadfast love [hesed] and not sacrifice, the knowledge of God rather than burnt offerings” (Hos 6:6).

For this reason, the people of Jerusalem cannot expect the temple’s presence alone to save them, despite previous occasions when the city had been spared (see Is 37:1-13). It is misguided to freely violate every law and then blithely call on Yahweh's name, expecting forgiveness and protection. Jeremiah assures them that Yahweh is not blind (Jer 7:11b), and that God will abandon them just as he left the people of the northern kingdom to their fate (Jer 7:15; see also Ezek 10).

Another quite systematic example of a prophetic indictment is found in Ezekiel 22:7-12. This passage contains an extensive and comprehensive list of violations that encompass a wide range of legal pronouncements (Block 1997, 709-10). With each charge the prophet points to a contemporary practice that violates the covenant and in fact does violence to the law (Harland, 113). In so doing, he intentionally references the legal codes that are intended to buttress the relationship with their God. Some items on his list are familiar: abusing the orphan and widow, taking bribes, committing adultery and engaging in idolatry. All together, these charges represent several items found in the Decalogue as well as a number of specific injunctions contained in the Holiness Code (Lev 17-26) that deal with incest taboos. This list suggests that aspects of Israelite society had broken down, allowing previously prohibited or unthinkable acts to take place. The prophet's role as social arbiter thus comes into play as he makes it clear that a society that feeds on itself, abusing its members and preying on the innocent, cannot survive.

Of course, the idea of a world turned upside down is a common feature of ancient Near Eastern wisdom literature and is generally composed during periods of stress or political transition. Examples of this genre include the Middle Kingdom Egyptian "Tale of the Eloquent Peasant" and the eighth-century BC Babylonian dialogue between a sufferer and a friend (Matthews and Benjamin 2006, 230-44). In each case, the author decries the breakdown of social values and exhorts those in authority to take the steps necessary to restore justice and equilibrium to the community. However, Ezekiel goes so far as to say that the only way to remove the uncleanness associated with the shedding of blood and idolatry is the destruction of the coming fall of Jerusalem, that "bloody city" (Renz, 87).

4. Enacted Prophecy.

Another way in which the prophets and their message reflect Israelite society is found in the performance of enacted dramas or street theater (see Sign Acts). Their gestures or symbolic acts not only demonstrate how effective nonverbal communication can be, but also indicate a number of social values held by the community. Thus, Isaiah's three-year-long "naked circuit" makes it clear to his audience that they too will be stripped of their freedom, dignity and possessions if they engage in a revolt against the Assyrians (Is 20:2-4). He presents them with his own shame as a reflection of what awaits those who fail to listen to God's message and instead trust in alliances with other nations (Stiebert, 48). In a similar way, when God restricts Jeremiah's ability to engage in the normal range of human emotions (joy or sorrow), the prophet's failure to marry, have children or attend the funerals of his parents causes his neighbors to ask why and thus gives him the opening to warn them of the coming crisis for Judah and Jerusalem (Jer 16:1-13). And, when it becomes clear that the city of Jerusalem will fall to the Babylonians in 587 BC, Jeremiah takes the symbolic step of redeeming a field to keep the land in his extended family (Jer 32:1-15). In this way, the prophet uses a common economic transaction, including witnessed copies of the agreement, to demonstrate that there will be an end to the exile and a return to the land of promise. Reassurance comes from the use of the familiar even though the people are in the midst of a crisis that will transform their lives.

One more example that graphically illustrates the value of prophetic gestures is found in Ezekiel 4:4-8. Here Ezekiel engages in a pantomime or prophetic symbolic action, lying on his left side for 390 days and then on his right side for forty days to signal the number of years of the kingdoms' exile. This kind of staged event (see also the procession and execration ritual in Jer 19) functions as an extra physical prop to represent the message and to elicit questions or a reaction from the audience. Ezekiel is also instructed to prophesy against Jerusalem "with bared arm." Presumably, this means that he raised his arm above his head, which caused his robe to slip off his arm. It is also likely that he is employing a gesture of command typically used by military leaders (note God's "outstretched arm" [Deut 5:5; 7:19; 11:2; 26:8; 1 Kings 8:42; 2 Kings 17:36]) or when God's "bared arm" indicates divine action against the nations (Is 52:10).

5. References to Everyday Life.

In order to have an impact on the audience (either in the prophets' own day or in the time of the editors of their prophetic materials), prophetic speech had to contain images and metaphors that would ring true to their cultural ear. Speaking on their level about activities or items with which the audience was familiar added greater impact to the message and insured understandability. Only in the case of some of the later *apocalyptic literature is the meaning shaded in more complex imagery (see the visions in *Zechariah that require a divine interpreter). Therefore, an examination of these references, many of which are agricultural, provides an additional means of recreating ancient Israelite society.

5.1. Agricultural References. In the Mediterranean climate of the Middle East, rain in its season (Jer 5:24) brings life to the fields in spring and autumn and insures a good harvest. However, the many gods worshiped in this region that are said to bring rain or the dew provide competition to the Israelite's Yahweh. Thus, the prophets try to make the case that their God both provides the rain and can withhold it. The idyllic image in Isaiah 30:23-26 contains God's promise of the "rain for the seed with which you sow the ground." A more frightening picture is found in Amos 4:7, in which the prophet points out that God can "send rain on one city, and send no rain on another city." Similarly, Haggai uses famine and want to warn the returned exiles to note that they "have sown much and harvest little" (Hag 1:6) because God's temple has not been rebuilt.

The field and the threshing floor provide a common and quite useful setting for prophetic speech. A farmer would be quick to answer Isaiah's question, "Do those who plow for sowing plow continuously?" (Is 28:24), or Amos's sarcastic query, "Does one plow the sea with oxen?" (Amos 6:12), with an amused "No!" Having gotten their attention, the prophet could go on to make his analogy with God's teachings that prevent such useless and wasteful behavior. In a similar manner, Micah warns the disobedient Israelites that their plans that exclude giving thanks or recognition to God will leave them in a situation in which they "shall sow, but not reap" (Mic 6:15).

Once the harvest is ready and the people rejoice at the prospect of a return on their labors

(Is 9:3), the prophets can use this activity to make their point. In some cases, these efforts resulted in disappointment, as in Isaiah's vineyard song, in which the grape harvest proves to be useless and sour (Is 5:1-7). Such a poor crop provided a ready metaphor for a nation that had not turned out the way God had hoped it would. Also using an agricultural allusion to describe an imminent crisis, Hosea warns the endangered people of the southern kingdom, "For you also, O Judah, a harvest is appointed" (Hos 6:11). In a later period, Joel uses the concept of harvest to envision a battle in which God will direct the armies of Israel to "put in the sickle, for the harvest is ripe" (Joel 3:13) and utterly destroy the enemy nations just as a field is cleared of its grain (Barton, 103-4).

The activity on the threshing floor creates a vivid picture for those who have spent long hours working there to process their grain. On these open sites with the aid of prevailing wind gusts, the people would deposit their harvested grain (Job 5:26) and crush the stocks of wheat and barley with sledges pulled by teams of oxen (2 Sam 24:22). Then large wooden forks were used to cast the grain into the air so that the lighter chaff will be carried away and the heavier grain could be swept up and sieved to remove stones and other objects (Is 30:24; Amos 9:9). This familiar set of steps in processing the grain and readying it for use gives fertile ground to the prophets as they exhort the people. Jeremiah, for instance, can transfer the act of winnowing into God's efforts to indicate to the people that he is displeased with their violations of the covenant. Using a dual metaphor of judgment in the gate court and separating the wheat from the useless chaff, the prophet describes how God has "winnowed them with a winnowing fork in the gates of the land," and yet "they did not turn from their ways (Jer 15:7). In contrast, Second Isaiah gives hope to a people who have experienced the exile and now look forward to taking revenge on their enemies. He assures them that God "will make of you a threshing sledge, sharp, new, and having teeth" and promises that they "shall winnow them and the wind shall carry them away" (Is 41:15-16).

Of course, produce from the fields, vineyards and fruit trees finds its way into prophetic speech as well. Amos can liken the people of Israel to "summer fruit" that looks delicious when picked and contains the promise of the last sweet taste before the fall and winter rains, but that also is quick to spoil and become rotten (Amos 8:1-2). Jeremiah's vision of the two baskets of figs gives him the occasion to once again provide a theodicy of exile by pointing out how the people are like good figs (the exiles of Judah) whom the Lord will eventually return to their land, and the bad figs (Zedekiah, his advisers, etc.), "so bad they cannot be eaten," who will become a curse and a taunt "in all the places I shall drive them" (Jer 24:1-10) (see Floral Imagery).

5.2. References to Tools and Occupations.

While many of the people in the villages engaged in pottery making and weaving, in the towns there were specialists whose skills were worth watching. Recognizing this and playing off the desire to share in the creative process, even as spectators, Jeremiah uses the potter at his wheel as the basis for one of the best examples of the remnant theme (Jer 18:1-11). In this way, the people of Jerusalem are warned that the divine potter may well become dissatisfied with the clay in his hands and, seeing that the vessel he is shaping is spoiled, stop the wheel and begin again after mashing it down before beginning again. Using references to workers common to their society, Isaiah portrays the economic disaster that God will cause to befall Egypt, listing a variety of occupations that will be affected, including fishermen, flax workers, carders and weavers whose livelihood will be destroyed (Is 19:5-10).

Construction projects were a continuous form of activity in the villages and towns of ancient Israel. Walls had to be rebuilt or strengthened on houses and around cities. Additions were made to personal dwellings as extended families grew, and the rich were able at times to construct fine new homes (Amos 3:15) and tombs (Is 22:16). The builders' tools as well as the construction process found their way into prophetic speech and once again give us insight into everyday life in that ancient society. So we find in Zechariah 2:1 a reference to a surveyor's tool, a measuring line, which was used to measure the width and length of Jerusalem in preparation for rebuilding its walls. But the prophet enjoins the people not to proceed, because God intended to place a "wall of fire" around the city to provide divine protection. In another, more judgmental example, Amos describes God as a mason constructing a wall using a plumb line, a tool ordinarily used to keep the rows of stone straight and true (Amos 7:7-9). However, in this instance it is Israel's fidelity to the covenant that is being measured, and it is found to be off center due to Israel's idolatry and use of local high places.

In another case, Second Isaiah condemns the use of idols while providing an interesting recital of the methods in which artisans create them (Is 44:12-17). He describes the ironsmith at the forge shaping the metal with a hammer, and the carpenter who meticulously measures a piece of wood with line and stylus, while pointing out how comical it is to use a portion of the wood for the reversed idol and the rest to bake his bread. Jeremiah also creates a metaphor using a hammer ordinarily used to break up stones and likens it to the strength and effect of God's word (Jer 23:29).

5.3. References to Social Institutions. To truly plumb the depths of a society, it is necessary to explore its social institutions, such as marriage customs, inheritance laws and mourning rituals. As members of that society, the prophets recognized how important these social dimensions were and wove them into their message. Through their many references to basic social interaction and the analogies that they drew with them, we gain a better understanding of matters that are at the heart of everyday life in ancient Israel.

5.3.1. Marriage Customs. The institution of *marriage is intended to bind families together through contract and association, produce heirs for the family's estate, and perpetuate the memory-linked story of the shared experiences. The prophets understood this and used marriage customs as a way of demonstrating the nation's bond with Yahweh. Thus, it is quite easy for the prophets to describe the joy of the bride and bridegroom on their wedding day and compare it to the joy that God takes in the faithful of the nation (Is 62:5). They can also call on the exiles to maintain a sense of normalcy while in a foreign land by marrying and giving their children in marriage with the hope that they eventually will return to Israel (Jer 29:6).

Before the exile, however, marriage is used quite effectively by several of the prophets to demonstrate the breach that had formed between the people and God. Hosea's extended marriage metaphor plays on the infidelity of his wife, Gomer, as an analogy with Israel's idolatry and unfaithfulness to Yahweh (Hos 1—2). What is clear in this case is that although the husband/God had provided the expected items to sustain his wife/Israel (water, bread, wool, flax, wine, oil [Hos 2:5, 9]), she went after other lovers/gods, and he chose to publicly humiliate her and then divorce her (Hos 2:9-13). Even with such provocation, the end of the story is the effort to bring her/Israel back into the marriage/covenant by offering her the chance to renounce her lovers/gods and once again swear totally devotion to Hosea/Yahweh (Hos 2:14-23). Ezekiel uses a similar situation, although in his case the marriage is preceded by the efforts of an adoptive parent; however, the result is the same: blatant idolatry and ungrateful infidelity (Ezek 16). Such antisocial behavior cannot be countenanced, and the punishment takes the form of reciprocal action: stripping the woman of her finery and property and leaving her to be stoned and cut by the mob (Ezek 16:38-41). When, like Gomer, the wife is restored, it adds to her shame and is designed to both prevent a recurrence and demonstrate God's care for the covenant even when it is undeserved (Ezek 16:53-63). Since the prophets do employ a certain amount of poetic license in describing these exaggerated and violent actions to further demonstrating God's passion for the people and the covenant, they should not be considered a model for behavior in every marriage situation (Carroll R., 120).

5.3.2. Inheritance Laws. There is a long-standing tradition in ancient Israel that ties each family's identity as members of the covenantal community to the portion of the promised land that they will hold in perpetuity (note the systematic division of the land by Joshua following the conquest [Josh 13—21]) (Myers, 19). That is at the heart of Naboth's argument when he refuses to allow King Ahab to purchase his vineyard, proclaiming, "I will not give you my ancestral inheritance" (1 Kings 21:1-4) (Mays, 63). After allowing his wife, Jezebel, to arrange the judicial murder of Naboth and his family, Elijah confronts Ahab as the king is greedily stepping off his new property. The prophet's curse encompasses Ahab's "selling himself" (i.e., abandoning his role as the champion of the law for personal gain) and threatens him with a shameful death without burial and the extinction of his dynasty. The irony of the situation is that Ahab's family loses their own claim to rule and to their inheritance as kings when Naboth's inheritance rights are stolen from him.

Perhaps in response to the injustice done to Naboth and to other abuses by the kings, Ezekiel pronounces a series of regulations intended to prevent the exploitation of land owners while upholding inheritance rights within a family (Ezek 46:16-18) (Block 1998, 678-79). In this case, the prophet proclaims that a "prince" may divide up his estate, including lands, among his sons, and they will hold that inheritance as their possession. However, under no circumstances may the prince seize the lands of his subjects or evict them from their property (see the prohibitions against cheating neighbors in Lev 25:13-17). The object here is to prevent monarchs or rich landowners from taking advantage of the poor or intimidating them into the sale of their land and thus depriving future generations of their inheritance. Such a position once again marks the prophet as the guardian of social justice and economic fair dealing within the community.

5.3.3. Mourning Practices. Mourning often took the form of physical gestures as well as crying and moaning by the bereaved (King and Stager, 372-73). For a set period of time (Is 60:20) the mourners fasted (Joel 2:12), and they tore their clothing or replaced it with sackcloth (Jer 6:26; 41:5) while their hair was disarrayed and covered with dust and ashes (Ezek 27:30). Although some of these practices, such as the use of professional mourners (Jer 9:16-17), seem to be staged as expected behavior in their society, others are clearly a way of venting uncontrollable grief. When such deep emotions are involved, there is an opportunity to draw analogies, and the prophets took advantage to call on the people to mourn the fate of the exiles (Mic 1:16) or to acknowledge their culpability in the face of God's punishment (Jer 25:34). There is also the chance, as Joel indicates, to use a common mourning ritual and transform it into a physical gesture of repentance and self-examination: "Rend your hearts and not your clothing" (Joel 2:13).

6. Conclusion.

The prophets were a manifestation of ancient Israelite society serving as intermediaries between the people and Yahweh and defending tradition (see Prophecy and Tradition) against the political and economic forces that threatened righteousness and *justice. They served the purpose of voicing social criticism in the face of judicial and economic abuse of the poor and the powerless, and they continuously reminded the people of their obligations under the covenant with Yahweh. Despite physical and verbal abuse by authorities with a vested interest in silencing them (Jer 20:1-6; Amos 7:10-17) and their own self-doubts (Jer 20:7-18), they functioned as the conscience of the nation in very trying situations. While carrying out this task, they did not set themselves apart from their audience, but instead used aspects of their social world that were easily understood by the people to illustrate their message. Their efforts may have provided some comfort to those who chose to listen, and now they give us a glimpse of the society that they tried so hard to caution and preserve.

PROPHECY AND TRADITION

The relationship between the OT prophets and tradition is somewhat Janus-like, facing two ways. There is the issue of what traditions the prophets themselves inherited that may have influenced the style and presentation of their work and, to some extent, the content of their message. But there is also the tradition to which they themselves gave rise, testimony to which we have in the books bearing their names and also, occasionally, in other writings. Precision in the study of both aspects of the topic is difficult because we are given very little hard evidence of the nature of prophecy before the appearance of the eighth-century BC prophets, and although we may be fairly confident that even where individual prophets did commit their words to writing, those writings have gone through long and extensive processes of editing, additions and shaping after their time; separating original words from editorial additions is by no means an exact science.

1. Prophetic Tradition Before the Eighth Century BC.

The activity of prophets is widely attested throughout the ancient Near East (see Ancient Near Eastern Prophecy). Prophets were attached to sanctuaries and also to the royal courts. For example, from Mari we have a prophetic declaration to a king promising him victory if he obeys the god Adad (ANET 625), in much the same way the Deuteronomistic History records prophets warning Judean and Israelite kings, as when, for example, Elijah threatens Ahab (1 Kings 21:20-23). Such prophets can serve the interests of those in power, as when the king of Moab hired Balaam to pronounce a curse against Israel because he had a reputation for effective "oracles" (Num 22:6). Groups of charismatic prophets like those mentioned in 1 Samuel 10:5-13; 19:18-24 may well have been attached to religious sanctuaries. Gradually, individual figures begin to emerge in the story such as Samuel, Elijah, Elisha, Nathan and Gad, remembered for their deeds (sometimes of miraculous nature [e.g., 2 Kings 4:32-37]) as well as their words, which were also often said to have effective power (e.g., 1 Kings 18:36-39). Already in the challenge of some of these individual figures to those in power we hear the ethical emphasis later associated with those prophets who have left books in their name, as in Nathan's challenge to David over his sin with Bathsheba (2 Sam 11-12). The earlier prophets used some of the literary formulae and devices to be found in the later prophetic books (e.g., Nathan's "Thus said the LORD" in 2 Sam 12:7 and his use of the literary device of the parable in 1 Sam 12:1-6).

Of course, we must remember that the picture of prophecy recorded in the Deuteronomistic History is strongly influenced by that movement's belief in God's control of history through the prophetic word. This they demonstrate by the prophet's prior announcement of what will happen and the subsequent event as that word's "fulfillment" (e.g., 1 Kings 2:27), and there are strong indications in the Prophetic Books that they have been edited in similar circles. But it seems safe to assume that the phenomenon of OT canonical prophecy did not spring suddenly from heaven, but rather inherited a continuing prophetic tradition that flourished from much earlier times.

2. Eighth-Century BC Prophecy in Israel.

*Amos, although from Judah in the south, prophesied in the northern kingdom of Israel during the reign of Jeroboam II. It was a brief period of security and prosperity, at least for some, for Amos denounces the extremely wealthy who have achieved their gains by exploiting the poor. The main tradition that he seems to have inherited is that of God's special relationship with Israel, whom he has chosen (Amos 3:2) and brought from slavery in Egypt to their present land (Amos 3:1; 9:7). Scholars nowadays are wary of speaking as confidently as once they did of a developed *covenant theology by this time (see e.g., Perlitt; Nicholson), but these individual elements of the tradition to which Amos alludes must have formed the basis of the later, more developed Deuteronomistic covenant theology. But Amos mercilessly turns these traditions on their head. His opening series of oracles against surrounding *nations (see Barton), in which he accuses them of excessive cruelty in time of war, no doubt would have brought comfort to his Israelite hearers. But such comfort was shattered by his final oracle against Israel itself (Amos 2:6-8), uttered in exactly the same form as the others with the same charge of excessive cruelty. But the enormity of Israel's sin is that in their case the cruelty was exercised against their own people. Similarly, their comforting belief that they were special because of God's favor toward them in their history is also swept away by the claim that while God had indeed brought them out of Egypt to their present *land, God had equally been involved in the movements of nations such as the Philistines and the Arameans (Amos 9:7).

But just as Amos dealt radically with the traditions that he inherited, it is clear from the book that bears his name that he himself gave rise to a tradition process. There are indications that it was finally edited in the southern kingdom of Judah. The oracle against Judah (Amos 2:2-5), clearly intrusive in its present position, suggests later tradents urging Judeans to learn the lessons that Amos taught, lessons reinforced by the subsequent conquest of Israel by Assyria. Indeed, one suspects that for later editors, the fact that what a prophet predicted came to pass guaranteed his authentic, divine commission. This certainly was the view of the Deuteronomists, who usually are thought to have had a major influence on the editing of the prophetic books (Deut 18:22). Further, the rather happier conclusion to the book in Amos 9:11-15, in strange contrast to the apparent totality of judgment threatened earlier, may well have picked up on concerns from the prophet for the oppressed poor in the community and translated them into exilic hopes for the future restoration of the Davidic monarchy and the future of "the house of Jacob" (Amos 9:8, 11-15).

*Hosea, who also prophesied in the northern kingdom of Israel in the eighth century BC, inherited similar traditions to those of Amos. He depicts God's gracious deliverance of his people from Egypt in the picture of loving parent caring for a child (Hos 11:1-4; cf. Hos 13:4-6). But he also accuses them of repeated unfaithfulness to Yahweh, although he concentrates more on their religious apostasy in adopting the rites of the Canaanite fertility religions (e.g., Hos 13:1-3). There are, however, also accusations of social and moral *sins in the manner of Amos (e.g., Hos 4:1-3, a passage that seems closely to parallel the Ten Commandments [cf. Ex 20:3-17; Deut 5:7-21]). Neither the king nor the religious leaders escape fierce criticism (e.g., Hos 4:4-6; 5:1-2; 8:4). But it is above all for their religious apostasy that the northern kingdom is threatened with a judgment that includes loss of the land whose fertility they have sought in vain from the Canaanite gods, and whose security they have sought to ensure by foreign alliances (Hos 7:11-13).

It is true that there is some ambivalence in the book about the totality and finality of judgment, with God alternately pleading with them like a lover (Hos 2:14-23), confessing that a parent cannot bear to lose a child so loved (Hos 11:8-9), while the book, as with the finally edited edition of so many of the Prophetic Books, ends with a promise of final deliverance (Hos 14:4-9), though probably this should be read as dependent upon their acting on the words of repentance that precede it (Hos 14:1-3). So, while Hosea may not be quite as total in his picture of judgment as Amos appears to be, there can be no doubt that he challenges the received traditions of the north in a thoroughly radical and subversive way.

But, again, Hosea is a prophet who seems to have left a very strong tradition process in his wake. Many scholars have pointed out the strong similarities between the theology of Hosea (and, to some extent, of Amos), with its insistence that total and undivided loyalty to Yahweh alone is the vital condition of experiencing the divine blessing, and the theology of Deuteronomy and what is known as the Deuteronomistic movement (see Nicholson). In Amos and Hosea there is not, of course, the insistence that loyal worship of Yahweh can be conducted only at the one, central sanctuary in Jerusalem that is found in Deuteronomy, for although they roundly condemn what goes on at Bethel, Gilgal and other shrines, they do so because the conduct of their devotees does not match the words of their worship, not because they are worshiping at the wrong places. Further, there can be little doubt that the close relationship between the eighth-century BC prophets and Deuteronomy is not a one-way process. As already suggested, there is no doubt that the Deuteronomists edited the final versions of the Prophetic Books. But to have influenced so significantly such an important movement in the southern kingdom of Judah is no small tribute to the tradition that these prophets inspired.

3. Eighth-Century BC Prophecy in Judah.

Scholars have long believed that the record of the ministry of "Isaiah of Jerusalem," as he has been known, is to be found mainly in *Isaiah 1—39. Isaiah 40—55 is widely held to have come from the period of the exile, while many believe Isaiah 56—66 to be postexilic. Even within Isaiah 1—39 there is usually thought to be some later material, and the usual questions about just what may have come originally from the prophet and what from later hands that face us in all the Prophetic Books are unusually acute and much debated here. What is evident is that the prophet is steeped in the traditions of the southern kingdom of Judah: Jerusalem with its sacred *temple is God's dwelling place on earth, and the Davidic dynasty is divinely appointed. He is as severe in his judgments on society in Judah, however, as Amos and Hosea were in theirs against the northern kingdom. The corruption and oppression that the people tolerate and promote make their scrupulous *worship invalid in God's eyes (Is 1:15-17). Where God had looked for the fruits of justice and righteousness in the tenderly nurtured "vine" of the nation, he found only bloodshed and the cry of the oppressed (see Is 5:1-7, where there is play between the Hebrew words mišpāt ["justice"] and mišpāh ["bloodshed"], which, similar in sound, convey wildly opposed qualities). For all this God will judge his people, although there is a strangely ambivalent note in what the threats will mean (as there was with Hosea). According to Isaiah 1:21-26, God will come in judgment against all that is corrupt in Jerusalem, and yet this judgment turns out to result in a refining process that will lead to renewal. In much the same way, Isaiah 17:12-14 pictures the onrush of the threatening floods of chaos against the city, in much the same terms as some psalms (e.g., Ps 46:1-7; 93:3-4), but then God suddenly asserts power over the chaos waters as in the act of creation (cf. Gen 1:6-13). So Isaiah certainly is influenced by the tradition, found also in many psalms, that God dwells in Jerusalem and, at the last, will defend it against all comers. And these chapters of the book of Isaiah also reiterate the belief found in many of the royal psalms that God has chosen the Davidic dynasty, and, even if there were to be a break in the historical line of its descent, in the future it will be restored (Is 11:1-10).

There is great emphasis in these chapters on the place of *faith, in the sense of a quiet trust in God and the divine power to act and deliver his people. He calls on Ahaz to "have faith" in a time of severe national threat (Is 7:9). He denounces trust in alliances with foreign powers, calling instead for utter reliance on Yahweh (Is 30:15). Perhaps this is the link between his threats of judgment but also hope of a divinely wrought renewal of the community on the other side of that judgment. But there can be no doubt that it is this aspect of Isaiah's teaching that has influenced the tradition process that he initiated, especially with the great hopes of renewal beyond defeat and exile found in Isaiah 40—55; 56—66 and among the postexilic prophets.

*Micah's criticisms of Judean society are often very close to Isaiah's (the almost verbatim agreement of Is 2:2-4 and Mic 4:1-4 is, however, probably due to later editing). But there are close thematic similarities, as between Isaiah 5:11-12 and Micah 2:1-2. Religious and secular leaders, who should have served and promoted the people's interests, have instead been their oppressors (Mic 3:1-3). Ominously, in these verses it is the poor and oppressed who, alone, are described by God as "my people." Micah is much more devastating in his picture of judgment than Isaiah was, announcing that the holy city of Jerusalem would be totally destroyed (Mic 3:12). It was as such a prophet of judgment that Micah was remembered, and he is the only canonical OT prophet who is mentioned by name outside his book. Jeremiah 26:17-19 actually cites Micah 3:12, thus showing one thread of the tradition that the eighth-century BC prophets such as Micah instituted, as their threats provided keys for interpreting the disasters of 586 BC in terms of faith and theodicy. The greater hope for national renewal expressed at the end of the book (Mic 7:7-20) may express the hopes of that later time for restoration beyond exile, but even so, they might be based on Micah's own hopes for some purpose of God for the oppressed who are described as "my people."

Thus, taken together, the eighth-century BC prophets of Israel and Judah initiate a tradition by which later disasters could be interpreted in terms of faith and a hope in God's ultimate purpose could be maintained.

4. Seventh-Century BC Prophecy.

The book of *Jeremiah is the towering example of seventh-century BC prophecy. Much of the recorded early preaching of the prophet shows strongly the influence of Hosea, accusing the people in just the same way of religious apostasy in turning to other gods, and attacking similar kinds of social abuse and injustice that are seen to flow from that. Much of this would reflect the conditions that were said to give rise to King Josiah's reforms, described in 2 Kings 24—25, a reform organizing worship in the central sanctuary of Jerusalem made possible by the decline of Assyrian power. As we have seen, the influence of the northern prophets was also strongly evident in the emergence and development of the Deuteronomistic movement, and it is perhaps no coincidence that the book of Jeremiah in its final form shows strong Deuteronomistic influence, particularly in the prose sermons attributed to the prophet (e.g., Jer 7:1-15). We should view this process of Deuteronomistic editing and shaping as part of the process by which the words of individual prophets were remembered, treasured and reissued to show their relevance for later times. There is no need to think that the figure of Jeremiah is wholly a later, Deuteronomistic construction (with Carroll), but it does reveal the tendency of later editors to portray prophets as "preachers of Torah" (see Clements). Both the prose sermons and the poetic oracles threaten the people with destruction at the hands of a "foe from the north" (e.g., Jer 1:14-16), although the book also has strong elements of hopes of a future made possible by the divine renewal (e.g., the new covenant promise of Jer 31:31-34), but such action will take place only on the other side of the judgment that will befall in the destruction and loss of land, city, temple and kingdom.

As the complex state of recent scholarly interpretation reveals (for a summary, see Schmidt), it is probably impossible with confidence to distinguish between original words and deeds of the historical figure Jeremiah and the very strongly Deuteronomistic form in which so many different forms of literary genre are brought together in the present book (of which the differences between the two extant versions, the Hebrew and the Greek, show how open the prophetic tradition could continue to be). But, in facing the utterly transforming events of 597 and 586 BC, interpreting them in terms of faith and offering hopes of a future beyond the catastrophe, it is difficult to exaggerate the significance of the continuing tradition to which the seventh-century BC prophet Jeremiah gave rise. Nor did its influence end with the emergence of the postexilic community in Judah, as the strong influence of the book in the NT, particularly its concept of a "new covenant" (e.g., Mk 14:24), reveals.

5. Exilic Prophecy.

It is difficult to imagine what a completely devastating event the final destruction of Jerusalem at the hands of Nebuchadnezzar, king of *Babylon, must have been for the people of Judah, with the city that God had promised would last forever (e.g., Ps 48:8) destroyed, and the Davidic king, representative of a dynasty God had also said would last forever (e.g., Ps. 89:19-37), forcibly removed into exile. We know very little of the fortunes either of those taken into exile or those remaining in Judah, but two outstanding prophetic voices speak from that time.

*Ezekiel is said to have been a priest (Ezek 1:3) who was taken to Babylon among the first exiles. He seems to have been a figure of some standing, consulted more than once by the elders of the community (e.g., Ezek 8:1). The opening vision of Ezekiel 1:1—32:11 shows him also being commissioned as a prophet. The form and content of his prophecy appear strangely new, with its mysterious *visions, his apparently being transported by the *Spirit to different scenes and his strange symbolic prophetic actions (e.g., Ezek 4—5). However, there is more continuity with earlier prophetic tradition than might appear. The themes of the book's message, of judgment against Judah (Ezek 4:1—24:27) and against foreign nations (Ezek 25:1—32:32) and of hopes of a future restoration (Ezek 33:1—48:35), reveal a structure similar to other prophetic books. Ezekiel's *sign acts and his being transported by the Spirit recall the earliest of Israel's prophetic traditions of Elijah and Elisha. The prediction of the end about to come upon the land (Ezek 7:2-3) recalls Amos 8:2, while Isaiah's imagery of the smelting of Israel (Is 1:22-25) is echoed in Ezek 22:17-22. But the strongest parallels are with the book of Jeremiah (as some time ago noted by J. W. Miller). Among many that could be cited is Ezekiel's vision of the threat to Judah as "coming from the north" (Ezek 1:4; cf. Jer 1:13). Ezekiel is directed to "eat the scroll"—that is, to assimilate it fully—taking up the picture of Jeremiah 15:16, while Ezekiel 34 enlarges on Jeremiah's theme of God as Israel's shepherd (Jer 23:1-8). Thus, Ezekiel is pictured as taking up many of the themes of earlier Israelite prophecy and maintaining their continuing validity by finding in them the reasons for the historical calamity and holding out their promises for future fulfillment. These words of hope for the future also continue some of the themes found in Jeremiah, particularly that of the renewal of human hearts (Jer 31:31-34; cf. Ezek 36:26-27). Yet there are distinctive elements in Ezekiel, not least a strong emphasis on divine sovereignty. God acts, apparently, not for the sake of the people but rather for the divine reputation (e.g., Ezek 36:22-32). The verses show that this is by no means indicative of lack of divine compassion, but that God must be shown as the supreme power, authority and disposer of destiny. At a time when other nations and their gods appeared to be having things all their own way, it may be that this was an emphasis needed to bring hope to the despairing exiles. They are also encouraged by a strong reassurance that, neither as individuals nor collectively, are they bound by past actions and guilt (e.g., Ezek 18:1-32). It is not too late, nor is their condition so hopeless, as to rob their repentance of significance.

The final section of the book echoes the vision of the defiling of the *temple in Ezekiel 8—11, with its poignant picture of the departure of God's "glory" from the sanctuary (Ezek 8:18), by detailing the dimensions and details of the temple to be restored in the future and the glorious reentry of God into it (Ezek 43:1-4). This certainly was to be a tradition that was taken over by the postexilic prophets, with their encouragement to the returned exiles to rebuild the temple.

Isaiah 40—55 seems to reflect an exilic situation, and for this reason traditional critical scholarship has assigned them to an unnamed prophet, later than Isaiah, usually referred to as Second Isaiah. More recently, however, there has been much greater attention paid to the structure of the book as a whole (see, e.g., Williamson). H. G. M. Williamson argues that these chapters are an "exposition" of Isaiah 1—39. Certainly the prominence given to Zion in them reflect the strongly Jerusalem-centered themes of Isaiah 1—39, since Zion symbolizes the community whom God is going to redeem and renew (e.g., Is 51:1-3, 11). Yet these chapters also draw on other mainstream traditions, of creation (Is 40:12, 21f.) and, above all, of the *exodus tradition. Now that the people have suffered for their sins, God is going to reverse their punishment and bring them back from exile, thus effecting a second exodus in their history far transcending the first (e.g., Is 43:14-21). There is allusion also to the patriarchal traditions (e.g., Is 51:1-2) and even to the ancient creation myth of God's overcoming of the *chaos monster in order to bring about the order of *creation (e.g., Is 51:9-11), an allusion found in the creation account of Genesis 1, where the Hebrew word for the watery chaos that existed before creation, têhôm (Gen 1:2), is etymologically related to the name of the chaos monster Tiamat in the Babylonian creation story (see Day).

There is also a mention of the David tradition in these chapters (Is 55:3-5), but in a somewhat startlingly new way. Several times in the passages promising hope in Ezekiel 33:1—39:29 a restoration of the Davidic dynasty is explicitly predicted (e.g., Ezek 37:24-28). However, this is not so explicit in Ezekiel 40—48, where there is much more talk of the priestly orders, and the civil leader is, perhaps significantly, given the title of "prince" rather than "king" (e.g., Ezek 45:7-9) and is pointedly reminded not to repeat the oppression of the people as their preexilic forerunners had done. But Isaiah 55:3-5 goes further. Here, it is the whole restored community being addressed, and the covenant with David is being democratized; that is, it is no longer with him and his line alone, but with the people as a whole who will inherit the Davidic kings' role in God's purposes for the world.

So, while these chapters draw on a range of earlier Israelite traditions, there is a creatively new element to be found as well. Not only are the destruction of Jerusalem and the exile of king and people given the already familiar interpretation of being God's judgment for the nation's sin, but also there is some attempt to give a theological meaning to the whole process, not least in the four passages that relate to God's "servant" (Is 42:1-4; 49:1-6; 50:4-9; 52:13—53:12) (see Servant of Yahweh). As with all poetry, they are rich in symbolic significance and can be legitimately interpreted at many levels, but the actual identification of Israel with the "servant" (Is 41:8-10) should not be ignored. The last of the passages, in particular, says that their sufferings will not have been in vain. Although these sufferings were just punishment for sin (the "innocence" of the servant in Isaiah 53 is in relation to the nations who oppressed Israel, who are the speakers here), they will be the means by which these other nations come to acknowledge God (Is 53:10-11). By virtue of God's divine *redemption and restoration of Israel, all nations will come to acknowledge that the God of Israel is the only true God, whose power extends over all nations and all creation. Such a bold, creative, even daring interpretation of the calamities of the exile is a striking tribute to the power of OT prophecy to inherit and reverence older traditions, but not to be so bound by them that it cannot create powerful, far-reaching new traditions of its own.

6. Postexilic Prophecy.

It is a remarkable testimony to the continuity and resilience of the phenomenon of prophecy in Israel that in the quite new situation of the emergence of postexilic Yehud under Persian rule, with no temple and no Davidic king on the throne, prophets emerged who both built on the great traditions of the past and renewed and reinterpreted them to inspire the faith and energize the life of the restored community. First among them was *Haggai, who addresses the conditions of physical hardship and poverty of the people and the daunting task of rebuilding that confronts them (Hag 1:4-7). He draws on the *Zion and temple traditions of the preexilic period. The temple is Yahweh's "house" and so an essential feature of the life of the community. Haggai urges them to rebuild it, whatever the cost in materials and to other, more self-centered interests, and he assures them that when Yahweh dwells among them again, the temple will be filled with "glory" (Hag 2:7, using kābôd, the technical name for the glory that signifies God's presence [cf. 1 Kings 8:11]). There, God will rule again over all the earth so that the treasure of all peoples will again flow toward it, so enriching the whole community (Hag 2:4-11). This emphasis on the saving presence of God echoes both the Zion traditions (Ps 46:4-7, 9-11) and the exodus tradition (Hag 2:5; cf. Ex 13:21-22) and also takes up Ezekiel's forceful use of the same promise of God's return to the new temple (Ezek 43:4).

If a postexilic prophet such as Haggai draws so much on the Zion tradition, a legitimate question would be "How does he treat the David tradition?" The book envisages a joint leadership between Zerubbabel (a Babylonian name) as governor and Joshua as high priest. According to the Chronicler, Zerubbabel was a grandson of King Jehoiachin (1 Chron 3:17-19) and thus a descendant of the Davidic line. The two leaders are described as being empowered by God to lead in the enterprise of rebuilding the temple (Hag 1:12; 2:4-6), but a final oracle in the book (Hag 2:20-23) suggests a future, greater honor for Zerubbabel, using a term, "signet ring," used by Jeremiah of King Jehoiachin (Jer 22:24). This would suggest that some kind of messianic hope for a political restoration of the Davidic line was still held by some after the exile.

The book describes an enthusiastic response by leaders and people to the prophet's call (Hag 1:12-15) in terms that recollect the tradition of the willing response of the people to the call of Moses to build the tabernacle in the wilderness (Ex 35:29; 36:2-7). Thus, by reasserting the continuing relevance of their preexilic traditions and hopes, postexilic prophecy assures the restored community of its continuing identity as those who inherit all the earlier promises of God.

*Zechariah 1—8 contains the message of a prophet claimed by the dates given throughout to be a contemporary of Haggai. These chapters consist of a series of eight "visions of the night" (Zech 1:7—6:15), the "vision" being a form familiar from earlier prophecy, especially Ezekiel (visions form approximately one-third of the book of Ezekiel). They may suggest the idea of the prophet as “watchman,” looking out for the first signs of the dawn of God’s new actions (e.g., Is 21:8-9; Ezek 3:17; Hab 2:1-3). Those in Zechariah take the form of a description of the vision, the prophet’s request to know its meaning, followed by an explanation given by an angel. The form may suggest that Zechariah is the divinely appointed watchman commissioned by God to report the first signs of deliverance and salvation after the exile.

The message of the visions is a renewal of the hopes for Jerusalem so strongly expressed by Isaiah 40—55 and Ezekiel. Judah has paid the price for its sins, and now God is going to restore Judah, and the city and temple will be rebuilt (Zerubbabel is specifically named as the one who will achieve this [Zech 4:9]). Thus, as with Haggai, the tradition of exilic prophecy is strongly reinforced, in both its promises and its literary forms.

There are apparently conflicting pictures of the type of rule that will be exercised. Zechariah 4:12-13 suggests a joint rule between Zerubbabel and Joshua much as Haggai does. On the other hand, in Zechariah 6:9-14, an obscure and difficult passage, it appears as though Joshua is crowned as high priest in promise of the coming of “the Branch” (a messianic term [cf. Is 11:1-5]) who “shall build the temple.” Either this is from an earlier stage, before Zerubbabel’s return from Babylon, or it is a recognition that any messianic hopes that attached to him were disappointed, and later traditions saw the continuing priestly line of postexilic Yehud as a guarantor that the former promises concerning a ruler of the Davidic line would be fulfilled some time in the future (see Mason 1990, 210-12).

A similar role of later tradition in the shaping of the prophetic tradition may well be found in Zechariah 7—8. In addition to reinforcing the promises of the prophet concerning God’s purposes for Jerusalem and the temple to those who grow impatient with the lack of signs of it (the objection being expressed in Zech 7:1-3, and the prophet’s answer in Zech 8:18-19), the prophet is portrayed as preaching the kind of general ethical teaching of the preexilic prophets on the nature of true cultic worship (Zech 7:4-7) and the need for ethical conduct (Zech 7:8-14), preaching that is backed by appeal to the tradition of the preexilic prophets (Zech 7:7, 12). In this way the tradition, while holding on to the eschatological promises of these postexilic prophets, also represents them as authentic teachers of Torah for the continuing community by which, until the promises are fulfilled, their lives are to be governed.

Zechariah 9—14, although undoubtedly later (though difficult to date with any precision), deserves to be mentioned here. Zechariah 9—14 often has been assigned more to the genre of apocalyptic than to that of prophecy, but, like all the so-called *apocalyptic sections of the OT, these chapters draw strongly on prophetic tradition, seeking to reinforce the certainty of the fulfillment of the prophetic promises, even if that fulfillment is now cast into a more distant and unspecified future. These later chapters of the book certainly draw much from the Zechariah tradition (see Mason 1976) and hence may suitably be mentioned here, but they also draw from a much wider tradition, and especially from Second Isaiah (Is 40—55). One instance must suffice. In Zechariah 9:9-10 Zion is called upon to rejoice because of the coming of its king. He is said to be “triumphant” (ṣaddīq, which basically means “righteous” but can also carry the sense of “righteousness vindicated”), “victorious” (nōṣāʿ, which is a passive form of the verb “to save, deliver” but can also be translated as “bearing salvation”) and “humble” (ʿānī, which can mean either “humble” or “afflicted”), and he is described as “speaking” (or “commanding”) “peace” (šālôm) to the nations. All four of these attributes of the coming king are found in the royal psalms describing the reigning king of the Davidic dynasty. But, interestingly, all four also occur in the so-called Servant Songs of Isaiah 40—55 (Is 42:1-4; 49:1-6; 50:4-9; 52:13—53:12). In Isaiah 50:8 the servant says, “He who pronounces me righteous is near”; in Isaiah 49:6 God says to the servant, “I will give you as a light to the nations that my salvation may reach to the ends of the earth”; in Isaiah 53:4 it is said of the servant, “Yet we accounted him stricken, struck down by God and afflicted”; and, finally, in Isaiah 53:5 it is said, “The chastisement of our peace was upon him.”

If this represents later prophetic tradition reinterpreting of older hopes of the reappearance of a Davidic king, it would also reflect another modification of tradition in Second Isaiah whereby he appears to “democratize” the historic Davidic royal dynasty as now finding its embodiment in the whole nation and mission of Israel (Is 53:3-5). Zechariah 9—14 would then endorse the earlier prophet's belief that the *sufferings Israel had endured, and from which God had already delivered them and would yet more fully and triumphantly deliver them in the future, were the price that the "servant" paid for being the means of revealing God's power and grace to the world. But, not only would that be a remarkably creative reinterpretation of received tradition; it also was to have a powerful and creative shaping force on subsequent tradition, when the Christian community found in it a means of explaining why Jesus, whom they claimed was the promised "messiah," should nevertheless have suffered humiliation and a shameful death (it is, perhaps, no coincidence that Zech 9—14 is one of the most frequently quoted Old Testament texts in the New).

A similar picture emerges in the book of *Malachi (the name means "my messenger"). It comprises a series of questions and answers between the prophet and his hearers, either as a rhetorical device or, perhaps, in echo of what some have called "the Disputation" (see Westermann, 210). Here the prophet appears very much in the role of expounder of Torah (see Law), on the nature of true *sacrifice, on mixed *marriages with those of other races, on the proper payment of tithes—all matters, it seems, that fall particularly within the role of the priest. Indeed, the priesthood is highly idealized (Mal 2:4-7), with special emphasis on his role as "teacher of Torah" in Malachi 2:6-7, the only place in the OT where the priest is called "the messenger of the LORD." Yet the book also holds out the fulfillment of the *eschatological promises of the prophets (Mal 3:1-5; 4:1-3), and those who have grown cynical about this are strongly condemned, and their fate is contrasted with those who remain faithful (Mal 3:13-18).

It is, perhaps, fitting that this last prophetic book of the OT, even while stressing the certain fulfillment of the prophetic promises for the future, should end with a reference to the past traditions on which it rested and from which it sprang. Some have suggested that Malachi 4:4-6 was intended as a conclusion to the whole prophetic section of the Hebrew canon. Certainly the reference both to Moses the lawgiver and Elijah the prophet reminds us of the traditions on which the prophets drew, the way they were remembered and portrayed by later tradition, and the tradition that they inspired of a strongly held flame of hope for God's divine intervention in the future, a flame that neither the passing of time nor repeated delays and disappointments could ever finally extinguish.

PROPHECY AND WISDOM

Prophecy and wisdom are presented in the OT as two significant aspects of life in ancient Israel. They are depicted as both complementing one another and conflicting with one another, and are described positively only when they are founded on the *law of God. This article examines various aspects of the relationship between prophecy and wisdom.

1. Definitions.

1.1. Wisdom. The broad semantic range of the Hebrew term hokmâ ("wisdom") presents some difficulties in the attempt to define wisdom precisely, let alone its relationship to prophecy (see Whybray, 181-83). The term itself refers to any form of skill: "all those skilled in some trait or profession possess wisdom of a sort: the craftsman, the potter, the builder, the farmer" (Grabbe, 162-63). Kings were given wisdom by God in order to rule (e.g., Deut 34:9; 1 Kings 3:12; 5:26; Is 11:2); others were given wisdom for specific tasks, such as the skill required by Bezalel to construct the tabernacle (Ex 31:1-5). Wisdom also appears in different guises: proverbial wisdom (as found in much of Proverbs); mantic wisdom, involving divination and largely confined to foreign sages; or speculative wisdom, such as that found in much of Ecclesiastes. So although Daniel is declared to be wise, his wisdom rests, at least in part, on direct revelation from God (Dan 2; cf. Joseph in Gen 40—41). Thus Daniel's wisdom has more in common with prophecy than it does with the speculative wisdom of Qohelet.

Further complicating the tasks of defining wisdom and understanding's relationship with prophecy is the evolution of wisdom through history. R. Whybray (195) noted, "[That] wisdom ideas or theology underwent great changes during the OT period . . . is obvious. . . . There are tremendous theological differences between the older elements in Proverbs and the later ones, between Proverbs and Job, between Job and Ecclesiastes." Beyond this, the speculative wisdom of Ecclesiastes seems to have given way to a form of wisdom that found its basis in the law by the time of Ben Sira (see Sir 24:23), and the evolution did not stop here, for later wisdom texts suggest further development (see Aitken, 181-93).

These vagaries should not, however, obscure the fact that the bulk of the biblical treatment of wisdom and its interaction with prophecy is focused on the intellectual aspects of wisdom, as noted by L. Grabbe (179): "There is a special sense in which wisdom was applied to intellectual characteristics, especially those gained or developed by formal learning, education, and study." The task of these sages is well described by J. Crenshaw (1993, 6): "The sages . . . insisted on the intellect's capacity to assure the good life by word and deed. By using their intellectual gifts the sages hoped to steer their lives safely into harbor, avoiding hazards that brought catastrophes to fools." Moreover, outside of the Wisdom literature, references to the wise frequently focus on their role as royal advisors in Israel and beyond. Thus, when considering the relationship between wisdom and prophecy, the biblical text concentrates on the intellectual stream of wisdom frequently manifest in advisors who sought to influence the course of government.

1.2. Prophecy. The literary records of prophecy preserved in the OT are somewhat more uniform than the wider phenomenon of prophecy in ancient Israel appears to have been. The existence of bands of prophets pronouncing ecstatic utterances (e.g., 1 Sam 10:9-12) and indications of the existence of institutionalized prophets (e.g., 2 Kings 6:1; Amos 7:14) reflect aspects of prophecy that are largely unrepresented among the prophetic books. Precisely how these prophets operated is not entirely clear, and because of the very limited information on them and their activities, any informed discussion of prophecy and wisdom must confine itself to the form of prophecy recorded extensively in the biblical text itself (see Prophecy, History of).

Consequently, for the purposes of this article, the definition of a prophet by Grabbe (107) is sufficient: "The common denominator . . . is that the prophet is a mediator who claims to receive messages direct from a divinity, by various means, and communicates these messages to recipients." It thus follows that a prophecy is the message received and transmitted by the prophet.

2. Wisdom and Prophecy.

Wisdom and prophecy are depicted both favorably and unfavorably in the OT. False prophecy is prophecy not arising from the *God of Israel; false wisdom is wisdom that is not founded in the fear of Yahweh. True prophecy reflects God's desire for his people and so reflects his will as revealed in the law. True wisdom is defined within the law as obedience to the law (see Deut 4:5-6). It is this link to the law that is the touchstone for both wisdom and prophecy, and against which they are each assessed by the biblical authors.

The fundamental difference between wisdom and prophecy lies in the nature of wisdom as a skill or the ability to live well, whereas prophecy conveys direct and specific information from God addressing a particular situation. As such, although the intellectual acumen that constitutes some examples of divinely given wisdom—that of Solomon, for instance—may be said to come from God, there is no implicit guarantee that the results of the application of wisdom also carry divine authority (see Scott, 11). Solomon is a prime example of this distinction, for in spite of the divine origin of his wisdom, he employed it to make strategic alliances through marriage and subsequently introduced *idolatry into the very center of the kingdom. Unlike the prophets, whose words often are presented as direct quotations of God's words to them, the sages' insights are their own even if the intellectual capacity for reaching their conclusions was God-given.

Consequently, the authority of the sage differs fundamentally from that of the prophet: "[That] priest and prophet were regarded as speaking with divine authority is clear. It is less certain that the same can be said of the 'counsel' of the wise man and the elders" (Scott, 3). The criticism of this distinction by B. Gemser (208-19), arguing that "counsel" (ʿēṣā) is presented as bearing equal authority to the word of the prophet (cf. Crenshaw 1971, 119), requires significant qualification. Gemser correctly notes that this counsel derives its authority from its relationship with the Torah; however, he fails to account adequately for either the evolution of wisdom through history or the frequent assertions within the OT text that the wisdom of the sages had become disconnected from the law and thus had lost its authority (cf., e.g., Is 5:21; 19:11-12; 47:10; see Shields, 7-19). Where wisdom derives from and expounds God's revealed instruction and calls for an obedience to those instructions founded in the fear of Yahweh (see Deut 4:6), it is favorably depicted in the OT. Wisdom that ignores God's word—that of Qohelet or of Job's counselors, for instance—is condemned.

3. Literary Features of Wisdom and Prophecy.

Scholars have recognized that the various types of literature present in the OT are frequently characterized by specific literary forms (see Form Criticism). The proverb, for example, is generally recognized as a feature of wisdom. It is therefore significant to note instances where forms typically associated with one genre occur in literature of another genre. The appearance of wisdom forms in prophecy or of prophetic forms in wisdom is often construed as revealing something of the relationship between wisdom and prophecy.

3.1. Prophetic Features in Wisdom Literature.

3.1.1. Proverbs. Both Agur and King Lemuel label their sayings as maššā' (Prov 30:1; 31:1; [traditionally, "oracle," but HALOT suggests "pronouncement," while others prefer "burden"]). As a description of speech, this term is elsewhere exclusively associated with prophecy (e.g., Is 13:1; 14:28; 15:1; 17:1; 19:1; 21:1, 11, 13; 22:1; 23:1; 30:6; Ezek 12:10; Nah 1:1; Hab 1:1; Zech 9:1; 12:1; Mal 1:1). In fact, so anomalous does its use in Proverbs appear to some scholars and translators that they understand the word to be a place name rather than as a claim that the words that follow are in any way akin to a prophetic pronouncement (see HALOT; cf. Gen 25:14; 1 Chron 1:30; Ps 120:5).

B. Waltke (81-82) claims, however, that the use of the term here affirms the inspired status of the utterances of the sages, and that the wisdom recorded in Proverbs is founded not merely on intellectual analysis of the natural and social world but rather on special divine revelation. The only other use of maššā' in the Wisdom literature (Job 7:20) clearly does not include the notion of revelation, but the fact that Proverbs 30:1 also uses the term nē'um, which HALOT describes as "an almost completely fixed technical expression introducing prophetic oracles," strengthens Waltke's case.

However, there are grounds for caution before claiming too much based on the use of these terms alone. In spite of Agur's and Lemuel's use of this distinctively prophetic language to introduce their words, the form and content of those words remains distinct from the prophetic utterances elsewhere associated with these terms. Furthermore, these terms are not explicitly applied to all of Proverbs, let alone all the Wisdom literature, and if the use of these terms in Proverbs 30:1; 31:1 is intended to ascribe to the words of these sages prophetic authority, it is quite clear from the perspective of Job and Ecclesiastes that this ascription cannot be extended to all wisdom, for both these works denounce human wisdom and contrast it with direct revelation from God.

3.1.2. Job. The book of Job, which records God's direct intervention and speech to Job and his counselors, has long been recognized as reflecting some degree of prophetic influence. For example, Crenshaw (1971, 108) argued that "the continuity between Job and prophecy cannot be denied" (cf. Snaith, 33).

Job represents an interesting blurring of wisdom and prophecy, but one that ultimately undermines the wisdom presented by the human sages, Job's "friends" (cf. Job 5:13; 12:17; 38:2). Unlike Proverbs, which contains material that balances the tendency to read its wisdom as endorsing a purely retributive understanding of the world (e.g., Prov 10:2; 16:8, 19; 17:1; 19:1, 22; 22:1; 28:6), the book of Job does not resort to wisdom to counter the arguments of Job's acquaintances. Rather, the ultimate corrective to their wisdom comes in direct special revelation from God (see Job 38–42), a mode more akin to prophecy than wisdom. In thus resorting to special revelation rather than wisdom, together with the expression of wisdom's limitations (Job 28), the book highlights wisdom's inadequacies and the ultimate role that prophecy plays in understanding the world in which we live.

3.1.3. Ecclesiastes. One portion of the words of the epilogue to Ecclesiastes (Eccles 12:11–12a) is often understood to affirm the divine origin of the biblical Wisdom literature. The basis for this understanding is the apparent assertion that the words of the wise are given by the one shepherd, widely understood as a reference to God. This understanding is reflected in most modern English translations. For example, the esv reads, "The words of the wise are like goads, and like nails firmly fixed are the collected sayings; they are given by one Shepherd. My son, beware of anything beyond these." G. Ogden (210) endorses this interpretation of the passage, stating that the epilogist, in writing these words, is "claiming that the observation-reflection method typical of the sage . . . qualifies as a method by which the divine will and purpose may be ascertained. This then gives the sage's words an authority as revelation, as scripture."

There are, however, a number of significant problems with this understanding of the epilogue to Qohelet's words (see Shields, 69–92). The identification of the "one shepherd" as God is dubious. When God is described as a shepherd elsewhere, the identification is always explicit and unambiguous, and since others are described as shepherds of the people (e.g., Ezek 34:23, which uses the phrase rō'eh eḥād ["one shepherd"], found in Eccles 12:11), if the shepherd here is to be understood metaphorically, then it is not immediately clear how that identification ought to be made. Further, these words claim far more than most would be happy to affirm, for they do not restrict the assertion made regarding the words of the sages to the words of Qohelet, nor even to the canonical Wisdom literature, but simply to all the words of the wise, without qualification. Yet few would claim that all words from all sages have a divine origin.

Instead, it is better to read these words of the epilogue as a warning against the wisdom of the sages rather than an endorsement of it. As such, they can be translated thus: "The words of the wise are like goads, and like cattle-prods are [the words of] the masters of collections, those which are used by a lone shepherd. In addition to these things, my son, beware of making many texts. . . ." As a lone shepherd must employ painful goads to direct his flock, so the wise use their words to manipulate and coerce their students. Furthermore, warns the epilogue, beware of being consumed by the literary activities typical of the sages, for such tasks are pointless.

If these words do not affirm the divine origin of the wisdom of the sages, then there is little to indicate any prophetic influence in the book of Ecclesiastes. Qohelet reaches his conclusions without ever appealing to special divine revelation; indeed, it may well be that he actively repudiates any notion that such information can ever be reliably discerned and distances himself from any who would claim to have access to such information (see 4.2 below).

3.2. Wisdom in the Prophets. The prophetic books of the OT occasionally employ wisdom language and forms, as R. Scott (4) notes: "Isaiah and Jeremiah scorn the wise men of their time, yet they themselves adopt some of the language, forms, and ideas of the wisdom teachers." J. Lindblom (201-2) identifies a number of instances of wisdom forms used in prophetic literature (e.g., Is 5; 10:15; 28; Hos 7:4-5; Amos 3:3-6; 6:12), together with prophetic use of aphorisms (e.g., Jer 31:29; Ezek 18:2 [although both in reference to aphorisms that will no longer be used]; also Is 65:8; Jer 8:4; 13:12; 15:12; 23:28; 49:24; Ezek 11:3; 16:44). He further identifies rhetorical questions with a specific didactic intent that resembles wisdom utterances (e.g., Is 10:15; Jer 23:28; Ezek 15:2-8; Amos 3:3-8; 6:12; 9:7; Mal 1:6; 2:14-15, 17; 3:7-8, 13-14).

The appearance of such wisdom forms within the Prophetic Books has prompted a number of explanations from scholars. In the mid-twentieth century some such as J. Fichtner suggested that they indicated that these prophets were once numbered among the sages. Others suggest that the broad distribution of wisdom material throughout the OT can be attributed to the activities of scribal sages who were responsible for the compilation and transmission of the texts preserved as the OT, and that the wisdom forms embedded in the text can be traced, at least in some instances, to their hands. For example, R. Van Leeuwen (1993, 49) suggests that "the end-redaction of the Tanakh as a whole was the work of scribal sages who were forerunners of Ben Sira."

Both of these explanations are founded on uncertain presuppositions. No prophet ever claims to have been previously counted among the sages, and so to suggest that several of them were is based entirely on a speculative assessment of the significance of wisdom forms among their words (see Lindblom, 197; Van Leeuwen 1990, 297-98).

Similarly, the suggestion that wisdom language and forms can be attributed to later editorial work by scribes imposing their own agenda upon the text, though impossible to exclude in every instance, is founded on no manuscript evidence and supposes that the use of wisdom language either would have been inappropriate for the prophet or does not cohere with the work's message. Yet, if some wisdom originated in the home and so was shared in by most of the population—as seems likely, given the subject matter—then it would hardly be surprising that wisdom forms and language should be found throughout the OT. Furthermore, if the observation by M. Sato (142) that "to propheticize non-prophetic genres of speech, is in itself a characteristic of prophetic-inspiratory dynamism" is correct, then the presence of wisdom forms and language in the prophetic books ought to be even less in need of special explanation.

Identification of wisdom language in the Prophets is also complicated somewhat by wisdom's frequent use of examples from everyday life. In spite of the tendency of some scholars to see in such illustrations dependence of the prophet upon the wise, such connections are almost always unwarranted by the evidence, for to make such a claim ascribes to the sages a monopoly on using common language for their ends. As Crenshaw (1969, 134) says, "The mere use of wisdom phraseology by a prophet does not make him a sage, for his meaning may be completely alien to wisdom thinking" (see also Murphy, 104; Reventlow, 381-82).

3.2.1. Isaiah. Isaiah contains a number of passages that employ wisdom language and forms (e.g., Is 5:21; 29:13-16). The prominence of wisdom themes in Isaiah led Fichtner to argue that Isaiah was once a sage who had turned against the wise upon recognition that their wisdom had departed from its roots in the law (cf. Is 6:9-10). Few scholars go so far as Fichtner, recognizing the degree of speculation involved in so identifying Isaiah with the wise, but a number of scholars (e.g., Whedbee; Jensen) do nonetheless acknowledge the significance of wisdom language for Isaiah, particularly when addressing those who claim to be wise (cf. Is 10:13; 19:11-12; 44:25; 47:10).

J. Whedbee helpfully suggested some means to limit speculation as to the extent of Isaiah's dependence upon wisdom by proposing that the identification of influence ought to be restricted to those sections where there is a conjunction between wisdom form and content, pointing to the parables of Isaiah 1:2-3; 5:1-7; 28:23-28, the proverbial material in Isaiah 10:15; 29:15-16, and the "summary appraisals" in Isaiah 14:26; 28:29.

Van Leeuwen (1990, 299) argues that Isaiah's criticism of the sages reflects that of Proverbs itself: "That Isaiah used the wisdom of Proverbs to attack courtly wisdom probably means that the sages were not true to their own wisdom, or that there were conflicting factions in the court, some of which, at certain times in his lengthy career, Isaiah attacked. Unfortunately, the limited data leave uncertainty in these matters" (cf. Collins, 10). This note of caution is certainly warranted, for even the claim that Isaiah used the wisdom of Proverbs is speculative.

The presence of such material in Isaiah, however, has not convinced more careful scholars that Isaiah has been significantly influenced by the wisdom movement (see Whybray; Crenshaw). In light of the apparent ubiquity of wisdom in some form at all levels of society, it seems likely that Isaiah at least shared some degree of familiarity with wisdom and so could employ wisdom forms and language to his own ends without having to have ever himself been a sage.

3.2.2. Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Jeremiah and Ezekiel share with Isaiah their general disdain for the sages while occasionally adopting wisdom forms and language. The book of Jeremiah, in particular, recounts details of the prophet's conflict with royal advisers when seeking to guide foreign-policy response to Nebuchadnezzar (although see Jeremiah's letter to the exiles in Jer 29, at which point Zedekiah would appear to have been in agreement with his advice [see McKane 1995, 150]).

Both Jeremiah and Ezekiel employ aphorisms, perhaps most famously Ezekiel 18:2 (cf. Jer 31:29-30): "Fathers have eaten sour grapes, but the teeth of the sons have been dulled." This aphorism bears all the hallmarks of a wisdom saying, but it is quoted by the prophets to refute its teaching, for they wish to make the opposite point. Jeremiah goes so far as to offer an amended version of the proverb: "Every person who eats the sour grapes, his teeth will be dulled" (Jer 31:30). Thus, although both Jeremiah and Ezekiel employ wisdom language, they self-consciously do so in order to undermine the sages. We will examine this conflict in more detail later (see 4.1 below).

3.2.3. Hosea. The extent of Hosea's acquaintance with wisdom is not entirely clear. Hosea does draw on the natural world for some metaphors (cf. Hos 9:10, 13, 16; 10:1; 14:6; 4:16; 8:7;

10:4; see Macintosh, 129), as the sages also frequently did, but this alone is not sufficient basis for claiming any significant interaction with the sages on Hosea's part. Likewise, although his use of aphorisms does suggest at least some passing familiarity with wisdom, given the likely ubiquity of wisdom in some of its forms, this cannot be construed as indicative of any special connection to more formal wisdom or the sages who promoted it (Macintosh, 125).

Nonetheless, the final verse of Hosea does stand out for its appeal to wisdom: "Whoever is wise, let him discern these things. Whoever is discerning, let him know them. For the ways of Yahweh are straight, and the righteous walk in them, but those who are disloyal stumble in them" (Hos 14:9). Van Leeuwen (1993, 36-39) sees this final verse as evidence of the activity of a scribal redactor shaping the Book of the Twelve to function as a theodicy and overlaying the prophetic material with a decidedly wisdom agenda. However, the appeal made in this verse is not wholly foreign to Hosea, who has referred to those without wisdom (Hos 13:13) and to those without understanding (Hos 4:14). As such, this closing appeal, although clearly couched in wisdom terms, reflects the prophet's own concerns and need not be read as evidence of later redaction.

3.2.4. Amos. Numerous features of Amos have prompted scholars to identify links with wisdom of one form or another: his use of sayings introduced by sequential cardinal numbers (Amos 1—2 [see Lindblom, 202; although, the connection of these with wisdom has been refuted by Soggin, 120-21]), theological emphases, special vocabulary and rhetorical devices (such as the "woe" sayings). Although these have prompted some to speculate about Amos's links to the sages, these do not make a compelling case for any close association, as J. Soggin (120) has noted: "[A] biblical author . . . writes in his own style, and uses particular devices for expressing himself. In our case, these could incidentally have been borrowed from wisdom. But such a stylistic analogy does not turn a writing into a text dependent upon wisdom" (cf. Crenshaw 1969, 134; Whybray, 188).

3.2.5. Jonah, Habakkuk, Malachi. Any unequivocal connection with wisdom in the remaining Minor Prophets is difficult to establish. Some have suggested that Jonah and Habakkuk are in some way connected with wisdom because both are understood to address the problem of theodicy on some level (see Crenshaw 1998, 29; Gowan). Furthermore, some scholars suggest that Jonah is a māšāl ("proverb" [although, the Hebrew term describes a more diverse range of literary forms than does the English "proverb," including "parable"]) and as such is of a form more at home among the sages than the prophets (Landes; Crenshaw 1998, 29). The appearance of disputations, particularly in Malachi, has prompted some to suggest wisdom influence also in that book. Yet the appeals to such features overlook the significant differences between the prophetic use of disputation and those found elsewhere (see Crenshaw 1969, 134). In the end, it is difficult to claim any more than a conscious borrowing of wisdom language and forms by the prophets, who turned these facets of wisdom to their own ends and employed them in the service of their own prophetic, not sagacious, message.

4. The Relationship Between Prophets and Sages.

Any discussion of the nature of the relationship between sages and prophets turns not only on the definition of wisdom and prophecy but also on the identity of the sages and prophets themselves. Whybray, for example, has argued that there never was, in ancient Israel, a class of specialists known as "the wise," and so the notion of conflict between prophets and the wise "falls to the ground" (Whybray, 193). Most scholars, however, think that Whybray goes too far in totally rejecting the existence of an identifiable class of wisdom professionals (e.g., Blenkinsopp, 11; Shields, 43-45).

There is evidence that both prophets and sages occupied positions in the royal courts of Israel and other nations, testifying to their "specialist" status (e.g., 2 Sam 24:11; cf. 2 Sam 16:23). Aside from official court positions, there are also reports of prophets seeking to influence the decisions made by the king. As such, they would have found themselves competing with royal counselors whose advice would have been founded more on principles of wisdom than immediate divine revelation (see 2 Chron 25:14-24; and perhaps the ultimate example is 1 Kings 11:29-39, where the prophet Ahijah opposes Solomon himself).

In light of the competing interest of prophets and sages in the royal court, it is unsurprising to find indications throughout the OT of enmity between the two groups. W. McKane (1965, 48), for one, concluded that "there was constant tension between [prophets and sages] since the wise men did not permit themselves the luxury of religious or ethical assumptions, their task being to advise the king on matters of statecraft."

4.1. Prophets' Attitudes Toward the Sages. The prophets whose words have been recorded in the OT clearly did not have high regard for the sages. Van Leeuwen (1990, 306) notes that "the sages (hkmym) explicitly mentioned in the prophetic texts are almost always opponents of the prophets. Such wise men, as domestic or foreign royal courtiers, stand opposed to the prophets with regard to justice and political guidance. These sages are not false per se but only as they forget the human limits of wisdom (according to the criteria from Proverbs) and defy the word of Yahweh's messengers" (cf. Scott, 3; McKane 1995, 142; 1965, 65-91; Dunn, 7).

Although it has been common to identify this conflict as arising out of the distinction between "sacred" prophecy and "secular" wisdom (e.g., McKane 1965), the reality appears somewhat more nuanced than is reflected in this disjunction. Wisdom cannot be depicted in monolithic terms, and the criticisms leveled against the sages by the prophets reflect warnings already present within the book of Proverbs (see Van Leeuwen 1990, 300). As such, the prophets are critical of those who deviate from the law, including priests and other prophets, not merely those who employed a form of wisdom that neglected God's revealed will. So their condemnation is not reserved merely for the royal advisers but rather is directed at all in leadership roles who would flout God's law.

4.1.1. Isaiah. Isaiah's antagonism toward the wise is readily apparent in many passages (e.g., Is 5:21; 19:11-12; 29:14; 40:20; 44:25; 47:10). Of these, Isaiah 19:11-12 is particularly significant because of the explicit link that it makes between wisdom and the counselors who functioned in the royal court: "The princes of Zoan are nothing but fools; the wisdom of the advisors [y'š] of Pharaoh is stupid advice [ʿēšā]. How can you say to Pharaoh, 'I am one of the sages, a son of kings of old'? So where are your sages who can tell you and who know what General Yahweh has planned [y'š] against Egypt?" Isaiah notes that the diplomatic plans (ʿēšā [cf.

Is 30:1-5; 31:1-3]) of the royal counselors consistently elevated human wisdom over Yahweh's plan, and so their plans would be thwarted (cf. Prov 19:21; 21:30-31; see Van Leeuwen 1990, 302). For Isaiah, true wisdom lies with God alone, and those who are truly wise derive their wisdom from him. This is apparent in the descriptions of the ideal coming ruler (Is 9:6; 11:1-9; cf. Is 33:6).

4.1.2. Jeremiah. One characteristic of Jeremiah is the frequent opposition that he faces as he seeks to fulfill his commission to speak God's word to God's people. This opposition sometimes comes from the wise or those described as advisers (see Jer 18:18-23 [particularly note v. 23, which refers to the plans of his opponents using the plural of 'ēšā]), although Jeremiah faced opposition from all quarters, including from other prophets. Jeremiah in turn announced God's opposition to the sages and advisers of his day, as can be seen in numerous passages (e.g., Jer 4:22; 8:8-9; 18:18; 49:7; 50:35; 51:57). As with Isaiah, the only wisdom viewed positively by Jeremiah was God's own wisdom (see Jer 10:12; 51:15).

4.1.3. Ezekiel. Ezekiel has less to say about sages or advisers than does either Isaiah or Jeremiah, but all that he says is negative. The most exalted wisdom language is reserved for the ruler of Tyre (Ezek 28), who stands in opposition to God and whose wisdom and other virtues are thus ultimately abhorrent. Aside from this, Ezekiel only makes brief mention of those who give evil advice: "The Spirit lifted me and brought me to the eastern gate of the House of Yahweh, which faces eastward. There were twenty-five men at the entrance to the gate, and among them were Ya'azaniah son of Azzur and Pelatiah son of Benaiah, leaders of the people. Then he said to me, 'Son of man, these are the men who plot iniquity and who advise [y'š] evil advice ['ēšā] in this city'" (Ezek 11:1-2 [cf. Ezek 7:26]).

4.1.4. Summary. The prophets unequivocally condemn the sages and their wisdom for their departure from true wisdom, which was founded in obedience to God's law—a feature of wisdom reflected in Proverbs but absent from the sages, whom the prophets opposed. This condemnation, however, does not extend to all wisdom, for they recognized that true wisdom comes from God and is expressed in obedience to him. Furthermore, although the prophetic condemnation of the sages is unrelenting, it is not exclusively directed at the sages, for the prophets are also critical of priests and even other prophets.

4.2. Sages' Attitudes Toward the Prophets.

There appears to be little direct information regarding the attitude of the sages toward the prophets in the OT (see Scott, 3). Proverbs 29:18 could be a reference to the prophets, as it contains one of the few words frequently associated with prophecy (hāzōn ["vision"]) to be found in the Wisdom literature: "When there is no vision, the people are unchecked, but the one who keeps the law, he is happy." The parallelism of the aphorism links vision (hāzōn) with keeping the law (tôrâ) and reveals approval for both vision and obedience to the law. Proverbs 30:1; 31:1 (see 3.1.1 above) also use language more commonly associated with prophecy (and found nowhere else in the Wisdom literature of the OT). These passages, however, reveal little of the sages' attitude toward prophets or prophecy, except perhaps to indicate that some sages sought to attribute to their words an authority on par with those of the prophets.

In light of the scathing assessment of wisdom and the wise recorded in the prophets outlined above (and, indeed, throughout the remainder of the OT [see Shields, 7-20]), it might be expected that the Wisdom writings may reflect some enmity directed back toward the prophets. There is no sign of this in Proverbs, but there may be some echoes of such enmity among the words of Qohelet recorded in Ecclesiastes.

Aside from reaching conclusions that placed Qohelet in direct contradiction to the prophets (e.g., Eccles 1:10; cf. Eccles 3:14-15, where he claims that there is nothing new, whereas the prophets consistently taught that God was about to do something new [cf. Is 42:9; 43:19]), some of his words may represent a direct attack on the prophets and other religious officials in ancient Israel. In Ecclesiastes 8:5b-7 Qohelet says: "[Regarding the] appropriate time and a just outcome, a wise heart knows that for every matter there is an appropriate time and a just outcome, . . . that no one knows what will happen; and that when something will happen no one can tell." Here and elsewhere (cf. Eccles 3:22; 6:10-12) Qohelet affirms that no one knows what will take place in the future, whereas the prophets consistently announce the impending arrival of God's judgment or other events.

In Ecclesiastes 5:1-7 Qohelet condemns those who utter many words in God's house. Although the reference is somewhat ambiguous, it could be that those who spoke many words in God's house were either priests or prophets. Given that Qohelet also makes reference twice in this passage to dreams, and that dreams in the OT are frequently modes of divine revelation (e.g., Gen 20:3; Num 12:6; 1 Sam 28:6), it is quite possible that he directs his words at the prophets who expounded their visions in the precincts of the temple.

Finally, Qohelet may have sought to belittle prophecy by seeking to imply wisdom's superiority, at least in some ways. For example, prophets were known to announce the destruction of entire cities (e.g., Jer 26 [see McKane 1995, 144-45]; Mic 3:12). Qohelet, on the other hand, presents a parabolic tale of a small, relatively defenseless town faced with destruction that could have been saved had the rulers of that town listened to a poor sage (Eccles 9:14-15). Although prophets may have announced destruction, a sage could offer salvation in the face of overwhelming odds.

5. Conclusion.

True prophecy and wisdom are rooted in exposition and application of God's law to God's people. Prophecy proclaimed divine application, whereas wisdom appealed to the human intellect shaped and guided by the fear of Yahweh. In this form both shared the same authority and goal. Furthermore, wisdom's reach extended through all levels of society, such that prophets could readily employ the stylistic characteristics of wisdom when expounding their message. Yet the sages in Israel consistently departed from this ideal and found themselves in conflict with the prophets, who pronounced God's condemnation of the wise.

PROPHETIC VISIONS. See VISIONS, PROPHETIC.

PROPHETS IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

The OT prophets are used in a variety of ways in the NT. The most obvious is direct quotation, and the overwhelming favorite in this regard is Isaiah. According to the fourth edition of the United Bible Societies' Greek New Testament, the NT quotes sixty-five different verses of Isaiah, compared with only six verses from each of Jeremiah, Hosea and Zechariah, five from Joel and Amos, three from Ezekiel, Habakkuk and Malachi, and one each from Daniel, Jonah and Haggai. It is no wonder that Isaiah has sometimes been designated as the "Fifth Gospel" (Sawyer). On the other hand, if we compare the United Bible Societies' list of "allusions and verbal parallels," we find a rather different story. Isaiah is still on top, with around 210, but the figures for Ezekiel (130), Jeremiah (95) and Daniel (70) are more comparable. Indeed, if we were interested in the concentration of allusions taken from a particular book, Daniel would be the winner (followed by Joel).

This raises an important question about the relative importance of quotations, allusions and themes. For example, in Mark's Gospel (generally thought to be the earliest), if we focus on explicit quotation, then Jesus identified with the "rejected but precious stone" of Psalm 118:22-23 (Mk 12:10-11), the "smitten shepherd" of Zechariah 13:7 (Mk 14:27) and the "forsaken sufferer" of Psalm 22:1 (Mk 15:34), but he did not identify with the "suffering servant" of Isaiah 53 (Hooker), however "obvious" that identification has seemed to later Christians. On the other hand, scholars such as J. Marcus and R. Watts have argued that Mark's opening quotation of Isaiah 40:3 ("Prepare the way of the Lord") sets the scene for understanding Jesus' ministry as a fulfillment of Isaiah's promise of a new *exodus (Is 40—55). In support, they note that there are explicit quotations of Isaiah in Mark 4:12; 7:6-7; 11:17, and the teaching on discipleship in Mark 8—10 focuses on following Jesus "on the way" (Mk 8:3, 27; 9:33, 34; 10:52), a reference back to "the way" of Isaiah 40:3. In the light of this Isaiah background, it could be argued that when Jesus says that he will give his life as a "ransom for many" (Mk 10:45), and that his blood will be "poured out for many" (Mk 14:24), he is referring to Isaiah 53:11-12, despite the fact that there are only a few words in common: "The righteous one, my servant, shall make many righteous, and he shall bear their iniquities. Therefore I will allot him a portion with the great, and he shall divide the spoil with the strong; because he poured out himself to death, and was numbered with the transgressors; yet he bore the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors" (Is 53:11-12) (see Servant of Yahweh).

Whatever view one takes on this debate, it is clear that Isaiah deserves pride of place, and thus it is the starting point for this article, followed by shorter sections on Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel and the Book of the Twelve.

1. Isaiah
2. Jeremiah
3. Ezekiel
4. Daniel
5. The Book of the Twelve
6. Conclusion

1. Isaiah.

It may come as a surprise that the majority of the sixty-five verses of Isaiah quoted in the NT are applied not to Jesus but rather to the identity of the people of God (R. Hays therefore calls it “ecclesiological” rather than “christological” interpretation). For Paul, the central issue is the inclusion of the Gentiles, and he assumes that the salvation oracles in Isaiah refer to the church, while the judgment oracles refer to Israel’s current unbelief. An important exception to this occurs in Romans 11, where the promise that God will redeem “those in Jacob who turn from transgression” (Is 59:20-21) is taken as evidence that Israel’s current unbelief cannot be permanent, since God’s word is irrevocable (Rom 11:26-27).

1.1. Israel’s Blindness and Unbelief. Following his vision of God in the temple, Isaiah is told to preach to a people whose eyes and ears are closed and whose minds are dull (Is 6:9-10). This is quoted in the Gospels to explain why outsiders cannot understand Jesus’ parables (Mt 13:13-14; Mk 4:12; Lk 8:10) or why the crowds are not responding to his “signs” (Jn 12:40). Luke’s use is particularly interesting because he includes only the phrase “looking they may not perceive, and listening they may not understand” in the Gospel passage but has Paul give the quotation in full at the end of the book of Acts, followed by the statement “Let it be known to you then that this salvation of God has been sent to the Gentiles; they will listen” (Acts 28:28). Whatever Jesus may have originally said, Luke thinks that the text also applies to the rejection of Paul’s preaching, with the positive consequence that the Gentiles will be more receptive.

Because the people are blind, they stumble and fall. There are several sayings in the Gospels about stumbling (Mt 18:8-9; Jn 11:9-10), but they are not linked with Scripture. However, Jesus is said to have identified with the “rejected stone” of Psalm 118:22-23, and this probably is what led the early church to Isaiah 8:14 (“He will become a sanctuary, a stone one strikes against; for both houses of Israel he will become a rock one stumbles over”). The author of 1 Peter understands the text to apply to anyone who does not believe in Jesus (1 Pet 2:8), but Paul applies it more specifically to unbelieving Israel (Rom 9:33).

Isaiah 29 is also an important text for explaining Israel’s unbelief. Both Matthew and Mark record Jesus accusing the Pharisees of hypocrisy by quoting the LXX of Isaiah 29:13: “This people honors me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me; in vain do they worship me, teaching human precepts as doctrines” (Mk 7:6-7). Since the Hebrew text says nothing about teaching doctrines but reads, “their worship of me is a human commandment learned by rote” (NRSV), some scholars deduce that Jesus could not have said this. Others suggest that Mark has simply replaced whatever Jesus originally said with the words of the LXX for the benefit of his Greek-speaking readers. Whichever is correct, Paul finds in the same chapter of Isaiah a statement that can be applied to Israel’s present unbelief (“God gave them a sluggish spirit, eyes that would not see and ears that would not hear, down to this very day” [Rom 11:8, citing Is 29:10]), as well as the more general proposition that God destroys “the wisdom of the wise” and thwarts the “the discernment of the discerning” (1 Cor 1:19, citing Is 29:14).

1.2. Inclusion of the Gentiles. Although the inclusion of the Gentiles (“nations”) is present in Isaiah, it certainly is not its major theme. However, in the NT it is one of the most important topics to be discussed. Thus, Matthew understands the promise of better times for the “land of Zebulun and the land of Naphatali” (cf. Is 9:1-2) to be fulfilled when Jesus settles in Galilee, no doubt prompted by the expression “Galilee of the nations” (Mt 4:15-16). Mark has Jesus accusing the temple authorities of making the temple a “den of robbers” (cf. Jer 7:11), whereas it should be a “house of prayer for all the nations” (Mk 11:17, citing Is 56:7). But the key text is Isaiah 49:6, where the mission of the servant is to be a “light to the nations” so that God’s salvation “may reach to the end of the earth.” The verse is alluded to in Luke 2:32 and Acts 26:23 (and perhaps the “light of the world” sayings in John), where it is applied to Jesus, but it is explicitly quoted in Acts 13:47, where it is applied to Paul. This might explain why Paul never explicitly applies Isaiah 53 to Jesus; he thinks of himself as the servant (Gal 1:15, alluding to Is 49:1) who brings the gospel message to the Gentiles (Rom 15:20-21, quoting Is 52:15).

The inclusion of the Gentiles forced the early church to wrestle with the question of whether they should be required to be circumcised and keep the law (Acts 15). Paul's arguments focus on the Abraham narratives, but he also finds support in verses that speak of "faith." The key text is Habakkuk 2:4, but he also draws on Isaiah 28:16; 65:1-2. Isaiah 8:14 speaks of a "stone" that causes people to stumble, but Isaiah 28:16 speaks positively of a "precious cornerstone" in which one can trust. Paul and the author of 1 Peter bring the two texts together (the link is already present in Is 8:14 LXX, which begins "and if you trust in him") to show that unbelief leads to destruction, but faith or trust leads to salvation (Rom 9:33; 1 Pet 2:6).

Paul's use of Isaiah 65:1-2 in Romans 10:20-21 is somewhat controversial. The text indicts Israel for walking in ways that are not good, neither seeking God nor calling on his name. The pathos is expressed in the words "I held out my hands all day long to a rebellious people." However, Paul splits the passage so that the first verse applies to Gentiles ("I have been found by those who did not seek me; I have shown myself to those who did not ask for me"), while the "rebellious" clause is specifically applied to unbelieving Israel ("But of Israel he says"). Some regard this as quite arbitrary, but J. Wagner defends it on two grounds (Wagner, 205-17). First, there clearly is a tension between the two verses: Isaiah 65:1 speaks of God being found by those who were not seeking, but Isaiah 65:2 suggests that God's offer was refused. This is somewhat alleviated by the NRSV ("I was ready to be sought . . . to be found"), but the NIV preserves the tension ("I revealed myself . . . I was found"). Second, although the overall sense makes it clear that both verses are talking about Israel, they do in fact use different words for "people," one of which the LXX translates as ethnos, Paul's usual word (in the plural) for referring to Gentiles.

In Paul's quotation of Isaiah 11:10 in Romans 15:12, the particular rendering of the LXX plays an even greater role. According to the Hebrew text, Isaiah 11:10 says, "On that day the root of Jesse shall stand as a signal to the peoples; the nations shall inquire of him, and his dwelling shall be glorious." In this case, Paul does not play on the difference between "peoples" and "nations" but follows the LXX rendering of the verb for "inquire" (Heb dāraś) with elpizō ("to hope"). He is thus able to support the inclusion of the Gentiles with a text that reads, "The root of Jesse shall come, he who rises to rule the Gentiles; in him shall the Gentiles hope" (Rom 15:12).

1.3. Redeemer Figures Applied to Jesus. It is not clear how the various "redeemer" figures in Isaiah are related. Isaiah 9 speaks of a future Davidic king who will establish justice and righteousness on earth and will be called "Wonderful Counselor, Mighty God, Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace" (Is 9:6). Despite the familiarity of this verse from Christmas liturgies, it is never applied to Jesus in the NT (Lk 1:32 comes closest). Establishing justice is also central to the servant's role in Isaiah 42:1-4, but this is somewhat different from the figure in Isaiah 53, who had "no form or majesty that we should look at him" (Is 53:2) and was "despised and rejected" (Is 53:3). Talk of victory is muted ("Out of his anguish he shall see light; he shall find satisfaction through his knowledge" [Is 53:11a]), although his suffering is said to benefit others (Is 53:5, 11b-12). A further figure is described in Isaiah 61, who is anointed with the Spirit (like the servant in Is 42) and whose mission is to bring good news to the oppressed and announce the vengeance of God (Is 61:1-2). What does the NT make of these various figures?

1.3.1. Jesus as Anointed Prophet. If Jesus saw himself fulfilling any of these figures, most scholars think that the anointed prophet of Isaiah 61 is the most likely one. Indeed, Luke has Jesus reading this very passage in the synagogue and declaring, "Today this scripture has been fulfilled in your hearing" (Lk 4:21). There are problems with accepting this at face value, since the reading not only follows the LXX by speaking of "recovery of sight to the blind" instead of "release to the captives," but also incorporates a snippet of Isaiah 58:6 ("let the oppressed go free"). It is therefore highly unlikely that Jesus could have read from a Hebrew scroll that said what Luke reports. C. Kimble's answer is that Luke has combined the reading with the sermon that would have followed, deducing that Jesus saw himself not only as the herald of salvation from Isaiah 61:1-2, but also as the agent who would bring it about from Isaiah 58:6 (Kimble, 110).

Alternatively, Luke may have deduced that Jesus must have read/preached from this passage at some point in his ministry, since he clearly alludes to it in his reply to John the Baptist. John wants to know whether Jesus is “the one who is to come, or are we to wait for another?” (Lk 7:22). Jesus’ reply combines phrases from Isaiah 29:18 (“the blind receive their sight”), Isaiah 35:5-6 (“the lame walk . . . the deaf hear”), Isaiah 26:19 (“the dead are raised”) and Isaiah 61:1 (“the poor have good news brought to them”). Although some of these phrases could come from other texts (e.g., Ps 146:8), it does suggest that Jesus associated the messianic signs with the anointed prophet in Isaiah 61 (see Messiah).

1.3.2. Jesus as Suffering Servant. Although it has been questioned whether Jesus specifically identified with the figure in Isaiah 53, the chapter is quoted in Matthew 8:17; Luke 22:37; John 12:38; Acts 8:32-33; Romans 10:16; 1 Peter 2:22-25. However, only in the last text is it explicitly used to explain the meaning of Jesus’ death. As table 1 shows, the author of 1 Peter has skillfully taken phrases from Isaiah 53:4, 5, 6, 7, 9, 12 and woven them into his own salvific statement.

Isaiah 53:4, 5, 6, 7, 9, 12	1 Peter 2:22-25
(A) surely he has borne our infirmities (B) upon him was the punishment that made us whole, and by his bruises we are healed (C) all we like sheep have gone astray (D) he was oppressed, and he was afflicted, yet he did not open his mouth	(E) He committed no sin, and no deceit was found in his mouth. (D) When he was abused, he did not return abuse; when he suffered, he did not threaten; (F) but he entrusted himself [paradidōmi] to the one who judges justly.
(E) he had done no violence, and there was no deceit in his mouth (F) he poured out [paradidōmi] himself to death (G) he bore the sin of many	(A, G) He himself bore our sins in his body on the cross, so that, free from sins, we might live for righteousness; (B) by his wounds you have been healed. (C) For you were going astray like sheep, but now you have returned to the shepherd and guardian of your souls.

Table 1. Isaiah 53 and 1 Peter 2

Acts 8:32-33 belongs to the passage where Philip meets a court official returning home to Ethiopia after worshipping in Jerusalem. The man is in his chariot reading from Isaiah 53 and wishes to know whether Isaiah is referring to himself or someone else. We are not told Philip’s answer, but the text gives a summary statement that “starting with this scripture, he proclaimed to him the good news about Jesus” (Acts 8:35). This could mean that Philip showed the man how Isaiah 53 applied to Jesus, but equally it could mean that he moved from this passage to other passages in order to proclaim the gospel to him. The summary statement in Luke 24:44 (“everything written about me in the law of Moses, the prophets, and the psalms must be fulfilled”) perhaps favors the latter.

Both John and Romans quote Isaiah 53:1 (“Who has believed our message?” [NIV]) in support of Israel’s unbelief, but it is not related to Jesus’ death. Matthew follows the Hebrew text of Isaiah 53:4 (“he has borne our infirmities and carried our diseases”) to support Jesus’ healing ministry, whereas 1 Peter follows the LXX (“he himself bore our sins”). This leaves Luke 22:37, where Jesus tells the disciples that he will be “counted among the lawless,” four words that appear to come from Isaiah 53:12. However, there is no indication that Jesus is instructing the disciples about the theological meaning of his death; he is simply indicating that like the servant, he will die an ignominious death.

1.4. An Isaianic Framework? As we noted above, some scholars believe that the influence of Isaiah in the NT is not simply through quotation and allusion but provides an overarching framework for understanding the entire salvation event. Thus, D. Pao notes that Isaiah 40 acts as a prologue to the themes of Isaiah 40—55: release from captivity, proclamation of the word of God, conquest of enemies, giving of the Spirit, and God teaching his people. He suggests that all of these themes are found in Luke-Acts, and that this, along with the evidence of the explicit quotations (Lk 3:4-5; 4:18-19; 8:10; 19:46; 22:37; Acts 8:32-33; 13:34, 47; 28:26-27), shows that Luke understands the entire Christ event as a fulfillment of Isaiah’s “new exodus” theme. On the other hand, P. Mallen thinks that the “dual mission of the servant” offers a better framework, since it can explain Luke’s emphasis on Gentiles (which is present in the “new exodus” theme but hardly prominent), as well as the fact that the servant imagery is applied both to Jesus and to his followers. This mirrors the oscillation between individual and corporate characteristics in Isaiah’s servant figure. K. Litwak agrees that Isaiah is an important influence but denies that it is being used as a framework; the psalms, for example, are just as important.

2. Jeremiah.

We have already noted the snippet of Jeremiah 7:11 (“den of robbers”) that is included in Jesus’ accusation against the temple authorities. It is possible that this is nothing more than a colorful phrase, but the chapter is concerned with those who think that the temple will protect them from judgment (Jer 7:4). If they amend their ways, God promises to dwell with them (Jer 7:3, 7), and it is possible that Jesus wishes to evoke this background. According to T. Berkley, Paul draws on Jeremiah 7:9 (“Will you steal, murder, commit adultery, swear falsely, make offerings to Baal, and go after other gods that you have not known?”) when he indicts Jewish teachers of hypocrisy in Romans 2:17-23. Paul also draws on Jeremiah 9:24 to exhort the Corinthians to boast not in their own accomplishments but only in the Lord (1 Cor 1:31; 2 Cor 10:17). The reference is highly abbreviated (“Let the one who boasts, boast in the Lord”), whereas Jeremiah 9:24 says, “Do not let the wise boast in their wisdom, do not let the mighty boast in their might, do not let the wealthy boast in their wealth; but let those who boast boast in this, that they understand and know me, that I am the LORD.”

The most significant use of Jeremiah in the NT is the “new *covenant” passage of Jeremiah 31, where God indicts Israel for breaking the covenant and promises a time when the *law will be written “on their hearts” (Jer 31:33) and their sins and iniquities will be forgiven (Jer 31:34). This probably lies behind the language of “new covenant” in the Paul/Luke version of the Last Supper (1 Cor 11:25; Lk 22:20) and texts such as 2 Corinthians 3:6 (“who has made us competent to be ministers of a new covenant”) and Romans 11:27 (“and this is my covenant with them, when I take away their sins”). However, only in Hebrews 8:8-12; 10:16-17 is the passage explicitly quoted, the former being the longest quotation in the NT (131 Greek words). The author of Hebrews does not immediately explain the relevance of the quotation, except to say that talk of a “new covenant” implies that the previous one is “obsolete” (Heb 8:13). What he wants to say is that this promised forgiveness comes through the sacrificial death of Christ, but before he can do that, he needs to establish that “without the shedding of blood there is no forgiveness of sins” (Heb 9:22), and that “it is impossible for the blood of bulls and goats to take away sins” (Heb 10:4). Having done that, he then can assert that Christ has “offered for all time a single sacrifice for sins” (Heb 10:12), and so the prophecy of Jeremiah 31 has been fulfilled.

3. Ezekiel.

There are brief quotations of Ezekiel in 2 Corinthians 6:16-17, and the “good shepherd” discourse in John 10 owes something to Ezekiel 34, but the extensive use of Ezekiel in the book of Revelation is what stands out. Over half of the 130 or so allusions to Ezekiel in the NT are from Revelation, and many scholars have observed how a number of the visionary descriptions occur in the same order in both books (see table 2).

Ezekiel	Allusions	Revelation
1	God on his throne; multi-faced creatures; “full of eyes”	4
9—10	Saints protected by a seal; burning coals hurled to the earth	7—8
16; 23	Harlot city left desolate and naked; destroyed by fire	17
26—27	Lament over the fallen city; list of luxury imports; people throw dust on their heads; music heard no more	18
37—48	Dry bones come to life; battle with Gog of Magog; new Jerusalem; river of life; tree with healing leaves	20—22

Table 2. Ezekiel Allusions in Revelation

M. Goulder attempted to put the two books into a one-to-one correspondence, but there are too many exceptions for that to be plausible. Nevertheless, there is good evidence to suggest that John's final vision of the new Jerusalem has been substantially modeled on Ezekiel, though with some interesting modifications. G. K. Beale is more impressed with the parallels and argues that Revelation 20–22 represents the true fulfillment of Ezekiel, but other scholars are more inclined to speak of John's transformation of Ezekiel (see table 3).

Ezekiel		Revelation
37:10	Revival of dry bones	20:4	Saints come to life
37:21	Israel reunited under Davidic king	20:4	Saints rule with Christ for one thousand years
38:2-16	Gog of Magog roused for battle	20:8	Gog and Magog roused for battle
38:22	Gog of Magog destroyed by fire	20:9	Gog and Magog destroyed by fire
39:4	Birds invited to gorge on corpses	19:21	Birds invited to gorge on corpses
40:2	Ezekiel transported in spirit to high mountain	21:10	John transported in spirit to high mountain

4. Daniel.

Discussion of the use of Daniel in the NT has focused on the way the Gospel writers present Jesus as speaking about a “son of man” who comes “in/with clouds” in “power and glory” (Mk 13:26; 14:62 pars.). On its own, one would assume that Jesus is speaking about someone else, but since he frequently has referred to himself as “son of man,” most scholars think this is a self-reference. But with what meaning? Traditionally, it has been taken as a reference to his “second coming,” but this clearly is not Daniel’s meaning, since the figure is coming to God, not from God (Dan 7:13-14). So either the Gospels (or Jesus) are substantially changing the meaning of Daniel or the traditional interpretation is incorrect. N. T. Wright is one scholar who has championed the latter, arguing that the text is not to be taken literally, as if Jesus needed a mode of transport to get from heaven to earth; it is a metaphor (Wright, 510-19). What the visionary language of Daniel is claiming is that the persecuted saints will be vindicated (Dan 7:18), and that is what Jesus is claiming for himself.

The other major use of Daniel in the NT is in Revelation. The book opens with the statement that a “revelation” of “what must soon take place” has been given to John, and this is generally recognized as an allusion to Daniel 2:28: “There is a God in heaven who reveals mysteries, and he has disclosed to King Nebuchadnezzar what will happen at the end of days.” The particular Greek phrase for “what will happen” (ha dei genesthai) occurs at pivotal points in Revelation (Rev 1:1, 19; 4:1; 22:6) and clearly is important to John. The “son of man” text (Dan 7:13) is quoted in Revelation 1:7, but the chapter has also supplied images for John’s vision of the risen Christ (Rev 1:12-18), God on his throne (Rev 4–5), the beast that rises from the sea, which combines the traits of Daniel’s four beasts (Rev 13:1-10) and the final judgment scene (Rev 20:11-12).

5. The Book of the Twelve.

It is likely that the NT authors saw the twelve Minor Prophets as a single book (the Book of the *Twelve), though Hosea, Joel and Jonah are mentioned by name. There are significant quotations from Joel (Acts 2:17-21; Rom 10:13), Amos (Acts 7:42-43; 15:16-17) and Malachi (Mk 1:2; Mt 11:10; Lk 7:27), but here I will restrict comments to Zechariah, Hosea and Habakkuk.

5.1. Zechariah. A case can be made that Jesus had Zechariah 9:9 in mind when he chose to ride into Jerusalem on a donkey (made explicit in Mt 21:5; Jn 12:15), and that he saw the desertion by his disciples in the light of Zechariah 13:7 (Mk 14:27). This appears to have led the early church to see much of Jesus' passion in the light of Zechariah 9—14. Thus, Matthew suggests that the betrayal of Jesus for thirty pieces of silver fulfills Zechariah 11:12-13, even though the reference to Jeremiah ("potter's field") is a little confusing (Mt 27:9-10). John sees the onlookers at the crucifixion as a fulfillment of Zechariah 12:10 ("look on the one whom they have pierced" [Jn 19:37]), a text that also appears in Matthew 24:30; Revelation 1:7. What is interesting about these two references is that both of them combine the Zechariah reference with Daniel's "son of man" text. Some argue that it is precisely Jesus' combination of the texts in Matthew 24:30 that led to the other developments, but since it is not found in Mark's version of the same text (Mk 13:26), others think that it is part of the same tendency to align more and more of Jesus' passion with Zechariah 9—14.

5.2. Hosea. There are six quotations from Hosea in the NT. Hosea 1:10 and Hosea 2:23 are combined in Romans 9:25-26 to show that God can change "not my people" into "my people." Hosea is referring to the unification of Israel, but Paul understands the text as a reference to the inclusion of the Gentiles, perhaps because the idolatrous Israelites had effectively become like Gentiles. He also draws on Hosea 13:14 in 1 Corinthians 15:55 to argue that death has been defeated through Christ's resurrection. This is some distance from Hosea's meaning, and it may be that the quotation that precedes it (Is 25:8) is the supporting text and the words from Hosea are used to fill out the meaning. There are three quotations in the Gospels: the reference to Jesus's departure and return from Egypt (Mt 2:15, quoting Hos 11:1); the priority of mercy over *sacrifice (Mt 9:13; 12:7, quoting Hos 6:6); and the severity of times to come (Lk 23:30, quoting Hos 10:8; cf. Rev 6:16). It has also been argued that the most likely text behind Paul's statement that Christ's resurrection on the third day is according to Scripture (1 Cor 15:3) is Hosea 6:2 ("After two days he will revive us; on the third day he will raise us up, that we may live before him"). However, the contexts are very different, and it is more likely that Paul is referring to the general theme of vindication in Scripture rather than a specific text.

5.3. Habakkuk. Habakkuk 1:5 is quoted in Acts 13:41, and Habakkuk 2:3-4 in Hebrews 10:37-38, but it is the use of Habakkuk 2:4 by Paul that has attracted most attention. In particular, Paul follows the quotation of Habakkuk 2:4 in Galatians 3:11 with the assertion that "the law does not rest on faith," which suggests that he understands the prophet's reference to "faithfulness" as "faith in Christ" rather than obedience to the law. This raises the question of whether Paul has simply imposed his doctrine of justification on the ancient text. F. Watson thinks not, arguing that the "faithfulness" required of Habakkuk is because the vision concerns the end and awaits an inspired interpreter (Watson, 127-64). Paul sees himself as that interpreter and can now offer the clarity that was denied to Habakkuk. However, when Paul quotes the text in Romans 1:17, it is immediately followed by a long section on the importance of obeying the law (Rom 1:18-2:29). R. Hays argues that Romans is not primarily about salvation (justification of the sinner) but rather theodicy (justification of God's ways), and this is why Paul quotes the Habakkuk text; it is the locus classicus for the theme in the OT (Hays, 34-44). Watson, however, thinks that the argument of Romans is basically the same as Galatians, the critique of obeying the law coming later in Romans 3.

6. Conclusion.

It is evident that the OT prophets are used in a variety of ways in the NT. It has often been assumed that this is to show that Jesus is the fulfillment of the prophets. However, relatively few texts are directly applied to him. The majority of texts are applied to the events that followed, particularly the birth of the church, the inclusion of the Gentiles, the present unbelief of Israel and future salvation. Of course, all these events are dependent on the life, death and resurrection of Jesus, and so it is not incorrect to describe it as "christological" or "messianic" interpretation. However, it is precisely because the NT authors discovered that the prophets "spoke" to so many of their concerns that such headings can be misleading. Paul can even suggest that Isaiah 28:11-12 ("with stammering lip and with alien tongue he will speak to this people") is directly relevant to the issue of speaking in tongues (1 Cor 14:21). And 2 Timothy 3:16 is often quoted in discussions about the inspiration of Scripture, but the thrust of the passage is primarily about function and offers a good summary of the use of the prophets in the NT: "All scripture is inspired by God and is useful for teaching, for reproof, for correction, and for training in righteousness, so that everyone who belongs to God may be proficient, equipped for every good work."

REMNANT

The prophetic writings of the eighth through fourth centuries BC portray descriptions of historical events in which the future existence of a distinct ethnic and geopolitical people named “Israel”* was often in question (e.g., aggression and destruction of Samaria and the northern kingdom in 734 BC and 722 BC, the threat against Jerusalem in 701 BC, and subsequent incursions against and deportations of Judeans in 605, 597, 586 and 581 BC) (see Israelite History). As the threat of either slavery or pogrom from other surrounding nations such as the Neo-Assyrian, Neo-Babylonian and Persian Empires was continually in the purview of the northern and southern kingdoms, the prophetic figures associated with Israel and Judah interpreted the concept of “remnant” both in negative and positive manners. There are five Hebrew lexemes that provide a semantic range associated with a “remnant theology” (ʿhr [NIDOTTE 1:360-62; TDOT 1:207-12]; ytr [NIDOTTE 2:571-74; TDOT 6:482-91]; plṭ [NIDOTTE 3:621-26; TDOT 11:551-66]; śrd [NIDOTTE 3:1271-72; TDOT 14:215-18]; šʾr [NIDOTTE 4:11-17; TDOT 14:272-86]); the corresponding Greek lexemes in the LXX are leimma, hypoleimma, loipos and kataloipos. Beyond the lexical material, the idea of a remnant people can also be adduced through conceptual developments. The conceptualization of a people who are “left behind” has multiple connotative values that may range from positive or negative to suprahistorical or eschatological. The concept of remnant is directly associated with the various historical events that caused those in Israel and Judah to reinterpret who they were as a people of Yahweh.

Depending on the approach taken, theological or strictly historical, the answer to the question of how the understanding of “remnant” originated and developed will differ accordingly. Concerning the former, the first explicit occurrence of the remnant motif is found in Genesis 7:23: “He [God] wiped out everything that was on the face of the ground, from humanity and animals to creeping things and birds of the sky. They were wiped away from the earth. Only Noah was left [wayiṣṣāʾer], and those with him in the ark” (see Elliott, 723). Since this is the first appearance of the remnant motif in the canon of the HB set in the context of the primeval flood story, it is curious that the first literary occurrence of this topos in the ancient Near East is found in another Sumerian flood story from the third millennium (ANET 42-44). Although the observation that this idea occurs early in the “biblical history” of Israel demonstrates its importance to the meta-narrative of a more comprehensive biblical theology of “remnant groups” (Rendtorff, 265-79), our concern will be with the prophetic literature and how this literary corpus takes up the remnant topos as a response to the various historical events that shaped the history and self-identity of Israel/Judah.

6. Conclusion

1. The Historical Question of Origins.

The variety of adaptations of the remnant theme in ancient Near Eastern literature (see Hasel 1980, 50-134) suggests that the concept derived from the practical concern that a people might survive a natural threat such as disease or drought or a social threat such as war or civil strife (Hasel, ISBE 5:130). Further, this topos is present in Egyptian mythological texts (e.g., “Book of the Cow of Heaven” [ANET 10-11; COS 1.24:36-37]) and Mesopotamian king lists (e.g., Sumerian King List [ANET 265-69]). The Akkadian creation story Enuma Elish (ANET 60-72, 501-3; COS 1.111:390-402) features a remnant people as well as the Syria-Palestine creation story Baal and Anath Cycle (ANET 129-42; COS 1.86:241-74). The remnant motif is also found in the Hittite “Plague Prayers” of King Muršili II (ANET 394-96; COS 1.60:156-60). These primary texts are just a sampling, and the remnant motif spans West Semitic and Mesopotamian literature genres, including hymns, myths, epics, prayers and annals. Although the Neo-Assyrian Empire employed the motif as a propagandistic military tactic to terrify conquered peoples (see Müller and Preuss; Carena), this use is a later specification of the concept as seen in the eighth-century BC prophets (Amos, Isaiah, Micah) after it was already well ingrained in the conceptual and literary milieu of the ancient Near East. The widespread dissemination across all types of Gattung suggests that the concept arose from the quite mundane desire for humanity’s survival and existence when life was jeopardized by natural threats. G. Hasel suggests that the remnant concept can be either “historical” or “eschatological,” but this may be slightly reductionistic, and, strictly speaking, the pervasive concern of the writing prophets was not so much for the eschaton as for the return from Babylonian exile. Instead, we can observe in the literature, whether in the OT or greater ancient Near Eastern context, that the survival of a remnant people was viewed both as looking back to physical harm or national disaster and looking forward to a future hope of national existence and identity. Therefore, the notion of remnant evinced a dimension of discontinuity whereby a people were kept for or from judgment and a dimension of continuity whereby a people were kept for *salvation.

2. Remnant in the Prophetic Literature of the Neo-Assyrian Era.

From the first and earliest instances where the remnant motif is employed in the prophetic literature, the purpose is clear: Yahweh has spared a people from judgment and destruction. The idea refers to a people who have survived either foreign or domestic threats, whether war, famine or pestilence. Amos and Isaiah support this purpose.

2.1. Amos. As with the motif of the Day of Yahweh in Amos 5:18-20, the Judean prophet to northern Israel has anything but positive pronouncements to the people. The concept of a remnant theology is pervasive in the book of Amos, but to Amos’s audience this notion only signifies a people who escape destruction from the aggressive Assyrian armies, where an initial deportation occurred in 734 BC and was then fully realized in 722/21 BC. The first mention of the remnant motif occurs in the oracles against the nations (Amos 1:2—2:16). As the prophet proclaims Yahweh’s judgment over the surrounding enemies of Israel and Judah, even the “remnant” (šē’erîṭ) of the Philistines will be destroyed (Amos 1:8). The same is said for Israel, where Yahweh will allow only a few people to remain for a time (Amos 3:12; 5:3) before he eventually sends the sword and serpent to kill any who have escaped the first round of judgment (Amos 9:1-4). Yahweh will make sure that there is no “escapee” (plṭ) from the northern kingdom to make up a surviving remnant. This use of the remnant motif corresponds with the Neo-Assyrian war annals, where a conquered and displaced people were left alive so that they might be a sign of judgment for other nations. As Yahweh “shakes” Israel and the other nations, not one “pebble” will fall to the ground (Amos 9:9-10). Thus, the final form of Amos marks out Joseph/Ephraim (i.e., northern Israel) for death, but a remnant from the house of Jacob (i.e., southern Judah) will continue in covenant relationship. The prophet’s use of the remnant topos is diverse and innovative. He negates the preconceptions of those in Bethel (cf. Amos 7:10-17), and he sets forth a hope for a remnant people of Yahweh as exclusive to those who align themselves with the reconstitution of the “booth of David” (sukkat dāwīd) in Jerusalem (Amos 9:11-15). The diverse appropriations in the book of Amos provide a conceptual richness that both antedates and influences subsequent prophetic traditions (see Hasel 1980, 173-215).

2.2. Isaiah. The characteristics of the remnant motif in Isaiah 1—39 differ from those in Isaiah 40—66, largely due to issues regarding composition, audience and historical concerns. From the outset of the book, Daughter *Zion has already suffered from war and brutality (Is 1:7-8), and the surviving community recognizes that it is only due to Yahweh’s mercy that anyone from Judah is still alive (Is 1:9). Although only a few remain (hōtīr lānū šārīd), this motif of the “left over” people contributes to the literary plotline of the book of Isaiah.

The “remnant” people of Yahweh are set against the historical backdrop of Assyrian hegemony and recurring aggression, principally under the reigns of Ahaz and Hezekiah. The initial image regarding the remnant motif is that of a tenth of a people who survive divine judgment, and they serve as the “holy seed” (zera’ qōdeš) who will repopulate the land (Is 6:13). In Isaiah 7 the prophet’s son, Shear-jashub (šē’ār yāšūb), is a sign both to Ahaz and to Isaiah himself that King Rezin of Aram and King Pekah of Israel will turn back to their own countries as “fire stumps” that are all but extinguished. In this way, the eldest son of the prophet Isaiah serves as a “living sign” that Yahweh will provide victory over Judah’s northern aggressors. In Isaiah 10 there is a further development of this eponym. Now Yahweh declares that a “remnant will return” (šē’ār yāšūb) in the context not of Judah’s defeated enemies but rather of Judah’s continued existence by means of a people who will survive the destruction that Yahweh has determined for the southern kingdom (Is 10:20-23). The only hope of national existence from the defeat of first the Neo-Assyrian armies and then the Neo-Babylonian armies is that Yahweh keeps a “remnant of Jacob.” Although this remnant people will be dispersed among the surrounding nations (Is 11:11-12), Yahweh will provide for their return to the land. This hope, however, is not given to the surrounding nations and their remnant people (Is 16:14; 17:1-6; 21:16-17).

The chief contribution that Isaiah evinces for the remnant motif is its depiction in terms of agrarian and horticultural imagery. Some scholars see this interpretive expansion as having taken place post-586 BC (TDOT 14:279-80). This development is provided in a number of texts (Is 4:2-3; 11:1, 10; 17:6; 37:31-32). In this manner, the conceptualization of a remnant people for Yahweh is associated with the “root” (šōreš), “shoot” (gēza’, nēšer) and “branch” (šemaḥ, hōter) of a tree. It is difficult to determine whether the origin of this metaphor is drawn from the ancient Near Eastern notion of a cosmic tree, where the root, shoot and branch represent the three-tiered cosmos, or from a divine or royal figure that symbolizes the source of earthly fertility. For Isaiah, the locus of this people is Mount Zion (Is 37:31-32), which then brings together the motifs of the cosmic tree coming out of the cosmic mountain. In other prophetic texts such as Joel 2:32; Haggai 1:12, 14, a remnant is identified by those who are faithful to Yahweh in Mount Zion (i.e., Jerusalem). This observation implies that the expectation of a remnant people in the prophetic literature is directly linked to those who are loyal to the *worship of Yahweh in his Jerusalem sanctuary.

In the latter literary unit of Isaiah 40—66 little lexical and thematic attention is given to the remnant theme (Is 44:17; 46:3; 49:21). However, when the concept does surface, it applies to the “survivors of the nations” (pēlīṭe haggōyim) that Yahweh calls to worship (Is 45:20-22). Although the lexical terms do not occur often in this latter part of the book, the concept is there and is enforced by the theme of new exodus in Isaiah 40—55, and an exilic audience is in view that is reminded of the remnant expectations in Isaiah 1—39. The idea of a new or second exodus suggests a salvific or redemptive divine act for the benefit of a remnant people, this time leaving Babylonia. This motif has been readily observed, for example, in Isaiah 40:1-11; 48:17-22, where Yahweh leads his people out of Babylonia and into the land of Israel. In addition to the preservation and deliverance of a people, the motif of a second exodus is associated with a renewed creation (Is 51:3). Both of these events—the preservation of a people and the restoration of creation—find their locus at Mount Zion (see Anderson).

2.3. Micah. The prophet Micah had just witnessed the Neo-Assyrian conquest of the northern kingdom in 722/21 BC, and this aggressive empire was set to besiege Jerusalem in the closing years of the eighth century BC. Regardless of whether the remnant theme is due to a postexilic editing, the book of Micah gives this concept a strong theological import. Two perspectives are in view in Micah. On the one hand, the gathering of Yahweh's people will occur when a sign act is observed whereby a woman will give birth to a child. This event will mark the period when the "remainder" (yeter) of the child's brothers will return to and constitute Israel (Mic 5:3). In response to the birth of this child, Yahweh will gather together a nation from this exiled remnant (Mic 2:12; 4:6-7; 5:7-8). The "remnant [šē'ērîṭ] of Jacob" is described as "dew" that comes from Yahweh (Mic 5:7) and as a "lion" that is fierce and overpowering (Mic 5:8). In this poetic imagery the remnant topos is given a diverse collocation that allows the concept of remnant to intimate both permanence and retribution. As reflected in the prophets such as Amos and Isaiah, Mount Zion (i.e., Jerusalem) is the locus of this remnant people (Mic 4:7). A parallel interest is given in other prophetic books where the "escapees" (pēlēṭā) take refuge at Yahweh's earthly sanctuary (Joel 2:32; Obad 17).

3. Remnant in the Prophetic Literature of the Neo-Babylonian Era.

Once Neo-Assyrian armies exiled northern Israelites and Neo-Babylonians armies exiled southern Judeans, the Prophetic Books accommodate the remnant motif to provide hope for a deported and displaced people. Among the Book of the Twelve, Micah (see 2.3 above) and Zephaniah contribute to this development, and then Jeremiah and Ezekiel provide complementary perspectives for how the prophets envision this future hope.

3.1. Zephaniah. There are three instances of the remnant motif concerning Yahweh's people in Zephaniah (Zeph 2:7, 9; 3:13). This book is set in the historical context of King Josiah of Judah (Zeph 1:1), and so the reader is aware that Judah is at the cusp of Babylonian deportation. Just four years after the death of Josiah in 605 BC, Nebuchadnezzar already exercised control over Judah and began to deport Judeans

(cf. Dan 1:1-3). Moreover, in the final order of the Book of the Twelve, Zephaniah is positioned as the last book before the Babylonian exile, while the subsequent book of Haggai takes up the concerns of the remnant which has returned to Jerusalem.

In Zephaniah 2:7 the very regions where Nebuchadnezzar has complete hegemony (i.e., the coastal area of Ashkelon) are where Yahweh will restore the influence and control of the "remnant [šē'ērîṭ] of the house of Judah." The same idea is conveyed in Zephaniah 2:9, where Yahweh's "remnant" (šē'ērîṭ) will control not only Cisjordan but also Transjordan areas, including Ammon and Moab. The third occurrence of this topos is in Zephaniah 3:13, where the "remnant [šē'ērîṭ] of Israel" is returned by Yahweh to the land, and the people are characterized by the removal of sin and deceit from their midst. The writer of Zephaniah portrays the "remnant" of the impending exile as those who will have control over the very areas where the Neo-Babylonian Empire was conquering territory, and they will be a purified and holy people for Yahweh. The descriptions correspond to the overall theme that Yahweh will "remove" (swr) a prideful people and that he will "leave" (š'r) a humble people (Zeph 3:11-12). But first, Yahweh must remove the "remnant [šē'ār] of Baal" from the land (Zeph 1:4).

3.2. Jeremiah. Jeremiah follows a similar line to that of Amos, with the notion of a "remnant" people largely being a description of disdain. The root š'r is used often (42x), but the root gh is what signifies that the community who would become the postexilic remnant people of Yahweh (NIDOTTE 4:16). With a few passages, however, the idea of a "remnant" is still a positive notion (cf. Jer 23:3; 31:7 [šē'ērîṭ]; Jer 39:9 [yeter]; Jer 43:5-6; 50:20). For Jeremiah, the "remnant" is destroyed by Yahweh, but the "exiled" are preserved in Babylon to secure a future generation who will return to the land (Jer 28:4; 52:28-30). The "escapees" (plṭ) and "survivors" (šrd) of the Babylonian invasion will die if they stay in Judah or seek refuge in Egypt (Jer 42:17; 44:14). The book of Jeremiah abounds in metaphor, and this is no different with the remnant theme. It is the "good figs" that are preserved in exile, while the "bad figs" are a rotten remnant that will die in Jerusalem or Egypt (Jer 24:5-10). The "good figs" are actually the Golah community in Babylonia, who are beneficiaries of Yahweh's favor and promise of return (Jer 29:4-14). W. L. Holladay notes that this reversal of remnant expectation takes language from Jeremiah's initial call in Jeremiah 1:10 (Holladay, 141). Yahweh sets the prophet "to build" (bānā) and "to plant" (nāṭa), and then Yahweh decides to "build" and "plant" the exiles in Babylonia (Jer 24:6) and commands the Golah community to "build houses" and "plant gardens" in exile (Jer 29:5). This interesting turn for Jeremiah identifies the Golah with the remnant people who will repatriate Israel in a later generation (Clements, 281-82). Although the concern for a remnant people is central to Jeremiah, it is not a positive term for anyone who remained in Judah or Egypt.

3.3. Ezekiel. On two occasions the priest Ezekiel, who served as a prophet during the exile, cries out to Yahweh to relent from killing the "remnant [šē'ērīt] of Israel" (Ezek 9:8; 11:13). These accounts clearly note that Ezekiel understands the remnant to be the sole hope for the continuation of the Judean people. The oracles of Ezekiel employ the idea of a remnant people who initially would be associated with the Golah community in Babylonia and later with a Golah community that would repopulate Jerusalem in the postexilic period. The presence of Yahweh continues only with those who are in Babylon (Ezek 11:16), while any other alleged remnant will indeed be abandoned and scattered "to every wind"—that is, throughout the earth (Ezek 5:10 [šē'ērīt]; Ezek 17:21 [hannīs'ārīm]). Other than an enigmatic "mark" (tāw) on the forehead of those who are still loyal to Yahweh in Jerusalem (Ezek 9:4), which separates them from being killed by Yahweh's agents of judgment (Ezek 9:6), remnant terminology is sparse in Ezekiel, which is the very prophetic tradition in which it should be most expected. These observations point to the possibility that a thoroughgoing theology of remnant was formulated in Persian Yehud after the Golah community had already returned to Jerusalem.

4. Remnant in the Prophetic Literature of the Persian Era.

4.1. Haggai and Zechariah. Haggai and Zechariah display the remnant motif and are set in the context of postexilic Persian Yehud. The references to a surviving or remnant people are exclusive to the Golah community that has returned from the Babylonian exile (Hag 1:12, 14; 2:2, 3; Zech 8:6, 11-12) (L. V. Meyer, 671). In this respect, the idea of a remnant people serves as the "bridge concept" between previous generations who have been judged and destroyed by Yahweh and future generations who will be a community prepared for the messianic age (Elliott, 724). As the remnant community set out to build the second temple under the shadow of the Persian Empire, the self-designated remnant saw itself as the true people of Yahweh over and against those who would not take up the task of rebuilding Yahweh's sanctuary in Jerusalem (Hag 1:12, 14). Not only did this Golah remnant rebuild the Jerusalem *temple cult (Hag 1:8), but also they alone had obeyed Torah and consequently received Yahweh's covenantal blessings (NIDOTTE 4:17). In addition, this Golah community was imbued with the spirit of Yahweh. For Haggai's audience, only those who have the spirit are designated as the remnant of Israel (cf. Hag 1:12, 14). Further, only the remnant (šē'ērīt) of the former people will experience the full restoration of Jerusalem (Zech 6:15; 8:7-8) and the subsequent effect on agricultural prosperity and fecundity over the entire land (Zech 8:11-12). The expectation for a remnant people in Zechariah 9—14 encompasses both those who are Gentiles (Zech 9:7) and those who are Judeans (Zech 13:7-9). This accords well with the expectation that concludes Zechariah where only those nations who worship Yahweh at the annual autumn Feast of Booths in Jerusalem will be spared drought and plague, which again identifies the remnant of Yahweh as those who support the Yahweh's sanctuary at Mount Zion.

4.2. Malachi. The last book of the Twelve has one reference to the remnant topos. As with Haggai and Zechariah, the postexilic designation of the remnant having the spirit of Yahweh is also noted in Malachi. Only those who have the "remnant of the spirit" (šē'ār rūah) have not betrayed Yahweh through cultic and social rebellion (Mal 2:15).

5. Remnant in the Literature of the Greek and Roman Eras.

5.1. Developments in Qumran, Intertestamental and New Testament Literature. Foreign religious and political entities in Judea grew more oppressive against those who sought to keep Torah and hold fast to the Second Temple cultus during the last two centuries BC. Manuscripts at Khirbet Qumran provide an understanding of the remnant motif that associates the notion with survivors from historical, physical threats (1Q33 I, 6; IV, 2) as well as the self-understanding of those who composed this "sectarian" literature (1Q33 I, 3; XIII, 8; XIV, 8; 4Q393 3, 7). For the sectarians, keeping Torah was prerequisite to being within the remnant community (1Q33 XIII, 8; XIV, 8-9). After rehearsing Israelite history at the beginning of the Damascus Document (CD-A I—III), the writer connects the surviving remnant from this historical overview with those who have covenanter identity (CD-A III, 21—IV, 4). Among the Qumran documents, these Zadokite Documents are most revealing of the sectarian's self-designation with Yahweh's remnant (Collins, 288-92).

Even in the pseudepigraphal literature this group distinguished itself as Yahweh's remnant in light of having undergone intense persecution (4 Ezra 7:27; 8:26-28). Moreover, it is those who survive physical threats and who continue in works and faith who will be the eschatological remnant and will be returned to the land (4 Ezra 9:7-9). The agrarian motif is taken up in 1 Enoch, where the "remnant" is the seed for a new people (1 En. 83:8; cf. Apoc. Ab. 29:17). As mentioned in a number of the prophetic traditions, the locus of the remnant people is expected to be Mount Zion (2 Bar. 40:1-2). Appearances of the remnant topos in the NT are relatively sparse (cf. Mt 22:14; Lk 12:32; Rev 11:13), but there is a conceptual reality of exile for the Jewish people, which is enlivened with the ministries of John the Baptist and Jesus. The apostle Paul provides a sustained treatment of the remnant motif in Romans 9—11.

5.2. Exile in the First Century AD Since the remnant motif is exhibited in literature as late as the first century BC, it may be inferred that some Jewish groups still considered themselves to be in an exilic state (cf. Tob 13:5, 13; 14:5; Sir 36:10; 2 Macc 2:7, 18; Pss. Sol. 8:28). E. P. Sanders argues that a removal of foreign presence in the land and the restoration of the twelve tribes were focal points to a postbiblical remnant understanding (Sanders, 95-98). Evans notes that Jesus' ministry of preaching and providing signs and wonders exhibited an exilic awareness (Evans, 91-100). Taking this evidence into account, N. T. Wright maintains that a first-century AD Jew would answer positively, "We are in exile," when asked by a fellow Jew, "Where are we?" In this manner, the exile/restoration nexus with that of a remnant people provides for a remnant theology that moves beyond that of the Babylonian exile and significantly influences the social and literary developments among NT writers (see the essays in Scott).

6. Conclusion.

The "escapees" (plṭ) and "survivors" (śrd) of the successive invasions and deportations by the Neo-Assyrian Empire in the late eighth century BC and the Neo-Babylonian Empire in the early sixth century BC struggled with a continual theological resignification of their remnant status. The development of the remnant motif can be seen in the prophetic literature whereby certain historical events brought about the need to reassess theologically the nature and identity of Israel (TDOT 14:278-79). In a sense, remnant terminology became a de facto mark of identity for those loyal to Torah and the centralization of the second temple in fifth-century BC Yehud. In later Jewish traditions, various groups aligned themselves with this remnant designation where each understood itself to be the šē'ērīt of Yahweh. However, after AD 70 the Pharisees became the dominant and authoritative group in Judaism and believed that all Israel constituted the remnant and would be saved for the coming world. Again, agrarian metaphor was applied to the remnant motif, but this time within an eschatological perspective: "All Israel will have a portion in the world to come, for it is written: 'Your people are all righteous; they shall inherit the land forever, the branch of my planting, the work of my hands, that I may be glorified'" (b. Sanh. 90a).

REPENTANCE

Repentance refers to the human experience of turning away from attitudes and activities opposed to God and his ways and turning to God and his ways. It is expressed through a breadth of vocabulary, images and themes. Within the OT repentance can refer to human experiences that involve a human's affections, voice and/or behavior. While repentance often has been considered one of the hallmarks of the prophetic movement and corpus, the Prophetic Books of the OT highlight the ultimate failure of this agenda, at least as a human act. This article investigates the presentation of repentance within Isaiah, Jeremiah, Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel and the Book of the Twelve (see further Milgrom 1990; Dempsey; Krašovec; Boda 2009, 190-356, 452-71).

1. Isaiah.

The introductory pericope of the book of Isaiah (Is 1) highlights two major strategies for dealing with *sin within the community, the first in Isaiah 1:2-20, focusing on the human response of repentance, what B. Childs called the "radical reversal" (Childs, 20), in which the community in both its inner affections and outer behavior (Is 1:19-20) turns from doing *evil to doing good (Is 1:16-17); and the second in Isaiah 1:21-31, focusing on the divine response of refining, in which Yahweh purges the community from the impurities of rebellion through a drastic act of discipline. The placement of repentance first suggests that this is the preferred strategy, but the second strategy is the ultimate outcome of the people in the first major section in Isaiah (Is 6—39). This reality is made clear from the outset of Isaiah 6—39 in the commissioning narrative of Isaiah 6. One can discern an ideal prophetic process underlying Isaiah 6:9-10 that entailed revelation (seeing, hearing), reception (understanding, perceiving with hearts), response (turning) and restoration (healing)—that is, one in which repentance was a key component. However, God's commission to Isaiah undermines this prophetic process, as God commissions Isaiah to dull the people's organs for receiving revelation so that they would be unable to repent and find healing (Boda 2009, 195-97; contra Wong, 213-33). The verses that follow in Isaiah 6:11-13 describe a drastic refining work of Yahweh that will result in the production of "holy seed" out of the ashes of the mighty forest that once was Israel and Judah. Repentance in Isaiah 7—39 is especially related to the issue of Judah's trust, an emphasis made clear by the crises experienced by a father (Ahaz) and son (Hezekiah) who are called to rely on Yahweh for protection (Oswalt, 55, 629-30; Conrad, 34-51; Seitz, 195-96).

Throughout Isaiah 28—33 the community is enticed to place its trust in religious (other gods [Is 28:15, 18]), political (other nations [Is 30:1; 31:1-3]) and economic (social injustice [Is 30:12-14]) resources rather than Yahweh. Repentance entails turning from these objects of trust to Yahweh (e.g., Is 28:16; 30:15, 18; 31:1, 6-7). This repentance, however, must not entail merely empty words (Is 29:13); it must include a deep engagement of the inner affections (Is 29:13) and a shift in behavior (Is 33:13, 16). While the Hezekiah narrative in Isaiah 36—38 showcases the kind of trust that Yahweh was demanding, the final scene in Isaiah 39 reveals Hezekiah's ultimate failure, which would lead to the drastic refining foreshadowed in Isaiah 6:11-13 (cf. Is 39:5-8). The name of one of Isaiah's sons, "Shear-jashub," meaning "a remnant will return" (Is 7:3; cf. Is 8:18), provides hope for the remnant that will emerge from the discipline envisioned in Isaiah 6. Not only does this *remnant return in a physical sense to the *land, but also this remnant returns by trusting in Yahweh rather than the *nations (Is 10:20-21) (Clements, 115; Webb, 72).

The drastic discipline of *exile clearly underlies the second major section of Isaiah (Is 40—55), a section addressing the exilic community. It soon becomes apparent, however, that the strategy of refinement has been unsuccessful as the community remains a deaf and blind servant (Is 42:18; 43:8; cf. Is 6). The answer in Isaiah 43:1 is a new act of divine grace by which Yahweh blots out the transgressions of the people (Is 43:8, 14, 25) and then invites the community to repent (Is 44:21-22). This is a key development in Isaiah's vision of repentance, as grace precedes repentance (Goldingay, 256). This same order can be discerned also in the concluding section of Isaiah 40—55. It is after the revelation of Yahweh's gracious act of *salvation for his people in Isaiah 52—53 that the community is invited "to participate in a renewal covenant" (Oswalt, 10) in Isaiah 55. This renewal uses the imagery of food, as the community is invited to enjoy a delicious and satisfying banquet without cost rather than its present diet. That repentance lies at the heart of this renewal is made explicit in its closing chapter (Is 55:6-7), which calls the community to seek and call on Yahweh while forsaking its present behavior and thoughts and turning to Yahweh.

The final section of Isaiah (Is 56—66) reveals enduring challenges within a community living in the wake of early returns from exile (see Is 56:8)—that is, in the early Persian period. Isaiah 58 highlights a community involved in fasting rituals, possibly reflecting penitential rites that emerged in the wake of the fall of Jerusalem and continued well after the Babylonian period. The prophet attacks these fasting rituals as merely external ritual and words without a true seeking of God reflected in repentance in behavior (Is 58:6-7). This theme of repentance is repeated in the prophetic liturgy of Isaiah 59, which depicts a community confessing their sins (Is 59:12-13) and repenting from rebellion (Is 59:20). This penitential community is promised God's spirit (Is 59:21). The prayer in Isaiah 63:7—64:12 often has been connected with the tradition of penitential *prayer, especially in light of its admission of sin (Is 64:5-8). In contrast to later exemplars of this tradition (Ezra 9; Neh 1; 9; Dan 9), this prayer blames God for the enduring apostasy of the people (Is 63:17). For this reason, the prophetic response to this prayer in Isaiah 65—66 is not positive, as God reminds the audience that he was the *covenant party who had been reaching out to them (Gärtner; Boda 2012).

The book of Isaiah thus reflects varying perspectives on repentance, moving between repentance as a prophetic agenda to avert judgment (Is 1; 7—38), to the abandonment of repentance as an agenda in judgment (Is 6), to repentance as an agenda prompted by God's new act of salvation (Is 40—55), to repentance as once again a prophetic agenda (Is 56—66).

2. Jeremiah.

A similar prophetic process to that underlying Isaiah 6:9-10 can be discerned throughout Jeremiah, especially showcased in passages such as Jeremiah 18:1-17; 25:3-11 and entailing three basic elements: divine word, human response, divine response. The ideal is a human response in which the community turns away from evil and turns to God, even though the norm in Jeremiah is a community that continued to do evil or turned away from God to do evil. Essential to ideal penitential human response in Jeremiah is “listening” (qšb, nṯh, ʾzn, *šm*⁶), not surprising in light of the emphasis on the divine word as the first key step in the prophetic process. At the core of the vocabulary of human response lie words related to change, especially šwb, but also nḥm Niphal and prh (see Holladay; Thompson, 76-81; Ossom-Batsa; Shields, 41). Jeremiah showcases the twofold process involved in repentance: turning from evil behavior and turning to appropriate behavior (Jer 18:11; 26:3, 13; 35:15). There is a “repentance,” however, in which the people turn from God to sin, and for this the prophet Jeremiah again uses the root šwb (e.g., Jer 3:10), but also swr (e.g., Jer 5:23), ymr (e.g., Jer 2:11) and šnh Piel (e.g., Jer 2:36). Echoing the dominant root šwb, the community is described with the pejorative terms “apostate” (mēšûbâ [e.g., Jer 2:19]) and “rebellious” (šōbāb [e.g., Jer 3:14]).

In Jeremiah repentance is described on three levels. First, at times repentance entails speech, whether calling on God (Jer 29:12, 13; 36:7) or admitting culpability (Jer 3:13; 8:6). Second, repentance is regularly associated with a change in behavior, especially putting away *idolatry and acting justly (e.g., Jer 4:1-2; 7:3-6). Third, in some cases repentance is described in terms of the deep engagement of the affections of the heart (e.g., Jer 3:10; 24:7), which starkly contrasts repentance that is merely deception (Jer 3:10).

The dominant motivation for repentance in the book of Jeremiah is the threat of judgment (e.g., Jer 4:4; 36:3). However, at times a more positive strategy is used as the prophet points to God’s promised *blessing and salvation (e.g., Jer 11:4) or the opportunity for renewal of covenant relationship (e.g., Jer 7:23).

The book of Jeremiah reveals a shift in the agenda of repentance. In Jeremiah 2:1—4:4 the prophet calls the community to a repentance that involves inner affections, verbal expressions and practical actions. As the book progresses, however, one can discern a major crisis in the prophetic process (see Paterson). The people’s lack of response ultimately leads to Yahweh shutting down the prophetic process and with it removing the opportunity for the people to repent, seen especially in the attempted penitential liturgy in Jeremiah 14:1—15:4, which concludes with Yahweh demanding that Jeremiah no longer seek him on behalf of the people (Dempsey). The prophet becomes intertwined with his people as even he is told to repent (Jer 15:19) and loses access to God’s voice in relation to his own predicament (Jer 17:14-18; 18:18-23; 20:7-13; 20:14-18) (Diamond, 77-78; Boda 2012).

The demise of penitence depicted in Jeremiah 1—25, however, is not the end of the book, and Jeremiah 26—52 provides future hope for the community to deal with its sin. Jeremiah 29:12-13 articulates a future penitential agenda that includes calling on Yahweh, coming and praying to him, seeking and searching for him with all one’s heart. What will make this possible has been foreshadowed in Jeremiah 24:7 and clarified in Jeremiah 31:27-40; 32:37-41 as the prophet promises the gift of a new covenant with a new heart upon which the law of God will be written and the fear of God will be placed. Thus, repentance and avoidance of apostasy are secured in the end only by an internal, divine work (Raitt 1977, 175-84; Dempsey) based on God’s declaration of forgiveness (Jer 31:34; 33:8). Thus, as J. Unterman has noted, the prophet most closely connected with the call to repentance ultimately “abandons the principle of free will and the attendant demand for repentance” (Unterman 1987, 177).

3. Lamentations.

One can discern at various points in the book of Lamentations a penitential agenda (see Boda 2008). Admission of culpability is explicitly stated in Lamentations 1:8 (“Jerusalem sinned greatly”); 1:17 (“I have rebelled against his command”); 1:22 (“all my transgressions”); 4:6 (“the iniquity of the daughter of my people”); 4:13 (“the sins of her prophets, the iniquities of her priests”); 4:22 (“your iniquity”); 5:7 (“our fathers sinned”); 5:16 (“we have sinned”). While at times Yahweh’s actions are justified (e.g., Lam 1:18), the general message is that the punishment that has befallen Jerusalem exceeds the crimes committed (e.g., Lam 1:12; 2:13, 20). At the center of the book, however, lies an invitation to repentance. First, the grace of Yahweh is rehearsed in Lamentations 3:21-33, focusing on the full breadth of the Hebrew lexical stock for God's care for his people. This prompts a rehearsal of the justice of God in Lamentations 3:33-38, revealing that Yahweh "does not afflict with delight" (Lam 3:33) but rather disciplines because of sin (Lam 3:37-38). This leads to the invitation to repentance in Lamentations 3:40: "Let us examine and probe our ways, and let us return to the LORD." While the response that follows (Lam 3:41-47) does admit sin (Lam 3:41), it expresses the frustration of the people that although they have confessed their sin, God has not pardoned, as they continue to suffer. The remainder of the book of Lamentations returns to the tone of the first two chapters, expressing the deep pain and frustration of the people while admitting culpability.

The book of Lamentations thus showcases the frustration of penitential rhythms for the community living in the wake of the destruction of Jerusalem. Its placement among the prophets within the Greek traditions brings it into conversation with the prophets whose works emphasize the theme of repentance. On the one side, Lamentations contrasts the prophets in its rejection of the penitential invitation of Lamentations 3:40; on the other side, Lamentations echoes the crisis in penitential traditions evidenced in the Prophetic Books. While the answer of Lamentations appears to be a combination of frustration and *faith (Lam 5:19-22), the prophets at times look to a new era of transformation initiated and accomplished by Yahweh himself.

4. Ezekiel.

The penitential process identified above in Isaiah and Jeremiah can be discerned also in the book of Ezekiel, especially in Ezekiel 2—3; 18; 33, where the people's response to the prophetic warning is articulated clearly. Key vocabulary used for penitential response involves not only turning (šwb [e.g., Ezek 3:19]), but also listening/obeying (šm' [e.g., Ezek 2:5, 7; 3:6, 11]), acting (šmr, šh, hlk [e.g., Ezek 18:5]), keeping holy (qdš Piel [e.g., Ezek 20:20]) and clean (thr Piel [Ezek 24:13]), and separating oneself (nzr [Ezek 14:7]).

Ezekiel's prophetic commission in Ezekiel 1—3 does emphasize the necessity of repentance for averting judgment, but there is a dominant tone of skepticism over the people's ability to respond. This skepticism dominates the chapters that follow in Ezekiel 4—33, suggesting that the fate of Jerusalem is sealed. The role of repentance in this section of Ezekiel has been controversial. Calls to repentance do appear in Ezekiel 1—33 (see Ezek 2—3; 14:6; 18:30-32; 33), and these have been treated in various ways from later redactional insertions (e.g., Zimmerli, 205), to "an interesting and authentic interlude" between Ezekiel's judgment and salvation phases of preaching (Raitt 1971, 49), to rhetorical flourishes to justify God's punishment (Fishbane, 147-48; Joyce, 50-60), to stimulation to prompt admission of guilt (Kaminsky, 166). The problem with these approaches is that they assume that repentance here is related to the impending judgment on Jerusalem/Judah. It appears, however, that Ezekiel's audience is the exilic community rather than the community in Jerusalem/Judah (Fishbane, 147-48), and that the penitential calls in Ezekiel 1—32 are directed to the exilic community from which will emerge a purified remnant (Matties). Ezekiel, like Jeremiah, was denied an intercessory role for the city (Ezek 3:24-27; 24:26-27; 33:21-22) (see Wilson; Block, 255; Odell, 106).

The tone of the book of Ezekiel shifts considerably after the message of the fall of Jerusalem reaches the prophet in Ezekiel 33 (Ezek 33:21-22). It is not surprising that this event is preceded by a reiteration of the Ezekiel's initial calling (Ezek 33:1-20) and the importance of repentance. The themes of salvation and restoration dominate the chapters that follow (Ezek 34—48). A key component of this vision of restoration is a spiritual renewal that will see restoration in the relationship between Yahweh and the people and renewal in their hearts. The core of this renewal is remembering and loathing sin (Ezek 36:31; cf. Ezek 6:9; 20:43) and experiencing shame over one's past behavior (Ezek 36:32; cf. Ezek 16:60-63), acts that follow God's gracious acts toward his people (see Ezek 16:60, 62). Loathing of past sin will be accompanied by changes in behavior (Ezek 37:23-24; cf. Ezek 11:18-20). Such internal and external signs of repentance will be enabled by a divine operation of deep inner transformation as Yahweh takes away their heart of stone to give them a single heart, new heart, new spirit, heart of flesh, and divine spirit (Ezek 11:19; 36:26-27; 37:14; 39:29) (Dempsey). One cannot miss the deep contrast between this vision of repentance and that found in Ezekiel 18:30b-32, where the people are called to repent and get for themselves a new heart and a new spirit.

5. Daniel.

Repentance is associated with three groups of people in the book of Daniel. First, the emperors in Daniel 1—6 are at times exhorted to repent. Daniel tells King Nebuchadnezzar to avoid the punishment of God by destroying his sins through righteous and merciful treatment of the poor (Dan 4:27) and even after punishment to experience restoration by acknowledging the sovereignty of the Most High (Dan 4:26, 32, 34b, 37). Second, Daniel is presented as an exemplar penitential figure as he prays a penitential prayer to Yahweh (Werline 1998; 2007; Boda 1999; 2008; Venter). Such a prayer is based on the theological and liturgical foundations of Leviticus 26; Deuteronomy 30; 1 Kings 8; Jeremiah 25; 29. Daniel is depicted as discerning from Jeremiah that the time of exile was coming to an end (Jer 25:11-12; 29:10) and so prayed in line with the agenda laid out in Leviticus 26:39-40; Deuteronomy 30:1-3; 1 Kings 8. Similar prayers are found in Ezra 9; Nehemiah 1; 9; Psalm 106. This verbal penitential act contrasts the prayer found in Isaiah 63:7—64:12 and the book of Lamentations not only by admitting the culpability of the community due to their sins and those of their ancestors, but also by justifying Yahweh for the judgment that befell the nation. Daniel prays this on behalf of his people and city Jerusalem with hope that the state of destruction would come to an end. Daniel is clear that the gracious response of Yahweh is dependent upon human response, since Daniel 9:4-5 refers to “those who love him and keep his commandments,” and Daniel 9:13 describes those who seek God’s face by “turning from their iniquity and giving attention to his truth.” The divine response to this penitential act, however, is disappointing as Gabriel announces in Daniel 9:24 that the expected seventy-year limit to the destruction of Jerusalem would increase sevenfold in order to deal with sin. This suggests that although Daniel may express repentance, the community that he represents continues to struggle with sin.

Daniel thus showcases repentance as a normative activity both for pagans (emperor) and the covenant community (Daniel). However, the ineffectiveness of Daniel’s prayer suggests the failure of repentance (Venter, 37), an emphasis echoed in the Prophetic Books.

6. The Book of the Twelve (Minor Prophets).

The book of Zechariah begins by highlighting the importance of repentance to the message of the prophets (Zech 1:3-4). By referring to the “earlier prophets,” Zechariah 1:4 brings into view the earlier prophets found in the Book of the Twelve, but by citing vocabulary reminiscent of Jeremiah, it brings into view the broader prophetic corpus. The cry of repentance can be discerned throughout the Book of the Twelve (Unterman 1982; Collins, 59-87; Smothers; Van Leeuwen; Rendtorff 1998; 2000; Watts; House; Boda 2011). Hosea, Amos and Micah, the eighth-century BC prophets in the collection, call the people to repentance (Hos 2:2-4, 7; 5:4; 6:1-3; 7:10, 16; 11:5; 12:6; 14:1-2; Amos 4:6-11; 5:4-6, 14-15; Mic 6:6-8). However, each of them highlights the inability and insincerity of the nation to respond to these calls (Hos 2:7-8; 5:4; 6:1-4; 7:10, 14, 16; 8:1-3; 11:5, 7; 12:11—13:16; Amos 4:6-13; Mic 6:1-16 (Smothers). These books focus on certain future judgment (Hos 2:9-13; 5:8-14; 11:5-6; 12:14; 13:16; Amos 1—2; 8:1—9:10; Mic 1—3; 7:1-10) and at times on a future divine unilateral initiative to restore the people (Hos 2:14-23; 3:1-3; 14:4-7; Amos 9:11-15; Mic 2:12-13; 4-5; 7:11-13). At times, this future judgment or salvation prompts repentance and confession (Hos 3:4-5; 5:15; 6:1-3; 14:1-7; Mic 7:16-20). These perspectives on repentance have led to divergent conclusions on the role of repentance within these books, from treating repentance as restricted to the future (e.g., Stuart, 7-8 [on Hosea]) to treating it as a present demand to avert judgment (e.g., Sweeney, 1:26-27 [on Hosea]). By juxtaposing the message of repentance with depictions of the people’s rejection of the message, these prophets undermine the efficacy of repentance.

However, Joel and Jonah, the two Prophetic Books that have been placed in proximity to these eighth-century BC prophets, contrast the message of Hosea, Amos and Micah by showcasing positive responses to the message of repentance using similar vocabulary (Joel 1:13-14; 2:11-16; Jon 3:5-10). Key to repentance in Joel and Jonah is the revelation of Yahweh found in Exodus 34:6-7, where Yahweh declares himself to be "gracious and compassionate, slow to anger, abounding in covenant faithfulness" (cf. Joel 2:13; Jon 4:2). Repentance thus is closely linked to the grace of Yahweh, even though the threat of God's judgment plays a key role (see Joel 2:11; Jon 3:4). The message of repentance disappears in the second phase of the Book of the Twelve, signaled by the reflection on the revelation of Yahweh from Exodus 34:6-7 at the outset of the book of Nahum (Nah 1:2-3). While Jonah's message prompted repentance among the Ninevites, Nahum declares an irreversible announcement of judgment upon Nineveh. This tone of judgment without an opportunity for repentance to turn away *wrath continues into Habakkuk and Zephaniah, even though there are encouragements for penitential response for the remnant that will survive the judgment (e.g., Hab 2:4b; 3:16; Zeph 2:1-3 [see also Ezekiel in 4 above]). Haggai, however, signals the beginning of the final phase of the Book of the Twelve and with it a renewal of the call to repentance. Haggai's vision of repentance is focused on the restoration of the temple, but with Zechariah this expands to include repentance from immoral and ungodly behavior (Hag 1:4), related in Zechariah 7—8 especially to social injustice (see Zech 5) (Boda 2003). Amidst the warnings of salvation and judgment in Zechariah 9—14 one finds the depiction of a community receiving "a spirit of favor and pleading for favor"—that is, a spirit that prompts a penitential mourning over what the community has done to Yahweh (Zech 12:10-14). This is reminiscent of the hoped-for "spirit" declared by Ezekiel (see 4 above). Repentance is also of key importance to the message of Malachi, as this final prophet of the Twelve confronts the priests and community of his day. That summary message of the earlier prophets found in Zechariah 1:3 is repeated in Malachi 3:7, revealing that human penitential response is an enduring priority of the prophets, even if it will take "the day of his coming" to produce the ideal community (Mal 3:1-2).

The echo of the penitential message "Return to me, and I will return to you" (Zech 1:3; Mal

3:7) in these concluding chapters of the prophetic corpus emphasizes the relational priority in the message of repentance among the prophets. Repentance is first and foremost a return to a relationship with a personal God who longs to enjoy covenant fellowship with his people. That this has implications for behavior is made clear in the surrounding texts (Zech 1:4; Mal 1—2), but this kind of repentance makes sense only within the context of relationship.

7. Canon.

Clearly, repentance is a key theme in the prophetic traditions of the OT. This theme can be discerned within this tradition from its origins. This agenda of repentance is not limited, however, to the Prophetic Books of the OT, but also can be discerned in the priestly traditions (e.g., Lev 26 [Milgrom 1975; 1990]), the Deuteronomic traditions (e.g., Deut 4:25-31; 30:1-10; 1 Kings 8 [Boda 2006]), the liturgical traditions (e.g., Pss 51; 106 [Boda 2009, 395-451]) and the narrative traditions of the Persian period (e.g., 2 Chron 7:14; Ezra 9; Neh 1; 9 [Kelly; Werline 1998]). However, the theme is developed most extensively in the prophetic traditions, and although repentance is never fully abandoned, its limitations as a human act are showcased most vividly. The legacy of this great penitential project can be discerned in the NT (Nave; Boda and Smith), beginning with the messages of John the Baptist (e.g., Mt 3:2) and of Jesus (e.g., Mt 4:17), and then those who proclaimed the gospel (Lk 24:47; Acts 2:38, 3:19; 5:31; 20:21). Repentance is both a gracious divine gift based on the mercy of God (Acts 5:31; Rom 2:4) and a human response that prompts God's gracious response (1 Jn 1:9).

RETRIBUTION

Retribution is a corollary of divine *justice. If God is indeed just, then he will punish or reward people according to their actions, whether individually or corporately. As the etymology of the term retribution suggests, God "pays back" to humans what their actions deserve (Towner, 203; Wong, 2). In the prophetic literature, as in contemporary English usage, the notion of retribution is usually associated with judgment, though the idea of reward is also attested on rare occasions.

1. The Language of Retribution.

The prophets express the concept of retribution with a variety of words and phrases. The most common of these are as follows.

1.1. The Verb šāpaṭ ("to Judge") and the Related Noun mīšpāṭ ("Justice"). Isaiah uses the verb form only twice of God as judge (Is 33:22; 66:16) but employs the related noun seven times (Is 3:14; 4:4; 5:16; 26:8-9; 30:18; 34:5). Isaiah 30:18 characterizes the Lord as a just God.

Jeremiah uses the verb three times of divine judgment (Jer 2:35; 11:20; 25:31) and the noun seven times (Jer 1:16; 4:12; 10:24; 30:11; 46:28; 48:47; 51:9). Jeremiah 11:20 is important to the theme of retribution because it affirms that the Lord judges "righteously" (šedeq) as he examines thoughts and motives carefully. This judgment is closely associated with divine vengeance (nēqāmā [see 1.3. below]). In Jeremiah 10:24 the prophet asks the Lord to implement his discipline "in justice" (i.e., "in just measure"), not "in anger." As one would expect if a judicial concept of retribution is assumed, this suggests that a principle of justice and fairness be employed, in contrast to a mere outpouring of anger. This same idea of "just measure" appears in Jeremiah 30:11, where it stands in contrast to allowing wrongdoing to go unpunished (see also Jer 46:28).

Ezekiel uses the verb seventeen times of divine judgment (Ezek 7:3, 8, 27; 11:10-11; 16:38; 17:20; 18:30; 20:35-36; 33:20; 34:17, 20, 22; 35:11; 36:19; 38:22) and the noun twice (Ezek 5:8; 39:21). Five times the verb is collocated with “according to one’s ways” (Ezek 7:3, 8; 18:30; 33:20; 36:19), indicating a direct correspondence between the people’s actions and the divine response, as one would expect if the principle of retribution is assumed (Wong, 239-42). Ezekiel 33:20 is instructive because the Lord pronounces his intention to judge each one “according to his ways” in response to the charge that he (Heb derek ’ādōnāy [“the way of the Lord”]) is unjust. Ezekiel 18:30 gives insight into the relationship between divine intervention and human responsibility. After announcing his intention to judge each one “according to his ways,” the Lord urges the people to *repent, because otherwise their “iniquity will become to them [yihyeh lakem] their stumbling block.” The Lord will clearly intervene (“I will judge you”), but from another perspective it is the people’s sin that brings them to ruin because it prompts divine intervention. Divine sovereignty and human responsibility are held in delicate balance.

The verb is used only once of divine judgment in the Book of the Twelve (Joel 3:2), and the noun seven times (Hos. 5:1, 11; 6:5; Mic 7:9; Hab 1:12; Zeph 3:15; Mal 3:5). Hosea 6:5 is enlightening because the instrument of the Lord’s judgment is identified as his word, spoken by the prophets. In this passage judgment is not something that works itself out in a purely mechanistic or even providential manner; it is initiated by the prophetic word, which sets judgment in motion. Habakkuk 1:12 indicates that the instrument of judgment, the Chaldeans, was ordained by the Lord, emphasizing once more the divine initiation of punishment.

1.2. The verb šillam (“to Repay”). Isaiah, Jeremiah and Joel use the verb šillam (“to repay”) to express the concept of divine retribution. This use of the verb appears to be rooted in the law. In Exodus 21:33–22:14 it is used of making full restitution for something stolen or destroyed. In Isaiah 59:18 the prophet announces that the Lord “will repay his enemies according to their actions.” According to Isaiah 65:6-7, the Lord “will repay upon their lap their iniquities and their fathers’ iniquities.” The Lord speaks of measuring or meting out (mādad) “their former actions upon their lap.” The language indicates that the judgment will be commensurate with the sins committed, and that the Lord himself will intervene to bring retribution. Speaking through Jeremiah, the Lord warns that he “will repay” his idolatrous people “double” for their iniquity and sin (Jer 16:18). In Jeremiah 25:14 the Lord declares that he will repay the Chaldeans “according to what they have done and according to the work of their hands” (cf. Jer 50:29). Although the majority of cases pertain to judgment (see also Is 66:6; Jer 51:6, 24, 56), the verb is used on two occasions to describe how the Lord will repay his repentant people with renewed blessing (Is 57:18; Joel 2:25). In Jeremiah 32:18 the verb is used of judgment, but this is an aspect of the broader principle that the Lord repays all people according to their actions, whether good or evil (Jer 32:19) (Krašovec, 47).

1.3. The Verb nāqam (“to Avenge”) and the Related Nouns nāqām, nēqāmā (“Vengeance”). These terms suggest that the Lord has been offended (see Is 1:24) and that his vengeance constitutes retribution (see Vannoy, 1145-46). In Isaiah 34:8 the Lord’s “day of vengeance” is associated with his “year of repayment” (šillūmīm). Vengeance is equated with “recompense” (gēmūl) in Isaiah 35:4. In addition to Isaiah (see also Is 47:3; 59:17; 61:2; 63:4), the concept appears in Jeremiah (Jer 5:9, 29; 9:9; 11:20; 15:15; 20:12; 46:10; 50:15; 51:6, 11, 36), Ezekiel (Ezek 24:8; 25:14, 17), and the Twelve (Mic 5:15; Nah 1:2). In Jeremiah 11:20 divine vengeance is the outworking of the Lord’s righteous judgment. When the Lord’s vengeance is implemented against Babylon, the prophet urges the instruments of divine judgment to “do to her as she has done” (Jer 50:15). In Jeremiah 51:6 vengeance is associated with the ideas of “recompense” (gēmūl [cf. Is 35:4]) and repayment, while in Jeremiah 51:36 it appears to have a legal connotation.

1.4. The Collocation pāqad ‘al (“to Visit Upon” = “to Punish”). G. André understands this expression to mean “to pronounce judgment upon” (André, 57-58). In many cases, the object of judgment simply follows the preposition in the verbal expression (Is 10:12; 24:21; Jer 9:24; 11:22; 21:14; 23:34; 27:8; 29:32; 30:20; 44:13, 29; 46:25; 50:18 [‘el is used here, not ‘al]; 51:44, 47, 52; Hos 4:14; 12:2; Zeph 1:8-9, 12; Zech 10:3). Jeremiah 21:14, where “according to the fruit of your deeds” is added, is particularly instructive because it suggests that judgment will correspond to the effects (“fruit”) of the royal court’s deeds. In this regard, several passages assert that divine judgment operates according to this principle (Jer 17:10; 32:19), including both reward (Is 3:10) and punishment (Mic 7:13).

Less common are cases where the verbal idiom takes the form “visit iniquity/sin upon a person/place.” In these cases the sin boomerangs, as it were, back upon the wrongdoer. The punishment implemented by the Lord is viewed as a direct consequence of the sinful action. For example, in Isaiah 13:11 the Lord declares that he will “visit upon the earth wrongdoing and upon the wicked their iniquity.” In all of these instances divine intervention is highlighted (see also Is 26:21; Jer 23:2; 25:12; 36:31; Amos 3:2, 14). The idiom is used differently in Hosea, where the object of the verb is “his ways” (Hos 4:9) or the specific sin involved (Hos 1:4 [the bloodshed perpetrated in Jezreel]; Hos 2:13 [idolrous worship of the Baal idols]).

A related noun pēquddā (“punishment”) is also used of divine judgment, always modifying “time,” “day” or “year” (Is 10:3; Jer 8:12; 10:15; 11:23; 23:12; 46:21; 48:44; 50:27; 51:18; Hos 9:7; Mic 7:4).

1.5. The verb šûb (“to Return”). One of the clearest expressions of the concept of retribution occurs in Obadiah 15, where the prophet warns, “As you have done, it will be done to you. Your deeds will return on your head.” The first statement has a talionic (“eye for an eye”) flavor, while the second pictures sin rebounding on the evildoer. The Hiphil form of the verb is more common; here the Lord makes evil actions “return to” (Hos 4:9; 12:2, 14) or “turn back on the head of” (Joel 3:4, 7) the evildoer. The notion of evil deeds returning upon the head of the perpetrator is talionic (Raabe, 665).

2. The Rhetoric of Poetic Justice.

In addition to the terminology discussed above, which directly states the principle of divine retribution, the prophets express the concept in more subtle ways. They use a variety of literary devices to demonstrate that the punishment fits the crime and therefore constitutes appropriate and just payment for the sin(s) committed. P. Miller has developed a detailed taxonomy of these rhetorical techniques (Miller, 111-19). Three of the most common and significant are as follows.

2.1. Verbal Repetition Is Used to Correlate the Sin and the Punishment. The prophets often use the same word to describe both the sin and the punishment. Through this verbal correspondence they draw attention to the fact that the punishment fits the crime. The sin receives an appropriate and just divine response.

For example, in Isaiah 1:4 the prophet laments that sinful Israel has become alienated (nāzōrû, from zûr, “to be foreign”) from the Lord. As a result, the Lord (see Is 1:9) has judged the nation, allowing foreigners (zārîm) to invade and devour the land (Is 1:7) (Chisholm 1987, 51). In Isaiah 5:20 the prophet pronounces a woe upon those who confuse darkness (what is morally wrong [cf. Is 5:20a]) and light (what is morally right). He then announces (Is 5:30) that the coming judgment will turn light (security and prosperity) into darkness (death and destruction). Those who had caused moral darkness to descend on Judah would experience the darkness of divine judgment when the Assyrian army, summoned by the Lord (Is 5:26), swept through the land (Chisholm 1986, 54).

Jeremiah and Ezekiel also employ this device. For example, in Jeremiah 30:16 the Lord declares that those who “devoured” his people will themselves be “devoured.” They had “plundered” Israel; they would in turn become “plundered.” In Ezekiel 5:8 the Lord announces that he will bring “judgments” (mišpāṭîm) upon his people because they have disregarded his “ordinances” (mišpāṭîm) and followed the “customs” (mišpāṭîm) of the nations (Ezek 5:7) (Wong, 202). In Ezekiel 36:6-7 the Lord informs his people that the nations that have caused them to “bear reproach” will in turn “bear reproach.” As Miller observes, the language “is clearly talionic” (Miller, 74).

One also finds this rhetorical technique in the Book of the Twelve. For example, in Hosea 4:6 the Lord informs the sinful priests, “Because you have rejected knowledge, I will reject you from serving as my priest; because you have forgotten the law of your God, I will forget your children.” As Miller states, the prophet “announces a judgment against the priesthood which point for point matches the sin it has committed”; his language “underscores heavily the character of the priestly sin and declares an appropriate justice” (Miller, 14). In Micah 2:3 the Lord announces that he is “planning calamity" (the collocation is ḥāšab rā'ā) against those who are "planning" wicked schemes and already working out in their minds how they will implement "evil" (rā') (Mic 2:1). More specifically, these sinners are devising plans to rob their victims of their property (Mic 2:2), and the Lord's corresponding plan in turn takes from the sinners what they had stolen (Mic 2:4-5). As Miller points out, "The effect of Yahweh's scheme will be the same as the effects of their nocturnal schemes. Those whose sin was the greedy and oppressive seizing of houses and fields belonging to others will be punished by having their own fields portioned out among others"; he adds, "What is clear is that the judgment is wrought by God and is like the sin. It is not pictured as a consequence of the sin except by Yahweh's decision to punish the wicked deeds. The judgment corresponds to the sin but becomes a consequence of it only as Yahweh determines that" (Miller, 30-31).

Sometimes verbal repetition creates an intertextual link between distinct speeches. For example, in Hosea 7:13 the Lord pronounces woe upon the people because they have ignored him and "wandered" (nādēdū, from nādad, "to wander") from him. In a later speech the prophet announces that the Lord will reject them, forcing them to be "wanderers" (nōdēdim) among the nations (Hos 9:17) (Chisholm 1987, 47).

On occasion, the correlation between sin and punishment is conceptual, not verbally exact. For example, in Isaiah 5 the prophet pronounces a woe upon those who carouse at sumptuous feasts (Is 5:11-12). Ironically, these sinners will die of hunger in exile (Is 5:13) and become the main course at Sheol's banquet (Is 5:13-14). Only sheep will be left to eat in the ruins of the banqueting halls (Is 5:17) (Chisholm 1986, 52).

2.2. The Instrument or Location of Sin Becomes the Object of Punishment. In Hosea 10:1 we read how Israel, as they prospered, constructed idolatrous altars and pillars. In response, the Lord would break the altars and destroy the pillars. The judgment in this case targets the instrument of Israel's disloyalty. Miller explains that the correspondence between the sin and its punishment "illuminates the inner relationship between human offense and the divine response of justice" (Miller, 19).

In Amos 5:5 the location of Israel's sin becomes the target of divine judgment. The prophet urges the sinful people not to go to Gilgal, for "Gilgal will surely go into exile." The prophet utilizes sound play to suggest that the town's destiny is already inherent in its name (haggilgal gālōh yigleh). Similarly, in Hosea 12:11 the Lord states that he will turn the altars of Gilgal into ruins (gallīm).

2.3. Sinners Are Deprived of What Their Sin Acquired. Micah 2:1-5, discussed above, provides a vivid example of this. Those who had stolen fields from their victims would be deprived of those same fields. Similarly, Isaiah pronounces a woe upon those who had accumulated houses and vineyards at the expense of the oppressed (Is 5:8), for the houses would be reduced to uninhabited ruins and the vineyards would yield almost nothing (Is 5:9-10; cf. Amos 5:11).

3. Examples of Divine Retribution in Prophetic Texts.

The principle of divine retribution permeates the judgment oracles of the prophetic literature. It is especially prominent in the oracles against the nations, but God's covenantal people, Israel, are by no means exempt from it.

3.1. Isaiah's Vision of Cosmic Retribution. Isaiah 13—23 contains a series of oracles against the nations, followed by the so-called Little Apocalypse (Is 24—27), which describes an outpouring of divine judgment upon the entire earth in conjunction with the inauguration of God's kingdom on Zion (Is 24:23; 25:6-8). In the very first oracle, which has a strong cosmic flavor, the Lord announces his agenda: "I will punish the world for its evil, the wicked for their sins" (Is 13:11). In the Little Apocalypse it becomes apparent that the context for this judgment is covenantal, for the people of the earth have violated "the everlasting covenant" made between them and God. They have "defiled" the earth beneath them (Is 24:5) by shedding human blood indiscriminately (Is 26:21). The Lord will intervene (Is 24:1), activating the covenant curses (Is 24:6), reactualizing the Noahic flood (Is 24:18) and subduing his cosmic enemies (Is 24:21-23; 27:1).

3.2. Jeremiah's Oracle against Babylon. Jeremiah's prophecies, at least as arranged in the Hebrew Bible, conclude with a series of judgment oracles against various nations (Jer 46—51). The list culminates with a lengthy oracle against *Babylon, the nation that destroyed God's temple in Jerusalem. Throughout the oracle the Lord declares in the first person his intention to intervene and personally judge the Babylonians (see Jer 50:9, 18, 24, 31-32, 44; 51:1-2, 14, 24-25, 36, 39-40, 44, 52-53, 57). The language of retribution (surveyed above) permeates this oracle. The Lord's "judgment" (Jer 51:9) is designed to "punish" Babylon (Jer 50:18, 27; 51:18, 44, 47, 52). It constitutes divine "vengeance" (Jer 50:15; 51:6, 11, 36) and "repays" Babylon for its deeds (Jer 50:29; 51:6, 24, 56).

3.3. Amos's Oracles against the Nations. Amos likewise announces judgment against a series of nations (Israel and Judah included) that have "rebelled" (pāša') against the Lord's covenantal authority (The precise meaning of the expression "I will not cause it/him to return" is uncertain. The pronominal object may refer to the Lord's decree of judgment, his anger, or the specific nation addressed, viewed as a subject state ["I will not take him back," i.e., "I will not reinstate him to the status of covenant partner"].) In each case, following the formal accusation, the Lord announces his direct intervention in judgment, which begins (with the exception of the eighth oracle, directed against Israel) with the Lord setting fire to the object of his anger (Amos 1:4, 7, 10, 12, 14; 2:2, 5). The language makes it clear that retribution is judicial in nature (the announcement of judgment follows the stereotypical introduction, "because of three crimes, even four") and involves direct divine intervention. None of the crimes mentioned is inherently incendiary; it is the Lord who sets the fire.

3.4. The Punishment of Jerusalem in Isaiah 40–55. In Isaiah 40 the Lord proclaims a message of comfort to personified Jerusalem (Is 40:1), announcing that he is ready to return to her, bringing her exiled people home with him (Is 40:9-11). In Isaiah 40:2 he informs Jerusalem that her time of *warfare is over, and that she has "received from the hand of the LORD double for all her sins" (cf. Is 51:19). The concept of double restitution, though known in the law, probably is hyperbolic in this case, emphasizing that Jerusalem has indeed "done her time." Her sins caused her suffering and prompted the Lord to divorce her (Is 50:1). The Lord's interventional punishment is especially apparent in Isaiah 51:17-23, where he speaks of forcing Jerusalem to drink from the cup of his wrath (Is 51:17, 22; cf. Jer 25:15, 17, 28; 49:12; 51:7; Ezek 23:31-33; Obad 15-16; Hab 2:15-16). In Jeremiah 25:13-17, 28-29; Obadiah 15-16; Habakkuk 2:15-17 the image of drinking the cup of the Lord's judgment is directly associated with the concept of divine retribution.

4. The Dynamics of Retribution.

Should we view the concept of divine retribution strictly in judicial terms, where God intervenes and punishes or rewards human actions? Or should we opt for a providential model in which consequences are built into actions? Over the past six decades scholars have debated this issue.

4.1. Klaus Koch's Thesis. In 1955 Koch offered a provocative challenge to the traditional view of retribution. Prior to this, God was viewed as a judge who implemented rewards and punishment within a covenantal context (see Chapman, 175-79). But Koch, appealing to evidence in the Wisdom literature, Hosea and Psalms, argued that retribution should not be understood in a strictly judicial sense. Instead, human actions have "built-in consequences." God, operating providentially, oversees "the connection between actions and destiny, hurries it along, and 'completes' it when necessary" (Koch 1983, 64). Scholars have interacted extensively with Koch's thesis, which has come to be known as the "act-consequence" or "dynamistic" model (for surveys, see Chapman, 179-82; Gammie, 1-5; Kaminsky, 22-29; Krašovec, 82; Wong 3-25). Some refer to indirect (the act-consequence model) and direct (the judicial model) retribution. J. Barton suggested that indirect retribution be viewed in terms of natural law.

As noted above, Koch drew heavily on the Wisdom literature in developing his thesis. Yet he also utilized texts from Hosea where consequences are viewed as the natural fruit or harvest of sinful actions (see esp. Hos 7:2; 8:4-7; 10:12-13) (Koch 1983, 64-69). In subsequent discussion other passages have emerged as evidence for the act-consequence model (see esp. Is 3:9-11; Jer 2:5, 19).

4.2. Critiques of Koch's Thesis. Miller examines these texts carefully and offers a detailed critique of Koch's thesis. He shows that one must not make a false dichotomy between act-consequence and divine involvement. In one sense, sinners' deeds result in their demise (see Jer 2:19), but in another sense, the Lord is the one who brings about their demise. This "interaction of the divine activity and the fate-effecting deed" is especially apparent in Jeremiah 6:19; 14:16 (Miller, 126-27; see also Scalise, 97-98). Miller points out that "a sizable number of judgment speeches do not suggest an internal relationship between the deed and its consequence"; in many instances "the reliance on wordplay creates a correlation that cannot be viewed as inherent in the deed. It is created or revealed only by the poetic style of the prophet" (Miller, 134). He argues that similarity between sin and punishment "does not necessarily point to a cause and effect relationship. There is no inherent reason why consequences should be like the deeds that flow from them" (Miller, 134) (see also McConville, 31). Indeed, "the emphasis upon correspondence appears to point to something other than the mechanism of cause and effect. It points rather to a concept of retributive justice" (Miller, 134).

K. Wong's study of retribution in Ezekiel demonstrates that Koch's act-consequence model is inadequate. The "act-consequence connection is governed by a juridical understanding, particularly by the covenant" (Wong, 246). This "requires an external agent to serve as the judge who deliberates on what should happen to the actor according to some agreed norms" (Wong, 250). Likewise, M. Fishbane states that Ezekiel's "persistent theme of divine judgment of Jerusalem (and Judea) for her sins makes it clear that the punishment to come is the personal justice of Israel's covenant God, not simply the working out of some impersonal principle of natural balance or retribution" (Fishbane, 148).

RHETORICAL CRITICISM

Rhetorical criticism is a method of interpretation that focuses upon the *literary and persuasive characteristics of the biblical text. It seeks to understand the message of prophetic texts, focusing on elements including structure, organization and persuasive techniques. It is also interested in the response of the audience to the prophetic proclamation. This article traces the development of rhetorical criticism as an interpretive method, focusing on prophetic literature. It also considers issues pertaining to the development of rhetorical criticism while suggesting trajectories for its continued use.

1. Introduction.

Rhetorical criticism is an extremely valuable tool for interpreting prophetic literature. Rhetorical criticism is practiced across the *canon, but it has a particularly strong resonance with prophetic literature and its attempt to persuasively communicate messages from Yahweh. Rhetorical criticism focuses on the means of persuasion that the prophets employ to gain a hearing and to convince their audiences to respond appropriately. This concern with persuasion is what tightly links prophetic literature and rhetorical-critical study. Prophetic literature is a “rhetorical tour de force” that takes the unfolding story of Israel and arranges it so that it represents the logical outcome of Israel’s relationship with Yahweh (Barton, 52). The rhetorical nature of prophetic literature is revealed further in the apt claim that “by any definition prophecy is rhetoric. The prophets were concerned with persuasion and they are indeed persuasive” (Fox, 4). Rhetorical criticism provides a well-suited approach to consider the ways in which the prophets attempted to persuade their audiences.

The identification of prophetic literature as fertile ground for rhetorical criticism has led to considerable diversity on the subject. Different approaches to the prophetic text continue to claim the title of rhetorical criticism. The origin of this discipline, the issues with which it continues to wrestle, and its potential future trajectories are worth considering in greater detail.

2. Origins.

The inaugural incarnation of rhetorical criticism in the OT typically is attributed to J. Muilenburg’s presidential address to the Society of Biblical Literature in 1968. In this address, entitled “Form Criticism and Beyond,” Muilenburg encourages biblical scholars to consider approaching the text in a fashion that appreciates its literary character and uniqueness. He calls for scholars to pay attention to the various literary devices and structural strategies that give the text its artistic qualities and claims that “rhetorical criticism” is an appropriate name for this approach. He intends for this approach to move beyond identifying the text’s generic elements, which was the principal interest of *form criticism, toward appreciating each text’s individual compositional strategies and literary character. As potential outcomes of rhetorical criticism, Muilenburg suggests, such studies could uncover the delimitation of literary units, the identification of major motifs, and the discovery of points of climax within the text. While he acknowledges the continued importance of form criticism, he views the move toward rhetorical criticism as the next step in better appreciating the uniqueness of individual biblical texts. For example, Muilenburg considers the form of a lawsuit oracle in Deuteronomy 32 and Micah 6:1-8, suggesting that while both passages share form-critical features, their distinct approaches to the form make them worthy of closer, individual study.

Essentially, Muilenburg’s construction of rhetorical criticism establishes a relationship with form criticism where each can check the excesses of the other. While form criticism may not be sensitive to the unique literary features of a text, rhetorical criticism runs the risk of focusing too narrowly and missing the function of other similar texts in shaping the audience’s understanding (Tull 2003, 327-28). Rhetorical criticism as conceived by Muilenburg thus establishes a useful tension between the formal characteristics of a text and the creativity with which it is constructed. Muilenburg’s vision of rhetorical criticism marks a significant moment in biblical interpretation because it calls interpreters to a very close reading of the text, urging them to devote significant scrutiny to its literary devices and aesthetic qualities.

3. Growth of the Discipline.

From its foundation in Muilenburg’s article, rhetorical criticism grew and expanded in scope and influence in studies of the OT. This process gave rise to two issues that require significant reflection. The first involves considering precisely what it is that makes a study “rhetorical,” while the second requires determining the position that rhetorical criticism should take in the discussion of diachronic and synchronic approaches to the text. Both issues deserve further discussion here.

3.1. Descriptive and Persuasive Rhetoric. Following Muilenburg's point of departure, it is evident that rhetorical criticism as applied to the OT categorizes a wide range of studies. Essentially, rhetorical-critical studies proceed down one of two paths, which P. Tribble helpfully categorizes as rhetorical criticism either as "the art of composition" or as the "art of persuasion" (Tribble, 32). The former follows mostly closely in the tradition of Muilenburg. This species of rhetorical criticism explores the literary and structural devices found in a passage. It is interested in detecting poetic devices such as chiasmus, inclusio or merismus within a particular text. It focuses primarily on the final form of the text, allowing the interpreter to concentrate on an aesthetic evaluation of its qualities. In this fashion, rhetorical criticism bears a strong resemblance to aesthetic or stylistic analysis as it focuses on the text's use of literary devices as an end in itself. A. Hauser's survey essay of rhetorical criticism in the OT from the mid-1990s focuses primarily on studies of this nature, notably mentioning the work of Alter, Berlin, Bar-Efrat and Sternberg, which continues to set the standards for stylistic analysis of prosaic and poetic texts in the OT. Such studies successfully bring out the creative qualities and intricate patterning found in prophetic texts, which is a worthy legacy for this stream of rhetorical criticism.

As scholars put forward studies that fit into the rubric of rhetorical criticism as the "art of composition," others began to call into question whether these studies actually merited the title of "rhetorical." This reflects an impulse to look behind Muilenburg and recapture the classical understanding of rhetoric as the study of a speaker's (or text's) persuasive artistry. Whereas Muilenburg's understanding of rhetorical criticism derives from the perceived excesses of form criticism, this focus on persuasion looks back to classical conceptions of rhetoric (Howard, 103). One of the strongest calls for a correction in the aims of rhetorical criticism comes from W. Wuellner, who refers to rhetorical criticism in Muilenburg's formulation as "rhetoric restrained," or "the Babylonian captivity of rhetoric reduced to stylistics" (Wuellner, 453). In its place, Wuellner calls for rhetorical criticism to move toward studies that consider the persuasive appeal of biblical texts and how this impacts the communities that read them. Through this appeal, he aims to return rhetorical criticism to what he understands as its classical definition: a study of finding the means of persuasion within a given discourse. This supplies the foundation for the second branch of rhetorical criticism, categorized as the "art of persuasion."

Although Wuellner's appeal primarily focuses on NT studies, it has a significant impact on rhetorical criticism as practiced in the OT. This is evident in the realization that the role of the rhetorical critic is both to analyze the literary features of the text and to articulate its impact of upon its audience (Hauser, 14). In this way, rhetorical criticism can focus on how texts function as persuasive discourse (Howard, 102-3). This orientation toward persuasion links rhetorical criticism to the broader field of rhetorical studies that is developing from applying classical rhetorical paradigms to a more universal understanding of the art of persuasion. In this way, rhetorical criticism of the OT can move beyond merely cataloging lists of rhetorical or literary devices. Instead, it can consider more broadly all the means of persuasion that OT texts bring to bear upon their audiences.

The preceding considerations provide the groundwork for the movement of rhetorical criticism from its focus on the "art of composition" to the "art of persuasion." This vein of rhetorical criticism in the OT has grown alongside of NT rhetorical approaches that dialogue with classical Greco-Roman oratory, referring back to works on the topic such as Aristotle's. Overall, it has been less visible in OT studies due to valid concerns of the viability of using Greco-Roman rhetorical categories with Hebrew texts. However, there are many scholars of the OT who have latched onto the idea of persuasive rhetoric as a universal phenomenon and thus applicable to the OT. In the realm of prophetic literature, Y. Gitay has been the most prominent to employ classical categories of rhetoric in conversation with the biblical text. He uses Aristotle's definition of rhetoric as the discovery of the available means of persuasion in a given discourse as well as Aristotle's fivefold division of the tasks of rhetoric as the foundation for much of his work on Isaiah (see Gitay, 34-45).

Recent developments in the broader discipline of rhetorical studies also influence the study of OT texts. The twentieth century witnessed the rise of studies that develop the universal nature of rhetoric and its means of persuasion. Such approaches claim that rhetoric is available in any area where people are addressed in order to put forward social action or to gain adherence to a particular proposition. By emphasizing the universal qualities of rhetoric, these types of approaches have the potential to bypass the concerns of importing foreign categories into the study of an OT text. C. Perelman and L. Olbrechts-Tyteca put forward a massive study of elements of argumentation along these lines, calling their approach the "new rhetoric." They explore the discursive techniques that can be used to increase adherence to the propositions put forward for evaluation. Their study explicitly focuses on persuasive elements in a wide variety of literary texts, including novels and sermons. Their study also moves beyond the political topics emphasized in Aristotelian rhetoric to a more universal conception of situations in which argumentation is employed. Bringing their work into the OT, Gitay again makes use of their description of the order in which arguments should be presented to gain maximum adherence. The "new rhetoric" thus has influenced the development of rhetorical studies of OT prophetic texts.

On a slightly different track, the literary theorist K. Burke develops a dramatistic theory of rhetorical analysis based on determining the relative significance of five categories within different units of a rhetorical piece. These categories include act, agent, agency, purpose and scene. He argues that in this "pentadic" analysis the ratio between the two most prominent categories within each unit will demonstrate how the rhetor is attempting to be persuasive. Pentadic analysis appears in the study of OT prophetic literature concerning prophetic passages related the Day of Yahweh (see LaRocca-Pitts). This provides a means of tracing the development of the rhetorical functions related to the Day of Yahweh in prophetic literature (see Day of the Lord).

This survey of the development of rhetorical criticism in the OT suggests that rhetorical criticism as the art of persuasion is a worthwhile avenue through which to pursue studies of prophetic texts. The prophets speak to their audiences and attempt to persuade them to respond to their message. There is room for studies that are concerned with the art of composition and seek to articulate the literary skill and structure found within the biblical text, but studies that take the next step and consider it in terms of its persuasive impact offer intriguing possibilities for broadening our understanding.

3.2. Synchronic and Diachronic Orientations.

Another significant issue related to rhetorical criticism is its temporal orientation to the texts that it examines. This issue gains added impetus as scholars pursue rhetorical-critical studies that focus on the art of persuasion. If it is possible to assert that a text is persuasive, it then appears to require an audience upon whom one can say that the text had a persuasive effect. This requires considering whether a rhetorical-critical approach should focus on the final form of the text, which conceivably represents the fullest articulation of the text's persuasive potential, or whether it should work alongside diachronically oriented methods in order to determine the original utterances of the prophet and consider how these would have affected the text's original audience.

Essentially, the development of rhetorical criticism in prophetic literature takes place alongside an ongoing shift in orientation that scholars bring to the text. Biblical scholarship has been dominated by diachronic approaches that studied biblical texts in order to better understand the "world behind the text." These approaches work from the perspective that texts have complex prehistories, and that one of the scholar's tasks is to isolate and locate each stage of textual development. In response, literary approaches to the text reflect a desire to move beyond the study of the "world behind the text" and to appreciate the literary qualities inherent in the text itself ("world of the text"). However, scholars also continue to pursue the "world behind the text." Rhetorical criticism of prophetic literature developed in this scholarly atmosphere. Consequently, one of the key questions related to rhetorical criticism is whether its focus ought to be synchronic or diachronic. Unsurprisingly, there are a variety of perspectives to consider.

There is an understandable tendency to view rhetorical criticism as a primarily synchronic approach. This relates to the origin of rhetorical criticism in Muilenburg's proposal. Muilenburg's concern with the literary shape of the text and its use of stylistic devices is most consistent with synchronic studies of the final form of the text. While such studies do not necessarily dispute the idea of the text's growth and redaction, they do not appear well suited to address such issues. Accordingly, while practitioners may acknowledge the existence of diachronic concerns in rhetorical-critical studies, the primary purpose of such projects is to focus on a synchronic reading of the text. M. Kessler even proposes that rhetorical criticism ought to be categorized as "the leading candidate for synchronic criticism" (Kessler, 14). He makes this explicit in a methodological proposal that contains nine separate elements. Two of these (authorship; setting) set up a general diachronic background for the study, but the remaining seven elements (whole piece; medium: Gattung; stance; form: structure; style; meta-style; ratio) are synchronic in focus and are given much greater significance in his articulation of his approach (Kessler, 9). In this type of analysis the synchronic nature of rhetorical criticism is dominant, although concerns related to the diachronic development of the text are not completely eliminated.

Many practitioners of rhetorical criticism, however, would not wish for their work to deal only with the final form of the text, with little concern for its growth and development. It is possible to suggest a more nuanced relationship between the diachronic and synchronic concerns of rhetorical criticism. For example, G. Kennedy proposes that rhetorical criticism can bridge the gap between diachronic and synchronic approaches such as form and literary criticisms by considering the text "as we have it," and how such a text would be received by an audience of "near contemporaries" (Kennedy, 3-4). In prophetic studies, T. Renz constructs rhetorical analyses in accordance with an understanding of redactional layering within the text, thus basing his reading on previous diachronic results (Renz, 5-8). In this way, it may be possible to trace the persuasive potential of prophetic proclamation about its original audience if the work devoted to uncovering the text's redactional history is secure.

The relationship between rhetorical criticism and synchrony/diachrony attains further complexity when rhetorical criticism claims that its efforts can affect the results of diachronically oriented approaches. This is most notable in K. Möller's attempt to speak to the synchronic/diachronic balance. Essentially, Möller takes another step beyond Renz and argues that rhetorical-critical studies can challenge the results of diachronic criticisms when they discover literary seamlessness within a text that may render unnecessary theories of complex redaction and secondary additions (Möller, 5-10). Consequently, rhetorical criticism is not necessarily reliant on the observations of source and redaction criticism to delineate the boundaries of the persuasive potential of prophetic proclamations. Rhetorical criticism, according to this view, can exist in between synchronic and diachronic approaches, appropriating concerns from both sides, but it need not rely solely on the results of previous diachronic analysis as its foundation. It can offer results that affect both the synchronic and the diachronic understandings of the text.

As a result of these issues, rhetorical criticism as the "art of persuasion" demonstrates significant variation as a method of studying the OT. It is a discipline capable of supporting different presuppositions concerning the development of the text, and adherents of both diachronic and synchronic approaches to the text incorporate it into their studies. However, it is more prevalent among those who favor the literary integrity of the text and work with its final form. Further, some adherents of this discipline have sought to bring the analysis forward so that the texts in question can be studied in situations far removed from their original location. In doing so, rhetorical criticism thus appears to function as a bridge discipline in a greater sense than that envisioned by Kennedy. Möller claims that one of rhetorical criticism's strengths is its potential to combine the three primary foci of interpretation: the author ("the world behind the text"), the discourse ("the world of the text") and the reader ("the world in front of the text"). Not all rhetorical studies will examine all three foci, but the potential to offer a well-rounded view of a text lends promise to the future of rhetorical criticism.

4. Model.

The broad scope of what rhetorical criticism can study means that there are many different possible models. One model, however, is worth considering in greater detail. It is derived from Kennedy's NT model of rhetoric, but it has been used effectively to study prophetic literature (see Möller on Amos; Shaw on Micah; Renz on Ezekiel). This model consists of five steps. The first is to determine the rhetorical units of the text, or to break the text into its composite oracles for analysis. The second step is to describe the rhetorical situation of the text, which involves placing the text into its social, historical and literary context in order to describe how the prophetic text is responding to this situation. The third step is to consider the rhetorical genre of the text, which determines the basic approach to persuasion that the text will adopt. Texts are classified as (1) judicial, which involves making judgments on persons or events; (2) deliberative, which invites consideration of future actions; or (3) epideictic, which aims to reinforce certain values or beliefs. The fourth step is to consider the text's rhetorical strategy, which is where the interpreter can discuss all the literary and stylistic devices that the text employs to heighten the persuasive punch of its message. The fifth and final step is to consider the rhetorical effectiveness of the text, which provides the interpreter with an opportunity to look back over the preceding steps and determine how well a prophetic oracle spoke into a given situation and what effect it could have achieved.

This model is useful because it articulates an interpretive procedure that is easy to follow but also is adaptable to the concerns of individual texts. This is most noticeable in the categories of rhetorical situation and rhetorical effectiveness. It is impossible to completely get behind the world of the text and capture its rhetorical situation perfectly, which provides the interpreter with latitude to consider the most relevant elements. If information concerning the social and historical circumstances is lacking, the interpreter can focus on the literary situation of the oracle within a prophetic book, considering how it contributes to the argument of the whole book. Rhetorical effectiveness is not often described within the text, so the interpreter has the freedom to consider what its effect should have been, or perhaps to even consider the continuing effectiveness of the prophetic text upon different audiences. This model provides a useful point of departure for appreciating how rhetorical criticism can contribute to the study of prophetic literature.

5. Recent Developments.

This section surveys some of the recent developments in the field of rhetorical criticism. It shows how rhetorical criticism incorporates insights from related methodologies and uses them to more clearly articulate the persuasive appeal of prophetic language. This brief survey also demonstrates the continued vibrancy of rhetorical criticism in its study of prophetic literature.

5.1. Rhetorical Criticism and Speech-Act Theory. Rhetorical criticism successfully incorporates the insights of speech-act theory. Popularized by J. Searle and J. Austin, speech-act theory emphasizes the performative quality of language. Speech-act theory argues that words are not simply reflections of reality; instead, they can evoke new states of being. Speech-act theory employs the categories of locution (the words themselves), illocution (the actions they perform) and perlocution (the effects of the illocutionary actions) to describe what functions language can perform. The idea that words have a performative purpose is highly useful in classifying the ways in which language can be used, and it offers the possibility of new insight for the study of prophetic literature.

Speech-act theory has a natural parallel with rhetorical criticism in prophetic literature. The concepts of illocution and perlocution provide ways of examining what the prophets were trying to do in their oracles and what effect these might achieve on their audiences. This approach coincides with the concern for identifying the persuasive effect of prophetic literature, which is at the heart of rhetorical criticism. One useful example is to look at what speech-act theory might reveal about the persuasive intent of oracles of woe and doom in prophetic literature. There appears to be space between the locutionary and the illocutionary intentions of such oracles, where the prophet appears to be doing more than simply announcing the fixed reality of divine judgment. One suggestion to explain this is that the illocutionary force of the oracle of doom is intended to motivate return and repentance to Yahweh (cf. Jer 18:1-12). Thus, illocutionary act of proclaiming doom and destruction may well reflect an attempt to provoke a response of penitence.

Jonah 3 provides a fascinating test case. Jonah proclaims a succinct oracle of doom that leaves no hope for averting the prophesied fate. Nineveh, however, responds with penitence, and so Yahweh spares the city. In this instance it would appear that Jonah's words (locution) perform the act of initializing divine judgment (illocution) that provokes a powerful response from the audience of the prophetic oracle (perlocution). This illocutionary act and its perlocutionary response are active even in spite of Jonah's wishes (see Eagleton, 233). Whether the audience adopts the proper perlocutionary response to an oracle of woe and doom is an open question, but it does not eliminate the illocutionary force of the prophetic proclamation (Houston, 76). This brief example demonstrates the usefulness of using the insights of speech-act theory in a rhetorical-critical study of a prophetic oracle.

5.2. Rhetorical Criticism and "Interested" Methodologies. Another significant development in rhetorical-critical studies is its link to methodologies that try to uncover the diverse interests of the text. This reflects the continuing impact of rhetorical criticism as the "art of persuasion," since if it is persuasive, its effects on its audiences ought to be considered. This coincides with the development of the postmodern mentality that denies the possibility of proclaiming objective truth. Such methodologies seek to discover the embedded interests of the text, its audience and even of the practitioners of rhetorical criticism in order to better understand the means of persuasion being employed. There is warrant for this development in rhetorical criticism because it also important to consider the role of the interpreter in the persuasive potential of a prophetic text. Rhetorical criticism from this perspective cannot make the claim that it is objectively seeking the truth about a text's persuasive potential. Instead, the way in which the interpreter presents the text's rhetoric has persuasive force itself. P. Tull aptly summarizes this perspective, asserting that "the very practice we are analyzing, we are also ourselves exercising, since any stance that an interpreter takes concerning the text is by nature a rhetorical stance" (Tull 1999, 163).

The consideration of "interests" in rhetorical criticism opens up two primary interpretive trajectories. First, it provides an opportunity for "suspicious" readings of the text to flourish, where the interpreter deliberately reads against the grain of what would appear to be the persuasive intention of the prophetic text. This approach refuses to cede the normative voice to the prophetic text; rather, it seeks to undermine the prophetic text's privileged position and provide a reading from an alternative perspective (Clines). Other alternative perspectives could include feminist readings that challenge some of the highly charged sexual imagery found in prophetic texts, and liberationist readings that see prophetic rhetoric as a tool for crying out on behalf of the poor and oppressed. While such readings will hold differing opinions on the normative nature of prophetic literature, they share the perspective that its persuasive power speaks beyond the ancient text and can be used to affect other reading and hearing audiences.

Second, it is also possible to apply the idea of the "interested interpretation" to readings of the text that accept it as normative. According to this approach, interpreters place themselves within the audience of those whom the rhetorical power of the prophetic oracle can persuade. This is not done passively based on a simplistic reading of the text; rather, it is an active choice by the interpreters to situate themselves in this manner. This helps to reveal the persuasive potential of the prophetic text because "the interpreter can only receive truth from a text if he or she is willing to entertain the possibility of its being true" (Patrick, 77). Essentially, this approach argues that one can more comprehensively consider the prophetic text's persuasive potential if one reads the text as someone whom it could affect and persuade. It provides a useful counterweight to "suspicious" readings of prophetic texts and suggests that their persuasive potential can have beneficial effects beyond the boundaries of the original hearers and readers.

5.3. Rhetorical Criticism and Discourse Analysis. Rhetorical criticism also overlaps with emerging field of discourse analysis and its concerns with the composition of the text. Essentially, engaging in discourse-related studies helps to identify the boundaries of a prophetic text, the internal bonds of cohesion, and the way in which it builds to points of climax (Wendland, 26). It permits the interpreter to consider the way in which the prophetic text constructs its argument through the precise construction of its language, noting, for example, how variations in expected word order reveal points of potential climax within the text (van der Merwe and Wendland). This information is helpful in determining the persuasive power of a prophetic passage because it helps the interpreter to identify the manner in which the text constructs its argument. Discourse analysis is also concerned with the macrostructural arrangement of the biblical text, which is useful because it can provide the rhetorical critic with the means of placing the persuasive intention of a particular oracle within the broader strategy of the entire book. The field of discourse analysis is continuing to expand, which should provide opportunities to consider how it aids rhetorical critics in better understanding the composition of the text and how this contributes to its persuasive power.

6. Conclusion.

The term rhetorical criticism encompasses a wide range of models and methods that continue to have a significant voice in the study of prophetic literature. The focus of rhetorical criticism on the persuasive potential of the text resonates powerfully with the nature of prophetic proclamation. Rhetorical criticism has the capacity to help its practitioners to appreciate the aesthetic qualities of the text and to consider the various ways in which it can be persuasive. It allows the interpreter to articulate the text's use of imagery and literary devices while considering how these affect their audiences. Rhetorical criticism can consider the persuasive potential of the text on both its original audience and the audiences that continue to read it. The prophets spoke persuasively to their ancient audience, and as such texts continue to be celebrated and studied, it is important to consider how they affect contemporary audiences. The flexible nature of rhetorical criticism provides the foundation for continued use in studying prophetic literature.

SACRIFICE AND ATONEMENT

Perspectives of the OT Prophetic Books regarding sacrifice and atonement have aroused vigorous debate among modern scholars. The former tendency to interpret preexilic prophetic critiques as rejecting all sacrifice, thereby sharply contradicting the Pentateuch (e.g., Wellhausen, 422-23, 425), is now largely replaced by more nuanced approaches. These recognize that prophets before, during and after the Babylonian *exile invalidated various kinds of ritual practice but not the efficacy of sacrifices properly performed by loyal people at the authorized temple in Jerusalem. Their opposition was aimed at cultic abuse through practices such as pagan rituals or pagan elements in syncretistic *worship of the Lord, sacrifice at illegitimate northern Israelite cult sites, and sacrifices by unrepentant, disloyal people.

1. Positive or Neutral Prophetic Recognition of Sacrifice
2. Negative Prophetic Views of Sacrifice
3. Atonement with or without Sacrifice
4. Relationship Between Prophets and the Pentateuch

1. Positive or Neutral Prophetic Recognition of Sacrifice.

Sacrifices are ritual offerings to deities that serve as instruments for various kinds of relational interaction. Prophets, some of whom belonged to priestly families (Jer 1:1; Ezek 1:3), recognized that sacrificial worship was important in the lives of their people. They knew categories of sacrifice prescribed in the Pentateuch and could view them positively (e.g., Jer 17:26; 33:11; 33:18; Ezek 43:27; cf. Lev 1-7). This section considers positive or neutral prophetic references to sacrifice.

1.1. Positive References to Sacrifice in Narratives. In the book of Jonah a sacrifice by non-Israelite mariners (Jon 1:16) and the prophet's promise of a sacrifice (Jon 2:9) are positive expressions of belief in the Lord. After the temple in Jerusalem was destroyed, the fact that eighty men planned to present (nonanimal) grain offerings and incense at its site (Jer 41:5) shows the enduring centrality of this place of sacrifice for worship. Likewise, Daniel prayed from Babylon toward Jerusalem even while the temple lay in ruins (Dan 6:10; cf. 1 Kings 8:29, 30, 35).

In response to Daniel's prayer of confession and intercession for his exiled people, who had violated God's covenant and thereby incurred its curse (Dan 9:3-20; cf. Lev 26:40-41), the angel Gabriel flew to him about the time when the evening offering would have been performed (Dan 9:21; cf. Ex 29:38-42; Num 28:1-8) had the temple not been destroyed. The timing (cf. Ezra 9:4-10:1) implies that God heard his petition as if in response to a sacrifice (cf. Ps 141:2). So the concept of sacrifice for the benefit of faulty people was still valid. But the Lord could provide the same atoning benefit in answer to *prayer when they confessed or were humbled so that they made amends for (Qal of 2-ršh) their culpability (Lev 26:41, 43), just as a sacrifice would be acceptable (Niphal of 1-ršh) to him on their behalf (Lev 1:4).

1.2. Sacrificial Language in Metaphor or Simile. Such usage implies the existence of literal sacrificial practice, without which its force would have been lost on the original audience. Several prophets employed the term zebah ("sacrifice") metaphorically (with neutral implications for literal practice) to portray the Lord's future destruction of his human enemies (Is 34:5-7; Jer 46:10; Ezek 39:17-20; Zeph 1:7-8). The word lent itself to such usage because the verb zbh means “to slaughter,” and the offerer of a zebah ate from it and could share it with others (Lev 7:15-21; 1 Sam 9:13; cf. Zeph 1:7-8). Thus, the Lord’s sword would “devour” (Jer 46:10), and he would share his “sacrifice,” the corpses, with birds and *animals (Ezek 39:17-19). An Israelite was forbidden to consume fat or blood (Lev 7:23-27), but the Lord’s sword and wild creatures would devour the fat and blood of his enemies (Is 34:6; Ezek 39:17-19). In Isaiah 34:5-7 the human victims of such a “sacrifice,” referred to as sacrificial animals, belong to the Lord as a herem (“banned thing”) devoted to sacral destruction (cf. Lev 27:28-29; Josh 6:17-18, 21).

Isaiah 66:20 predicts that Gentiles would bring God a gift (minhâ), namely, dispersed Jews, whom they would assist in returning to the Lord’s place of worship. Isaiah positively likens the gift to an acceptable grain offering (also minhâ) brought by an Israelite, implying that the Lord would be pleased with it.

1.3. Restoration and Reform of Sacrifice. If the preexilic prophets had invalidated all sacrifice, Isaiah 43:22-24a would be strange. Here God disapproves of ungrateful people who were not offering him sacrifices because they had grown weary of him. Their attitude was unjustified because he had not burdened them with ritual requirements; rather, they had burdened him with their sins, which he still offered to wipe out (Is 43:24b-25).

Several prophets predicted a better time after the Babylonian exile, when sacrificial worship would be restored (e.g., Is 60:7; Jer 33:11, 18; Zeph 3:10). If they did not regard sacrifice as worthwhile, they would not have seen the need for its continuation in the future.

The most elaborate prophecy of restoration is that of Ezekiel, whose vision of a new, transformed *temple is accompanied by detailed ritual instructions (Ezek 40–48). Many aspects of this temple’s infrastructure and procedures correspond to those of the wilderness tabernacle (Ex 25–31; 35–40; Lev 1–9; 16; 23; Num 28–29) and the first temple (1 Kings 6–8; 2 Chron 3–8). But there are also significant differences, such as Ezekiel denying laypersons access to the area of the altar or slaughter of their own sacrifices (Ezek 40:32-47; 44:11, 15-19; contrast Lev 1:3-5), purgation of Ezekiel’s temple in the first month (Ezek 45:18-20; cf. Lev 16 [Day of Atonement in the seventh month]), and a special role for a “prince” (e.g., Ezek 44:3; 45:17, 22-25; 46:2). Most strikingly, Ezekiel’s temple is surrounded by a far more extensive holy area, including inner and outer courtyards with gates (Ezek 40; 42; 45-46; 48; cf. Ex 27; 1 Kings 6; 2 Chron 4), in order to protect its sacred domain from profanation and encroachment by impurities (Ezek 43:7-12; 44:5-9). The temple complex was never built, but Ezekiel’s vision points to the need for purer sacrificial worship, a holy community and permanent divine presence after the exile (Kasher).

After the exile, the prophets Haggai and Zechariah supported construction of the second temple (Ezra 5:1-2; 6:14; Hag 1-2; Zech 1:16; 4:9-10; 6:11-15; 8:3, 9). Like Ezekiel, postexilic prophets were concerned with purity. Malachi looked forward to a “messenger of the covenant” who would purify the Levites, so that they would present offerings in righteousness that would please the Lord (Mal 3:1-4). Zechariah also foresaw a time of reform when all cooking pots in Jerusalem and Judah would be holy to the Lord, so that sacrificial meat (of well-being offerings [Lev 7:15-16; cf. 1 Sam 2:12-14]) could be boiled in them, and there would no longer be merchants in the temple (Zech 14:21; cf. Mk 11:15-17; Jn 2:14-16).

Some prophecies of restoration include universalism. Non-Israelite peoples would worship the Lord through valid sacrifices, whether in Egypt (Is 19:19-22) or Jerusalem (Is 56:6-8). Malachi cites widespread Gentile worship of the Lord, by the offering of incense and the presentation of a pure offering (minhâ), as already occurring during the Second Temple period (Mal 1:11).

2. Negative Prophetic Views of Sacrifice.

2.1. Pagan Rituals.

2.1.1. Sacrifices by Non-Israelites to Deities Other Than the Lord. Not surprisingly, Jeremiah condemns pagan ritual worship practiced by Moabites (Jer 48:35). Habakkuk protests that God allows the Chaldeans to destroy peoples like catching fish in a net, so that they joyfully offer sacrifices to their “net” (Hab 1:14-16). Here the net represents their military system, which apparently they regard as divine (cf. Dan 11:38). Whether the Chaldeans literally performed such sacrifices or not, they failed to acknowledge the true God (cf. Is 10:5-14 of Assyria).

2.1.2. Pagan Ritual Activities Performed by Israelites. The preexilic prophets arraigned the national communities of Judah and Israel before God, presenting a lurid litany of pagan ritual practices that the chosen people were perpetrating in rebellion against their covenant Lord, who had forbidden them to have relations with other deities or to engage in *idolatry (Ex 20:3-6). Such illegitimate activities provoked him to anger (Jer 7:18; 32:29; 44:3, 8).

Apostates were burning sacrifices in service to other gods (Jer 1:16; 19:4; 44:3, 5, 8, 15 [by women]), such as Baal(s) (Jer 7:9; 11:17; Hos 2:13), and bowing to worship idols (Jer 1:16) or the "host of heaven" (Zeph 1:5). Their illicit rituals were performed on mountains or high hills, under leafy trees or in gardens, on bricks, or with "sacred" prostitutes (Is 57:3, 7; 65:3; Ezek 20:28; Hos 4:13-14; 11:2; 13:2), or on roofs of houses to the entire "host of heaven" (Jer 19:13; cf. Zeph 1:5) or to Baal (Jer 32:29). They were burning incense (Ezek 8:11), including to Baal(s) (Jer 11:12-13; Hos 2:13), pouring out drink offerings (Is 57:6; Jer 7:18; 19:13; 32:29; Ezek 20:28), presenting grain offerings (Is 57:6), burning sacrificial cakes to the "queen of heaven" and pouring out libations to her (Jer 7:18 [all family members participating]; Jer 44:17-19, 25). Worse, some were slaughtering children (Is 57:5) and burning their children as burnt offerings to Baal at high places of that deity (Jer 19:5).

Undoubtedly, many who engaged in pagan worship also participated in worship of the Lord. Zephaniah condemns those who bow down to and swear by both the Lord and other gods (Zeph 1:5). Even the Lord's temple in Jerusalem was not immune from pagan practices (Ezek 8; cf. 2 Kings 21:4-5, 7; Jer 7:30; 32:34).

In Jeremiah 17:1-2 metaphorically engraving the Judahites' sin (ḥaṭṭa't), including pagan practices, "on the tablet of their hearts and on the horns of their altars" alludes to the purification offering (also ḥaṭṭa't) in a way that reveals profound understanding of this sacrifice as prescribed in the Pentateuch. There, daubing purification offering blood on the horns of the Lord's incense altar or of his outer altar contributes to removal of sin from the (penitent) offerer, a prerequisite to divine forgiveness (e.g., Lev 4:18, 20, 25-26). In a second, corporate stage on the Day of Atonement, applications of special purification offering blood purge the sanctuary, including its altars, from pollution resulting from human evils (Ex 30:10; Lev 16:16, 18-19) (Gane, 106-43, 230-41, 267-84). Even though the Judahites' egregious sins had reached their altars, the fact that the sins were still etched on their hearts showed that they had not benefited from expiation. So their faults belonged to the category of inexpiable rebellious transgressions that automatically (not through purification offerings [cf. Lev 6:27-28]) defiled the sanctuary from a distance, and for which the offender was condemned to terminal punishment (cf. Lev 20:3; Num 15:30-31; 19:13, 20) (Gane, 144-81, 202-13). To make matters even worse, the horns belonged to "their" illegitimate altars (Jer 17:1), not the Lord's altar. So expiation was impossible, and they would suffer the divine judgment of exile (Jer 17:3-4).

Emphases of the prophets varied according to the nature of their audiences and their relationships to the trajectory of events. Those who addressed northern Israel were especially opposed to syncretistic, idolatrous worship of the Lord at cult sites that he had not authorized, where no sacrifices could be acceptable (e.g., Hos 4:15—5:4; 8:5-6, 13; cf. 1 Kings 12-13) (see Ahlström, 120). Use of illegitimate altars to expiate for sin only increased it (Hos 8:11-12).

In Amos 5 God rejects "your festivals," sacrifices, and even songs and harp music (Amos 5:21-23). Repeated second-person pronouns ("your") focus attention on the offerers: it is the worship of these people that God refuses to accept, not all sacrifice, singing and harp music per se. When they worship at unauthorized cult sites, they fail to seek him (Amos 5:4-6), and they have abandoned justice and righteousness (Amos 5:7, 10-15, 24).

In apparent contrast to unacceptable contemporary sacrifices (Amos 5:22), Amos 5:25 asks whether Israel brought sacrifices (pl. of zebah) and offerings (minḥâ) to the Lord during the forty years in the wilderness. If the expected answer is no, as a number of scholars have assumed, this would seem to contradict the Pentateuch (e.g., Ex 24:5-6; 40:29; Lev 9). But the Hebrew syntax of the question emphasizes the objects: "Were sacrifices and offerings what you brought me?" In context, this could be taken to mean "Is that all you brought me, or did you also bring corresponding justice and righteousness?" (cf. Amos 5:24). The answer would be "No, that was not all. . . . Yes, we also

... ” (for yes to a rhetorical question, cf. 1 Sam 2:27) (Lucas, 61-62). So whereas the ancestors brought acceptable sacrifices to the Lord before entering the promised land, their descendants would carry their idols into exile, where they would continue to worship other gods outside the land (Amos 5:26-27 [cf. NJPS]) (Ander- sen and Freedman, 531-37, 542-44).

2.3. Sacrifices Offered to the Lord at Jerusalem by Disloyal People. To both northern Israel and Judah, Hosea reiterated the relative values of obedient loyalty to God and sacrifice that Samuel had stated to Saul (1 Sam 15:22), but more starkly: the Lord wanted faithfulness and not sacrifice, and knowledge of God more than (comparative preposition min [cf. NKJV]) burnt offerings (Hos 6:6). Given that Hosea foresaw that the Israelites would again seek the Lord along with a Davidic king (Hos 1:7; 3:5), it seems clear that he did not mean to invalidate all sacrificial worship at the authorized temple in Jerusalem. His point was that loyalty was the essential element of a positive relationship with God, so that without loyalty, even proper sacrifices could not atone.

According to Isaiah, God refused to accept sacrifices, incense, sacred times and even prayers (Is 1:15) because his people had rebelled against him and persisted in doing evil, especially sins of social injustice (Is 1:2-4, 10, 15-23) (see Social Justice). The objection was not to the idea of sacrifices atoning for repentant sinners, but to rituals of particular unrepentant people: “your sacrifices” (Is 1:11, 12, 14, 15). It was not assemblies in general that the Lord could not stand, but their assemblies with iniquity; it was not all prayer that he refused to acknowledge, but prayer made with hands full of bloodguilt (Is 1:13, 15). What he desired was moral cleansing and justice, which rituals could not replace (Is 1:16-17; cf. Ps 40:6-8; Mic 6:6-8).

For Isaiah, loyalty was essential to the divine-human relationship (Is 1:2-4), which was based on divine grace (Is 40:16 [no burnt offering was sufficient]). So no religious activity performed outside the framework of loyalty could serve as a valid expression of that relationship. Later, in Isaiah 66:3-4, worship by those who did evil rather than listening to God was as unacceptable as murder, offering impure animals, or idolatry. Because sacrifices signified aspects of relationship, acceptance or rejection of the rituals and their offerers went together. If God rejected one, he also rejected the other. Jeremiah agreed: incense, sacrifices, fasting and crying out to the Lord were unacceptable to him and therefore unable to avert disaster, since the people had spurned his teaching and broken his covenant (Jer 6:19-20; 11:3-17; 14:10-12).

Jeremiah 7:1-20 counters the presumption that the Lord’s temple in Jerusalem provided safety to Judahites who were breaking his commandments, as if cult could substitute for morality. Then the Lord jarringly commands the people to eat the flesh of their burnt offerings along with their sacrifices (Jer 7:21). All flesh from burnt offerings was consumed in the altar fire for the Lord (Lev 1); it was never eaten by a human being, even a priest. So telling the Judahites to eat it along with their “sacrifices” (pl. of zebah), from which they were permitted to eat (Lev 7:15-16), means that God rejected the burnt offerings as his because the offerers were disloyal to him (cf. Jer 7:22-31).

The divine assertion in Jeremiah 7:22-23 that God had commanded the Israelites to obey him at the time of the exodus but did not then speak to them regarding/because of burnt offerings and sacrifices (zebah) appears to contradict the Pentateuch (e.g., Ex 12; 20:24; 23:18; 29:28, 38-42; Lev 1; 3; 6—7; Num 28:6). However, Jeremiah could be referring to the fact that God’s first proclamations at Sinai called Israel to covenant obedience (Ex 19:3-6; 20:1-17 [the Decalogue]) but did not specify requirements for the cultic system, which were presented in detail (e.g., Ex 25—31) only after ratification of the covenant (Ex 24). This order implies that obedience was more important than ritual practices (Thompson, 287-88). Alternatively, the prophet may be using hyperbole to emphasize the same relative priority (cf. 1 Sam 15:22). The possibility that Jeremiah’s statement was limited to individual, voluntary burnt offerings and sacrifices (Lev 1; 3) (Milgrom, 273-75) is unlikely because the prophet was addressing presumption regarding the temple system as a whole (Jer 7:7:2-14) (see Klavans, 81-82).

Prophetic rejection of sacrifice tended to be more limited and specific during the Second Temple period. In Haggai 2:10-14 the Lord deploys an analogy to vividly express the importance of completing construction of his temple. If a person contaminated by contact with a corpse touched food, it became ritually impure.

Similarly, because the returnees to Judah had been “impure,” so was everything they touched, including what they offered—that is, sacrifices at the reconstructed altar (cf. Ezra 3:1-6). The following verses (Hag 2:15-19) imply the cause of the people’s “impurity,” which had made everything they did unacceptable to God and consequently doomed to failure: they had sinfully neglected to build the Lord’s house (cf. Hag 1).

Sometime after the second temple was built, a problem arose when people thought they could get away with offering defective sacrificial victims (Mal 1:8, 13-14), which were disqualified according to Leviticus 22:17-25. God took sacrifices personally as tokens of attitudes toward him. So when he rejected a sacrifice, the individual who presumed to bring it was out of favor with him (Mal 1:8-9; cf. Gen 4:3, 5-7), and he would accept no gift from that one; the doors of the temple may as well be kept shut and the altar fire left unlit (Mal 1:10)! Pure (i.e., proper) sacrifices honored his reputation (Mal 1:11), but those who brought improper offerings scorned his name (Mal 1:6-7, 12).

Animals obtained by robbery also were disqualified (Mal 1:13). Not only did they cost their offerers nothing (cf. 2 Sam 24:24), they were not legally owned and therefore could not be legitimately offered. Moreover, a sacrifice gained by breaking God’s command against robbery (Lev 19:13) added insult to him on top of the initial crime. J. Klawans argues that other prophetic critiques included concern for ownership in a broader sense: sacrificial material from wealth gained by dishonesty and economic exploitation was disqualified because it did not legitimately belong to the offerers. So ethics and ritual were integrally connected (e.g., Is 61:8 NJPS; cf. Amos 2:6, 8) (Klawans, 84-89, 91).

In Malachi 2, as in preexilic prophecies, offerers are disqualified due to moral/ethical sin, in this case divorce (Mal 2:13-16). The sanction against intermarriage with pagans was even more severe: such an individual would be “cut off,” so that he would not even have anyone (in his line of descendants; on “cut off,” cf. Gane, 201) to bring an offering to the Lord (Mal 2:11-12 [see NJPS]).

2.4. Cessation of Cultic Systems. The preexilic prophets did not call for reform of sacrificial procedures; they pronounced doom on the ritual systems of Israel and Judah. There was never hope for the northern cults because they were illegitimate from the start. The northern Israelites were going into exile, where they would have no opportunity to offer sacrifices acceptable to the Lord (Hos 9:1-5), and they would long remain without ability to worship any deity (Hos 3:3-4).

Continuation of the first temple in Jerusalem was conditioned on return to loyalty (e.g., Jer 17:21-27; 26:1-19). But Ezekiel witnessed the departure of God’s presence from his house due to breakdown of his nation’s relationship with the Lord, as especially indicated by idolatry at the temple (Ezek 8—11; cf. Ezek 5:11; Lev 20:3 [idolatry also automatically defiles the sanctuary from a distance]). This implied that God had abandoned the temple and its entire sacrificial system to its fate (cf. Ezek 24:21, 25), pending establishment of a new temple, to which he would return (Ezek 40—48).

Joel prophesied interruption of rituals at the (first or second) temple due to a locust plague so devastating that there would not even be enough grain or drink for offerings (Joel 1:9, 13). Restoration was contingent on human repentance and divine mercy (Joel 2:12-14).

In Daniel 9 one who would strengthen a covenant with many for one “week” would make sacrifice (zebah) and offering (minhâ) cease in the middle of that “week”—that is, the last of seventy weeks of years (cf. Sabbatical cycles in Lev 25:1-8) following the decree to restore Jerusalem after the Babylonian exile (Dan 9:24-27). During the last “week” coincides with the time when the Anointed One (Messiah) is “cut off” (Dan 9:25-26 [after 7 + 62 weeks of years]). So it appears that the Messiah would bring an end to the sacrificial system (cf. Mt 27:51), after which the temple would be destroyed (Dan 9:26b, 27b). In the NT, the end of the need for an earthly ritual system involving animal sacrifices (including the temple system of Ezek 40—48, even though it was not implemented) coincides with Christ’s once-for-all sacrifice of himself and inauguration of his priestly ministry in God’s heavenly temple (e.g., Heb 7—10).

3. Atonement with or without Sacrifice.

Atonement is reconciliation with the deity, whether through sacrifices or not. The Hebrew verb traditionally rendered “to atone” is kipper (Piel of kpr), which denotes removal/expiation of an impediment to the divine-human relationship, whether it is caused by sin or physical ritual impurity (e.g., Lev 4:26; 12:7) (Gane, 191-95). The prophets employ kipper in several ways. Ezekiel's usage in the context of the ideal temple is similar to that of pentateuchal ritual law: various sacrifices expiate for the people (Ezek 45:15, 17 [cf. Lev. 23:37; Num 28—29; note expiatory efficacy for the sacrifice of well-being in Ezek 45:15, 17, as in 1 Sam 3:14]), purification offering blood cleanses the altar at its initial authorization (Ezek 43:18-26; cf. Lev 8:15), and such blood annually purges the temple from inadvertent sins committed by members of the covenant community (Ezek 45:18-20; cf. Lev 16 [but also removing rebellious sins in Lev 16:16]).

Animal sacrifice is not the only means of expiation. In Isaiah's temple vision, the prophet's sin is removed when a seraph touches his lips with a burning coal from the altar (Is 6:6-7). In Isaiah 27:9 expiation comes through reformation resulting from repentance: destruction of (unauthorized) altars and (pagan) sacred poles. Isaiah 53 points beyond animal sacrifice to the substitutionary death of God's suffering servant as a means for removing guilt ('āšām [Is 53:10]). In this sense his death functions like an expiatory reparation offering (also 'āšām [Lev 5:16, 18; 6:6-7]), but outside the ritual system (see Janowski).

In Ezekiel 16:63 the Lord mercifully promises to expiate (kipper) for the people of Jerusalem, without mention of how it is accomplished. Similarly, Daniel 9:24 does not state how conclusive expiation (kipper) for the iniquity ('āwōn) of the Jewish people would be achieved by the end of seventy weeks of years, although it appears that the Messiah could play a role in this (cf. Dan 9:25-27). Direct divine removal of guilt is expressed elsewhere by other terms, such as the Qal of mḥh ("to wipe out" [Is 43:25; 44:22]), Piel of thr ("to purify" [Jer 33:8]) and Qal of nś' + 'āwōn ("to bear culpability" [Is 33:24; Hos 14:2; Mic 7:18]). Some interpreters take Isaiah 40:2 to mean that God accepts the suffering of exile as expiatory (e.g., NJPS; cf. NASB, NJB, NKJV). But here the culpability of personified Jerusalem is paid for (Niphal of 2-rsh) simply because she has completed her term of punishment (cf. NIV, NRSV).

Divine mercy can be withheld by refusal to grant expiation (kipper) for iniquity (Is 22:14; Jer 18:23) or prevention (kipper) of disaster (Is 47:11). In Isaiah 28:18 kipper refers to annulment of a protective covenant with death, leaving presumptuous people exposed to disaster.

4. Relationship Between Prophets and the Pentateuch.

Pentateuchal and prophetic attestations of sacrifices are radically different. Pentateuchal ritual law provides systematic instructions to institute and regulate sacrificial worship officiated by priests, but only the vision of the priest-prophet Ezekiel (Ezek 40—48) is comparable in the prophetic corpus. Elsewhere, the prophets do not even directly mention reparation and purification offerings (see only Is 53:10; Jer 17:1, respectively), perhaps because the scope of these mandatory expiatory sacrifices was mostly limited to unintentional sins and/or cases of sacrilege (Lev 4:1—6:7) that were not significant concerns for them.

Agendas of prophets diverged from those of priests, who administered details of the ritual system and gained their livelihood from it. Prophets lacked such vested interest in the cult. Rather, they viewed it from outside priestly circles and were mainly concerned with effects of their people's ethical and ritual choices (including departures from strict monotheism) on the divine-human covenant relationship (e.g., Is 24:5; 55:3; Jer 22:9; 31:31-34; Ezek 16:8, 59-62). Not surprisingly, opposition of prophets to sacrifices that they regarded as unacceptable to the Lord aroused the ire of some priests (and cultic prophets), who were protective of their institutions and entitlements (e.g., Jer 26; Amos 7).

Prophets invalidated sacrifices for several reasons, but there is no solid evidence for outright rejection of all sacrifice by any prophet (contra Hendel, 190, 196; Barton, 120-21), although Daniel predicted eventual cessation of sacrifice at the second temple (Dan 9:27). "If the prophets had really meant that sacrifice under all circumstances was evil, they would not have needed to bring condemnation of the lives of men into association with their denunciation of the sacrifices" (Rowley, 343).

Where teachings of the Pentateuch and the prophets overlap, they agree on core concepts. For example: (1) The Lord was in voluntary residence at the sanctuary/temple, which meant that he could come or go (Ex 40:34-35; Jer 7:3, 7; Ezek 10—11). (2) Obedience to God, doing justice, and heartfelt loyalty are essential for the divine-human relationship, with no dichotomy between inner experience and outward practice (e.g., Lev 19; 26; Deut 6; Mic 6:8). (3) Ritual and ethics are linked (e.g., Lev 6:1-7 [sacrificial expiation for ethical sin]; Is 61:8 njps). (4) Sins committed by priests and prophets, who represent God to their people, are especially grave (Lev 4:3-12; 10:1-3; Num 20:10-13; Is 28:7; Jer 6:13; 8:10; 14:18; 23:11). (5) God can directly grant atonement, without mention of a need for animal sacrifice (Ex 34:7; Is 6:6-7; 27:9; Jer 33:8; Ezek 16:63; Hos 14:2; Mic 7:18; cf. Ex 32:30; Num 14:19-20). (6) An acceptable sacrifice is a genuine expression by a person loyal to God (e.g., Lev 1—5 [assumed]; Jon 1—2), but a person who despises God's word and defiantly breaks one of his commandments is terminally condemned and therefore barred from receiving the benefit of sacrificial expiation (e.g., Num 15:30-31; Jer 17:1-4). (7) Among the covenant curses, the Lord will reject sacrifices from idolatrous rebels and will destroy them along with their cult sites, idols and cities (Lev 26:30-31; cf. Prov 15:8; 21:27). Much of the prophetic indictment consists of implicit or explicit application of the covenant curses (Lev 26; Deut 27—28) to people of their times (explicitly in Jer 11:1-17).

Scholarly views regarding the original authorship, redaction and dating of the pentateuchal ritual texts and how they relate to other parts of the Pentateuch vary widely. So the chronological relationship between those texts and the classical prophets is a matter of complicated dispute. However, there are indications that at least the original authorship of the pentateuchal texts preceded the preexilic prophetic writings. For example: (1) The prophets remembered the Israelite wilderness experience, when the covenant and pentateuchal laws were given (according to Exodus through Deuteronomy, through the prophet Moses), as the time of their ancestors (Jer 7:22-23; 11:3-5; 31:32; Amos 5:25). (2) The prophets made literary allusions to pentateuchal law, including ritual law (e.g., Jer 11:1-17; 17:1) (see above; Fishbane, 292-317), but the Pentateuch contains no allusions to the prophetic writings. (3) Comparison between the pentateuchal language of the so-called Priestly source (P), which includes ritual law, and that of Ezekiel has indicated that the former belonged to an earlier stage of Hebrew (Hurvitz, 150-51, 154-55).

Whether the prophets interacted with those who formed the pentateuchal ritual texts at some stage(s) of their development (including editing) or not, conceptual differences between pentateuchal ritual and prophetic ethics do not seem sufficiently qualitative or clear-cut to support the conclusion that they represent two opposed trajectories of religious thought. Nor do such differences provide an adequate basis to reconstruct diachronic development from the prophets to the Pentateuch or vice versa (see Klawans, 75-76, 97; Averbeck, 728-29). In any case, if the pentateuchal and prophetic authors had lived at the same time, it appears that they would have gotten along with each other quite well.

SALVATION, DELIVERANCE

Some argue that the concept of salvation/deliverance is the unifying plot of the Bible (see Ryken, Wilhoit and Longman, 752). This divine rescue found its paradigm in the deliverance of God's people from Egypt, persisted with military victories over enemies, and eventually was articulated in *worship literature. Building on theological, historical and cultic themes such as these, the understanding of salvation in the Prophetic Books continues to find expression. God is still the one, the only one, who accomplishes salvation for his people, but they are rescued from even higher powers, those of God's *wrath and their own *sin, and delivered to an even greater end, that of eternal salvation.

1. Language of Salvation and Deliverance
2. Agent of Salvation and Deliverance
3. Nature of Salvation and Deliverance
4. Conclusion

1. Language of Salvation and Deliverance.

G. B. Stevens notes that "in the Old Testament the idea of salvation was the subject of a long development, and is therefore many-sided" (Stevens, 19). Language, in the form of vocabulary, stories, images and literary parallels, demonstrates how full and complex the concept really is.

1.1. Vocabulary. The two most typical Hebrew roots for salvation are yšc ("to deliver" or "to save" [Hiphil]) and nsl ("to snatch away" or "to deliver" [Hiphil]), the former being found in its verbal form fifty-six times, and the latter sixty-five times. The verb yšc implies bringing help to people in trouble ("deliverance unto"), while nsl implies the snatching away or freeing from distress ("deliverance from"). Typically, God is the subject of both verbs.

Related to yšc are the nouns yēša^c, yēšū^c ā, tēšū^c ā, each of which can be translated "salvation" or "deliverance." The word mōšīa^c, usually translated as "savior" or "deliverer," rounds out the salvation language related to yšc and is a Hiphil participle. Although the majority of the occurrences of these terms do not appear in the Prophetic Books, they serve to fill in the depiction of salvation/deliverance in this portion of the HB. Also noteworthy is the fact that many proper names in the OT can be traced back to the verbal root yšc. The names of the prophets Isaiah and Hosea are two of the more prominent examples. "Isaiah" means "salvation of Yahweh" or "Yahweh is salvation," and "Hosea" is an abbreviated form of "Yahweh is salvation."

Of course, oracles of salvation and various descriptions of deliverance do not necessarily contain this typical language of salvation. Many other Hebrew terms are used by the prophets to refer to saving deeds. They include but are not limited to: šzb ("to rescue") and mlt ("to rescue"), g'l ("to redeem"), ʿzr ("to help") and brk ("to bless"). C. Westermann observes that the noun šālôm occurs often in oracles of salvation and can mean both *"peace" and "salvation," the latter of which he defines as the restoration of a whole relationship with God. "Never does [šālôm] mean simply the cessation of war, and never does it mean only the relationship of an individual to God, that is, . . . 'peace with God'. . . We cannot have peace without the restoration of a true relationship with God and all that belongs to it. . . It is not possible to have the 'peace with God' that is announced here without the effect of that peace on the rest of life and on the life of men and women in community" (Westermann 1991, 272).

Further demonstrating the complexity and richness of the concept, Westermann even suggests that the expression "fear not" in Isaiah 44:2 represents the central point of the passage, which is the assurance of salvation (Westermann 1969, 134). "The only way by which Israel can learn that she is God's servant, chosen by him, and give practical effect to her status, is for her to accept the assurance of salvation now being addressed to the nation" (Westermann 1969, 135).

1.2. Story Reviews. The depiction of salvation in the prophetic literature goes beyond mere vocabulary. J. R. Middleton and M. J. Gorman put it well: "Beneath the OT's use of explicit salvation language lies a coherent worldview in which the exodus from Egyptian bondage, followed by entry into the promised land, forms the most important paradigm or model" (Middleton and Gorman, 45) (see Exodus Imagery). Furthermore, the exodus "constitutes the sociopolitical deliverance of a community from a real, concrete situation of oppression . . . [and thus] resists any 'spiritualizing' of salvation, keeping it firmly rooted in life in this world" (Middleton and Gorman, 46). T. E. Fretheim, however, warns of two dangers: either collapsing salvation into a political theology or neglecting the spiritual dimension of salvation altogether. Nevertheless, he can say, "This ought not detract from the biblically-based point that God's saving activity also has to do with deliverance from oppressive social, economic, and political realities" (Fretheim 1993, 367). The continuation of the story of salvation thus captures all aspects of human existence: from history to community to political affairs and daily life.

Recollection of the exodus event and subsequent wilderness wandering can make up an integral part of a prophetic argument. Jeremiah 2, for example, contains a full description of the saving action of the Lord and the unfortunate response of his people, only to conclude, "Therefore I bring charges against you" (Jer 2:9 [all biblical quotations are NIV]). In the same way, Ezekiel 20 is the prophet's answer to the elders of Israel who inquire of the Lord. The divine response, "As surely as I live, I will not let you inquire of me" (Ezek 20:3), is defended with a lengthy account of bringing their ancestors out of Egypt (e.g., Ezek 20:6, 10, 17) and of their detestable practices that followed shortly thereafter (e.g., Ezek 20:8, 13, 21). And in Jeremiah 32, when the prophet is commanded to buy a field in Judah almost immediately before its destruction, part of the basis for his obedience is God's prior saving acts. The prophet prays, "You brought your people Israel out of Egypt with signs and wonders, by a mighty hand and an outstretched arm and with great terror. You gave them this land you had sworn to give their ancestors" (Jer 32:21-22).

Not to be overlooked amidst the lengthy story reviews are the brief historical reminders of the exodus that punctuate many of the prophets' words as modifiers. For example, frequent mention is made of the God "who brought [his] people out of Egypt with a mighty hand" (Dan 9:15 [see also Hos 12:9; Amos 2:10; Mic 6:4]) and of Israel's ancestors who were taken by the hand out of Egypt (e.g., Jer 7:25; 31:32). The historical event is also used as a kind of time stamp by which the audiences can orient themselves: "As in the days when you came out of Egypt, I will show them my wonders" (Mic 7:15 [see also Is 11:16; Jer 34:13; Hag 2:5]).

The exodus event was never far from the minds of the prophets or their audiences, and, according to Fretheim, it would have prompted them to consider the saving act of God in the future: the return of the exiles. "The 'old' exodus event no longer stands on its own as a redemptive and cosmic event; indeed, it is sharply reduced in importance compared to the new" (Fretheim 2005, 192). The Lord says, "Forget the former things; do not dwell on the past. See, I am doing a new thing!" (Is 43:18-19a [see also Is 42:9; 48:3, 6; Jer 16:14-15]). Westermann, however, balances that thought by thinking that it would be "very strange" if the exodus were to be forgotten and obliterated by the new thing to come (Westermann 1969, 127). In either case, this story of salvation from the past has a profound impact on the prophets' understanding of future salvation.

1.3. Images. Throughout the OT, the Hebrew language effectively describes more abstract concepts, such as salvation, using concrete images. Salvation/deliverance in the Prophetic Books is no exception. When God determines to work deliverance on his own, he dons the helmet of salvation (Is 59:16-17). Even the prophet himself has been clothed with garments of salvation (Is 61:10). From the wells of salvation water will be joyfully drawn, and thirst therefore will be quenched (Is 12:3). In response to the rain of righteousness, salvation will spring up like plants (Is 45:8). Salvation is also depicted as the walls of a city (e.g., Is 26:1; cf. Jer 1:18-19; 15:20). Speaking of the glory of *Zion and the end of violence and destruction there, Isaiah says, "You will call your walls Salvation and your gates Praise" (Is 60:18). Isaiah later describes Zion's salvation as a blazing torch (Is 62:1).

1.3.1. The Arm of God. One of the more frequently used images and parallel expressions for salvation is "the arm of God," which, of course, is equated with and often translated as his strength (e.g., Is 33:2; 51:5). The arm is also depicted, more particularly, as the agent of salvation (e.g., Is 59:16; 63:5). Using a simple chiasmic structure, Isaiah says, "The LORD will lay bare his holy arm in the sight of all the nations, and all the ends of the earth will see the salvation of our God" (Is 52:10).

1.3.2. The Shepherd of the Sheep. A frequent image in the OT is that of the sheep and its shepherd. The prophet Ezekiel uses this image quite fully in Ezekiel 34 to depict salvation (see also Jer 23:1-8). As the chapter begins, it is clear that the human shepherds have failed, and that God saves or rescues the flock from them, taking over the ineffective caretakers' responsibilities from them (Ezek 34:1-10). In Ezekiel 34:11-16 salvation is then described in terms of the good that a shepherd will do for his sheep; among other things, he will "rescue them from all the places where they were scattered" (Ezek 34:12). The sheep of the flock, however, will be judged as well and eventually brought under the care of one shepherd, the servant David (Ezek 34:17-24). In the final verses of the chapter God describes the new covenant of peace for his flock (Ezek 34:25-31): "They will know that I am the LORD, when I break the bars of their yoke and rescue them from the hands of those who enslaved them" (Ezek 34:27).

1.4. Relation to Righteousness. Helping to fill out this picture of salvation in the prophets is its relationship to the concept of "righteousness" (šedeq, šēdāqā). On many occasions the salvation of God is set in literary parallel with his righteousness (e.g., Is 46:13; 56:1; 61:10), sometimes complemented by concrete images. For instance, adding to the image of God's own arm working salvation is the parallel expression "his own righteousness sustained him" (Is 59:16) (see Justice, Righteousness). To accomplish this act of deliverance, the next verse says, God dons the complementary divine armor of the helmet of salvation and the breastplate of righteousness (Is 59:17). As Zion's salvation is like a blazing torch, so will Zion's righteousness shine like the dawn (Is 62:1). The rain of righteousness will produce a growth of salvation and more righteousness (Is 45:8).

These relatively simple poetic parallels hint at the complexity of salvation as a theological concept. Stevens notes that national salvation, which is not merely political, and real moral righteousness go hand in hand, so that righteousness accompanies salvation and gives to it its deeper meanings (Stevens, 20). One sees this in Isaiah 51, where in the space of four verses salvation is compared to righteousness three different times (Is 51:5, 6, 8), portraying the universality and eternity of God's righteous salvation. In the first reference righteousness and salvation are described as being on their way to the nations, so that salvation is what God does, and righteousness is the quality of that which fills it (see Motyer, 405-6). "The saving work satisfies every standard of the Lord's righteous nature, meets every legal claim and discharges every debt before the eternal law. . . . In a way that fully satisfies absolute righteousness there will be salvation, an end of divine wrath, an entrance by faith upon divine comfort, strength and joy" (Motyer, 405). The latter two references (Is 51:6, 8) highlight the eternity of righteous salvation that will not fade or flee. "Salvation's durability is in its constitution" (Motyer, 406).

N. H. Snaith goes one step further and relates righteousness and salvation to the doctrine of holiness, making sure that neither holiness nor righteousness is regarded as a mere ethical concept. "Just as religion is more than ethics, so holiness should be regarded as being more than awefulness plus moral perfection. It should be regarded as involving Salvation to at least an equal extent as Righteousness. God is Saviour at least as surely as He is Judge" (Snaith, 79). He continues, "Righteousness is the visible effect of this nearness of God in the affairs of this world . . . and is in fact a personal relationship at root. It is because Righteousness involves Salvation. . . . Without [this nearness and personal activity of the unique, holy God] there could never be any connection between Holiness, Righteousness, and Salvation. . . . Unless the three were inextricably involved, the Holy God could never be the Saviour" (Snaith, 80).

Snaith makes his case primarily using the text of Second Isaiah. "No prophet has insisted more certainly upon the nearness of God to His people Israel, and to His saving activity on their behalf" (Snaith, 80). This is seen, as Snaith notes, in the two characteristic epithets that Second Isaiah uses for God: "redeemer" (e.g., Is 41:14; 43:14; 47:4; 48:17) and "savior" (e.g., 43:3, 11; 45:15, 21; 49:26) (Snaith, 85-87). Snaith concludes his argument saying that "in Second-Isaiah the word tsedeq-tsedeqah (righteousness) has come to mean 'salvation.' The Righteousness of God shows itself in his saving work. Whilst the ethical content must by no means be neglected, . . . in the Prophets . . . the salvation motif steadily becomes supreme" (Snaith, 92). And in Second Isaiah the "idea of Salvation is everywhere dominant" (Snaith, 92).

1.5. Relation to Creation. Like the concept of righteousness, the doctrine of *creation can contribute to one's understanding of salvation/deliverance. G. von Rad says that creation is "a magnificent foil for the message of salvation, which thus appears the more powerful and the more worthy of confidence" (quoted in Fretheim 2005, 189). Touching on the complementary roles of creator and redeemer, Isaiah 44:24 describes the Lord as "your Redeemer, who formed you in the womb . . . who has made all things." "God's saving action upon his chosen people as proclaimed by himself was, [as] it were, an island within the mighty universe of God's work as creator. It is therefore no accident that the combination, Israel's creator and her redeemer, most of all occurs in the promises of salvation (43.1, 15; 44.2; 44.21, 24; 54.5; also 45.11; 51.13)" (Westermann 1969, 25).

While the relationship between creation and salvation is often based on the power of God that enables him to create and to save, Fretheim and H. H. Schmid champion the more involved connections between the two concepts. Fretheim notes, "God's redemptive work does not put an end to God's creative work; God's work as Creator continues through and beyond such historical redemptive actions. . . . The objective of God's work in redemption is to free people to be what they were created to be, the effect of which is named salvation" (Fretheim 2005, 10). But Fretheim is careful not to equate creation and salvation. Speaking in particular of Second Isaiah, he regards the redemptive work of God as a special dimension of his activity as creator (Fretheim 2005, 11).

And then looking ahead to God's cosmic and universal goal, all the while making sure to distinguish between redemption and salvation, he says that "God's redemption is a means to a new creation, and salvation will be the key characteristic of that new reality" (Fretheim 2005, 12) (see also Fretheim 2005, 191-92).

Schmid expounds another aspect in the relationship between creation and salvation, especially as it relates to an ancient Near Eastern view of creation. He first explains the connection of act and consequence: "Whoever does what is right conforms to the created order . . . and hence stands under the blessing. Whoever acts wrongly must in some special way bear the consequences of this deed and thus stands under the curse" (Schmid, 106). Implicating the latter is the preoccupation of the prophets. "The circumstances in which the prophets appeared, the radical consistency of their indictment of the people, and the deadly earnestness with which they demand righteousness and justice comprise a specifically Israelite phenomenon quite without any ancient Near Eastern parallels; nevertheless the substance of their proclamation, the horizon and even the logic thereof, is that of the general Near Eastern view of the order of creation" (Schmid, 106-7).

Bringing the concepts of creation, salvation and righteousness together, Schmid says, "In those cases . . . where salvation (Heil) is described with the concept of šēdāqā [e.g., Is 45:8, 23f; 46:12f; 51:6, 8] . . . 'righteousness' is not understood narrowly as a legal matter, but as a universal world order, as comprehensive salvation. Here too the basic structure of the prophetic message corresponds essentially with the ancient Near Eastern view of creation" (Schmid, 107). Creation theology need not take a secondary position to soteriology, as it too often does, but is rather, as Schmid calls it, "the broad horizon of biblical theology" (Schmid, 102).

2. Agent of Salvation and Deliverance.

2.1. The Incomparability of God. In the Prophetic Books great pains are taken to portray God not just as the typical agent of salvation for his people, but as the only agent of salvation and hence as the Savior. In God's accusation against Israel he frequently notes Israel's persistent appeal to that which cannot save: idols, other gods, humans. Sometimes mention of God's salvation is not made directly, but the implication in those instances is that only he could save. Even if a human instrument is somehow involved in the act of salvation, God is still to be given sole credit. Several passages highlight that there is none besides God who saves (e.g., Is 45:21-22; 59:15-16), and therefore that he alone can claim the designation "Savior" (e.g., Is 43:3; 49:26; 63:8-9; Hos 13:4; Mic 7:7).

In Isaiah 43, for example, God proves himself to his people and concludes, "I, even I, am the LORD, and apart from me there is no savior" (Is 43:11). God is insistent on proving himself as the singular deliverer of his people. In Isaiah 47 God castigates *Babylon, who mocks him by taking his words for herself: "I am, and there is none besides me" (Is 47:8, 10). God does not tolerate such arrogance, and of Babylon's beloved astrologers he pronounces, "There is not one that can save you" (Is 47:15).

Habakkuk 1 records the complaint of one prophet who boldly questions God, "How long, O LORD, must I . . . cry out to you, 'Violence!' but you do not save?" (Hab 1:2). Yet even Habakkuk eventually acknowledges God as the author of salvation when, in the midst of trouble, he says, "I will be joyful in God my Savior" (Hab 3:18). In another prayer God's anger for sin is acknowledged as the speakers ask rhetorically, "How then can we be saved?" (Is 64:5), thus implying that God is the only one to deliver them.

2.1.1. In Relation to Idols. A technique often used by the prophets to demonstrate the incomparability of God's salvation is to contrast it with the inability of others to save. Idols, for one, are unable to deliver (e.g., Is 57:13). In Isaiah 44 God almost humorously describes the situation. A person carves an idol and prays to it, saying, "Save me" (Is 44:17), but "such a person feeds on ashes; a deluded heart misleads him; he cannot save himself, or say, 'Is not this thing in my right hand a lie?'" (Is 44:20). In Isaiah 45 the conclusion is reached: "Truly you are a God who has been hiding himself, the God and Savior of Israel. All the makers of idols will be put to shame and disgraced. . . . But Israel will be saved by the LORD" (Is 45:15-17).

2.1.2. In Relation to Other Gods. Often used interchangeably with the idols are the gods identified with them, and neither are they able to save (e.g., Is 45:20; 46:5-7; Jer 2:26-28; 11:12).

In Isaiah 36—37 Sennacherib himself, king of Assyria, ironically acknowledges that gods are not able to deliver their lands, but he misapplies the rule to the God of Jerusalem when he says, "Do not let Hezekiah mislead you when he says, 'The LORD will deliver us.' Have the gods of any nation ever delivered their lands from the hand of the king of Assyria? . . . How then can the LORD deliver Jerusalem from my hand?" (Is 36:18, 20). Referring to the king of Assyria, God defends his unique ability to save: "He will not enter this city. . . . I will defend this city and save it" (Is 37:33, 35).

Foreign rulers are also known, however, to acknowledge positively the unique ability of the God of Israel to save. As recorded in the book of Daniel, edicts were announced that made it mandatory to bow down to other gods. Men such as Shadrach, Meshach, Abednego and Daniel himself refused to do so and were punished. Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, after witnessing how God kept Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego from harm in the fiery furnace, decreed that no people of any nation or language should say anything against the God of Israel, "for no other god can save in this way" (Dan 3:29). King Darius spoke similarly in a later context: "I issue a decree that in every part of my kingdom people must fear and reverence the God of Daniel. . . . He rescues and he saves. . . . He has rescued Daniel from the power of the lions" (Dan 6:26-27).

2.1.3. In Relation to Humans. Along with idols and other gods, human salvation cannot compare to that of God. Specifically, astrologers, as mentioned above, cannot save the people or even themselves (Is 47:13-14); the king cannot save his people (Hos 13:10); one nation cannot save another (Is 20: 5-6; Lam 4:17; Hos 14:3); and Judah is certainly not able to save itself (Is 26:18). Likewise, the possessions of humans—silver and gold—cannot save (Ezek 7:19; Zeph 1:18). In Hosea 1:7 God claims that he will save the house of Judah, yet this he will not do through human instruments such as "by bow, sword or battle, or by horses and horsemen"; instead, he will save by himself (cf. Jer 14:9).

Ezekiel 14:12-20, however, appears to suggest that at least three men—Noah, Daniel and Job—could hypothetically save themselves by their righteousness (Ezek 14:13, 20). But also this illustration serves the broader point that even these three great men of faith could not save the nation or their own sons and daughters.

2.2. The Instrument of the Messiah. Prophetic references that traditionally are understood as being messianic address the topic of deliverance by speaking of God's instrument of salvation, the coming *Messiah. Jeremiah makes reference to the "righteous Branch," in whose days Judah will be saved (Jer 23:5-6). Micah introduces a ruler from Bethlehem (Mic 5:2) who will, most immediately, deliver God's people from the Assyrians (Mic 5:6). Zechariah announces the coming of Zion's king, righteous and having salvation (Zech 9:9).

Also, the character referred to as the *"Servant of Yahweh" in Isaiah is the one who brings the salvation of God (Is 49:6 [lit., "to be" the salvation of God]). Although the typical vocabulary of deliverance is not found in Isaiah 42, the Servant of Yahweh is the one who will establish *justice (Is 42:1, 3, 4) and who will "free the captives from prison" and "release from the dungeon those who sit in darkness" (Is 42:7).

M. de Jonge observes that the messianic prophecies "announce a decisive and lasting change in the plight of the people, brought about by God. War will end, peace and plenty will be restored, Israel and Judah will be reunited, people in Exile will return; salvation has worldwide dimensions" (de Jonge, 781).

2.3. The Role of the Prophet. Although the prophet (*nābī*⁷) is in no way the agent or even instrument of salvation, his role as messenger to the people is crucial and deserves consideration, since he is one who speaks in the name of God. "Divine inspiration was what made a person a prophet, and what caused the prophet to speak out, and what made others listen to the prophet as a legitimate spokesperson for the divine" (Schmitt, 482). The evidence of this inspiration is the messenger formula. The most common formula is "thus says the LORD," and it indicates that the prophet is authorized by God to pronounce the message (be it of salvation or judgment). Even when the formula is not used consistently, "it is clear from the message itself that an oracle of salvation is commissioned by God" (Westermann 1991, 253). Other formulas include "on that day" and "days are coming."

2.3.1. The Oracle of Salvation. Especially, though not exclusively, the prophet conveys the message of deliverance with the oracle (*maššā*⁷) of salvation. Although "oracle" often is used generically to refer to any prophetic speech, *maššā*⁷ (which can also be translated "burden") more precisely designates a type of speech used by ancient Israelite prophets (Weis, 28). R. D. Weis suggests that translating *maššā*⁷ as "prophetic exposition of divine revelation" is preferable to "oracle" (Weis, 28). He furthermore notes that mostly before the exile, the genre of *maššā*⁷ represented the product of a prophetic encounter with God, communicating how God is at work and how the audience should respond, but that later examples of the genre refer to revelations previously communicated, giving insight into the future rather than direction for action (Weis, 28-29).

Narrowing the broader genre and surveying only oracles of salvation in the prophetic literature, Westermann makes three observations. First, an oracle can be addressed to an individual (sometimes representing a whole family) or a community (mostly Israel and then later the remnant). Second, the length of time between announcement and fulfillment of that oracle varies, usually being short for an oracle addressed to an individual and longer for those directed to a community. Third, regarding the content of an oracle, there is a distinction, expressed in the forms of the oracle, between God's activity in deliverance and the state of well-being, both of which constitute God's saving activity. Many oracles of salvation, however, consist only of the proclamation of deliverance, which reflects a fixed pattern: distress, cry for help, cry heard, deliverance (Westermann 1991, 14-16).

Westermann also helpfully categorizes the oracles of salvation based on their structure and content. He observes that the majority are found in collections of oracles (as in Second Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Third Isaiah, Micah and Zephaniah), while others are found in reports of situations in which oracles were given (only in Isaiah, Jeremiah and, perhaps, Ezekiel, and in the Historical Books). Westermann further subdivides the former into groups: a major group (Group 1) and three secondary groups (Westermann 1991, 15).

The oracles of Group 1, Westermann notes, follow the pattern of Second Isaiah (see also Is 1:1-17; Mic 2:12-13; Nah 1:15—2:2; Zeph 3:18-20). "First, the salvation announced for Israel is open to the people of all nations [cf. Group 2]. . . . Second, . . . the regaining of political power and influence is not proclaimed. That was not a part of the salvation that was being announced" (Westermann 1991, 66). The oracles of Group 2 are mostly short and supplementary and always have two parts, which proclaim the destruction of Israel's enemies and salvation for Israel (e.g., Is 14:24-27; Joel 2:18-20; Obad 15-17). The oracles of Group 3 are conditional proclamations of salvation (e.g., Jer 3:6-18; Hos 3:2-5). Finally, the oracles of Group 4 combine the message of salvation with the fates of the pious and the wicked (e.g., Is 33:14-15; Amos 9:8-10) (Westermann 1991, 17-18). Westermann notes, "It is especially striking that in all the prophetic books there are only these four groups and none of the groups is found only in one or two of the books" (Westermann 1991, 17).

2.3.2. Second Isaiah. Although reference has been made above, the distinctive nature of Second Isaiah is worth noting in greater detail. As described by Westermann, the "message as contained in chapters 40-55 is, as a whole, a proclamation of salvation, a situation not duplicated in any other prophetic book. The reason for this is that the proclamation is concentrated on a single event, the liberation of Israel from Babylonian captivity. A further difference is that here we do not have individual oracles one after another. . . . Rather we have a coherent whole consisting of various literary forms" (Westermann 1991, 39). Westermann identifies at least seven of these literary forms, all of which express salvation: the oracle (or promise) of salvation, which is the most typical form (e.g., Is 41:8-13, 14-16); the proclamation of salvation, which speaks of future events (e.g., Is 41:17-20); praise language (e.g., Is 40:12-31); aggressive polemics against foreign nations and gods (e.g., Is 41:1-5, 21-29); polemics against Israel (e.g., Is 43:22-28); songs or cries of exultation (e.g., Is 42:10-13); and the Servant Songs (e.g., Is 42:1-4) (Westermann 1969, 11-21).

3. Nature of Salvation and Deliverance.

3.1. Scope. While the threats of enemies are ever present in the Prophetic Books, the scope of God's salvation is broadened to include deliverance from the threats of the people's own sin and, somewhat ironically, of God's *wrath. First, the people's own sin has been alluded to above: creating and worshiping idols and looking to other humans or nations for their salvation. Thus, the people's trust in that which cannot save represents the very sin from which they need to be saved. Looking to the future, God speaks of his covenant people in Ezekiel 37: "They will no longer defile themselves with their idols and vile images or with any of their offenses, for I will save them from all their sinful backsliding, and I will cleanse them. They will be my people, and I will be their God" (Ezek 37:23 [see also Ezek 36:29]).

Second, God's wrath, often described by the prophets in terms of the dreaded *Day of the Lord, will ultimately be a day of deliverance for his people. In the emphatic words of Joel, "Everyone who calls on the name of the LORD will be saved; for on Mount Zion and in Jerusalem there will be deliverance, as the LORD has said, among the survivors whom the LORD calls" (Joel 2:32). Zephaniah 1, as well, describes in vivid detail the Day of the Lord, when God will stretch out his hand against all who live in Jerusalem (Zeph 1:4), saying, "Neither their silver nor their gold will be able to save them on the day of the LORD's wrath" (Zeph 1:18). But the closing declaration of God to Jerusalem is this: "The LORD your God is with you, the Mighty Warrior who saves" (Zeph 3:17).

3.2. Duration. Whereas historical deliverance of God's people from their enemies is short-lived and temporary, the prophets develop the eschatological dimension of divine salvation: it is everlasting (e.g., Is 45:17). In Isaiah 51 God speaks of this eternal salvation for Zion. God says that although heaven and earth will pass away, "My salvation will last forever, my righteousness will never fail" (Is 51:6). And again he says, "My salvation [will last] through all generations" (Is 51:8). Likely speaking eschatologically of "that day" (e.g., Zeph 3:11) and after pronouncing that he is mighty to save (Zeph 3:17), God says, "At that time I will deal with all who oppressed you; I will rescue the lame; I will gather the exiles. . . . I will give you honor and praise among all the peoples of the earth" (Zeph 3:19-20).

3.3. Recipients. Related to the notion of God's everlasting salvation is the idea that it is reserved not just for the remnant of Israel, or even all of Israel (e.g., Amos 3:12); some prophetic passages suggest that foreigners may also be the recipients of divine attention that can lead to divine salvation (e.g., Is 45:22; 56:1-3). Speaking to his servant, whether individual or corporate, God says, "It is too small a thing for you to be my servant to restore the tribes of Jacob and bring back those of Israel I have kept. I will also make you a light for the Gentiles, that my salvation may reach to the ends of the earth" (Is 49:6 [see also Is 49:22-23]).

A particular example of the salvation of foreigners, though perhaps more short-term than long-lasting, comes in the book of Jonah when God shows compassion for Nineveh. In response to Nineveh's repentance, God did not bring destruction on the city and its inhabitants (Jon 3). Although the typical language of salvation is not found in this chapter, it is ironic that Jonah, the happy recipient of a unique divine deliverance through the means of a fish (Jon 1:17), was not pleased with this particular foreign recipient of God's deliverance. The book of Jonah well illustrates the truth of the prophet Jonah's own confession from inside the fish, "Salvation comes from the LORD" (Jon 2:9), even if the prophet is angered when this divine deliverance is applied to a foreign city.

3.4. Reason. Salvation in the Prophetic Books often is portrayed as a means to an end. Of course, the reason for deliverance, especially from human oppressors, is practical: life can continue, privately and nationally. Yet more than that, the prophets highlight that salvation, be it from one's enemies, from one's own sin, or from God's righteous wrath, is for the sake of foreign nations and for the sake of God's own people, that all might know God. Salvation is even for the sake of God himself. Alluding to all three reasons for salvation and referring to the recently mentioned illustration of the recipients of salvation, C. F. Keil notes that God's direction for Jonah to preach to the foreign city was not for her conversion but "to give His people Israel a practical proof that He was the God of the heathen also, and could prepare for Himself even among them a people of His possession" (Keil, 277).

3.4.1. For the Sake of Foreigners. First, divine deliverance comes to the people of God, or even to foreign nations, so that the ends of the earth will know God (e.g., Is 52:10). Hezekiah himself acknowledges this when he prays for God to save his people from the king of Assyria: "Now, LORD our God, deliver us from his hand, so that all kingdoms on earth may know that you, LORD, are the only God" (Is 37:20). In an oracle concerning Egypt the prophet Isaiah says, "It will be a sign and witness to the LORD Almighty in the land of Egypt. When they cry out to the LORD because of their oppressors, he will send them a savior and defender, and he will rescue them. So the LORD will make himself known to the Egyptians" (Is 19:20-21).

Narrowing the focus even further and demonstrating that not all within the community of Israel are to be counted among God's people, in Ezekiel 13 God speaks to the daughters who "prophecy out of their own imagination" (Ezek 13:17): "I will tear off your veils and save my people from your hands. . . . Then you will know that I am the LORD. . . . And because you encouraged the wicked not to turn from their evil ways and so save their lives, . . . I will save my people from your hands. And then you will know that I am the LORD" (Ezek 13:21-23).

3.4.2. For the Sake of God's People. Likewise, God saves his people so that they themselves will come to know him and not fear. To that end, the themes of salvation and of the divine presence sometimes are coupled. This is seen often in the book of Jeremiah and comes first of all for the benefit of the prophet himself. Knowing that his message would not always be received favorably among the nations, God says to Jeremiah, "Do not be afraid of them, for I am with you and will rescue you" (Jer 1:8 [see also Jer 1:19; 15:20]). God speaks similar words to a broader audience, his people in exile, reassuring them of their eventual restoration: "Do not be afraid of the king of Babylon. . . . For I am with you and will save you and deliver you from his hands" (Jer 42:11 [see also Jer 30:11; Zeph 3:17]). "Salvation . . . witnesses to the active presence of God among his people and with his leaders" (Hartley, 416).

3.4.3. For God's Own Sake. Finally, salvation is for God's sake—that is, for the sake of his holy name (e.g., Ezek 36:22-32; cf. Is 43:25; Jer 14:7-9; Dan 9:15-19). In response to Hezekiah's prayer mentioned above, God answers, "I will defend this city and save it, for my sake and for the sake of David my servant" (Is 37:35). And in Ezekiel 20 God refers to the paradigmatic act of deliverance, the deliverance from Egypt (e.g., Ezek 20:5-6), when defending his own name or reputation. Responding to his people's rebellion, he says, "But for the sake of my name, I brought them out of Egypt. I did it to keep my name from being profaned in the eyes of the nations among whom they lived and in whose sight I had revealed myself to the Israelites. Therefore I led them out of Egypt and brought them into the wilderness" (Ezek 20:9-10 [cf. Ezek 20:14, 22, 44]).

4. Conclusion.

The theme of salvation, expressed in rich and varied language and communicated by the prophet with the oracle, occupies a prominent place in the Prophetic Books. Only God can save, and he will do so how, when, for whom, and for whatever reason he pleases. "The saving deed then is determinative for the nature of each generation's relationship with Yahweh, and its proclamation inspires the faith to establish and to maintain the relationship (cf. Is 52:7)" (Hartley, 416).

SERVANT OF YAHWEH

The phrase "servant of Yahweh" occurs only once in the Prophetic Books, in Isaiah 42:19; most OT occurrences of the phrase come in Joshua, where it is a description of Moses. But the expressions "my servant," "your servant" and "his servant," with the pronoun referring to Yahweh, come a number of times in the Prophetic Books. The use of these expressions in Isaiah 40—55 has been a subject of close study, particularly because some references are particularly significant in the NT and are also difficult to interpret in their OT context.

3. The Unidentified Servant of Yahweh: New Testament References
4. The Servant Songs

1. Occurrences.

In the Prophetic Books, the first person whom Yahweh designates as "my servant" is Isaiah himself (Is 20:3), the second is a Judean political leader, Eliakim (Is 22:20), and the third is David (Is 37:35; cf. Jer 33:21-22, 26; Ezek 34:23-24; 37:24-25). The description then becomes transferred to Israel as a whole (Is 41:8-9; 43:10; 44:1-2, 21; 45:4; 48:20; 49:3; cf. Jer 30:10; 46:27-28). This transfer has a background in the description of Israel's ancestor, the individual Jacob, as "my servant" (Ezek 28:25; 37:25). In some other passages Yahweh's servant is not identified (Is 42:1, 19; 44:26; 49:5-6; 50:10; 52:13; 53:11). In yet other passages Yahweh's servants (plural) refer to the Israelites corporately or to faithful Israelites (Is 54:17; 56:6; 63:17; 65:8-9, 13-15; 66:11; Dan 3:26, 28). Elsewhere, Yahweh's servants are the prophets (Jer 7:25; 25:4; 26:5; 29:19; 35:15; 44:4; Ezek 38:17; Dan 9:6, 10; Amos 3:7; Zech 1:6).

In Jeremiah, Nebuchadnezzar is "my servant" (Jer 25:9; 27:6; 43:10). Elsewhere, Moses is Yahweh's servant (Dan 9:11; Mal 4:4), as are Daniel (Dan 6:20; 9:17), Zerubbabel (Hag 2:23) and the unnamed "Branch" (Zech 3:8), a new growth from the felled Davidic tree. Zerubbabel himself was such a new growth, and here Zechariah may denote him by "the Branch" as one who represents an embodiment of God's faithfulness to David. Alternatively, the Branch's not being named may reflect the awareness that Zerubbabel's leadership was short-lived, and that he never became king (see Israelite History). "The Branch" then refers to a future Davidic ruler whom God will one day send—a *Messiah," to use the later term.

The Hebrew word 'ebed ('abad in the *Aramaic passages in Daniel) denotes a person such as Abraham's servant in Genesis 24, who is in a committed relationship with a master. This relationship involves a commitment on the servant's part to do whatever the master requires and a commitment on the master's part to protect and provide for the servant. In addition, a servant's relationship with a master means the servant can represent the master and have full power to act on the master's behalf and with the master's authority. The servant's words and acts have the same weight as the master's. These considerations apply in varying ways when the prophets describe someone as Yahweh's servant. Moses' or Isaiah's being Yahweh's servant means that people must pay heed to their words; the same applies to the description of the prophets in general as Yahweh's servants. Ignoring the servant's words means risking the wrath of the master. Something similar is true of Nebuchadnezzar, God's agent in bringing trouble on Judah; the Judahites must submit to him because he is Yahweh's servant. Jacob, David or Zerubbabel is Yahweh's servant (along with "the Branch," if that is not Zerubbabel); this means that Yahweh is committed to them, fulfilled promises to them, and will do so again. Eliakim's being Yahweh's servant means that Yahweh is committed to him rather than to the person who will be displaced in his favor.

This understanding of masters and servants is also background to the description of Israel as "my servant." It is an aspect of the way positions occupied by individuals such as David can be applied to the people as a whole. Yahweh chose David as servant and thereby put him in a position of honor and security. Yahweh has done the same to *Israel as a whole, in a way that reflects Israel's being the descendants of Yahweh's servant Jacob. In the context of *exile, when Israel feels like a worm and has grounds for seeing itself as cast off by Yahweh because of its waywardness, Yahweh assures it that it actually has the exalted status that Jacob and David had as Yahweh's chosen servant. Yahweh has not rejected it (Is 41:8-9; cf. Is 44:1-2; Jer 30:10; 46:27-28). Yahweh's faithfulness to Israel as servant will be expressed in restoring it, and it is a basis for appealing to Israel to return to Yahweh (Is 44:21-22). It is for the sake of Israel as Yahweh's servant that Yahweh is summoning Cyrus to be the means of putting Babylon down and restoring Israel (Is 45:4; cf. Is 48:20). David acted as a witness to Yahweh's deity and power by carving out his empire; now the people as a whole will function as witnesses to Yahweh's acts in restoring it, and in this way they will function as Yahweh's servant (Is 43:10; 55:3-5). Thus, it is Yahweh's intent that through Israel Yahweh's attractiveness should be demonstrated (Is 49:3).

2. The Unidentified Servant of Yahweh in Isaiah 42:1-4; 52:13—53:12.

The central focus of study in connection with the phrase "servant of Yahweh" has been several passages in Isaiah where the servant is not identified, especially Isaiah 42:1-4; 52:13—53:12 (Is 42:5-9 can be seen as an extension of the first passage). Both might be called *"visions," though the term applies more strictly to Isaiah 52:13—53:12 than to Isaiah 42:1-4. Both passages might also be called "job descriptions." Both include words and phrases that are difficult to interpret, which complicates issues raised by the servant's anonymity. The appropriateness of calling them "visions" derives initially from the fact that the prophet (or rather, Yahweh) begins by pointing to the servant, as if he is someone who can be seen: “There is my servant” (Is 42:1); “There, my servant will act with insight” (Is 52:13). Both passages utilize the form of a declaration such as a prophet might make at a king’s coronation, in which the prophet proclaims what the king would or should do, what his achievements would be, and/or what God would bring about through him. The servant’s designation is thus analogous to that of a king. By implication, the designation lays an agenda before the king; it presents a challenge to him.

In Isaiah 42:1-4 the role of “my servant” relates to the *nations, and key to it is the idea of bringing out mišpāt to them or establishing mišpāt among them (see Justice, Righteousness). The word mišpāt is hard to translate into English. It often is translated as “justice,” but the older translation “judgment” is nearer its meaning, though without the negative connotations that often attach to that word. Mišpāt denotes the exercise of power or authority or the capacity to make decisions. Ideally, this will be an expression of justice, though this is not always so. “Government” comes near to the word’s meaning. Isaiah 40:14 asked, rhetorically, who taught Yahweh the way of mišpāt, the way to make decisions about how to create the world or how to run the world. In Isaiah 40:27 Israel asked what had happened to its own mišpāt, to the exercise of governmental power by Yahweh on its behalf in the world. Isaiah 42:1-4 declares that the servant’s role will be to see that such mišpāt reaches the nations. While this might mean that Yahweh’s servant is the means of implementing Yahweh’s rule there, in the last of its three occurrences in these four verses mišpāt is paralleled by tôrâ (“teaching”). This rather suggests that the servant’s role is to instruct the nations, to enable them to see how Yahweh has been exercising authority in the world, specifically in the rise of the Persians, who are overthrowing the Babylonian Empire. The term “nations” often refers to the empire itself, and this may be so here; or it may refer to other peoples who, like the Judahites, will benefit from the fall of Babylon. In the following verses (Is 42:5-9), similar ideas are expressed in different ways as the prophecy follows the form of a commission addressed to a person such as a king, rather than a statement about the king. It declares that the person addressed (it is the context that suggests that this is Yahweh’s servant) has been appointed as “a covenant of the people, a light of the nations.” The servant is the embodiment of what it means to be in a covenant with Yahweh and thus models this for people in general and thereby brings illumination and blessing to the nations.

Isaiah 52:13—53:12 likewise adapts the form of a declaration about a king, though reworking it more radically. One mark of its poetic nature is the way it is structured as a chiasm. It begins and ends with words from Yahweh (Is 52:13-15; 53:11b-12). Inside these words of Yahweh are the introductions and conclusions of a group that speaks about Yahweh’s servant (Is 53:1, 10-11a). Inside this frame, in turn, are the group’s actual reflections (Is 53:2-9), with their key insight at the center (Is 53:4-6). The poem as a whole describes Yahweh’s servant as one who has been attacked and taken near to death, perhaps to actual death. Yahweh affirms that he will be restored and recognized by people. In the vision Yahweh and the prophet stand at a point where the attacks are past but the restoration future, though this does not establish where things are in real time outside the vision. As in Isaiah 42:1-9, Yahweh’s words speak of his significance for the nations, which will be astonished at what they hear about him. In the main part of the vision, the group that recognizes him describes how they came to do so. He was someone who had gone through humiliation, rejection and pain, and they had assumed that this was because of wrong that he had done. They had come to realize that actually he had gone through his affliction as a result of identifying with them in the suffering that came to them, which in their case was indeed caused by their wrongdoing, and also as a result of the ministry that he had exercised to them. He had been willing to go through this experience because doing so could bring them well-being (šālôm). It could do so because he was prepared in accordance with Yahweh’s own purpose to make his obedient suffering a kind of offering to Yahweh that could make compensation for their disobedience (an ’āšām, a restitution offering). The key factor in their coming to this new understanding of his affliction was the silent, accepting way he put up with it.

3. The Unidentified Servant of Yahweh: New Testament References.

The account of the servant’s vocation and significance in Isaiah 42:1-9 and Isaiah 52:13—53:12 is very different from the significance that attaches to being Yahweh's servant in passages such as those that explicitly identify Israel or Isaiah or Nebuchadnezzar or some other person as Yahweh's servant. In Christian tradition it was customary from NT times to take the two passages to refer to Jesus. Thus, Matthew 12:18-21 quotes the whole of Isaiah 42:1-4 and declares that Jesus' healing ministry "fulfilled" it. The NT quotes many individual verses from Isaiah 52:13—53:12 and sees them embodied in aspects of the Christ event. In Matthew 8:17 Yahweh's taking up people's infirmities (Is 53:4) is "fulfilled" in Jesus' healing ministry. 1 Peter 2:22 looks at Jesus' suffering in light of the way Isaiah 53:9 describes Yahweh's servant as suffering without being led into sin or deceit; 1 Peter 2:24-25 utilizes further phrases from Isaiah 53:4-6. In Luke 22:37 Jesus speaks of a "fulfillment" in him of the words in Isaiah 53:1 about Yahweh's servant being counted with the transgressors. John 12:38 sees people's failure to believe in Jesus as "fulfilling" the rhetorical question "Who has believed our message?" (Is 53:1; see also Rom 10:16). In Romans 15:21 Paul looks at his preaching of Jesus around the Mediterranean in light of the declaration that nations and kings would see and understand things that they had never heard of (Is 52:15). Beyond such actual quotations, the picture of Yahweh's servant in Isaiah 42:1-4 and Isaiah 52:13—53:12 is of more pervasive influence in the NT, especially in connection with an understanding of Jesus' death. Thus, until the nineteenth century, Christian understanding of the passages simply assumed that they referred to Jesus.

The rise of critical interpretation of Scripture brought a sea change in the interpretation of these passages from Isaiah. The nature of critical interpretation is to question the church's tradition of interpretation, to seek to start from scratch in interpreting passages, and to ask what they meant to their authors and original hearers. In that context, people would not take Isaiah 42:1-4 as a prophecy of the Messiah's healing ministry, nor would they take Isaiah 52:13—53:12 as an anticipatory account of a crucifixion.

When the NT uses these passages, it starts from Jesus and the knowledge that he is Savior and Lord, and it looks back at the Scriptures (i.e., the OT) for help in understanding what that means. In particular, the first Christians needed help in understanding the surprising fact that the Messiah had been executed. The NT was not preoccupied with proving that Jesus was the Messiah. Its writers and the people for whom it was written knew that Jesus was the Messiah; they did not need to be convinced of this. Instead, they were concerned with knowing more clearly what it meant to call Jesus "Messiah," "Savior" and "Lord" and with understanding puzzling facts about Jesus. Isaiah 52:13—53:12 gave crucial help in that connection. Like any reading of Scripture that starts from the questions of later readers, this use of Isaiah was concerned not with understanding the text in its own right but rather with seeing how it answered these questions. Arguably, critical interpretation did the same thing; it started from different questions, but its quest for the text's original historical meaning was believed to correspond more to the text's own agenda.

4. The Servant Songs.

Critical study thus sought to work out afresh the detailed exegesis of these two difficult passages and also asked whom they describe, not assuming that they describe Jesus. The context in which it considered them in this connection was their setting in Isaiah 40—55 understood against the background of the exile, instead of their setting in the story of Jesus. Yet the collocation of the descriptions of an unnamed servant of Yahweh with the references to Israel as Yahweh's servant in the chapters either side of Isaiah 42 deepened the mystery of whom they referred to. Could Yahweh's servant as portrayed in Isaiah 42:1-4 and Isaiah 52:13—53:12 be the same person as Yahweh's servant in those other passages in the context? It seemed implausible to see Israel as Yahweh's servant in Isaiah 42:1-4, where Yahweh's servant does not cry out in distress (the verb is similar to the one used of Israel crying out under oppression in Egypt) and does not snap off bent reeds or snuff out flickering candles. In the context of the exile, Israel itself is a bent reed and flickering candle and is crying out again as it did in Egypt. In Isaiah 52:13—53:12 Yahweh's servant is suffering as a result of his identification with the wrongdoing of other people and as a result of his ministry to them, and suffering without protest. In the context of the exile, Israel has been suffering as a result of its own wrongdoing, and it is now protesting at Yahweh's long-term abandonment of it.

In subsequent discussion of the tension in the portrayal of Yahweh's servant in these varying ways, a key role has been played by a theory put forward by Bernhard Duhm in his epoch-making commentary on Isaiah, first published in 1892. One of his key theses was that these two passages, along with Isaiah 49:1-6 and Isaiah 50:4-9 plus Isaiah 50:10-11, were not original parts of Isaiah 40—55 but rather were a separate group of poems inserted later into the text. This then would explain the different understanding of Yahweh's servant expressed in these four passages. In light of Duhm's work, it came to be regular convention to refer to these four poems as the "servant songs," even on the part of people who would not share Duhm's critical views.

Separating the four poems from their context in Isaiah 40—55 solved one problem but created another. The problem that it solved was the need to relate the four poems to that context; at one level, interpreters no longer had to reconcile the portrait of Yahweh's servant in these four passages with the portrait elsewhere in the chapters. The problem that it created was the question of whom the four passages did refer to. This question dominated study of Isaiah 40—55 during the twentieth century.

Acts 8 tells of a man reading Isaiah 53 and wondering about its significance. He asks the evangelist Philip whether the prophet is talking about himself or about someone else. Beginning from this passage, Philip tells him the good news about Jesus. Along with the explicit identification of Israel as Yahweh's servant elsewhere in Isaiah 40—55, this discussion provides a framework for discussing possible answers to the question of who is Yahweh's servant in the four passages.

4.1. The Servant's Identity: The Messiah? First, a usual Jewish and Christian view is that it is the Messiah (so, e.g., Oswalt, 108). Partly if not entirely in reaction to Christian stress on the passages in this connection, this view became less common among Jews, who emphasized weaknesses in the Christian claim that the four passages prophesied Jesus. Whereas Matthew 12:18-21 says that Jesus' healing ministry "fulfilled" Isaiah 42:1-4, it did so only in a loose sense. The NT's only actual quotation from the first-person testimonies in Isaiah 49:1-6 or Isaiah 50:4-11 makes a connection with Paul and Barnabas, not with Jesus (see Acts 13:47). While some aspects of Jesus' significance correspond to aspects of Isaiah 52:13—53:12, Jews point out, for instance, that this vision does not suggest crucifixion, that Jesus did not stay silent under sufferings, was not allocated a grave with the wicked, did not have offspring, and did not live a long life (see Outreach Judaism). Whereas it became customary for Christians to use passages such as Isaiah 52:13—53:12 apologetically, as a means of proving that Jesus was the Messiah, we have noted that the NT uses such passages theologically and parenetically rather than apologetically. It uses them, that is, not to prove something but rather to help believers understand what it means for Jesus to be their Lord and Savior, and to help them understand the nature of the life of discipleship to which they are called (see esp. 1 Pet 2:22-25). If passages such as Isaiah 52:13—53:12 are not prophesies of the Messiah, this does not make it inappropriate for Christians to see Jesus as the supreme embodiment of the vision of Yahweh's servant, but it does require a different way of articulating that point.

The NT helps us in two other ways to understand the connection between these passages and Jesus. When the Ethiopian asks whether Isaiah 53 is about the prophet or someone else, Acts does not report that Philip simply says, "It is about the Messiah" or "It is about Jesus." Rather, it reports that Philip started from this passage and told the man the good news about Jesus. This is a rather more allusive statement; it suggests a less direct way of understanding the relationship between the passage and Jesus. Indeed, it corresponds to the way I have suggested that the NT uses the passage. It does not treat it as an anticipatory video of the crucifixion. Rather, starting from specific facts about Jesus such as his silence under attack or people's failure to believe in him, it goes back to Isaiah 53 to enable us to see these facts not as mere accidents but as part of a broader picture of the achievement of God's purpose.

The other way the NT helps us is by Matthew's use of the Greek verb plēroō, translated "fulfill," which often appears in the NT in such connections. In Christian parlance, "fulfill" is a quasi-technical term in connection with the idea that God made concrete revelations about the future, which then come about as announced. But the verb plēroō is not by nature a technical term. It is the ordinary Greek word for “fill.” In contexts such as this, it suggests something like “fill up” or “fill out” as easily as “fulfill.” When Paul speaks of love as the “fulfilling” of the law, he does not mean that if you love, you will obey the law. He that means you will do the kind of thing that the law was aiming at. As there is an indirect relationship between the law and what Christians do when they live by the Spirit, there is an indirect relationship between prophecy and what happens in NT times. The fulfillment fills out the prophecy as it fills out the law; it takes it in new directions, ignores parts of it and reshapes others, and assimilates it to a new agenda.

4.2. The Servant’s Identity: Some Other Individual? During the century following the publication of Duhm’s commentary, many suggestions were made for the identity of Yahweh’s servant in Duhm’s “servant songs.” C. North surveyed the theories propounded over the first half of this period (although North’s book is now over fifty years old, it reports quite enough theories to satisfy most investigators). For a number of these, the starting point could be the identification of this servant in other passages of Scripture, noted above. Moses, for instance, undertook aspects of the role described, and he experienced suffering as a consequence of being Yahweh’s servant. The same might have been true of Zerubbabel. E. Sellin suggested that Zerubbabel was enthroned as king in Judah and then executed by the Persians. Isaiah 52:13—53:12 would then link with this. Zerubbabel had a son called “Meshullam” (1 Chron 3:19), a name meaning something like “one in a covenant of well-being.” The word mēšullām comes with that meaning in Isaiah 42:19 as a description of Yahweh’s servant, and J. L. Palache suggested that the verse actually refers to this Meshullam (about whom nothing else is known) and identified him as Yahweh’s servant.

While no one has suggested that Nebuchadnezzar is Yahweh’s servant in Isaiah 40—55, the notion that Yahweh’s servant is a non-Israelite king opens up the possibility that it is Cyrus the Persian leader, the equivalent figure to Nebuchadnezzar in the time to which Isaiah 40—55 speaks (so Watts, 643-61; Blenkinsopp, 76-77, at least in connection with Is 42:1-9). He certainly is identified as Yahweh’s “anointed” (mēšīah) in Isaiah 45:1.

4.3. The Servant’s Identity: The Prophet? Whereas

Isaiah 42:1-4 and Isaiah 52:13—53:12 speak of Yahweh’s servant in the third person, Isaiah 49:1-6 and Isaiah 50:4-9 are first-person testimonies in which someone speaks like a prophet. This fits the description of Isaiah ben Amoz and of prophets in general as Yahweh’s servants. R. N. Whybray’s comment is apposite: “In view of the fact that in the prophetic books generally the subject of speeches in the first person singular, when it is not Yahweh and not otherwise indicated, is normally the prophet himself, it is remarkable that this identification should have been contested in this case by so many commentators” (Whybray, 135).

The implication is that these two passages describe the ministry of the anonymous prophet whose work lies behind Isaiah 40—55. In Isaiah 49:1-6 the prophet speaks of being summoned by Yahweh before birth, as happened to Jeremiah, and of being designated “my servant.” Isaiah 49:3 goes on to speak of Yahweh designating the prophet as “Israel, in whom I will display my attractiveness,” and then of commissioning a ministry to bring Israel back to Yahweh. The reference to Israel as both the identity of the speaker and as the object of the speaker’s ministry is an issue for any view of Yahweh’s servant’s identity; the designation implies a call to embody what Israel was supposed to be, on an interim basis until Israel itself is brought back to Yahweh. The testimony goes on to describe the prophet’s lack of success but then speaks of Yahweh giving a larger task to the prophet: to be the means whereby Yahweh’s deliverance comes to be known to the ends of the earth. The further testimony in Isaiah 50:4-9 then describes the prophet’s experience of opposition and certainty of vindication. It is only in the supplementary verses of Isaiah 50:10-11 that the speaker in Isaiah 50:4-9 is explicitly identified as Yahweh’s servant.

Along with other scholars, Whybray takes the view that Isaiah 42:1-4 and Isaiah 52:13—53:12 also refer to the prophet, though one could pursue his initial logic and suggest that, as it is natural to take the use of first-person speech to indicate that the prophet speaks, so it is natural to take third-person speech to indicate that the passage refers to someone else.

This raises the question of whether all four of Duhm’s “servant songs” need denote the same person. Many people are designated Yahweh’s servant within the OT as a whole; why should this not be so within Isaiah 40—55?

There is a related question. The problem with the twentieth-century quest for the identity of Yahweh's servant was that it was far too fruitful, as there was no way of arguing for or against many of the theories. This was the problem that Duhm created. Isolating the four "servant songs" from their context in Isaiah 40—55 makes it impossible to identify Yahweh's servant. Thus, T. Mettinger suggests, as in the title of his book, that it is time to say Farewell to the Servants Songs. The fact that they are no more or no less songs than other parts of Isaiah 40—55 is one supporting argument. Going back to reading the "songs" in their context more likely opens up the possibility of progress in interpreting them.

4.4. The Servant's Identity: Israel? This takes us back to Israel as Yahweh's servant, the explicit identification in Isaiah 41:8-9 and the usual modern Jewish view regarding all the passages about Yahweh's servant. When Isaiah 42:1-4 follows on from Isaiah 41:8-9 in making further statements about Yahweh's servant, it is natural to assume that the term refers to the same entity. Isaiah 42:1-4 describes Israel's task as being Yahweh's servant. We noted that the relationship between a master and a servant is one of mutual commitment between the two parties. Isaiah 41:8-9 and Isaiah 42:1-4 represent the two directions of this commitment. But in itself, Isaiah 42:1-4 then describes not a person but rather a role. Its exegesis "must not be controlled by the question, 'Who is this servant of God?'" for it neither tells nor intends to tell us that (Westermann, 93). "The question of the identity of the servant is not raised; attention is restricted to what he is to do" (Motyer, 318). Isaiah 41 has told us that Israel is Yahweh's servant, and Isaiah 42:1-4 goes on to describe what that will involve. The problem is that we know that this servant cannot fulfill this role. Our assumption is confirmed in Isaiah 42:18-25, the sole passage where the actual phrase "Yahweh's servant" occurs, and where the servant is described as being deaf and blind. In this sense, we might see Yahweh's servant in Isaiah 42:1-4 as "the ideal Israel." Isaiah 43—48 confirms that Israel itself nevertheless still has this status and ultimately this vocation, but in the meantime it needs to have the servant role fulfilled toward it. It is in this connection and in this sense that the prophet is to embody what it means to be Israel, to bring Israel itself back to God. Insofar as one can speak of the remnant of Israel as fulfilling the role of Yahweh's servant, it is the prophet who is the remnant of Israel; the broader remnant would be the people who respond to the challenge to identify with Yahweh's servant (Is 50:10-11). The task of bringing Israel back to Yahweh and being a light to the nations is then systematically described in Isaiah 52:13—53:12. In my view, it makes sense to see this as a further description of the prophet's vocation. Its application to Jesus then involves a typological interpretation of it.

In terms of the meaning of Isaiah 40—55, then, there is thus truth both in the view that Israel is Yahweh's servant and in the view that the prophet is Yahweh's servant. Outside of the context of Isaiah 40—55, Christians know that Jesus is the supreme embodiment of the servant vision, and in this sense there is truth in the view that the Messiah is Yahweh's servant. Yet passages such as 1 Peter 2 indicate that the NT also expects the job description or vision of Yahweh's servant to be one that the church fulfills. Isaiah 52:13—53:12 is not fulfilled in the person of Jesus in a way that then means that it has no further implications. The vision of Yahweh's servant is one to be fulfilled again and again. It has been fulfilled by the Jewish people as well as by the church. By its own nature, the vision seeks to draw its readers into fulfilling it (Clines, 63-64).

SIGN ACTS

The biblical prophets had available the full spectrum of verbal and nonverbal elements of communication as they proclaimed their messages. It can be assumed that the prophets used a wide range of nonverbal components, such as body movements, gestures and facial expressions, to emphasize points of their messages. The written records have preserved very few references of such, probably due to the inherent theological and ideological nature of the preserved text, which was concerned almost solely with the content of the messages rather than with how the messages were delivered. Thus, nonverbal elements were reported in the text only when they bore the message content (see Performance Criticism).

1. Definition of "Sign Acts."

Sign acts are nonverbal actions and objects intentionally employed by the prophets so that message content was communicated through them to the audiences.

Sign acts, therefore, do not refer to non-communication activities—for example, Isaiah's going to a location to deliver an oracle (Is 7:3) or Jeremiah's writing the message on a scroll (Jer 36:2). Also, sign acts do not encompass actions that the prophets did in *visions—for example, Ezekiel's eating the scroll (Ezek 2:8-3:3). A further differentiation must be made between an intentionally performed sign act and the prophetic interpretation of an action performed by another person, where there was no intent to communicate a specifiable message—for example, Jeremiah's observing the potter (Jer 18:1-11) and Samuel's interpreting Saul's tearing of his robe (1 Sam 15:27-29). Another distinction must be made between sign acts and rhetorical commands that are figures of speech not intended to be carried out. That category includes, for example, the commands to Ezekiel to "set his face" (Ezek 6:2; 13:17) and to do cooking activities (Ezek 24:3-14); those to Jeremiah to take the cup of *wrath to the nations to drink (Jer 25:15-29) and to go through the streets (Jer 5:1); and the ones to Zechariah to be a shepherd (Zech 11:4-17). Some suggest that actions may have accompanied other verbalized messages, such as Ezekiel performing some type of "sword dance" (Ezek 21:8-17). However, when the text never specifies that actions were performed, it is unwise to include those hypothetical possibilities in the discussion of sign acts.

2. The Literary Form “Report of a Sign Act.”

Sign acts are recounted through the literary form “report of a sign act.” This distinct literary form has two primary components: the divine command to the prophet to perform the specified action, and the interpretation of the sign act.

Frequently, a report will also include other subsidiary elements or motifs, such as an account of the prophet performing the commanded action, a statement indicating the presence of eye-witnesses, a promise or declaration that the event depicted by the action would come to pass, and an explicit statement of the simile relationship between the sign and its referent.

3. Summary of the Sign Acts and Their Meanings.

Reports of sign acts occur in the prophetic books of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hosea and Zechariah:

- Isaiah 20:1-4: Isaiah goes naked for three years to represent the people of Cush and Egypt being led away naked as captives by the Assyrians.
- Jeremiah 13:1-11: Jeremiah buys, wears and buries, by the River Perat, a waist sash to illustrate the people’s initial closeness to God and their subsequent deterioration.
- Jeremiah 16:1-9: Jeremiah does not marry or attend funerals or feasts, representing the people’s future decimation, such that they would be devoid of family members and occasions of ritual mourning and festivity.
- Jeremiah 19:1-13: Jeremiah shatters an earthenware jar, demonstrating that God will shatter Jerusalem.
- Jeremiah 27: Jeremiah wears a yoke to advise Judah to continue its submission to Babylon. In response, Hananiah (cf. Jer 28:10-11) breaks the yoke to symbolize the divine breaking of the Babylonians’ rule.
- Jeremiah 32: Jeremiah purchases a parcel of land to signify that, in the future, fields would once again be bought and sold by the Judahites.
- Jeremiah 35: Jeremiah offers wine to the Rechabites, who refuse to drink it out of commitment to their ancestral oath. Their faithfulness is then verbally contrasted with the Judahites’ failure to keep their covenant with God.
- Jeremiah 43:8-13: In Tahpanes, Egypt, Jeremiah buries a stone to indicate that the king of Babylon would invade Egypt and construct a throne on that very location.
- Jeremiah 51:59-64: Jeremiah sends with Seraiah a scroll to Babylon, which is thrown into the Euphrates to signify the demise of Babylon.
- Ezekiel 3:24-27; 24:25-27; 33:21-22: Ezekiel remains speechless from the time of his calling as a prophet until he receives the news that Jerusalem has fallen.
- Ezekiel 4—5: Ezekiel performs multiple actions revolving around a brick with “Jerusalem” inscribed on it. He lays siege to the city, sets an iron griddle next to it, and sets his face against the griddle; he lies on his left side for 390 days and then on his right side for forty days to symbolize the bearing of the people’s iniquities; he consumes both rationed portions of food and water to represent the scarcity of food during the siege; he bakes his bread on dung to symbolize the unclean food of the *exile; he shaves off his hair, divides it into three portions, and then, to show the threefold fate of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, burns one third upon the model siege, chops up another third with his sword, and scatters the last third to the wind and chases after it with the sword.
- Ezekiel 6:11-12: Ezekiel claps his hands and cries “Ah!” to display God’s indignation over the people’s wicked practices.
- Ezekiel 12:1-16: Ezekiel prepares a bag, digs a hole in the wall of his house, places the bag upon his shoulder, exits through the hole with his eyes covered, and departs from the city to represent the people of Jerusalem going off into exile.

- Ezekiel 12:17-20: Ezekiel eats and drinks with trembling to show the Jerusalemites' emotional distress during the Babylonian invasion.
- Ezekiel 21:6-7: Ezekiel groans to demonstrate the people's response to the news of God's impending judgment.
- Ezekiel 21:8-17: Ezekiel cries out and strikes his thigh to depict the people's gestures of grief. Later, he claps his hands to show the divine indignation toward the people.
- Ezekiel 21:18-23: Ezekiel sets up a signpost to show the ways the king of Babylon might take in his march against the west.
- Ezekiel 24:15-24: Ezekiel refrains from weeping or performing the normal mourning rituals at his wife's death to illustrate how the people should respond to the news of the fall of Jerusalem.
- Ezekiel 37:15-28: Ezekiel joins two pieces of wood to signify the reunification of Israel and Judah.
- Hosea 1:2-9: Hosea takes a wife of harlotry, symbolizing God's relationship to his people.
- Hosea 3: Hosea buys back his wife to symbolize God's taking back and restoring his wayward people.
- Zechariah 6:9-15: Zechariah makes a crown and places it on the high priest Joshua to show God's crowning of the person who will rebuild the temple.
- They often coordinated gestures, movements or actions with objects.
- Only in a few cases were the sign acts nonverbal paralinguistic—for example, Ezekiel's interjection, "Ah!" (Ezek 6:11; 21:15) and his groaning and wailing (Ezek 21:6, 12).
- Since nonverbal communication is inherently ambiguous, the sign acts were coupled with verbal proclamations, which either gave the meaning of the actions or complemented them by giving additional information that was not part of the nonverbal depiction.
- In the temporal sequencing, many of the nonverbal actions were performed first, followed by the verbal interpretation, or were concurrent with the accompanying verbal pronouncements.
- The connection between the prophetic action (the sign) and its meaning (the referent) often was that of a simile: "Just as the prophet has done, so it has or will be or should be done" (see Is 20:3; Jer 13:9-11; 19:11-12; 28:11; 51:64; Ezek 4:13; 12:11; 24:22-24; Hos 3:1).
- In the simile comparison, the prophet could take on the role of either the people or God. In the role of the people, the prophet portrayed the people's past, present or future behavior ("So the audience has done, is doing, or will do"). Ezekiel eats rationed portions of food (Ezek 4:9-11) to show the people's eating of limited quantities of food during the siege of Jerusalem. He eats and drinks with severe trembling (Ezek 12:17-20) to show the people's frightened response to the Babylonian invasion. Isaiah depicts how the people of Cush and Egypt would be led away naked into captivity (Is 20).

In addition to these accounts in the Prophetic Books, there are three in the Historical Books (1 Kings 11:29-37; 1 Kings 22:11 // 2 Chron 18:10; 2 Kings 13:14-19) and one in the NT (Acts 21:10-11).

4. Characteristics of the Sign Acts.

There are several general characteristics of prophetic sign acts:

Besides depicting actual behavioral responses, some of the sign acts exemplified commended responses ("So the audience should do"). Jeremiah wore the yoke to advise the people of the type of response that God was advocating them to take (Jer 27).

When in the role of God, the prophet depicted how God was acting toward the people, who often were signified through the artifact.

Jeremiah shattered the jar, showing that God would destroy Jerusalem (Jer 19:10-11). Jeremiah wore the linen waist sash to signify God's binding the people close to himself. Just as Jeremiah removed it and buried it, so God would remove his people into exile (Jer 13:1-11).

5. Type of Encoding.

With respect to sign-referent relationship, the prophetic sign acts were encoded in two ways:

(1) Representational (or iconic) sign acts had a close resemblance between the sign and the referent, such that the nonverbal act looked like what it signified. For example, Ezekiel's miniature siege of Jerusalem (Ezek 4:1-2) replicated the event. Ezekiel's eating mixed grains and drinking water in rationed portions (Ezek 4:9-11) looked just like the eating habits of the Jerusalemites during the siege. Ezekiel's leaving the city with a bag slung over his shoulder (Ezek 12:6) looked visually like a person going into exile. Isaiah's going naked (Is 20:2-3) looked like the captives being led away naked. Jeremiah's land purchase (Jer 32:9-12) resembled precisely the future legal transactions involved in buying fields. Zechariah's crown and act of crowning (Zech 6:11) looked precisely like a coronation.

(2) Figurative (or symbolic) sign acts were arbitrarily coded in such a way that there was no visual resemblance between the sign and its referent. For example, the people or nation was figuratively symbolized through a waist sash (Jer 13:1-11), an earthenware jug (Jer 19), a scroll (Jer 51:59-64), hair (Ezek 5:1-4), two pieces of wood (Ezek 37:15-28) and a woman taken in marriage (Hos 1; 3). The divine disposition was portrayed through an iron griddle (Ezek 4:3). Bread baked on dung symbolized the uncleanness of the food eaten in exile (Ezek 4:12). Lying on one's side was a figurative depiction of bearing iniquity (Ezek 4:4, 6). The concept of submission was figuratively depicted through wearing a yoke (Jer 27).

In a number of cases the total message was communicated through figurative and representational actions and artifacts being coordinated together. For example, in Ezekiel 4—5 the representational model city (= Jerusalem) (Ezek 4:1-2) was combined with the figurative iron griddle (= divine disposition) (Ezek 4:3), along with the figurative lying on the sides (= bearing iniquity) (Ezek 4:4-6) and the representational rationed food (= siege food) (Ezek 4:9-11), and the figuratively depicted unclean food (= exile food) (Ezek 4:12). The figuratively encoded hair (= people) was cut up with the sword, representational of military slaughter, and burned with fire, representational of the conflagration of Jerusalem (Ezek 5:1-4).

6. Actual Performance.

The actual performance of some of the sign acts has been questioned on various grounds. It has been suggested that some would have been incapable of being performed, or that some exceeded the boundaries of moral decency or violate prescribed religious practices, or that some are too unaesthetic in nature. For some of the sign acts, it has been suggested that they were too subtle, either in their performance, so that they would not have been noticed, or in their meaning, so that they would not have been understood. It has been argued that the rhetorical impact of telling about an action obviates the necessity of the audience having to see a live performance of it. Based on those objections, the accounts of sign acts are viewed as literary fictions of events that did not actually occur or were accounts of visionary experiences.

Contrary to that perspective, the literary accounts themselves describe the sign acts as things the prophets actually did. First, several of the accounts include statements that the prophets carried out the actions (Is 20:2; Jer 13:2, 5, 7; 32:9-14; 35:3-5; Ezek 12:7; 24:18; 33:22; Hos 1:3; 3:2). Second, some of the narratives refer to the presence of eyewitnesses (Jer 19:1, 10; 32:12; 43:9; Ezek 4:12; 12:3-7; 21:6; 24:27; 33:22; 37:20). Third, verbal audience responses are sometimes recounted, which indicates the presence of audiences who then inquired about what they had just seen (Ezek 12:9; 21:7; 24:19; 37:18). Fourth, some of the sign acts are designated as "signs" ('ôt, mōpēt [Is 20:3; Ezek 4:3; 12:6, 11; 24:24, 27]). The primary characteristic of those Hebrew terms is that of a visually observable phenomenon. Fifth, the imperatives that command the nonverbal sign acts are verbs of "doing." Thus, they are distinct from commands to verbally prophesy, which are verbs of speaking (such as "speak," "call out," "say," "prophesy"). Sixth, the literary form "report of a sign act" and the language used to command the actions are quite different from the reports of visions and the distinctive language associated with the apprehension of visions (such as “look,” “see,” “behold”).

These accumulative arguments suggest that the reader is to view the actions as actually having taken place, and that they were, under divine directive, intentionally and publicly performed by the prophets.

7. Hermeneutical Paradigms for Understanding the Sign Acts.

The prophetic sign acts have been analyzed from several varied perspectives to explain both the relationship between the sign acts and the real events that they portrayed and the purpose and function of the nonverbal actions as prophetic proclamation.

7.1. Inherently Efficacious. The perspective of inherent efficaciousness views the performances of sign acts as causally setting the depicted events in motion, which would then inevitably occur. An underlying presupposition is that the actions’ effectiveness was an inherent quality within the actions themselves, and thus the sign acts are comparable to sympathetic magic or the power of the spoken word (Amsler; Bowker; Fohrer; Fraser; Matheney; Pilch; Robinson). With respect to the connection between prophetic sign acts and sympathetic magic, the sign acts are viewed as originating out of sympathetic magic, but as employed by the Israelite prophets, they had, to varying degrees, overcome or transformed the incompatible magical metaphysical and functional presuppositions and ideology. The ideology transformation was such that the sympathetic magic perception that the power to produce results was inherent in the act itself or in the properly executed technical ritual was altered so that within the prophetic perspective the efficaciousness of the sign acts was derived from and guaranteed by God.

Frequently the sign acts’ inherent efficaciousness is viewed as being equivalent to the power of the spoken word, which posits that the word was viewed as a substantive entity, which, once spoken, would assuredly come to pass. It is suggested then that nonverbal communication must have the same type of, or even greater, efficaciousness in bringing about the resultant fulfillment.

them were not future-oriented. Rather, they depicted past or present events. Hosea’s marriage (Hos 1:2) depicted the past and current state of the covenant relationship. Similarly, Jeremiah’s wearing of the waist sash (Jer 13:1-2) depicted the people’s past closeness to God (Jer 13:11), which contrasted radically with the future spoiled condition of the people (Jer 13:7-10). Jeremiah’s wearing of the yoke (Jer 27) depicted the people’s current subjugation to the Babylonians under which they were to remain.

Besides some of the sign acts not depicting future events, the assumption of an inherent efficaciousness, based either on some type of link with sympathetic magic or the power of the word, has been challenged along several other lines. Anthropological and sociological studies challenge the presupposition that Israelite culture must have had a magical worldview out of which the sign acts would have derived (Lang). The concept that the ancient Israelites believed in the efficacious power of the word has been challenged with the argument that words are to be viewed as performatives (Hutton; Thiselton), whose ability to “do” things is related to the speaker and the occasion of the speech rather than being an inherent metaphysical quality.

7.2. Prophetic Drama. The perspective of prophetic drama views the sign acts as expressing reality rather than causing it (Stacey). The divine will, as a single entity, has many different modes of expression, consisting of not only the event or fulfillment itself but also the verbal oracle that speaks of it and the sign act that nonverbally depicts it. The dramatic expression of the divine will through the sign acts was only a window through which the divine reality was perceived. Within this paradigm, the communicative and persuasive aspects of the sign acts are relegated to a secondary function, even to the point that audiences need not have been present if the sign acts were actually performed. Likewise, whether the action was performed or whether it was merely a literary construct is of no real significance when understanding it as an expression of the divine will.

Whereas this explanation seeks to elucidate the metaphysical relationship between the depicted event (referent) and the depiction (sign), it does little to explain the purpose and functional aspects of the prophetic sign acts as to why they were performed or why they were addressed to particular audiences.

7.3. Acts of Power. A sociological approach to understanding the prophetic sign acts is viewing them as acts of power or prophetic actions (Overholt; McKnight). This perspective seeks to determine how the actions functioned within the context of the social interaction between the prophets and their audiences, specifically with respect to legitimating and authenticating the prophets' authority as intermediaries. The sociological category "acts of power" encompasses all actions that inform of the prophets' status. So, along with sign acts, acts of power include performances of miracles and all actions done in the role of prophet, many of which did not intentionally communicate specifiable message content.

Although that paradigm gives insight as to how the actions functioned within the social context of the prophet and audience interaction, it does not deal with the sign acts' primary communicative and rhetorical functions, with respect either to the meanings of specific messages or to the reason for communicating the particular messages within a particular context. Rather, the sociological paradigm deals with a secondary aspect of the sign acts of how identity as a prophet was attributed.

7.4. Street Theater. Street theater is public performance by individuals that employs dramatic, unexpected and unconventional methods as they seek to attract the audience's attention so that they will listen to and be persuaded of messages to which they would normally be unreceptive. Frequently street theater is associated with political propaganda (Lang). One such example is Nikita Khrushchev's banging his shoe on the table at the United Nations in 1960. The focus of the comparison with the prophetic sign acts is that of their public and persuasive purpose.

Although emphasizing the persuasive aspect of the prophetic sign acts, this paradigm fails to make technical distinctions between various actions with respect to their type, encoding or primary functions. For example, Khrushchev's action was an intrinsically encoded action (i.e., the act and the referent were the same) that displayed his personal anger, whereas the prophetic sign acts were representationally and figuratively encoded actions that were separate and distinct entities from the events or emotions that they referenced. Khrushchev's action functioned primarily in an interactive sense to gain attention, whereas the prophetic sign acts, although interactive, were primarily communicative as they sought to communicate specifiable messages in simile form.

7.5. Rhetorical Nonverbal Communication. This interdisciplinary approach seeks to explain the sign acts' various types, functions and purposes using definitions from the fields of both nonverbal communication and rhetoric (Friebel). The intentional purpose and function of the prophetic sign acts were to communicate specific messages through the nonverbal elements and to persuade the audiences through a wide range of rhetorical strategies. As rhetorical communication, there are similarities between the sign acts and verbal prophecy. Beyond just prediction, both gave advice of what action to take, warned of the consequences of behaviors, or indicted for sin. For example, Jeremiah's wearing the yoke (Jer 27) functioned in an advisory way as to how Judah should respond to the current Babylonian rule. Jeremiah's offering wine to the Rechabites (Jer 35) produced a demonstration of their covenant faithfulness, which he then used, in a contrastive manner, to indict the Judahites for their ongoing unfaithfulness in their covenant relationship with God. Even if predictive, some of the sign acts can be viewed as warnings that conveyed divine intention and conviction, but not necessarily an inevitable happening (see the sign act in Acts 21:10-11), as with contingent verbalized predictions. Whereas the nonverbal sign acts served communicative and rhetorical functions similar to those of verbalized prophecies, the key distinction was the channels (nonverbal versus verbal) through which the communication took place.

SIN, SINNERS

One key dimension of the role of the prophet was to confront the people of *Israel and the *nations of the world with their sin, and so it is not surprising that the theme of sin dominates the prophetic corpus. This dominance can be demonstrated by the ubiquity and breadth of vocabulary and images related to sin in the Prophetic Books and the development of the theme of sin throughout the individual Prophetic Books. Sin is here defined as a violation in thought, word or deed against another party (divine, human, creation) that breaks a divinely ordered norm (Boda, 11).

1. Words Related to Sin and Sinners.

The prophets regularly employ the roots and their cognates most commonly associated with sin throughout the OT, including: ^ʾśm (Qal: "be guilty," Hos 4:15; Ezek 25:12; ^ʾāsām: "guilt," Jer 51:5; ^ʾasēmā: "guilt," Amos 8:14), ḥṭ' (Qal: "do wrong, sin," Is 1:4; Hiphil: "mislead into sin," Jer 32:35; ḥēṭ': "sin," Is 1:18; ḥaṭṭā': "sinful," Is 1:28; ḥaṭṭā'ā: "sin," Is 5:18; ḥaṭṭā't: "sin," Jer 36:3), pś' (Qal: "rebel," Hos 8:1; pesā': Ezek 18:30, "sin"), ^ʿwn (^ʿāôn: "sin," Hos 5:5; "guilt," Hos 7:1; ^ʿonā: "sin," Hos 10:10), rś' (Qal: "be evil," Dan 9:15; Hiphil: "do wrong," Dan 9:5; "declare guilty," Is 50:9; rāsā': "guilty," Is 5:23; "guilty, wicked person," Ezek 3:18-19; resā': "wickedness," Is 58:4; rīs'ā: "offence," Ezek 18:27) and r' (Qal: "be evil," Is 59:15; Hiphil: "do evil," Zeph 1:12; ra': "bad, evil," Jer 8:3; ro'a: "evil, wickedness," Hos 9:15; rā'ā: "evil, wickedness," Jer 11:15; mēra': "evil deed," Dan 11:27; mērē'a: "evildoer," Is 1:4), ^ʾawā (Qal: "do wrong," Dan 9:5; Hiphil: "do wrong," Jer 9:4; ^ʾāwel: "wrong," Ezek 3:20), ^ʾwl (Piel: "do evil, act wrongfully," Is 26:10; ^ʾawāl: "evil, unjust one," Zeph 3:5; ^ʾawēlā: "wickedness, injustice," Is 59:3; ^ʾalēwā: "evil, wickedness," Hos 10:9); and m'ī (Qal: "violate one's legal obligations," Ezek 20:27; ma'al: "disloyalty, infidelity," Ezek 14:13).

It is commonplace in OT scholarship to provide a specific nuance for many of these words, for example, defining the root ḥṭ' as "missing the mark" (in light of the use of this root in Judg 20:16) or the root ^ʿwn as "to be crooked" or pś' as "to rebel" (2 Kings 3:5) or "to breach a relationship" (cf. Martens). However, the ubiquity of these terms in a variety of contexts that do not evidence these meanings suggests otherwise (see Knierim 229-35). Too close attention to this dominant vocabulary also deflects attention from the breadth of vocabulary and imagery used to designate sin in the Prophetic Books, including: ^ʾāwen ("sin, injustice," Hos 6:8); bzh (Qal: "despise," Mal 1:6); bēliya'al ("wickedness, evil person," Nah 1:11); znh (Qal: "reject," Hos 8:3, 5); znh (Qal: "commit fornication," Jer 3:6; zēnūnīm: "fornication," Ezek 23:11; zēnūt: "fornication," Jer 3:2; tazēnūt: "fornication," Ezek 23:7); hnp (Qal: "be desecrated," Is 24:5; Hiphil: "defile," Jer 3:2; ḥānēp, "godless, ungodly," Is 10:6; ḥānēp: "ungodly person," Is 9:17 [MT 16]; ḥōnep: "wickedness," Is 32:6; ḥānupā: "wickedness," Jer 23:15); yā'al (Niphal:

“turn out to be a fool,” Jer 5:4); kātam (Niphal: “be defiled/morally unclean,” Jer 2:22); m’n (Piel: “refuse,” Zech 7:11; mā’en: “refusing,” Jer 38:21; mē’en: “disobeying,” Jer 13:10); m’s (Qal: “reject,” Hos 4:6); mrd (Qal: “rebel,” Ezek 2:3); mrh (Qal: “be rebellious,” Jer 5:23; Hiphil: “behave rebelliously,” Ezek 5:6; mēri: “rebellious,” Ezek 2:5); n’p (Qal: “commit adultery,” Jer 3:9; Piel: “commit adultery,” Ezek 23:37; ni’up: “adultery,” Jer 13:27; na’āpūp: “adultery,” Hos 2:4); n’s (Qal: “spurn,” Jer 33:24; Piel: “spurn,” Is 1:4; ne’āšā: “blasphemy,” Ezek 35:12); nū’a (Qal: “wander,” Jer 14:10); br (Qal: “overstep, contravene,” Dan 9:11); zb (Qal: “abandon,” Jer 1:16); ml (āmāl: “harm,” Hab 1:13); swg (Niphal: “prove faithless,” Jer 38:22); swr (Qal: “turn aside,” Jer 5:23; sārā: “apostasy,” Is 1:5); srr (Qal: “be stubborn,” Is 1:23; sar: “stubborn ones, revolvers,” Jer 6:28); sūt (Hiphil: “mislead, incite,” Jer 38:22); šwb (Qal: “apostasize,” Jer 3:19; sōbāb: “backsliding,” Is 57:17; sōbēb: “backsliding,” Mic 2:4; mēsūbā: “backsliding,” Jer 2:19). This breadth of vocabulary reveals the multifaceted nature of the description of the sin of the prophets’ audiences.

2. Images Related to Sin and Sinners.

Not only is the vocabulary of the prophets dominated by the theme of sin, but so also is its imagery (see especially Goldingay 2:254-349). Many of these images are drawn from the world of nature, both animate and inanimate. *Animal imagery related to sin and sinners is connected with the snake (hatching eggs, Is 59:5), spider (weaving webs, Is 59:5), camel (running aimlessly, Jer 2:23), donkey (in heat, Jer 2:24), lion (ravenous, Jer 2:30; Ezek 22:25), horse (charging into battle, Jer 8:6; neighing, 50:11), cow (untrained calf, Jer 31:18; threshing, Jer 50:11; of Bashan, Amos 4:1; stubborn, Hos 4:16), wolf (tearing prey, Ezek 22:27), sheep (gone astray, Is 53:6), goat (goring, Dan 8:4), partridge (hatching eggs not its own, Jer 17:11), ostrich (cruel, Lam 4:3) and dove (silly, without sense, Hos 7:11). These images are dominated by depictions of the violent and uncontrollable behavior of animals, whether domesticated or not. Connections to fertility and web-weaving suggest the spread of evil.

Botanical features (see Floral Imagery) like the flower (fading, Is 28:1; 40:6-8), grass (withering, Is 40:6-8), chaff (blown away from the threshing floor, Hos 13:3), leaf (wither, Is 64:6), oak (whose leaf fades away, Is 1:30), garden (without water, Is 1:30), grape (rotten, Is 5:2, 4), plant and vine (foreign species, Is 17:10; Jer 2:21), straw (trodden down in manure, Is 25:10), fig (rotten, Jer 24:8) and thorn (tangled, Nah 1:10) are used at other times to designate sin and sinners. These features often point to the ephemeral nature of sinful humanity, but also to the inappropriate fit of the sinful before Yahweh.

Various inanimate basic elements in nature, such as fire (burning forests, Is 9:18), water (rumbling, Is 17:12-13), cloud/mist/dew (wiped out, Is 44:22; Hos 13:3), wind (blows away, Is 64:6), smoke (blown away from a chimney, Hos 13:3), dung (on the ground, Jer 25:33) and ashes (trampled underfoot, Mal 4:3), are also employed as images for sin and sinners. These images emphasize the power of sin (fire, water), but also its ephemeral (cloud/mist/dew, wind, smoke) and worthless (dung, ashes) nature.

In other cases agricultural features such as a scarecrow (idols as mute, Jer 10:5), fallow ground (in need of breaking up to sow righteousness, Hos 10:12), a vineyard (producing worthless grapes signifying evil, Is 5:1-7) and a shepherd (feeding himself as a self act, Ezek 34:2) are employed to describe sin and sinners.

Sin and sinners are related in the Prophets to various human manufactured items, such as a cistern (broken, Jer 2:16), a cord/rope (to drag iniquity, Is 5:18), liquor (diluted, Is 1:22), attire (unclean skirt, Lam 1:9; unclean garments, Zech 3:3-4), an earthen jar (valueless in contrast to fine gold, Lam 4:2), a rod (Ezek 7:11), an oven (smoldering, Hos 7:6), metal (silver becomes dross, Is 1:22; bronze, tin, iron, Ezek 22:18-19), cake (not turned, Hos 7:8), bow (deceitful, Hos 7:16), and traps and nets (Hos 5:1; snare of a bird catcher, 9:8). Each of these images has its own nuance.

Various types of humans are used to designate sin and especially sinners, including a son (rebellious, Is 1:2; 30:1; 57:4; Ezek 2:4), a daughter (arrogant and seductive, Is 3:16; trusting in her treasures, Jer 49:4), a woman (pregnant, Is 26:18; figurine, Zech 5:7-8), a wife (adulterous, Ezek 16:32), a harlot (Is 1:21; 23:16-18; Jer 2:16; Ezek 6:9; 23:3-21; 43:9; Hos 2:2-7; 4:10-15; 5:4; 6:10; 9:1; Nah 3:4), a drunkard (the earth staggering under transgression, Is 24:20), a swimmer (spreading hands, Is 25:11). Finally, human social groupings, especially the household (Ezek 2:5, 6, 8; 24:3) and the city (Sodom, Lam 4:6; the tyrannical city, Zeph 3:1; the bloody city, Nah 3:1), are also employed to designate sinners.

This lexical and imagistic data alone highlights sin as a major motif within prophetic literature, a dominant interest for this tradition commissioned by Yahweh to call the people to fidelity in relationship with both God and humanity. The many passages in which these words and images appear provide the best insight into the prophetic viewpoint on sin and sinners.

3. Sin and Sinners.

3.1. Isaiah. Isaiah focuses considerable attention on sin and sinners, offering insights into God's revelation to the nation over more than two centuries. Noting how the book begins and ends by focusing on the rebellion of the people (pš'; Is 1:2; 66:24), Oswalt (38) concludes: "Above all else, sin is rebellion for Isaiah" (cf. Is 24:20; 27:4; 10x in Is 40—55; 6x in Is 56—59), and "this rebellion is an expression of human pride" (cf. Is 2:17; 9:9; 13:11; see also Nysse, who notes Is 48:8 as well). The problem of sin in the book of Isaiah is largely understood through the lens of trust, that is, the people's shortcomings are described in terms of their lack of trust in Yahweh. Thus throughout Isaiah 28—33 the leaders and people fall into the trap of trusting in human religious (Is 28:15-19), economic (Is 30:12-14) and political (Is 30:1; 31:1-3) resources. This theme of trust continues into Isaiah 40—55. Isaiah 40:12-31 reveals that the people are struggling to trust in Yahweh before the might of the nations and the allure of their *idols. Thus the people are tempted to trust in idols (Is 42:17). The final section of the book, Isaiah 56—66, reveals the enduring struggle of the community with sin (esp. Is 56:9—59:15; 63:7—66:17). Here the emphasis is on *justice and righteousness (56:1; 59:14), with the contrast between unjust behavior and fasting rituals in Isaiah 58 highlighting the dysfunction of the community.

3.2. Jeremiah. Jeremiah played a key role in the closing moments of the kingdom of Judah, delivering a message of judgment that would seal its fate. The book that bears his name consistently highlights the sin of the people (see Thompson, 110-12; Eldridge 322-25), focusing particularly on the people's propensity to *worship false gods, which compromised their relationship with Yahweh (e.g., Jer 2:7), and to engage in personal and social sins, which destroyed their relationships with one another (e.g., Jer 7:5, 8). Such acts were "not just casual or habitual breaches but a basic attitude (2:22; 5:3, 5; 36:7), even though not natural since nations don't forsake their gods (2:10, 11), leopards their spots or Ethiopians their skin (13:23)" (Thompson 110-12; on this unnaturalness see Eldridge, 322). Sin is described in terms of negative behaviors, including idolatry, injustice, adultery and murder, but also in terms of the affections of the heart, as the people are accused of acting in the stubbornness of their evil hearts (Jer 7:24; 11:8; 13:10; 16:12; 18:12).

3.3. Lamentations. There is admission of sin in the book of Lamentations (Lam 1:5, 8-9, 14, 18, 20, 22; 2:14; 3:39-42; 4:6, 13, 22; 5:7, 16), but few details are provided as to the specific sins that were committed, besides the more general references to rebelling against Yahweh (Lam 1:20; 3:42) and his command (Lam 1:18), allusions to inappropriate lovers, possibly other nations or their gods (Lam 1:19), and comparative evil (greater than Sodom in Lam 4:6). Sin is connected with the prophets and priests (Lam 4:13), as well as with former generations (Lam 5:7).

3.4. Ezekiel. The sins identified in Ezekiel echo those attacked by earlier prophets, that is, both social sins (Ezek 34) and the sins of idolatry and apostasy (Ezek 8; see McKeating 85-91; Goldingay 2:256; Fishbane [134] speaks of "the people's civil and cultic sins"). What distinguishes Ezekiel, however, is thus not as much in sins identified, although at times he focuses on priestly offenses like Sabbath breaking and purity violations, but rather "in consistently designating the sins of the people as profanation and impurity" (Wong 120; von Rad II:224), especially using terms like abomination (tô'ebā; e.g., Ezek 6:9; 11:21; 18:24; 43:8), profaning (hālāl; e.g., Ezek 20:16), impurity (tm' Piel; e.g., Ezek 5:11; 36:17; 43:7-8), unfaithfulness (ma'al; e.g., Ezek 14:13; 18:24; 39:23); (McKeating 87; Wong 133; Goldingay 2:256). Commissioning narratives such as Ezekiel 1—3 focus on the rebellion (mēri) of the people (e.g., Ezek 2:5), while other key passages leverage imagery drawn from the violation of the marital covenant (Ezek 16, 17, 20) or vassal treaty (Ezek 12, 17; Wong 246-54) to describe the sin of the people.

3.5. Daniel. Sin within the first major section of Daniel (Dan 1—6) is associated with non-Judahites, that is, the emperors and their officials. Emphasis is placed on the sin of the emperors throughout these chapters, especially focusing on the pride of Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar, who fail to acknowledge Yahweh's sovereignty (Dan 4—5). The second major section of Daniel (Dan 7—12) continues this emphasis on the sin of the kingdoms of the earth, the source of great oppression against the faithful community. The fact that these kingdoms arise from the "sea" (Dan 7:3) suggests that they are of evil origin. Their oppression involves violation of orthodox worship as they eliminate daily sacrifice, destroy the holy city and sanctuary, and institute illicit worship (Dan 8:11-12; 9:26-27). Sin is evident in this section among the members of the Jewish community, hypocrites who forsake and violate the covenant (Dan 11:30-34). Embedded within this section is the important prayer of Daniel (Dan 9), which confesses the sins of the nation, seeking to bring an end to exile according to the agenda of Deuteronomy 28, Leviticus 26:39-40 and 1 Kings 8. Daniel is honest about the sin of his nation, employing the full breadth of vocabulary available to him (e.g., Dan 9:5, 15, 16) and identifying the various groups whose behavior violated Yahweh's instructions (Dan 9:5-8).

3.6. Book of the Twelve. Within the Book of the Twelve Hosea's presentation of sin is notably dominated by the metaphor of the unfaithfulness of Israel as the wife of Yahweh.

Such a metaphor is appropriate in part because of the similarity of the marriage relationship to the covenant relationship. Harlotry as going after lovers outside of and in violation of the relationship of undivided loyalty between husband and wife vividly uncovers the nature of Israel's sin. (Miller, 7)

This marital unfaithfulness points in particular to the community's involvement in illicit cult activity (Hos 4:4-19; 6:1-6; 8:4-6, 11-13; 9:1; 10:1-8; 13:1-3) which has resulted "in the dissolution of her personal relationship with her God, who has given himself to her in personal acts of love throughout the course of her history" (Wolff 1974, xxvii). The list of sins in Hosea 4:1-3 reveals that the prophet is also concerned with violations against fellow Israelites, focusing on both sins of omission ("there is no truth or faithfulness or knowledge of God in the land") as well as those of commission ("swearing, deception, murder, stealing and adultery"; see Miller, 10). Offenses that compromise Israel's relationship with Yahweh and their fellow Israelites are both related to the key theme in Hosea of "the knowledge of God," whether that means knowing Yahweh as the one who has provided for them in the past (Hos 2:8; 11:3) or knowing Yahweh's requirements for relationships with one another (Hos 4:1; Davies, 22-24).

Many have noted the lack of mention of any sin in the book of Joel, although the necessity of the call to a day of repentance suggests some violation, as does the use of a term like drunkard in Joel 1:5 (see Boda, 305n35).

Amos emphasizes Israel's abuse of one another, displayed especially in their manipulation of the courts and accumulation of *wealth (Wolff 1977, 104; Miller, 21). As Hubbard (111) has noted, their crimes would fill an out-sized police-blotter: enslaving their countrymen for petty debts (2:6; 8:6), perverting justice for the disadvantaged (2:7-8; 5:10, 12, 15), practicing incest (2:7?), exacting harsh taxes (2:8; 3:10; 5:11), throttling the prophets who would condemn such deeds (2:12; 3:8; 7:12-13), maintaining an extravagant life-style at the expense of the poor (4:1; 6:1-6).

Amos focuses at points on dysfunctions in their worship practices, especially noting the lack of attention to justice and righteousness in their festal gatherings (e.g., Amos 5:24; see Bailey, 81-82).

Obadiah focuses attention on the sin of a foreign nation (Edom) and their "exploitation" of Judah in its destruction in the early sixth century BC (Allen 138). Their sin lies in "standing aloof" (Obad 11), "gloating" and "boasting" over Judah's calamity (Obad 12, 13), finally entering the city and looting its wealth (Obad 13) and even slaughtering and imprisoning its survivors (Obad 14). This sin is simply described as "violence" (hāmās) in Obadiah 10.

While the mission given to Jonah highlights the sin of a foreign city (Nineveh), few details are provided as to the nature of the sin, and the emphasis is clearly placed on the rebellion of the prophet himself (Jon 1) and, in the end, his lack of alignment with the deep values of Yahweh for humanity (Jon 4).

While Micah begins with an accusation against the religious sins of the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah (Mic 1:5), the emphasis in the book is on the “fierce condemnation of injustices arising from the economic and social policies of the privileged classes in Israel,” thus showing that “religion and ethics [are] inseparable” (Ex 20:1-17; Jenson, 100). Throughout the book the theology of land is key, as inheritances are seized from the vulnerable within society (e.g., Mic 2:2) by the elite classes (including leaders, priests, prophets and judges, see Mic 2:1-5; 3:5, 11).

With Nahum the focus returns to that found in Obadiah, that is, on a foreign nation, this time the Assyrians. This nation is called Yahweh’s enemy (Nahum 1:8) who plotted evil (Nahum 1:11), “a wicked counselor” (Nahum 1:11) and “a wicked one” (Nahum 1:15). Its capital city Nineveh is tagged as “the bloody city, completely full of lies and pillage” (Nahum 3:1).

The fundamental problem in the book of Habakkuk revolves around the issue of sin as the prophet expresses frustration over the behavior of humanity in his generation. The prophet laments over the violence, iniquity, wickedness, destruction, strife and contention (Hab 1:2-3) he observes among the wicked who “surround” the righteous by abusing the administration of justice (Hab 1:4). While the answer to this predicament is linked to Yahweh raising up the Babylonians (Hab 1:5-11), the Babylonians themselves are not above such wicked patterns (Hab 1:12-17), which prompts further frustration for the prophet as he dialogues with Yahweh.

Zephaniah “combines criticism of cultic apostasy with indignation against the social injustice by which the rich and powerful exploit the poor” (Mason, 55) by identifying the involvement of Judah and Jerusalem in illicit cult and revelatory practices (Zeph 1:4-6, 9) as well as unjust acts (Zeph 1:9, 13, 18). Attention is also placed on the nations, first for their arrogant treatment of the people of God (Zeph 2:8, 10), as well as their arrogant self-reliance (Zeph 2:15). Jerusalem receives considerable treatment, identified as rebellious, defiled, tyrannical, whose leaders have done violence to the law by not practicing justice (Zeph 3:1-5). The arrogance associated with the nations in Zephaniah

2 is also evident among those who live in Jerusalem (Zeph 3:11).

In Haggai sin is defined largely by misplaced priorities related to the reconstruction of the temple in Jerusalem.

Zechariah, however, expands the focus considerably from the outset (Zech 1:1-6), broadening the agenda to include injustices perpetrated by earlier imperial powers (Zech 1:18-21; 2:6-9), uncleanness related to the disciplinary destruction of Jerusalem (Zech 3), and especially unjust behavior (Zech 5:1-4; 7:4-14; 8:16-17) and idolatrous practice (Zech 5:5-11) within the restoration community. Problems with idolatry and attendant false prophecy can also be discerned in the latter sections of Zechariah (Zech 10:1-2; 13:1-6).

Malachi closes the Book of the Twelve by focusing on the sins of both priest and people in the restoration community in Jerusalem. Malachi’s attack echoes the earlier concerns of the prophets, focusing on violations in worship as well as ethics. The priests are upbraided for defiling the altar by permitting the use of unacceptable *sacrifices (Mal 1:6-14) and then for showing partiality by favoring the powerful in their legal rulings at the temple (Mal 2:1-9). The people, complicit in both of these previous offenses, are also attacked for divorcing their wives in favor of women from the imperial elite (Mal 2:10-16).

4. Acts and Motivations Related to Sin.

These many prophetic traditions share much in common, not only vocabulary and imagery but also descriptions of the sin of the community throughout over three centuries of prophetic activity. C. Dempsey has traced some of the key common trends. Sinful acts identified by the prophets include:

Excessive land appropriation (Is 5:8), the perversion of justice (Is 5:20), self-centeredness (Is 58:3a), oppression of laborers (Is 58:3b), infidelity and disloyalty (Hos 4:1), swearing, lying, murder, stealing, adultery (Hos 4:2), false prophecy (Mic 3:3-5), political and religious depravity and arrogance (Mic 3:9-11), social injustices of every sort (Amos 8:4-6), idolatry (Mic 1:7; Ezek 6:4, etc.), apostasy (Jer 2:19), among other transgressions. A people guilty of having broken covenant relationship, they have refused to turn back to God (Jer 5:1;

Is 9:13) despite the prophets' preaching and pleas. (Dempsey, 49)

Such acts, however, are regularly traced by the prophets to the inner motivations of the people:

Namely, a false, devious, perverse, stubborn, rebellious, and proud heart (see, e.g., Hos 10:2; 13:6; Jer 5:23; 17:9; 49:16; Ezek 28:7; Obad 1:3). Into its heart Israel has taken its idols (Ezek 14:4). Thus, the people's hearts have not remained one with the heart of their God; they have fallen out of covenant relationship with their God and consequently, right relationship with all other people as well. (Dempsey, 49)

The enduring prophetic witness to the sinful actions and motivations of humanity, however, is not included in the canon as merely a record of past failures, but is accompanied by a record of prophetic revelation designed to transform the community and deal with its sin.

5. Dealing with Sin and Sinners.

The opening chapter of Isaiah reveals the propensity of the community to deal with their sin through attention to cultic activity (cf. Hos 8:11-13) (see Liturgy and Cult). This key chapter lays out the two fundamental agendas within the prophets for dealing with sin (see Boda, 191-93, 220). Isaiah 1:2-20 showcases the prophet confronting the people with their sin (Is 1:2-15) and calling them to *repent from their evil behavior (Is 1:16-17) so that they may avoid divine punishment and enjoy God's blessing (Is 1:18-20). In contrast, Isaiah 1:21-31 reveals Yahweh's plan to purify the people by turning his hand against them (Is 1:25). The outcome in both cases is a purified people who walk in obedience to Yahweh, but the process by which this is accomplished is radically different. These two agendas can be discerned throughout the Prophetic Books, evidence of God's passionate pursuit of a holy community. However, the Prophetic Books also highlight the ultimate failure of these two agendas, as the penitential cries of the prophets largely fall on deaf (or deafened) ears (Boda, 354-55), and even a community purified through discipline falls back into sin (Is 40—66; Zech 7—14; Mal).

Nevertheless, there is another agenda for dealing with sin in the Prophets, especially evident in the books of Jeremiah and Ezekiel. In these two books, tracing the prophetic word spoken into the community that experienced the annihilation of the kingdom of Judah, one can discern a similar development near the end of the two books (possibly also Is 59:20-21 in Isaiah and Zech 12:10-14 in the Book of the Twelve; Boda, 356). Whereas the agendas of repentance and purification are clearly developed in both books, both provide a vision of renewal that shifts from human response to a divine gracious and transformative initiative. This vision of renewal looks to a unilateral gracious initiative of Yahweh to forgive his people and grant them an inner renewal that would enable them to avoid sin and walk faithfully before God and humanity (Jer 24:6-7; 31:33-34; 32:37-44; Ezek 11:19; 36:26-27; 37:14; 39:26).

SOCIAL INSTITUTIONS. See PROPHECY AND SOCIETY.

SOCIAL JUSTICE

A significant first step in understanding the Israelite prophets' approach to social justice lies in appreciating the cultural distance that separates the world of ancient Israel from contemporary Western society. Much more so than is the case in many parts of the world today, Israel was a socially and economically stratified society, patriarchal, with fixed gender roles. It would be wrong, therefore, to impose on it a concept of social justice that has emerged in Western industrialized liberal democracies only in the past century. It is also helpful to distinguish between justice in general and social justice in particular. The need for *justice is a basic requirement of civil societies, ancient or modern. The *covenant stipulations of Exodus through Deuteronomy that preserve what remains of ancient Israelite jurisprudence presuppose a basic system of morality and justice that was essential to the functioning of Israelite society. Within this framework, those in authority were expected to judge fairly. For the purposes of this article, "social justice" refers principally to the issues of justice as they relate to the most vulnerable members of Israelite society.

Although social justice might primarily be concerned with oppression and denial of justice at the level of human relationships, the failure to act justly in this way could have ramifications that extended far beyond the level of society itself. In Israel and the ancient Near East injustice was thought to have potential consequences for *creation as a whole. At Ugarit, for example, the Aqhat myth describes how the murder of the man Aqhat by proxies of the goddess Anat results in drought and the ruin of crops (COS 1.103:351-52). Similarly, in Genesis the *sin of Adam and Eve results in an earth that easily yields thorns and thistles but produces food only with great human toil (Gen 3:18-19). Later, after Cain kills his brother, Abel, the blood of the murdered brother cries out to God from the ground. Thereafter, the earth refuses to respond to Cain, forcing him to become a wanderer (Gen 4:10-12; cf. Hos 4:2-3). For the nation of Israel as a whole, a refusal to follow God's laws could so defile the *land that it might "vomit" Israel out as it had its previous inhabitants (Lev 18:24-28). All of this suggests that the created order itself could be affected by human misdeeds and acts of injustice (Rom 8:22) (see Taylor, 21-22).

As a consequence of the above, part of following God's covenant law and acting justly meant attending to the needs of the land and creation as a whole. When the Israelites were besieging an enemy city, they were forbidden from felling the city's fruit trees, since to do so would be to harm a noncombatant even as it would deprive the army of a source of food (Deut 20:19-20). Just as humans were to enjoy the rest of the Sabbath, so too the land was to enjoy its Sabbatical year (Lev 25:2-7). According to the writer of Chronicles, a failure to observe the needs of the land resulted in the total number of years of the *exile (2 Chron 36:21; cf. Lev 26:34-35). Within the postexilic community of Yehud, the Sabbath for the land was given renewed attention (Neh 10:31).

Israel had specific moral obligations as part of its covenant with Yahweh, but this did not mean that the nations were without a responsibility to practice justice. This idea is clearly expressed in the primeval narrative of Genesis 1—11. There, it is human beings as a race who are created to be in relationship with God and who suffer alienation from him when they rebel (Gen 1:27-31; 2:7-8, 16-25; 3:8-24). The image of God, which all humans share, places a specific moral obligation on all humans in the form of the universal prohibition against murder (Gen 1:27; 9:6). Here too, human wickedness has ruinous consequences for creation (Gen 6:11) and prompts God to judge the peoples of the earth by flood and start anew through Noah and his family (Gen 6:1—9:19). The responsibility of the nations to practice justice is also conveyed in the patriarchal narratives of Genesis 12—50. In the case of Sodom and Gomorrah, for example, God descends from heaven in response to reports of human misdeeds and responds in judgment against people who are not in covenant relationship with him (Gen 18:20-21). This same idea appears in prophetic literature. The prophetic mandates given to Jonah (Jon 1:2) and Jeremiah (Jer 1:5, 10; 25:15-31) to announce divine judgment over foreign nations represent cases in which the God of Israel imposes a standard of justice over nations other than Israel. The responsibility of the nations to practice justice is also forcefully articulated in the oracles against the nations found in the books of Amos (Amos 1:3—2:3) and Jeremiah (Jer 46—49). Here Yahweh condemns the nations for acts of violence and oppression even in cases where his covenant people are not counted among the victims (e.g., Amos 1:9-10).

Even as the nations are accountable before God, however, so too are they given the opportunity to experience redemption that results in an experience of God's justice. Through the promise first made to Abram, Israel plays a mediating role in this enterprise with the goal being that "all peoples on earth will be blessed through you [Abram and his descendants]" (Gen 12:2-3). The mediatory character of Israel's role in relation to the world is made plain in its identity as "a kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Ex 19:6) (see 2 below). Israel's election to such a role constitutes a national mandate that is repeated at several points in the book of Isaiah. Of Israel, Yahweh declares, "Here is my servant, whom I uphold, my chosen one in whom I delight; I will put my Spirit on him and he will bring justice to the nations" (Is 42:1 [cf. Mt 12:18]). The law given to and practiced by Israel will produce justice and will eventually lead the nations toward God: "The law will go out from me; my justice will become a light to the nations" (Is 51:4). In the postexilic era the prophets envision a future date in which all nations will respond to God's invitation and will stream to Jerusalem to learn his ways (e.g., Mic 4:2; Zech 8:20-23).

The need to experience justice in the present was a vital concern in ancient Israel. The limited understanding of life after death that prevailed in Israel during the preexilic period presumably made the issue of justice in the present a matter of pressing concern (Eccles 3:20; 8:14; 9:2-5) (see Wellhausen, 469; Rauschenbusch, 17-18). It is clear from the OT and cognate literature that Israel and its Canaanite neighbors believed that life continued beyond the grave, but this future life was regarded as a dismal, shadowy subsistence that was a pale reflection of life on earth. Those who had died were separated from the land of the living and from God's care (Ps 6:5; 88:5; Is 53:8) and occupied a realm in which the righteous and the wicked lived together as they had on earth (Gen 37:35; Job 21:13; 24:19; Ps 89:48; Eccles 3:20; 9:2; Is 14:9-11) (see Johnston, 69-85). In the OT era this place was one of continued, but diminished, existence where the prospect of judgment and reward was far from certain. The uncertainty surrounding what happened beyond the grave greatly increased the concern that justice be done in this life and accounts for the urgency typical of the individual complaint psalms (e.g., Pss 10; 13; 22) and the frustration of both Job and the teacher in the book of Ecclesiastes (Job 21:5-13; Eccles 4:1-3; 7:15; 8:14; 9:1-10; cf. COS 1.151-54:485-95). The unknowable character of life after death also explains the importance placed on the king as the one responsible for maintaining justice in the present and the angry prophetic action when this responsibility was not adequately realized.

2. Social Justice as Covenant Obligation
3. Social Justice as a Royal Responsibility
4. Social Justice in Prophetic Literature
5. Conclusion

1. Terms Related to Justice.

The concept of justice is found throughout the OT in widely varying genres. In prophetic literature a concern with justice is frequently, though by no means exclusively, expressed by use of the parallel word pair mišpāt ("justice, judgment" [145x; 425x in the MT]) and šēdāqā ("righteousness" [76x; 159x in the MT]) (Weinfeld, 25-44). The term hesed ("loving-kindness, mercy, loyalty") appears as a component of justice in Jeremiah 9:24, where it is used in conjunction with mišpāt and šēdāqā as characteristics exercised by God (cf. Ps 33:5). Elsewhere, love of hesed is counted along with righteousness and humility as a quality that should characterize the person of God (Mic 6:8). Other important concepts related to social justice are ʾemet ("truth" [e.g., Ps 89:14; Is 59:14; Ezek 18:8; Zech 8:16]), ʾemūnā ("faithfulness" [e.g., 1 Sam 26:23; Ps 40:10; 143:1; Is 59:4; Jer 5:1]), and rahāmîm (“mercy, compassion” [e.g., Ps 119:156; Hos 2:19; Zech 7:9]). In a negative sense, injustice is often indicated by use of the terms ‘āwel (“perversity, injustice” [e.g., Ezek 18:8; 28:18; 35:15]) and reša’ (“wickedness” injustice” [e.g., Is 58:6; Mic 6:10-11]), as well as ra’ (“evil” [e.g., Is 33:15-16; 59:15; Amos 5:15]).

Social justice is frequently in view when the aforementioned terms are used in conjunction with a range of nouns associated with vulnerable or marginalized individuals or groups, including ‘almānā (“widow”), yātôm (“orphan”), gēr (“sojourner, alien, refugee”), ‘ānî (“poor, afflicted”), ‘ebyôn (“needy, oppressed”) and dal (“weak, helpless”). Individuals included in these categories were those who fell outside the social support system of land ownership, family and/or patriarchy that served ancient Israel. In the language of today, such individuals could be described as facing “systemic discrimination,” since their very identity left them outside of the “systems” that existed to protect those living in Israel. As a consequence, individuals such as the ‘almānā, yātôm, and gēr came under the special care of Yahweh, his surrogate the king, and were to be cared for as a covenant obligation by the people at large. Such attention was necessary, given the realities of life in ancient Israel, where warfare, disease and famine ensured that widows, orphans and refugees were always present.

Persons such as widows, orphans and sojourners were the most easily ignored and exploited in society and least able to respond should their rights be denied. Although the vulnerable position of the poor merited the close attention of those in authority, it did not mean that they were to receive favoritism in legal proceedings, since this would constitute a miscarriage of justice (Ex 23:3; Lev 19:15). Rather, the obligation of the king and the judge was to ensure that the vulnerable were granted equal access to justice (Ex 23:6). In all of its dealings, Israel was to follow Yahweh’s example and act with hesed (“faithfulness” [Hos 6:6; Mic 6:8; Zech 7:9]), ‘emet (“truth” [Ezek 18:8; Zech 7:9; 8:16]), and mīšôr (“fairness” [Ps 67:4; Is 11:4]).

2. Social Justice as a Covenant Obligation.

For the prophets, social justice was not a theological abstraction or a passive activity; it was a way of being rooted in Israel’s covenant identity, one that had consequences for how the nation lived and ordered its life. Within Israelite society, values and hence behavior were governed by roles and responsibilities laid out in the covenant that bound members of society to each other and to God. In entering into covenant with Yahweh at Sinai (Ex 19), Israel took on a priestly role in relation to the world. In declaring that Israel would be for him “a kingdom of priests and a holy nation” (Ex 19:6), Yahweh identified the entire nation as an intermediary between himself and the world in the same way that Israel’s priests were intermediaries between individual worshipers and Yahweh. This covenant identity tasked Israel with the responsibility of living in a way that reflected Yahweh’s character to the nations (Wright 2004, 62-65). The Torah given at Sinai served to order society, but also it ensured that Israel adopted values and behaviors that allowed them to remain in Yahweh’s presence and accurately reflect his character to the nations. A foundational principle for Israel in both regards is embodied in Yahweh’s oft-repeated admonition that Israel “be holy to me because I, the LORD, am holy” (Lev 20:26 NIV; also Lev 11:44-45; 19:2; 20:7; 21:6). The fact that Israel’s concept of social justice was grounded in the Sinai covenant has convinced some scholars that in their concern for justice the prophets were not radical innovators but rather theological conservatives. T. Fretheim concludes, “Unless these social concerns of the prophets were reasonably well known by their audiences, . . . their message would have been obscure, even unintelligible” (Fretheim, 159-60 [cf. Brueggemann, 15-27]).

The covenant stipulations found in Exodus through Deuteronomy provided the instruction that allowed Israel to reflect God’s character in specific ways. Yahweh’s commitment to social justice, for example, is embodied in the command “You shall not wrong or oppress a resident alien [gēr], for you were aliens in the land of Egypt. You shall not abuse any widow [‘almānā] or orphan [yātôm]. If you do abuse them, when they cry out to me, I will surely heed their cry” (Ex 22:21-23 NRSV [cf. Lev 19:33-34; Deut 10:17-18; 24:17, 19-21; 26:12-13; 27:19]). The alien (better, “sojourner” or “refugee”), the widow and the orphan were among those who did not benefit from the normal societal protections enjoyed by most Israelites. The widow and orphan, for example, did not enjoy the social and physical protection afforded by a husband or father in a society that was structured along patriarchal lines. In the order of inheritance given as a legal precedent in the case of Zelophehad's daughters, for example, the widow is conspicuously absent (Num 27:8-11). Although the experience of Naomi suggests that inheritance by a widow and the subsequent sale of property to provide income was not impossible (Ruth 4:3), it is clear that the redemption of property was concerned primarily with retaining family ownership and not with supporting widows (Lev 25:23-28). Similarly, although levirate marriage served the function of providing for a widow, its fundamental role was to ensure an heir for her deceased husband (Deut 25:5-10; cf. Gen 38:8-10). Also lacking the protection offered by property and clan relationships were refugees or sojourners (gēr), non-Israelites who had left the land of their birth (often due to war, famine or some other calamity [e.g., Gen 12:10; 27:42-45; Ruth 1:1; 1 Sam 21:10; Jer 43:1-7]). Without the resources of land or family, economic options were severely limited. Although some might possibly enter royal service (e.g., Doeg the Edomite [1 Sam 21:7]; Uriah the Hittite [2 Sam 11; 1 Chron 11:41]), the fate of most sojourners was the life of the day laborer (Deut 24:14-15) or slave (Lev 25:45).

Widows and orphans were particularly at risk of losing the familial holdings that helped ensure economic stability. For refugees forced to relinquish ancestral property in favor of the relative safety of a foreign country, acquiring new agricultural land would have been economically and culturally difficult. As a result, these groups were given particular rights intended to keep them from starvation. Israelites were not to charge interest on loans or sell food at profit to their fellow Israelites who had fallen into poverty (Lev 25:35-38) (see Wealth and Poverty). During the various grain harvests, the crops on the edges and corners of the field were left ungathered so that the poor could reap there. Similarly, the fruit that fell from the olive tree or grapevine was to be left for the poor to gather (Lev 19:9-10; 23:22; Deut 24:19-21; Ruth 2). In addition, every third year the agricultural tithe was to be shared among these marginalized people and the Levites (Deut 14:28-29; 26:12). These rudimentary benefits, of course, depended on the magnanimity of the average Israelite. In the book of Ruth, Boaz's instruction to his reapers (Ruth 2:15) and his warning to Ruth (Ruth 2:8-9) imply that some Israelites were reluctant to cooperate with the poor who sought to exercise these rights. The sojourner was particularly vulnerable to the vigilantism that could arise if involved in a case of manslaughter. For this reason, the sojourner was granted the right to access the cities of refuge along with native Israelites (Num 35:15).

A significant aspect of Israel's commitment to social justice was the year of Jubilee (yōbēl [Lev 25:13-17]). This event occurred every fifty years as a moment of economic equalization for all Israelites. Land that had been sold because of financial distress was returned to its original owners, and Israelites who had been forced into indentured servitude were freed (Lev 25:39-43). Although scholars disagree over whether the Jubilee year was actually practiced or was solely a theoretical ideal, there is ample evidence in the ancient Near East for the remission of debts and freeing of prisoners when a king ascended the throne. Even so, there is no clear parallel to the sacral or cyclical character of the Israelite institution of the Jubilee year (Epsztein, 133-34; Wright 1995, 197-212; Weinfeld, 140-78).

3. Social Justice as a Royal Responsibility.

In Israel, as elsewhere in the ancient world, the administration of justice was a royal responsibility that was exercised by virtue of the monarch's connection with the divine realm. In Egypt the Pharaoh was understood to be the incarnation of the god Horus with responsibility for upholding maat, the standard of divine "truth" or "justice" without which society could not function. In the late third-millennium BC Sumerian law code of Ur-Nammu, the king boasts that he dispensed justice with equity: "I did not deliver the orphan to the rich. I did not deliver the widow to the mighty. I did not deliver the man with but one shekel to the man with one mina [i.e., sixty shekels]. I did not deliver the man with but one sheep to the man with one ox" (COS 2.153:409). In the law code instituted by Hammurabi of Babylon (1792-1750 BC), the gods Anu and Enlil are said to have elevated the king to the throne with the responsibility to "make justice prevail in the land, to abolish the wicked and the evil, [and] to prevent the strong from oppressing the weak" (COS 2.131:336). In Egypt Pharaoh was thought to be divine, while in Babylon the monarch was a human called to kingship by the god Marduk and was favored by him. In both cases, these relationships made the ruler responsible for administering laws that were entrusted to the king by the gods.

As Yahweh's adopted son (Ps 2:6-7), the Israelite king functioned as an earthly agent of the divine being and so bore special responsibility for ensuring that justice was carried out. Such responsibilities are the subject of Psalm 72, where royal attention to them is associated with long life and prosperity. In the OT the example of the king as Yahweh's agent of justice is set by David (Weinfeld, 46-48). Following closely on Yahweh's royal promise to David and his house, 2 Samuel 8:15 notes, "David reigned over Israel, doing what was just [mišpāt] and right [šēdāqā] for all his people" (NIV). In the subsequent narrative the author provides an example of how David rules in a manner that extends justice to the most vulnerable. By seeking out Mephibosheth and bringing him to court (2 Sam 8:1-13), David extends protection to one who was doubly disadvantaged. As a direct descendant of Saul, Mephibosheth might well have been considered a potential rival to David. Additionally, as a person with a significant physical disability from a now-decimated clan, the son of Jonathan had limited economic and social prospects. In extending "kindness" (hesed) to Mephibosheth (2 Sam 9:1), David clearly establishes himself as one who rules with a view to caring for the vulnerable. Later, the prophets will build on David's reputation as they look forward to a future king whose coming reign would restore justice (Jer 23:5-6).

It is the basic need to provide justice that informs Solomon's request for wisdom (1 Kings 3:9), and it is his demonstrated ability in this regard that earns him the admiration both of his people (1 Kings 3:28) and the visiting Queen of Sheba (1 Kings 10:9). The failure of the king to establish justice or, worse, to actively pervert justice was a violation of the monarch's fundamental obligation to both God and subjects. It is no surprise, therefore, that when Absalom seeks to undermine his father David's credibility as ruler, he does so by questioning the latter's commitment to maintaining justice in the land (2 Sam 15:1-4). In the case of David's adultery with Bathsheba (2 Sam 11), the severity of the king's infraction is multiplied not only by the murder-by-proxy of Bathsheba's husband, Uriah, but also by the fact that as a resident non-Israelite (i.e., gēr), Uriah was one whose welfare was to be a matter of special concern to Yahweh's agent, the king. Not surprisingly, David's actions in this case earn him a thorough excommunication from the lips of the prophet Nathan (2 Sam 12:1-15). The role of the king in maintaining justice and the interest of Yahwistic prophets in ensuring that this duty was carried out were also characteristics of the northern monarchy. There, Ahab's complicity in the judicial murder of the landowner Naboth shows the king, as one charged with maintaining justice, to be actively perverting it (2 Kings 21:8-19). This act is especially grievous because for the Israelites, land was a trust and inheritance from Yahweh and a sign that they were participants in covenant promise (Gen 12:7; Josh 13—19) (Mays 1983, 10-11). Through the mouth of the prophet Micaiah, Yahweh pronounces a sentence of death upon the Israelite monarch, a judgment carried out in poetic fashion by a lying spirit to parallel the lying witnesses earlier employed against Naboth (2 Kings 22:19-23) (Irwin, 59-62).

In the end, the royal need to maintain on earth the behavior and values of Yahweh is best summed up by the maxim offered by Jeremiah in the closing days of the Judean monarchy: "But let him who boasts boast about this: that he understands and knows me, that I am the LORD, who exercises kindness, justice and righteousness on earth, for in these I delight," declares the LORD" (Jer 9:24).

4. Social Justice in Prophetic Literature.

During the latter part of the nineteenth century, scholars such as B. Duhm and J. Wellhausen emphasized the individualism and spiritual vitality of the prophets, particularly over against what they perceived to be the institutionalism, legalism and ritualism of the priestly cult. In the years that followed, an increasing number of interpreters came to understand the prophets as independent-minded figures who preached an "ethical monotheism" that represented the pinnacle of Israelite religion (Dearman, 132; Wilson, 3-4; Wellhausen, 398-99, 473-75). For many, the prophets were understood to be reformers whose interest was in bringing about social change. This understanding of the prophets resonated well with the concerns of what later would become known as the Social Gospel movement. In the America of the late nineteenth-century, many scholars, clergy and theologians were increasingly concerned by the human toll exacted by unfettered capitalism and the ineffectiveness of a pietistic church in addressing such injustice. A prominent spokesperson for this movement was the German-American pastor and church historian Walter Rauschenbusch (d. 1918). According to Rauschenbusch, the great impediment to social equality and justice in ancient Israel was the nobility whose extravagant lifestyle was maintained at the expense of the poor. In this context, the role of the prophets was to give voice to the needs of the agrarian poor and demand justice from the urban social elite (Rauschenbusch, 3-16). Driven in part by this prophetic impulse, the Social Gospel movement became socially and politically active in an effort to move American society toward what it saw as a Christian ideal.

The Social Gospel movement was optimistic concerning the human capacity to respond to the prophetic message and consequently was hopeful with regard to the social change that was possible. Against this background, World War I, with its attendant horrors, was a profoundly disillusioning experience for many in the movement. Despite this, the view of the prophets as agents of social change that the movement espoused continued to influence the agenda of American liberal Protestantism throughout the remainder of the twentieth century.

The priority of social transformation at the expense of personal conversion was one feature of the Social Gospel movement that kept many conservative Protestants in North America from embracing its agenda. Although many theological conservatives were active in social work, such efforts often were tied to evangelism rather than to any prophetic imperative. With regard to the role of the prophets, many theological conservatives, particularly at the popular level, continued to be influenced by the dispensationalism that had begun in the early nineteenth century with the teaching of J. N. Darby. As a consequence, much of the interest that North American conservative Protestants showed in the prophets revolved around messianic prediction and end-times speculation rather than issues of social justice.

The understanding of the prophets as promoters of social justice that undergirded the Social Gospel movement has been echoed more recently in the work of W. Brueggemann. Brueggemann argues that the prophets promoted the values of the alternative community founded by Moses and stood in stark opposition to the monarchy, an institution that he regards as the primary source of injustice in ancient Israelite society (Brueggemann, 28-61; cf. Mendenhall). Such a view of the prophets, however, oversimplifies both their message and place in ancient Israel. While it is obvious that the preexilic prophets did oppose the kings of Judah and Israel, even to the extent of facilitating the removal of individual monarchs (e.g., 1 Kings 19:16), nowhere do we read that they promoted political revolution with the goal of replacing monarchy as a governing institution. Rather, as J. Dearman observes, prophetic critique includes passages that exhort the king and other passages that outline the king's social responsibilities (e.g., Is 9:1-6; Jer 21:11-12; 22:1-5; cf. Ps 72; 132:11-18) (Dearman, 141-43).

An additional corrective to this older view of the prophets as class-conscious advocates for social justice has been offered by J. Pleins, who uses a comparative approach to highlight the range of social locations out of which ancient prophets operated as well as the connections that often existed between prophets and royal institutions (Pleins, 219-23). Pleins also shows how the composition and the shaping of prophetic works in the exilic and postexilic eras make it difficult to maintain a view of the prophets that sees them solely as ones interested in social justice and opposing the elite. With regard to the book of Isaiah, for example, Pleins notes how in the context of the exile, the term ʿanī ("poor") comes to be applied to the nation as a whole, including its most elite citizens. This shift in the final form of the book makes it clear that the prophetic enterprise cannot be reduced to the simple opposition of advocates of social justice railing against the abuses of the wealthy (Pleins, 251, 264-70).

As noted above, in ancient Israel maintaining social justice was an inescapable royal duty (Ps 72). Even so, responsibility to protect the vulnerable extended beyond the king to become the obligation of every Israelite; when justice was not done, both felt the wrath of the prophets (Is 1:17; Jer 7:6; 22:3; Ezek 22:7; Zech 7:10). Depending on their context, the prophets vary between demanding justice in the present and seeing it as something to be brought about by an eschatological *messiah figure. In general, in preexilic contexts condemnation for failing to do justice falls upon ruler and ruled in equal measure. With the fall of Jerusalem and the dissolution of the monarchy, however, the king no longer existed to function as an agent of Yahweh's justice. Thus, in exilic and postexilic contexts the prophets often look to an eschatological Davidic ruler as the one whom Yahweh eventually will send to restore justice.

4.1. Amos. Nowhere in the OT is the issue of social justice a more focused matter of concern than in the book of Amos. In this short collection of oracles, a Judean pastoralist from Tekoa crosses over to the kingdom of Israel to deliver Yahweh's message of condemnation. The reign of Jeroboam II of Israel (793/92-753 BC) that forms the backdrop to Amos's ministry was a period of political, military and economic success. For most of Jeroboam's reign, the world power that was Assyria had been weakened by internal strife—a state of affairs that left regional powers such as Israel and Judah free to pursue their own interests. In cooperation with Uzziah (792/91-740/39 BC) of Judah, Jeroboam II had seized this opportunity to create wealth on a scale unseen since the days of the united monarchy. Such economic success, however, was achieved on the backs of the poor, and this earned the Israelite king the condemnation of the prophet.

The final form of the book of Amos is skillfully constructed to condemn the northern monarchy for its abuse of the vulnerable. The series of oracles against the nations with which the book begins assails various foreign powers for acts of oppression such as violence (Amos 1:3, 11, 13; 2:1) and slavery (Amos 1:6, 9). The seventh oracle, targeted against Judah, condemns Israel's southern neighbor for failing to obey the law (tôrâ) of Yahweh (Amos 2:4). The effect of these oracles and of Israel's nodding assent to them was to lure Israel into self-condemnation. In this way, Amos's audience is unable to deflect the accusation of oppression when the prophet's words are turned against them. The list of abuses catalogued in Amos 2:6-8 shows how the people of Israel had enriched themselves by their oppression of the poor. The latter were forced into indentured servitude for miniscule degrees of indebtedness (Amos 2:6b) while at the same time being denied access to the courts (Amos 2:7a). Once forced into servitude, the young girls (na'ārâ) were sexually abused by both master and son (Amos 2:7b; cf. Ex 21:8). Garments taken as collateral for loans and wine given as fines were misappropriated and used for drunken carousing (Amos 2:8; cf. Ex 22:26-27). The reference in this section to the destruction of the Amorites (i.e., Canaanites) and the liberation of Israel from Egypt is an ominous reminder to these abusers that Yahweh has a history of deposing oppressors and extending mercy to the oppressed (Amos 2:9-10).

The extent to which a culture of oppression had taken root in Israel is illustrated in Amos's condemnation of the women of Samaria (Amos 4:1-3). By characterizing these women as "cows" (pārâ), the prophet likens them to an animal that, unlike an ox, is not primarily a beast of burden, but one that exists to become fat (Gen 41:2). In parallel condemnations, Amos accuses these women of oppressing the poor and crushing the needy while demanding that their husbands wait on them (Amos 4:1). In the first instance, the prophet condemns the women for ignoring the fundamental covenant obligation to protect the needy and see that they received just treatment (Deut 15:7-18; 24:15; Lev 25:35-43). In the second instance, he condemns them for overturning the patriarchal social order that was the mechanism by which most Israelites were protected. For both of these crimes, the women of Samaria are sentenced to the fate of capture and exile that was the most severe of the covenant curses (Lev 26:17, 25, 33).

In what some regard as the focal point of the book (Jeremias, 83-85), Amos castigates Israel for having turned "justice into something bitter" and "thrown righteousness to the ground" (Amos 5:7a). This Israel has done by oppressing the poor, then denying them justice at the city gate, where disputes were settled (Amos 5:10-12). In such a situation, where the powerful are free to abuse and then bribe their way out of accountability, those with legitimate grievances are imperiled. In such times, the prophet ironically remarks, the "wisest" course of action is to remain silent, foregoing justice in favor of the security that comes with anonymity (Amos 5:13).

In Amos 5:18-20 the prophet describes how Israel's oppression of the poor will bring upon it the Day of Yahweh. What was originally considered a hopeful possibility—the arrival of Yahweh and the imposition of his authority—has, in light of Israel's abuses, become a terrifying prospect. In the first of two woe speeches, the prophet likens the Day of Yahweh to a time when there will be no escape from deadly animals, an allusion to the covenant curse in which wild animals take over the land (Amos 5:19; cf. Lev 26:22). In the second woe speech, the ultimate covenant curse of exile is directly invoked (Amos 6:7; cf. Lev 26:33).

In what have become the most memorable words of his prophecy, Amos identifies the quality that should characterize true justice: "Let justice [mišpāt] roll on like a river, righteousness [šēdāqā] like a never-failing stream!" (Amos 5:24 NIV). For justice to exist, it cannot be like the wadi or brook that runs full in winter but is reduced to an empty, cracked stream bed by the heat of the summer. For there to be justice, it must be like the stream that flows throughout the year (naḥal 'etān), constant and dependable.

4.2. Hosea. A close contemporary of Amos, and another figure who preached to the northern kingdom, was the prophet Hosea. Although best known as one who condemned the north for its idolatry, this prophet also strongly attacked the nation for its disregard for justice (see Nardoni, 104-6). For the prophet, idolatry and injustice are connected in that both flow from a rejection of Yahweh (Hos 1—2). While the rejection of Yahweh results most visibly in the idolatry that the prophet sees everywhere and vociferously condemns, it also creates a moral vacuum in which injustice flourishes. A recurring theme in the book, therefore, is the connection between Israel's disinterest in knowing God and the growth of injustice in the land (see Mays 1969, 63-64). In Hosea 4:1 the prophet assesses the situation by declaring, "There is no faithfulness ['ēmet], no love [ḥesed], no acknowledgment of God [da'at 'ēlohīm] in the land" (NIV). The rejection of these values along with the searching after God by which they are found has resulted in a society in which they have been replaced by injustice: "Oath making, lying, murder, stealing, and adultery—they burst out so that bloodshed follows on bloodshed" (Hos 4:2). All of the foregoing elements represent the fundamentals necessary for just human relationships; in their absence, anarchy prevails. Ultimately, this lack of knowledge (da'at) leads to destruction (Hos 4:6). National ruin, however, will not be God's final word. At the outset of the book the prophet uses the language of betrothal to describe how as a suitor he will bring Israel reengagement gifts of "righteousness" (šedeq), "justice" (mišpāt) and "lovingkindness" (ḥesed) and draw the nation into a relationship in which they will truly know (yd') him (Hos 2:19-20) (see Achtemeier, 27-29; Taylor, 19-20).

Throughout the book it is clear that the people of Israel long to experience the bounty conveyed in the covenant blessings, but they are unwilling to do anything substantive to merit those blessings. In response to this mindset, God exhorts the people to do the spiritual and moral work that is the prerequisite of such blessing: "Sow for yourselves righteousness [šēdāqā], reap the fruit of unfailing love [ḥesed], and break up your unplowed ground; for it is time to seek the LORD, until he comes and showers righteousness on you" (Hos 10:12 NIV). The people of both kingdoms, however, assume that their crimes can be covered over by a superficial acknowledgment of God that will compel him to forgive and restore (Hos 6:1-3). The frustration that God feels toward this way of thinking is clearly evident: "What can I do with you, Ephraim? What can I do with you, Judah? Your love [ḥesed] is like the morning mist, like the early dew that disappears" (Hos 6:4 NIV). In what is perhaps the best-known verse in the book, the prophet declares that God does not want from his people empty ritual intended to conjure up his favor; what God desires is that his people truly practice ḥesed and sincerely desire to know him (da'at 'ēlohīm) (Hos 6:6).

In the case of the northern kingdom, however, deceit has become part of the fabric of daily life and, not surprisingly, has left its practitioners self-deceived. In the evidentiary portion of a divine lawsuit the prophet observes, "A trader, in whose hands are false balances, he loves to oppress. Ephraim has said, 'Ah, I am rich, I have gained wealth for myself; in all of my gain no offense has been found in me that would be sin'" (Hos 12:7-8 NRSV) (see Stuart, 184-97). Faced with this, the prophet draws from the story of Jacob to show how God took a grasping and deceitful outcast and changed him into the father of the nation. Building on this example, God exhorts the people, "Return to your God; maintain love [ḥesed] and justice [mišpāt], and wait for your God always" (Hos 12:6 NIV). Israel's self-deception prevents such a return, however, and at the close of the lawsuit Yahweh announces that the nation will not avoid punishment for its sins (Hos 12:14).

At various points in the book, Hosea points the finger at those whose lapses have permitted the rise of injustice. The priests charged with teaching Israel the knowledge of God are the first to be condemned (Hos 4:4-19); they, and prophets along with them, have failed in their responsibilities (Hos 4:5). Rather than opposing the people's sin, the priests seized upon the opportunity to profit from it (Hos 4:8). Rather than acting to protect the people, they became predators who waited undetected until pouncing upon the unsuspecting (Hos 6:9). Similarly condemned is the royal establishment, whose fundamental role was to ensure that justice was carried out. Far from being a moral example or advocate of justice, however, the royal house has been on the same moral wavelength as the most corrupt in society (Hosea 7:1b-3). By rejecting Yahweh and embracing corruption, though, the kings sow the seeds of their own destruction; some are betrayed and killed by conspiring princes, while others who have rejected God are killed in battle (Hosea 7:7, 16).

4.3. Micah. At about the same time that Amos and Hosea delivered their condemnations of the northern kingdom, another prophet rose to speak against both Israel and Judah. Much of Micah's denunciation is related to the idolatry prevalent in both kingdoms, but a significant subtheme is Yahweh's displeasure over his people's abuse of the vulnerable. The prophet depicts his audience as obsessed with injustice. Ingenious abuses are planned out at night and quickly put into action at first light. Through fraudulent means these persons seize the houses and fields of their neighbors (Mic 2:1-2).

Micah identifies those who should be Israel's source of justice—its leadership—as being its worst oppressors (Mic 3:1). The image of cannibalism that the prophet invokes paints a picture of a leadership devouring the nation that it is charged with protecting and perhaps alludes to a covenant curse (Mic 3:2-3; cf. Lev 26:29). Such leaders cannot expect the assistance of Yahweh when they themselves are imperiled (Mic 3:4). These rulers, who should be the nation's source of justice (mišpāṭ), have no sense of it and have actually developed an inverted morality in which they hate good (tôb) and love evil (rāʿ). Consequently, they are a study in contradictions: they have perverted justice, what is "straight" or "right" (yāšār) they have made "crooked" or "false" (qš), while Zion, Yahweh's holy hill, they have expanded through bloodshed (Mic 3:9-10). Finally, they have accepted bribes when judging cases (Mic 3:11; 7:3). As a consequence of this behavior, Jerusalem will succumb to the covenant curse of destruction of city and sanctuary (Mic 3:12; cf. Lev 26:31). If the human leaders have failed, however, Micah nonetheless looks forward to a future date when Yahweh himself will restore Zion and make it a place where justice will be dispensed not only for Israel, but also for the nations (Mic 4:1-3).

In Micah 6:4-5 Yahweh reviews the mighty acts that he performed to rescue and bless Israel and enhance his own reputation in the world. By contrast, Israel's acts have ruined God's reputation. In light of this, Israel's solution—more numerous and extravagant sacrifices (Mic 6:6-7)—is feeble and misses the point. What God suggests (Mic 6:8) and what Israel needs is a spiritual rehabilitation that makes them people who can accurately reflect God's character to the world. By adjuring his people "to act justly and to love mercy and to walk humbly with your God" (Mic 6:8), Yahweh draws attention to the fact that the exercise of justice must always be accompanied by an attitude of humility that recognizes the authority of Yahweh and the relationship of humans to it.

When it comes to doing evil, both ruler (šar) and judge (šōpēṭ) are well practiced (Mic 7:3). As in Amos, the injustice rampant in Israel and condemned by Micah will merit a divine visitation. The day of Yahweh's coming will be one of hope for those who have been wronged (Mic 7:4, 7; cf. Amos 5:18).

4.4. Isaiah. During the second half of the eighth century BC, the prophet Isaiah carried the message of Yahweh to the city of Jerusalem. The consensus among the majority of scholars is that in its present form, the book of Isaiah contains the message of this preexilic prophet along with voices from the exilic and postexilic eras (Childs, 1-7; McConville, 1-11). In the final shaping of the book, these voices unite to proclaim Yahweh as the "Holy One of Israel" and the only one in whom Israel should place its trust.

The book of Isaiah begins with the familiar prophetic condemnation of Israel's tendency to favor religious ritual over the principled and faithful living that puts covenant values into practice (Is 1:10-31; cf. Hos 6:1-6; Amos 4:1-5; 5:4-15, 21-24; Mic 6:6-8; Zech 7:4-10). In the introduction to the book Yahweh declares, "Stop bringing meaningless offerings! Your incense is detestable to me. New Moons, Sabbaths and convocations—I cannot bear your worthless assemblies" (Is 1:13 NIV). Instead, Israel needs to practice a religion characterized by a commitment to justice: "Stop doing wrong. Learn to do right; seek justice [mišpat]. Defend the oppressed [hāmōs]. Take up the cause of the fatherless [yātôm]; plead the case of the widow [almānā]" (Is 1:16b-17 NIV). Although all Israel is culpable, they have been led in their sin by the dereliction of their rulers: "Your rulers are rebels, partners with thieves; they all love bribes and chase after gifts. They do not defend the cause of the fatherless; the widow's case does not come before them" (Is 1:23 NIV [cf. Is 3:14]). The result of this is that Jerusalem has gone from being a city inhabited by justice to one populated by murderers. If allowed to persist, this situation will force Yahweh to purge the city before restoring it as a place of righteousness (Is 1:21, 24-27; 3:1-15).

Israel's self-absorbed behavior has negative consequences for Yahweh's reputation as the "Holy One of Israel." If Yahweh's representative in the world will not practice justice, then it will be exiled, and Yahweh himself will initiate justice in a way that enhances, not harms, his reputation: "People are bowed down, everyone is brought low, and the eyes of the haughty are humbled. But the LORD of hosts is exalted by justice, and the Holy God shows himself holy by righteousness" (Is 5:15-16 NRSV). Those in authority who drink while accepting bribes and denying justice to the righteous will be consumed as Yahweh summons agents of judgment from afar (Is 5:22-23, 26-30).

Following the chastening of military defeat and subjugation, one of the ways in which Yahweh might restore justice to Zion is through the ascension of a king whose rule will bring justice after the manner of his ancestor David (Is 9; 2 Sam 8:15). The titles and hyperbole found in this passage have suggested to many that a messianic figure is in view. In a royal psalm that might have been a standard hymn heralding the birth of a Judean crown prince, the prophet celebrates the birth, contemporaneously or in the future, of one who would "reign on David's throne and over his kingdom, establishing and upholding it with justice and righteousness from that time on and forever" (Is 9:7 NIV) (Seitz, 86; cf. Sweeney, 178-79, 182-83). If the leaders of Israel have failed in their responsibility to ensure that justice is done, then Yahweh in his "zeal" or "jealousy" (qin'â [Is 9:7c]) can raise up a ruler who will be faithful to his assigned responsibilities.

In Isaiah 11 a royal figure once again stands at the center of a chapter focusing on the arrival of justice. Here, however, the picture drawn goes beyond that of the Davidic king who will rule over Israel in righteousness. The fact that this figure comes from the "stump" and "roots" of Jesse (Is 11:1) implies that the Davidic house has fallen and points to a date after 586 BC. A date after 538 BC is suggested by the fact that with the arrival of this figure, Yahweh will initiate a "second" return from exile that will focus on the tribes taken away by Assyria (Is 11:11, 16) (Clements, 121-22; cf. Oswalt 1986, 277-84; Seitz, 96-98). The royal figure depicted here is a superhuman being of eschatological character, one endowed with multiple manifestations of God's spirit and issuing words of judgment to cosmic effect (Is 11:2-4). The justice inaugurated by his advent and rule will extend not only to Israel, but also to the world as a whole (Is 11:4, 9).

This movement from the expectations regarding justice that were placed on a newborn crown prince or the ascension of a king in the present to the hope of future intervention by a messianic figure is understandable, given developments in Israelite history. With the destruction of the institutions of temple and palace that came in 586 BC, Judah was bereft of the forces that had been most directly responsible for communicating the need for justice and for ensuring that it was carried out. In addition, the exile and the ever-diminishing hope that the monarchy would be reinstituted meant that the prophets could no longer point to the ascension of a new king as the one who would restore justice. In this context, the responsibility toward justice that had been embodied by the Davidic king was now projected upon an eschatological figure who one day would come to reign on David's throne with a Yahweh-imbued commitment to righteousness.

According to the prophet, this figure will be so infused with the spirit of Yahweh that he will not need to use his senses of sight and hearing to render judgments (Is 11:1-3). Rather, this person will offer judgments to the needy from an innate sense of righteousness and justice (Is 11:4a). For the wicked, the judgments that proceed from his mouth will bring destruction (Is 11:4b). For the faithful, the new era of covenant peace and blessing that this figure will inaugurate is depicted in the image of peaceful coexistence between animals that once had been in the relationship of predator and prey (Is 11:6-9; cf. Lev 26:6b). The work of this figure will result in a second return of Israel and Judah to the land, undoing the ultimate covenant curse of exile (Lev 26:33; Deut 28:64-68) and restoring the ultimate covenant blessing of living at peace in the land (Lev 26:7-13; Deut 28:3-14).

The rulers of Judah are condemned once again in Isaiah 28. Through chiasm (A, B, C, B', A'), the prophet highlights the connection between false worship and the perpetration of injustice. The rulers of Jerusalem, the prophet says, have made [A] a "covenant with death" (bērit + māwet) and an "agreement with Sheol" (šē'ōl + hōzeh) (Is 28:15a) and boast that they are immune from the "surging flood" (šōt + šōtēp + ābar) (Is 28:15b) because they have taken refuge in [B] a "lie" (kāzāb) and something "false" (šeqer) (Is 28:15c); to this boast, Yahweh replies that he will [B'] make "justice" (mišpāt) and "righteousness" (šedāqā) (Is 28:17) the standard by which everything is measured, and that [A'] hail will sweep away their refuge and the "surging flood" (šōt + šōtēp + ābar) (Is 28:18) their hiding place so that the "covenant with death" (bērit + māwet) and "agreement with Sheol" (šē'ōl + hāzûr) (Is 28:18) is annulled. The result of this arrangement is to focus attention on [C] Isaiah 28:16: "See, I lay a stone in Zion, a tested stone, a precious cornerstone for a sure foundation; the one who trusts will never be dismayed." The emphasis here repeats a major theme of the book: Yahweh is the only one whom Judah should trust; to replace Yahweh with another deity is to remove Israel's basis for justice and *ethics (Is 28:16).

In Isaiah 32 two or perhaps three oracles are brought together to address the need for justice (Oswalt 1986, 583-84; cf. Childs, 236). The first of these (Is 32:1-8) paints a picture of a time to come when king and princes will reign justly. The example set by the leadership will filter down to ordinary Israelites who will be a refuge (Is 32:1-2). Scholars differ on the setting of this passage, but the initial reference to king and princes, as well as the subsequent critique of the "noble" (nāḏīb [Is 32:5]) implies that it is preexilic (Clements, 259). The advent of righteous leadership will bring to an end the rule of a so-called noble class that has perpetrated evil, ignoring the plight of the hungry, depriving the thirsty of water, and subverting justice in order to deny the poor (ʿānī) and the needy (ʿebyôn) (Is 32:6-7). Contrasting with this picture of a future when men will act to protect others is a present in which women seem utterly indifferent to the culture of injustice they inhabit. This group lives as though they are under the covenant blessings of abundant grape harvest (bāšîr) and assured security (bṯh) (Is 32:9-10; cf. Lev 26:3-6a), even though such blessing is undeserved. Such moral disorientation and complacency in the face of injustice will lead to the covenant curses of depletion of abundance, loss of physical security, and the ruin of the city (Is 32:9-14; cf. Lev 26:20, 31a). In place of this situation, Yahweh will pour out his spirit on all Israel in order to bring justice, righteousness and security to the people (Is 32:15-20). This blessing and security will take place not in the verdant hill country or within the walls of Jerusalem, but rather in the arid "wilderness" (midbār), a miraculous prospect that confirms Yahweh to be the one worthy of Israel's trust. Through these oracles the writer makes the point that while rulers bear primary responsibility for the existence of injustice, ordinary citizens share culpability when they live and move in such a culture as if it were "normal." When such a darkly symbiotic relationship exists, an outpouring of the divine Spirit is necessary to sweep away the old and replace it with something new.

Isaiah 33:1-6 comprises a declaration of woe against the power (likely Assyria) that is oppressing the nation and a community lament in which the prophet cries out to Yahweh for deliverance. Although the nations have plundered the land, they themselves will be plundered (Is 33:4). Interestingly, the development that will remove the threat from Israel is the arrival of Yahweh not as an avenging force, but as a source of justice: "He will fill Zion with justice and righteousness. He will be the sure foundation for your times, a rich store of salvation and wisdom and knowledge; the fear of the LORD is the key to this treasure" (Is 33:5b-6 NIV). Security and covenant blessing cannot be enjoyed apart from a return to justice. As in the previous chapter, it will be an act of divine intervention that will achieve this.

In Isaiah 42, a passage that most scholars hold to be exilic, Yahweh identifies the “servant” (‘ebed) whom he will use to bring justice to the nations. At first unnamed, this figure, it soon becomes clear, is the nation of Israel itself (Is 42:5-9; 49:1-7; cf. 51:1-8). Some see messianic overtones in the passage (e.g., Oswalt 1998, 108), but the basic task of being a conduit for Yahweh’s aims in the world is entirely in keeping with both the promise given to Abraham (Gen 12:1-3) and Israel’s covenantally rooted, intermediary role as a kingdom of priests (Ex 19:6).

Israel will not accomplish this task on its own, however. As is noted elsewhere in the book (e.g., Is 11:1-3; 32:15-20), an infusion of Yahweh’s Spirit will transform and equip Yahweh’s servant Israel in preparation for its task. Elsewhere in the OT, such an infusion of Yahweh’s Spirit can be not just an equipping, but also a compelling, force (e.g., 1 Sam 10:9-11; 1 Kings 22:19-23; Is 37:7). Israel will bring justice not through coercion or force of arms, but rather through a faithful determination that will eventually see the nations accept its teaching (tôrâ) (Is 42:2-4). As Israel undertakes this task, it can be assured of Yahweh’s guiding presence (Is 42:6). The once-blind Israel (Is 6:9) will become a light to the nations, freeing them from blindness and giving them liberty (Is 42:7). All of this Yahweh can do because as creator of heaven, earth and all life, he has authority over the nations (Is 42:5).

This passage reminds an exilic Israel that Yahweh has given meaning to their existence even when they are not in the land of promise. Even when in exile among the nations, Israel has a role given by Yahweh that is in perfect conformity with the promises given to them at Sinai. Furthermore, it is clear from this passage that Yahweh’s authority is universal, and that the standards of justice that Yahweh has long demanded of his people Israel will one day be required of all nations.

The theme of Yahweh’s justice being made available to others is taken up in Isaiah 56. Based on its placement in the book (Is 56—66) and on Isaiah 56:8 in particular, most scholars see this passage as arising during the postexilic period, a time during which the returning exiles struggled to reestablish a foothold in Judah and fend off opposition from a hostile local population (Ezra 4; Neh 4; 6:1-14). The need to preserve the religious integrity of this fledgling community and avoid assimilation to the surrounding populace led its leaders to reject intermarriage with outsiders (Ezra 9—10; Neh 9:2a; 13:23-30). As a corrective to this, the writer of Isaiah 56 reminds the postexilic audience that Yahweh accepts the foreigner who chooses to be faithful to him. That even eunuchs, technically excluded from worship in the temple (Lev 21:18-20; Deut 23:1), receive such acceptance shows that Yahweh’s interest is in caring for any vulnerable outsider who turns to him (Is 56:4-7). This passage reminds the community that social justice is not complete if it consists solely of arm’s-length charity. Here, social justice is depicted as having the relational component of full acceptance into the community of faith. As the one who gathers exiles from afar, Yahweh is one who cares for the outcast and is prepared to challenge Israel with who that might be (Is 56:8).

The disconnect between religious practice and ethics criticized so thoroughly in Isaiah 1 comes to the fore once again in Isaiah 58. In what most scholars regard as a postexilic oracle, Yahweh complains that his people clamor to know his ways, receive just decisions and have him present—all of this despite the fact that they are rebellious (Is 58:1-2). When the people point to their fasting, Yahweh counters that even while engaging in this religious observance, they continue to abuse their workers (Is 58:3-4). The result is their need to adopt a new kind of “fasting,” an observance that includes freeing those who have been enslaved (Is 58:6), offering food, shelter and clothing to the poor (‘ani), and caring for family (Is 58:7). Only if such “authentic” religious observance takes place will the fortunes of the people change and Yahweh begin to respond to their cries for help (Is 58:9). Once this takes place, Yahweh will reinvigorate the people so that they will be able to rebuild the ruined walls of the city (Is 58:11-12).

In Isaiah 59 the writer laments how the sin of the people has separated them from Yahweh and how no one seems interested in pursuing justice (šedeq [Is 59:4]). Yahweh is quite able to rescue (Is 59:1), but the sin of the people is a behavior that cannot lead to the covenant blessing of peace (Is 59:8; cf. Lev 26:6a). The sin of the people has kept justice always out of reach (Is 59:9, 12-14). Surveying the situation and seeing that there was no one willing to carry out justice, Yahweh determines to intervene and arms himself for battle. The successful conclusion of this action brings the restoration of covenant blessing and testimony. The nations will be punished, and from east to west they will fear God's name (Is 59:18-19). The final verse sees Yahweh returning triumphantly to Zion (Is 59:20).

4.5. Jeremiah. Much of the book of Jeremiah condemns the people of Jerusalem for their idolatry, but also the prophet charges them with practicing injustice. In an allusion that compares Judah's practice of injustice to that of Sodom and Gomorrah, the prophet is commanded to go through the city to see if he can "find but one person who deals honestly [lit., 'does justice'; ōšeh mišpāt] and seeks the truth" (Jer 5:1). Judah's sin is something that the prophet tentatively attributes to a simple lack of understanding (Jer 5:3-4). Consequently, he goes to their leaders (haggēddōlīm) only to discover that they too had consciously rejected Yahweh's teaching (Jer 5:5). With both leaders and people rejecting God's teaching and correction, the result is a land turned over to wild animals (Jer 5:6; cf. Lev 26:22) and vineyards that are ruined (Jer 5:10; cf. Deut 28:30b, 39; Lev 26:5).

Later in the same chapter Yahweh issues a proclamation that exposes the obvious culture of injustice that has taken root in Judah. Even though it is clear that Yahweh has cosmic authority, restraining the chaotic power symbolized by the sea, the people of Judah have chosen to ignore his dictates (Jer 5:22-23). As a result, Yahweh has withheld the rain and the harvest that it produces (Jer 5:24-25; cf. Amos 4:7-8). Even so, the people have continued to practice injustice with callous premeditation. The image of the fowler is used to describe the manner in which the wicked lie in wait to snare human victims. Victimizing others, they have become fat and sleek (Jer 5:26-28a). They refuse to plead the cause of the orphan (yātôm), with the result that the orphan has no chance of prospering; they refuse to extend justice to the needy ('ebyôn) (Jer 5:28).

This situation of injustice is allowed to continue in part because the prophets, whose task it is to hold the nation to account for how it is following the terms of the covenant, have prophesied lies (Jer 5:31; also Jer 6:13-14; 8:10-11; 14:14-16). In other words, the prophets have pronounced covenant blessing where covenant curse is actually called for. The priests, who comprise the other group that might intervene to ensure justice, behave in the same way. This situation of officially sanctioned injustice is something that the people "love." The rhetorical question that follows, "But what will you do in the end?" (Jer 5:31b NIV), concludes the section on an ominous note. The final shaping of the book answers this question with the command "Flee!" which introduces the prediction of attack that is the preoccupation of the subsequent chapter (Jer 6:1). The description in this same chapter of Yahweh's intent to attack his own people (Jer 6:2-5) likewise answers the rhetorical question of Jeremiah 5:29.

The theme of rampant injustice enabled by lies continues in the well-known temple speech of Jeremiah 7. Here, the prophet takes up position at the entrance to Judah's house of worship and harangues the passing supplicants with stinging rebuke. The temple in Jerusalem was thought of as the earthly dwelling place of Yahweh—a belief reflected in the fact that the word for "house" (bayit) can also mean "temple." By Jeremiah's time, however, the people of Jerusalem had come to think of the temple in Jerusalem as a talisman that would guarantee their deliverance. Thus, even as the Babylonian army was threatening Jerusalem, the people were clinging to the mistaken belief that the presence of Yahweh's temple would render them invulnerable. The prophet bluntly counters this notion: "Will you steal and murder, commit adultery and perjury, burn incense to Baal and follow other gods you have not known, and then come and stand before me in this house, which bears my Name, and say, 'We are safe'—safe to do all these detestable things?" (Jer 7:9-10 NIV). In short, Judah had deluded itself into believing that there is no such thing as cause and effect, that they could ignore the covenant requirement of justice and still lay hold of the covenant blessing of security (see Lev 26:5b-6a; Deut 28:7). The one hope that Jeremiah offers to this self-deluded people is a radical encounter with reality that sees them change their ways: "If you really change your ways and your actions and deal with each other justly, if you do not oppress the foreigner, the fatherless or the widow and do not shed innocent blood in this place, and if you do not follow other gods to your own harm, then I will let you live in this place" (Jer 7:5-7 NIV).

The twin elements of a delinquent and deluded leadership come together in Jeremiah 21:12-14 and the chapter following. In a short initial oracle apparently addressed to King Zedekiah (597-586 BC) (cf. Jer 21:1), the prophet addresses the royal administration and commands its members to be true to their responsibility to maintain justice: "Administer justice [mišpāt] every morning; rescue from the hand of his oppressor the one who has been robbed" (Jer 21:12 NIV). Despite abdicating its responsibility to protect the vulnerable, this royal family—and all Jerusalem with it—nonetheless feels secure in its fortified location atop the city of David (Jer 21:13) (Holladay 1986, 577-78). This same theme is taken up in a further oracle delivered at the palace gate (Jer 22:1-5). The command to pay special attention to the plight of the sojourner, the orphan and the widow (Jer 22:3) is intended to remind the royal family of their duty as Yahweh's agents, and the emphasis in both oracles of the ruling family's association with "David" (Jer 21:12a; 22:2, 4) recalls the dynasty's founder as an outstanding example in this regard (see 2 Sam 8:15).

To drive home the point, Jeremiah reviews recent history to demonstrate how Yahweh has already begun to judge the royal family. He begins by declaring that Shallum (Jehoahaz) (609 BC), son of Josiah, deposed and taken captive by Pharaoh Neco II (609-593 BC) after a rule of only three months, will die in captivity (Jer 22:11-12; cf. 2 Kings 23:31-35). The prophet then turns his attention to Shallum's successor, Jehoiakim (609-598 BC). In a woe speech (Jer 22:13-17), the prophet condemns this monarch for violating the royal responsibility to bring justice by pressing the people into forced labor to build a spacious new palace, and this during a time of crisis. Jehoiakim's behavior contrasts sharply with that of his late father, Josiah, who, in the spirit of David, "did what was just and righteous" ('šh + mišpāt + šēdāqā [Jer 22:15b; cf. 2 Sam 8:15]). As punishment for enslaving his own people, Jehoiakim will have his security torn from him; his allies will disappear, and he himself will die and his corpse be disposed of as if it were that of a donkey (Jer 22:18-23). Even King Jehoiachin (598-597 BC), whom Jeremiah and Ezekiel treat favorably for having been the only one of Josiah's sons to heed the prophetic word to submit to Babylon (Jer 27:1-15; cf. 2 Kings 24:12), will die in exile.

A new declaration of woe (Jer 23:1) summarizes the situation. The sons of Josiah, shepherds who are charged with protecting Yahweh's flock, have by their oppression and injustice ended up scattering it. The term for "scatter" (pwš) used here is the one used in Deuteronomy of the scattering that occurs when sin leads to the covenant curse of exile (Deut 4:27; 28:64; cf. Deut 30:3). Since the royal house of Judah has failed to maintain justice, Yahweh declares that in the future he will act in a new way. The flock that his negligent agents have scattered, Yahweh himself will gather and restore. At that future date, Yahweh himself will choose a member of David's line who will reign in the spirit of David to bring justice and restore covenant blessing: "'The days are coming,' declares the LORD, 'when I will raise up to David a righteous [šaddiq] Branch, a King who will reign wisely and do what is just [mišpāt] and right [šēdāqā] in the land. In his days Judah will be saved and Israel will live in safety'" (Jer 23:5-6a NIV [cf. Jer 33:15-16]). The idea that this new Davidic king is one chosen by Yahweh is in marked contrast with the fact that two of the final Judean kings had been chosen by foreign earthly powers: Jehoiakim by Pharaoh Neco II (609-593 BC) (2 Kings 23:34) and Zedekiah by Nebuchadnezzar II (605-562 BC) (2 Kings 24:17). Chosen by Yahweh, this figure will unfailingly act as Yahweh's agent of justice, as is evidenced by his very name: "The LORD Our Righteousness" (Jer 23:6b). The name of this future king (yhwh šidqenū) is an obvious play on the name of Zedekiah, Judah's final king and the monarch with which this sequence of oracles began in Jeremiah 22:1 (cf. Jer 21:1, 11; 33:15-16).

The failure of both monarch and people to maintain justice is dramatically illustrated in the dying days of the kingdom of Judah (Jer 34:8-22). With the army of the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar II (605-562 BC) surrounding Jerusalem, King Zedekiah (597-586 BC) of Judah leads the people to free all Israelite slaves, in an act that some have seen as the observance of the Sabbatical year (Jer 34:14-15) (Carroll, 645) or the Jubilee year (Weinfeld, 13). Accompanied by his officials, subjects, and members of the priestly class, the king enters into a covenant before of Yahweh and pledges to release those Israelites who were under enslavement. Perhaps emboldened by a temporary withdrawal of the Babylonian army (Jer 34:21-22), Zedekiah reverses his commitment and, soon after the pledge is made, allows the reenslavement of those so recently liberated (Jer 34:11). The consequence of violating the covenant and abrogating his responsibility to ensure justice earns Zedekiah the stinging rebuke of the prophet Jeremiah and the imposition of covenant curses of sword, plague, famine and ultimate military defeat (Jer 34:17-22).

4.6. Zechariah. In the book of Zechariah the prophet's vision of a massive, flying scroll emphasizes the importance of the covenant law that was to ground the postexilic community and the dire consequences that would result should the people ignore its requirements (Zech 5:1-4) (Boda, 290-302). The two crimes that the angel singles out, theft and perjury, have the potential to destroy a closely knit community because theft represents a fundamental betrayal of personal relationships, and perjury carries with it the intent to pervert justice. At their core, both crimes represent a failure to love one's neighbor (cf. Lev 19:11-18). It is not surprising, then, that the prophet encourages his audience to practice relationships consistent with covenant justice: "Administer true justice; show mercy and compassion to one another. Do not oppress the widow or the fatherless, the foreigner or the poor" (Zech 7:9-10 NIV). This command had been given a generation earlier, and the error of ignoring it had resulted in the exile of Israel by Yahweh (Zech 7:11-13). Now it is repeated in the hopes that the return to covenant justice will initiate a concomitant return of divine blessing and presence (Zech 7:4-10; 8:1-8). When this happens, Jerusalem will become known as the "City of Truth" ('ir-hā'ēmet), and Zion known as the "Holy Mountain" (Zech 8:3). Yahweh's presence and the justice lived out by the inhabitants of Jerusalem will attract the attention of the nations that will come to Zion to seek Yahweh's favor (Zech 8:14-23). With this, Israel will at last fulfill the promise given to Abraham that he and his descendants would be a blessing to the entire world (Zech 8:13; cf. Gen 12:1-3).

5. Conclusion.

The emphasis on social justice that so often is a concern of the prophets is rooted in the Sinai covenant and as such constitutes a central aspect of Israel's identity. Israel's practice of social justice is important for the prophets because it is consistent with God's character, something that Israel's covenant identity required them to imitate. When Israel failed to act justly, they were misrepresenting Yahweh's character to the nations. In such a situation the covenant curses were applied with an increasing degree of severity until Israel either reformed its ways or was silenced through exile. Throughout the preexilic era the enthronement of a new king, or even the birth of a crown prince, brought with it fresh hope that justice would be upheld. Where Israelite kings were unwilling to act as Yahweh's agents of justice or where they had been chosen and installed by a foreign power, Yahweh sometimes vowed to "raise up" another from the line of David who would ensure justice for the vulnerable. With the disappearance of the monarchy after 586 BC, the royal responsibility for justice sometimes was embodied in a messianic figure whom Yahweh would one day bring to liberate his people and rule over them with justice. The future intervention of this figure will also have the effect of extending Yahweh's rule of justice to the nations as a whole, bringing to fullness the claims of authority implicit in the various oracles against the nations (e.g., Jer 46—49; Amos 1:3—2:3) and fulfilling the promise made to Abraham (Gen 12:1-3).

SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES

The history of attempts to apply sociological, anthropological and psychological insights to the study of the OT and to the world of ancient Israel is a long one. Pioneering studies appear in the last quarter of the eighteenth century, when Europeans began to travel to the Middle East and to compare those cultural realities to scenes and behaviors depicted in the biblical text. Others have reviewed this history in detail, so there is no need to replicate that work here. These surveys demonstrate the increasing sophistication of these approaches over time, as biblical scholars explored a variety of social-science theories and employed them with greater skill (Rogerson; Wilson 1984; Mayes; Overholt 1996; Carter 1999; DOTHB 905-21; Kessler).

The goal has been to reconstruct the world portrayed in the text, as well as to understand the context within which the text may have been produced. Social-scientific theory often is combined with archaeological data, literary studies and critical biblical research. It is not uncommon for social-science research in the Prophetic Books to have a moral thrust, as it has taken as its task to identify their underlying message of justice and look for its contemporary relevance.

1. Methodological Considerations
2. Early Approaches
3. Recent Developments
4. Future Directions

1. Methodological Considerations.

Social-science study of the prophetic literature is characterized by multiple approaches. The breadth of these efforts can prove daunting, but several taxonomies of the kinds of methods that have been applied to these texts can serve as practical heuristic categories to sort out viewpoints and interests.

One way to classify approaches is to follow the primary tracks within macrosociology that privilege social dynamics and define in large measure the theoretical orientation of inquiry. These are of two broad types (Mayes). Conflict models, as the label suggests, concentrate on the struggles between individuals or groups within society to achieve their respective ends. A context's distinct distribution of influence, wealth and power, as well as the roles of competing ideologies, commands attention. Recognizing causal relationships for these vectors and the changes over time are key. These studies are a legacy of K. Marx and M. Weber, although these two giants in the history of the field and their heirs would not agree on, for instance, the level of impact of the means of production and labor, the part played by human subjectivity, and the relationship of religion and the world of ideas to a society's infrastructure. Marxist approaches prefer a more cultural materialist tact, which accords great warrant to concrete economic matters, environmental factors and the use of natural resources.

Structural functionalism, which is traced to E. Durkheim, emphasizes instead a society's core institutions, traditions and rituals—their interconnections, purposes and authority—and the stability and cohesion that they engender. The collective consciousness and shared representations of a society take precedence over the individual. Other disciplines, such as cultural anthropology and phenomenology, which focus on meaning systems and how these shape human identity and how people organize themselves, create symbolic worlds and evaluate behaviors, display similar concerns. Such approaches have been critiqued as idealist, but at their best they couple these genuine, more subjective realities with tangible social conditions and conflicts.

Second, social-science approaches can be grouped according to the perspective of the research. This can be deemed as either emic or etic, a distinction rooted in linguistics (Headland, Pike and Harris). Emics prioritizes the “native point of view”; that is, it observes and explains phenomena according to categories that the actors under study would consider appropriate and meaningful. Etic accounts, on the other hand, are defined by the framework of the observer. These standpoints are not necessarily mutually exclusive, but methodological clarity demands awareness of differences in outlook, values and assessment.

A third set of helpful distinctions comes from the French historian F. Braudel of the Annales school of sociology. Here, the object of study is specified. To begin with, research can concentrate on l'histoire événementielle, on specific events or discrete historical moments. A second focus is the conjecture, which is not limited to a specific item but rather looks at developments over longer periods of time, like decades. The longue durée is interdisciplinary research into social institutions, structures and patterns over still longer time frames. In addition to the more common tools of sociological research, the longue durée takes into account other wide-ranging concerns, such as the impact of geographic location, climate, demographic patterns, ideologies and technological advances within the complex rhythms and trajectories of civilizations. The kinds of societal and environmental conditions, which are the target of the conjecture and the longue durée, are by their nature generic and enduring and facilitate comparative study. Similar structures and patterns in multiple contexts across cultures and eras offer a degree of certainty for seeking analogies with ancient Israel and the prophetic text.

Perhaps one could add another dimension to Braudel's three. It could be called l'histoire constitutive. These would be those constituent realities that appear in every society across time, such as the abiding conditions of charity and oppression, and of fair treatment and injustice that manifest themselves in diverse ways in particular contexts. These deeper moral issues are the primary concern of many prophetic texts and permit them to continue to be an important voice across the centuries (Carroll R. 1992, 156-62).

Fourth, research requires clarity in the formulation of sociological models. W. G. Runciman delineates four tasks that need to be distinguished but are commonly confused (cf. Carroll R. 1992, 36-47). The first is reportage. This is the attentive portrayal of the object of research, which clearly distinguishes the native point of view from that of the investigator. The second step is explanation, which is the proposal of a plausible, testable account for this state of affairs. Care must be taken to not misrepresent the data, and there must be an awareness of evidence that could refute the proposal and of the possibility of alternative hypotheses. A third point is description. This is not the same as reportage. In Runciman's terminology, description refers to engaging the reportage and explanation with the worldview of the researcher and of the agents under study in such a way that each would consider the findings to be comprehensive and authentic. Incompleteness and oversimplification are shortcomings to be avoided at this stage. The final step is evaluation, the value judgment to be placed on the object of research. Again, the assessment of the investigator and of the agents under study should be distinguished. Every effort must be made not to allow an inappropriate agenda to misconstrue the work. This prudent and rigorous procedure can safeguard the quality of research.

These various means of analyzing social-science research of the prophetic literature are useful guides for its appraisal and appropriation. Nevertheless, all approaches have inherent limitations, and it is common for introductory texts to voice caution. First, researchers wrestle with the problem of the availability of data. The amount of information provided by archaeology continues to grow, but this always will be partial because of the inescapable challenges related to excavations. These include limited access to certain areas and the destruction or displacement of evidence over millennia. The fact that scholars disagree over the significance of the evidence reveals, too, that some speculation is unavoidable.

A second problem concerns expertise in the application of the social sciences, the degree of acquaintance with relevant theories and the academic literature. Studies conducted by biblical scholars can suffer from an appeal to dated ideas, unawareness of the latest research, or the unconscious influence of scholars' presuppositions. The history of the utilization of the social sciences to interpret the OT is replete with examples of such shortcomings, from the early attempts by pioneers such as W. R. Smith in the 1880s, to scholars in the mid-twentieth century such as R. de Vaux, to some of more recent vintage (Rogerson; Herion).

A third issue concerns the reliability of the biblical text for sociohistorical reconstructions.

The wide differences in opinion range from the suspicious attitude of the "minimalist" position to those with greater confidence in the trustworthiness of the text's descriptions. This sometimes acrimonious debate shows little sign of resolution (McNutt, 1-32; Kessler, 24-32). One way forward may be to reconfigure how these texts should be perceived. Perhaps they can be appreciated as ethnographic reports, accounts that naturally have biases and limited purview but still present adequately the contours of the society that they depict (Carroll R. 2000; cf. Overholt 1996, 1-23).

One of the more negative voices regarding the employment of the social sciences to understand prophecy is that of R. P. Carroll (Carroll 1989). He categorizes the inevitable obstacles that biblical scholars face under three headings: data, definition, analysis. The first is based on his conviction that the biblical texts are not trustworthy representations of ancient realities. The problem of definition is that the HB, he says, does not present a uniform picture of prophets and prophecy, and so attempts at definitive, consistent reconstruction are problematic. The last critique is that efforts to apply the social sciences often are simplistic and overly accepting of the texts' presentation of the prophets and their world. This assessment is overly pessimistic. It is indeed profitable to appeal to the social sciences, as long as studies keep in mind the aforementioned caveats and appreciate the tentative nature of the enterprise.

Some within faith communities view social-science approaches with misgiving (Carter 1999). The unease is that the uniqueness of the people of Israel as presented in the OT will be lost. In other words, parallels with other contexts, both ancient and modern, and social-science explanations will reduce what is found in the Bible to common human socioreligious ideas and practices. There also is the fear that some scholars involved in this research have as their goal to undermine Christian faith. In response, it is important to appreciate the value of this research in illuminating the particulars and messages of biblical passages; they supplement purely textual approaches and deepen in fresh ways classical background studies. A more constructive view recognizes that social-science approaches lead to greater understanding, which is foundational for an informed faith.

2. Early Approaches.

Studies from the late nineteenth century to the mid-twentieth century that appealed to the social sciences can be divided into three categories. These should be considered not as sequential foci of study, but rather as areas of research among which, of course, there are overlaps.

2.1. Socioeconomic and Religious Critique.

One of the important achievements of nineteenth-century OT scholarship, articulated so powerfully by J. Wellhausen and that held sway for many decades, was the reformulation of the relationship between the prophets and the law. Instead of functioning to condemn their audience for failure to obey the *law's demands, these spokespersons for God were presented as predating the promulgation of the law codes and as preachers of a pure faith divorced from the rituals that stifle direct communion with God and disorient moral life. Once the law was dated late and interpreted (in negative fashion) as the precursor to Judaism, the prophets were separated from any possible moorings in the law. They were envisioned as champions of ethical monotheism, and the social critiques in the Prophetic Books (especially those of the eighth-century BC) were taken as the high point of Israelite religion.

Working within a conflict view, L. Wallis contended that much of the blame for the ills denounced by the prophets targeted the growing class stratification that accompanied the rise of monarchy. Israel began to experience conflicts endemic to urban life, such as tensions deriving from financial and power disparities and the emergence of debt, along with the land loss suffered by debtors and the unjust accumulation of property by the privileged. In Wallis's view, the prophets were the voice of the rural peasantry against the urban elites. Over time, he believed, the perspective of the prophets expanded beyond the rural-versus-urban dichotomy to include moral issues within the cities as well. This facile bifurcation of a simpler, more ethical rural community (Gemeinschaft) as opposed to an urban, bureaucratic, hierarchical society (Gesellschaft) is a position that continues to find adherents.

2.2. The Prophet in Context. The reconstruction by sociologist M. Weber of the rise of prophecy was complex and multifaceted, but its influence was enduring. Even though he discussed the ecstatic character of prophetic personalities and experience (Weber 1952), his primary impact lay elsewhere. To begin with, he located prophecy within a discussion about the nature of religious authority (Weber 1964). Utilizing his concept of "ideal types," which are theoretical constructs to help decipher social realities, Weber classified the prophets as individuals of charismatic authority, in contradistinction to the more rational, bureaucratic legal and traditional hierarchical kinds (cf. Emmet; Berger). These individuals are believed to have exceptional capacities that derive from a unique call, which legitimates their mission and message before their followers and the broader society.

Another important aspect of Weber's work was his reconstruction of the prophets' social roles and context (Weber 1952). He connected the origins of prophetism with the concept of Yahweh as a war deity of a people bound by *covenant. At the beginning of Israel's history the "nebiim," as Weber called them, had as one of their primary functions to accompany the peasant tribes' militia in war. This responsibility changed with the establishment of the monarchy and a professional army. Eventually those prophets, who were independent of royal circles and the professional prophets, stood against the religious and sociopolitical corruption of the monarchy. They championed early Yahwistic ethical norms in defense of those who had been taken advantage of, and they looked to the people's nomadic existence as God's ideal. These spokespersons, Weber maintained, often were "genteel intellectuals" supported by wealthy, pious families and Levites. Their words were a moral indictment, however, not a charge for revolution; they offered no alternative sociopolitical program. He classified them as "aesthetic," as opposed to "mystic," prophets because ethical demands were so central to their work.

There also was interest in the social location of the prophets and their messages on the part of those working in biblical studies. A crucial component of *form criticism was identifying the hypothetical Sitz im Leben ("setting in life") or situation where prophetic genres, especially at the oral stage of development, arose. Today, form critics have a greater appreciation of the complexity of the social, historical and literary settings of these forms, but discovery of those social contexts occupied much of the attention of early form critics. The various types of prophetic speech, such as judgment oracles, announcements of salvation, the messenger formula, woe oracles and the lawsuit, were assigned to a variety of Sitze im Leben, such as the cult, legal institutions, or wisdom and royal circles. An interpretation that held sway for many years located the prophets in the cult. Based on certain psalms, prophetic texts and comparative Mesopotamian data, S. Mowinckel, A. R. Johnson, A. Haldar and others argued that certain genres were grounded in religious rituals, and that some of the prophets, even among the writing prophets (especially Ezekiel, Haggai, Zechariah, Joel), were temple functionaries (see Liturgy and Cult). Nevertheless, although these studies had sociological interests, they did not apply social-science methods.

2.3. Psychological Approaches. In 1855 OT scholar F. Delitzsch published the first edition of A System of Biblical Psychology, in which he explored the relationship between the soul and the body and what it means to be human. This work was based almost solely on the biblical text, although Delitzsch did engage to some degree the nascent field of psychology. The prophets and the prophetic literature, however, were not central to his task (see Prophecy and Psychology).

The primary area of research in this period that did center on the prophets investigated the religious experience and the nature of self-consciousness in the reception of revelation from God. Some of what is described in the OT seems at quite a distance from clear-headed ethical preachers and thoughtful theologians! G. Hölscher shifted attention from the prophets' religious ideas to their behaviors and social settings and attempted to understand the ecstasy passages (e.g., 1 Sam 10:5; 2 Kings 3:15) through the lens of psychology (see Lindblom; Clements, 66-69). Hölscher connected these to mantic prophecy, which is induced by music and characterized by trance, that in his historical scheme had been absorbed from Israel's Canaanite neighbors. A scene in the Egyptian Wen-Amon text (c. 1100 BC) seemed to offer an ancient parallel (COS 1.41). In time, this bizarre activity was replaced by the moral messages of the writing prophets, although those experiences of heightened awareness and strange actions are still visible in Ezekiel.

Using the psychology of religion, J. Lindblom surveyed a series of accounts of ecstasies from different parts of the globe and diverse time periods in order to compare them with the OT prophets. A common denominator was the experience of an atypical mental state in which they felt overwhelmed by the deity and called to speak divine messages. This experience was characterized by abnormal behavior and an altered state of the body and mind. Like Hölscher, Lindblom related these incidents to the earlier prophets and less to the classical prophets, although they too had *visions, auditory experiences and uncommon sensations (e.g., Is 6; Jer 15:16; 20:7-9; 23:9; Amos 7). Once again, Ezekiel was the exceptional case. Lindblom related aspects of his call to aphasia and neurotic paralysis (see Ezek 3—4; cf. Dan. 7:15; 8:27; 10:8, 16).

Psychological theory also was beginning to be utilized to analyze individual prophets. A pioneer article in the field was E. Broome's argument that Ezekiel was a paranoid schizophrenic. Broome suggested that within the book of Ezekiel there was evidence of the prophet in a catatonic state and exemplifying fantasies of castration and sexual regression, as well as delusions of persecution and greatness.

3. Recent Developments.

The last few decades have witnessed an increase, a "second wave" of research some suggest, in the use of the social sciences (Wilson 2009). It is characterized by greater diversity and increased sophistication, even as it continues the trajectories of earlier work. The sheer abundance of material allows for only a representative survey.

3.1. Socioeconomic and Religious Critique.

One of the most fruitful areas of study has been the analysis of the social, economic and political composition of the monarchies in Israel and Judah. Scholars have employed a variety of social-science approaches to try to identify and explain the mechanisms of oppression that are denounced in the prophetic literature and the socioeconomic and class crises that generated these inequalities. These books do not offer formal sociological analyses; their descriptions are general and impressionistic. The rhetoric is strident and expressive of moral indignation. Social-science research attempts to reconstruct the realities that motivated these enduringly powerful messages.

B. Lang appeals to “rent capitalism,” a form of mercantilism, to explain the exploitation described in Amos. According to this hypothesis, Israel was largely a peasant society, and the life of the peasantry was precarious. In that part of the world these small farmers were at the mercy of adverse climatic conditions and crop failures. The socioeconomic system compounded these difficulties. Formerly self-sufficient rural peasants increasingly became dependent on urban merchants, moneylenders and self-indulgent absentee landowners, and were at the mercy of tax demands beyond their means (Amos 3:15; 4:1; 5:11; 6:4-6; 8:4-5). Many would have lost their land in this web of contrary conditions. Separated from the ownership of their land, they fell into debt to pay for seed and sustenance and eventually were forced into debt slavery (Amos 2:6; 8:6). For these violations of Yahweh’s moral order, the prophet announced an imminent, inescapable judgment on Israel.

J. D. Pleins combines historical critical analysis and social-science studies to reconstruct the ethical views of the entire Hebrew Bible. His discussion of the Prophetic Books occupies four substantive chapters. In his exposition of the material in Isaiah, Pleins presents the ethical convictions of Isaiah 1–35, which demand national justice and international judgment in tension with a proclamation of hope for restoration centered in *Zion, and attempts to demonstrate how they anticipate Isaiah 40–66. To unpack the concrete elements of the prophetic critique in the earlier chapters, Pleins turns to the “rent capitalism” model to explain the change from the early premonarchic land distribution system to latifundialization (Is 5:8-10). He adds that legal abuse and the incorporation of Canaanite values and personnel, which would have occurred at the taking of Jerusalem centuries before by David, created the cancerous climate condemned by the prophet. Later redactors among the returnees from the *exile co-opted that message for themselves; now the elite are depicted as the victims of empire and had the hard task of restarting national life, although the original ethical message is not totally obscured (Is 58).

This same process of muting the original prophetic voice, Pleins argues, is present in other texts. While prophets had words uniquely pertinent to their contexts, the kind of social critique exemplified by Amos and Isaiah would have been a common thread. Later redactors subverted this clarion call for justice. Two cases in point are the books of Jeremiah and Micah. In the former, subsequent layers of prose commentaries and covenant theological emphases soften and redirect the prophetic message; in the case of Micah (here Pleins bases his analysis on the work of I. J. Mosala), the radical original message is distorted by a very different ideology, which centers on the renewal of Zion.

A more sophisticated sociological analysis of the tensions within ancient Israel has roots in the Marxist model of the “Asiatic mode of production.” N. K. Gottwald has done much of the pioneer work in its application to biblical studies, although he has preferred other labels, such as “tributary mode of production,” or simply discussed the socioeconomic realities of a centralized state without alluding to that terminology (Gottwald 1993a; 1993b; 2001). In ancient Israel it would have had three features: the principal owner of the land was the state; society was made up largely of self-sufficient agrarian villages of multifamily households; and the centralized state had the power to extract the surplus value from the production of these villages through the collection of taxes, which supported the lifestyles of the ruling class and funded (and led to conscription for) public works. Other state functionaries, such as administrators, military leaders, merchants and priests, would have benefited from this arrangement. The prophets decried the violation of the values of the more equitable founding communitarian mode of production of Israel’s earlier history. Gottwald claims that the prophets, at their best, unmasked the false consciousness of the powerful and pointed to a more emancipatory perspective (Gottwald 1991; 1996).

In a series of publications M. L. Chaney has argued that a “command economy” controlled by the crown and urban elites arose in eighth-century BC Judah and Israel (Chaney 1993; 1999; 2006). This economic development arose with the growth of international trade, regional specialization and intensification of crops for export (see 2 Chron. 26:10), and the centralization of productive land into latifundia. Evidence for these realities includes the Samaria ostraca, lmlk seal impressions, an increase in the number of olive oil presses, new technology for production and storage, and population growth. Extensive critical analysis of Isaiah 5:1-7 and Micah 6:9-15 reveals prophetic anger at injustices suffered by subsistence farmers and the vulnerable. D. N. Premnath has expanded upon these ideas in a full-length book.

M. J. M. Coomber turns to the insights of cultural-evolutionary theory as an alternative to the proposal of Chaney and Premnath. His is a multidimensional approach that is neither linear nor simplistic. It includes within its purview, for instance, the impact of environmental factors and religious and cultural values and thus can allow for greater complexity in social arrangements and attitudes. He uses the agrarian society of present-day Tunisia and its entrance into the global economy as a case study to illuminate the prophetic critique (in particular, Is 5:8-10; Mic 2:1-2) of the new economic conditions of the Assyrian Empire's presence and influence. A cluster of realities ignited censure. These were social (intensification of existing social hierarchies and violation of traditional patronage roles), economic (injustice by various perpetrators, including judges, political elites and their collaborators) and religious (some religious elites attacked changes because it affected their income; others balked at the loss of traditional religious influence).

W. R. Domeris questions the common view that the rise of the monarchy was the primary culprit for the oppression denounced in the HB. He, like some recent scholars, believes that material that has been attributed to the preexilic period actually belongs to a Persian context. On the basis of the lower chronology of the Israelite monarchy, Domeris proposes that the northern kingdom did not become a full-fledged state until the ninth century BC and Judah not until the eighth, and that both remained essentially peasant societies until the Persian period. Exploitation of the peasantry during the divided monarchy was caused by several factors. There were the pressures of tributary obligations to the Assyrian and Babylonian Empires. Internally, in addition to perennial environmental challenges, peasants suffered the asymmetrical distribution of power between rural dwellers and urban dwellers and the abuse of the obligations of reciprocal patronage. These conditions, along with exploitation through rents, taxation, forced labor, debt bondage and an unfair judicial system, were denounced by the prophets. With the postexilic era came a market economy, and in its train followed the emergence of large-scale peasant debt and latifundialization. Like many social-science models, Domeris's theory of Israel's social and economic history relies on studies of modern peasant societies (see Lenski).

W. J. Houston offers yet another perspective. After a detailed survey of several explanatory models, Houston claims that patron-client relationships offer the best insights into the social realities of the prophetic literature (Houston 2008; cf. Simkins). These relationships are personal, hierarchical and reciprocal. In these kinds of societies expectations are that a more powerful individual provide lower-placed persons sustenance and protection in exchange for loyalty and perhaps labor. Houston's contention is that what is decried by the prophets is the violation of these arrangements, and that patrons at all levels—from members of prominent families of local villages to urban elites and the royalty—oppressed the unfortunate through various mechanisms at their disposal, such as unfair credit practices, foreclosures and crippling taxation. In a more recent publication (Houston 2010), he proposes that prophetic accusations dealt primarily with injustice in the capital cities and other urban centers. Archaeological data suggest that villages were able to maintain some semblance of economic independence and stability—this in contrast to the working assumption of most sociological models that social stratification was generalized, and that the rural peasants were the particular victims of oppression.

These studies exhibit a general sympathy for the prophetic censure of injustice. Ideological criticism, however, now questions that social critique (see Bible and Culture Collective, The Postmodern Bible). It casts suspicion on interpretive strategies that might mask contemporary unequal power relations; it also reads "against the grain" of biblical texts to uncover the potentially problematic ideology of their producers that has been canonized. These readings resist the Bible and subvert its unquestioned authority in order to offer what is thought to be a more transformative engagement between it and modern audiences.

In the past, some liberation theologians appealed to the early Marx's assessment of true religion as one that should oppose oppression. For instance, J. P. Miranda argued that the authentic prophetic call of interhuman justice was to be found in a critical reconstruction of the prophets' original message, which had been obscured over time by the additions of later redactors and avoided by biblical interpreters. In other words, the true prophetic voice was exemplary, a champion for the poor. This positive view, however, is questioned by several scholars who appeal to Marxist literary theory, especially the work of T. Eagleton and F. Jameson. Although several, such as Pleins, compare and contrast the perspectives of redactional layers, ideological critics ground their views more self-consciously in sociology of literature research.

In his materialist reading of Micah, I. J. Molsala divides the book into A, B, C stages of production. Only the first directly represents the class interests of the oppressed as over against the powerful (Mic 1:10-16; 2:1-5, 8-9; 3:8-12; 5:9-14; 6:9-15). R. Boer contends that in fact the message of the prophets (Is 5:1-7 is his case study) is full of contradictions (Boer 2003; cf. Houston 2008). Although they did denounce abuses, their advocacy of justice sought to preserve the inherently unfair socioeconomic arrangements of the existing class system. What is worse, he suggests, these texts reveal that Yahweh ultimately is the source and creator of these conflicting affairs and expectations. Ideological suspicion of the Bible in the end has become theological criticism.

3.2. The Prophet in Context. Efforts to locate the prophets within ancient Israel continue, but a significant shift is that these individuals are no longer viewed as solitary outsiders but rather as those with a support group and following. This change has been pursued in several ways. D. L. Petersen assembles a matrix of various sources of data to reconstruct the complex context of the prophets, both socially and geographically. He appeals to role theory to distinguish various levels of prophetic involvement in society and to explain the skills and expectations required for each task (cf. Buss). This information is coordinated with assorted biblical labels for prophets to argue that the northern and southern kingdoms referred to the different types of prophets in diverse ways. A third dimension to his presentation refers to the work of the anthropologist I. M. Lewis.

Lewis's categories of peripheral and central prophets are useful for charting the prophets' degree of interaction with and support by the ruling social groups and institutions. This classification could clarify their connection (or opposition) to the prevailing religious symbolic universe and political ideologies.

R. R. Wilson's extensive study begins with a comprehensive survey of prophetic phenomena in contemporary societies and the ancient Near East. Based on broad anthropological research, he prefers the term "intermediary" to "prophet" as more methodologically precise. Wilson discusses in detail central and peripheral intermediaries in regards to their calling, social validation, functions and support groups. Using this information as well as biblical data, such as the titles assigned to these spokespersons and speech forms, Wilson assigns the prophetic figures in OT narratives and the Prophetic Books to either the Ephraimite or Judean streams of traditions and places them on a central-peripheral social continuum.

T. W. Overholt also looks to anthropological research, but his primary concern is to investigate the dynamics of the communicative act between an intermediary and the deity and between the intermediary and the audience. Foundational to his comparisons with the biblical material are reports of several Native American experiences and prophets, such as the Ghost Dance of 1890 and Handsome Lake. From them Overholt gleans the importance of culturally defined patterns of expectations regarding the content of prophetic messages, acts of power, and the workings of feedback and audience acknowledgment to acquire social legitimation. All of this is fruitfully applied to several passages, including the exchange between the prophet Amos and Amaziah at the Bethel sanctuary in Amos 7:10-17.

Some continue to pursue comparative possibilities with other cultures to clarify the behavior and messages of the prophets (e.g., Grabbe). Methodological variety, however, characterizes the field. D. L. Smith, for instance, uses communication theory and the sociology of knowledge to explain the sociopolitical rhetoric of the critiques in the Prophetic Books and of their visions of an alternative future world. G. Ramírez employs a group/grid anthropological model to propose that the prophet Amos best fits within an "enclavist cultural" type, which represents peripheral groups that oppose the violation of values by a society's hierarchical structure.

Efforts to explore the general social context of the prophets clearly have a long history and are sure to continue. Recently, research has taken a different turn to concentrate on a particular chronological context, more specifically the exilic and postexilic periods as the arenas in which prophetic literature was produced. An earlier view is exemplified by P. D. Hanson, who understands the milieu of *apocalypticism to be the conflict between various factions within postexilic community of Persian Yehud. In his view, marginalized prophetic visionaries and their sympathizers among the Levitical priests produced Third Isaiah (Is 56–66) and Zechariah 9–14. These texts reflect their view of the faithful, the world and its future in very different terms than does the hierarchical Zadokite priestly party of Jerusalem, whose perspective lies behind Ezekiel, Haggai, Zechariah 1–8 and Joel (cf. Brueggemann).

S. L. Cook has criticized this "conventicle" model, which is based on deprivation theory, as reducing the setting of millennial groups to the disenfranchised and oppressed. In fact, he says, these groups can represent a range of social classes and interests, galvanized by a predisposition to an imminent climactic end of their present situation. Cook suggests that Ezekiel, Zechariah 1–8; 9–14 and Joel come from different conservative central priestly groups, functioning in diverse times and settings, and that it is an error to posit their source as sharply opposed circles within the Jewish community. For his part, Gottwald appeals to materialist literary theory to argue that Isaiah 40–55 represents the ideology of descendants of exiled former Jerusalem officials in Babylon who see themselves, on the one hand, as called to preserve their distinctive faith in Yahweh over against the allure of that foreign culture and, on the other hand, as uniquely qualified by their suffering and heritage to head the restoration of Judah and its religion with the aid and approval of Cyrus, the Persian king (Gottwald 1992).

D. L. Smith-Christopher approaches exilic and postexilic texts from quite a dissimilar perspective. He contends that to understand the mindset of the displaced communities in exile, as well as that of the returnees, it is helpful to seek insights from sociological studies of groups that have migrated, whether by force or by free will, in the contemporary world (cf. D. L. Smith). This research explores how such displaced communities handle challenges of identity as a minority people and develop survival mechanisms. Three such strategies are applied to prophetic texts: Jeremiah's letter to the exiles is read as a competing tactic to Hananiah's regarding the nature and goals of exilic existence (Jer 29), Isaiah's Suffering Servant as an illustration of a "diaspora novella" representing the powerlessness of a minority community, and the exhortations of Haggai as a reflection of the concerns of a community that seeks to reestablish itself. In a more recent work Smith-Christopher turns to trauma studies of refugee communities and diasporic theology to probe the language of Ezekiel and Lamentations. K. M. O'Connor appeals to his work to probe the passionate, sometimes even violent, language of the personae in the book of Jeremiah. God, the prophet and the people desperately wrestle with the horrific circumstances and aftermath of the Babylonian invasion and try to give voice to their misgivings, despair, anger and hope.

A growing number of scholars assign the production of the Prophetic Books (along with much of the OT) to a guild of scribal elites in Persian Yehud (Edelman and Ben Zvi). These literati reworked earlier prophetic stories and oracles and created new material in the name and authority of these earlier spokespersons for God in order to communicate their own sociopolitical convictions. The harsh denunciations now found in this literature, which audiences would have connected to the ministry of those prophets, served as an avenue to attack the societal ills or imperial policies contemporary to those later redactors. This perspective has not established a consistent well-orbed, or "thick," social-science framework. An exception is the work of L. K. Handy on the book of Jonah. He proposes that its author was a scribe of Yehud's elite who created this imaginary literary world to express the centrality of the temple in Jerusalem and sovereignty of Yahweh over the Persian Empire, which is represented by Nineveh.

Lastly, another approach to cultural location sheds light on the rural setting of ancient Palestine within which the prophets lived, which often is quite foreign to modern audiences, who can be largely urban and educated. The imagery of that world lies behind many of the descriptions, metaphors and analogies that appear in the prophetic literature. D. C. Hopkins appeals to ethnographic work in Palestine to explain activities of agricultural labor and the numerous matters related to the care of fruit trees and the processing of their products that appear in multiple texts. E. F. Davis turns to contemporary work in agrarian theory to cite four areas that find an echo in the OT: the commitment to the primacy of the land, an appreciation of the wisdom woven into the natural order, the material concreteness of human existence, and the transcendent value of the land for the community as a sign of God's covenant. As does Hopkins, Davis cites agricultural activities, which are scattered throughout the Prophetic Books and include, among others, plowing (Amos 6:12; Mic 3:12), harvesting (Jer 40:10; 48:33; 50:16) and threshing (Is 28:27). In the aboricultural sphere there is mention of, for example, gathering (Jer 24:2; Amos 8:1) and the harvest of fruit and olives (Is 24:13; Mic 7:1). This agrarian way of thinking, Davis contends, is manifest in the language pictures in the prophets' messages. They speak of the yoke of oppression (Is 9:4; 47:6; Jer 27:11), reaping what was sown (Hos 8:7), experiencing the harvest of God's judgment (Is 17:5-6; Joel 3:13), the threshing of a people in war (Amos 1:3) and the pruning of the wicked (Is 18:5). Likewise, the hope of a future *peace is expressed in agricultural imagery (Amos 9:13-15; Mic 4:3-4; Zech 3:10).

3.3. Psychological Approaches. Dialogue between the disciplines of biblical studies and the wide range of theories of psychology has a long history but has increased in breadth and sophistication over the last two decades (Kille; El-lens and Rollins; Joyce). Studies have tried to uncover issues of the unconscious that may lie behind the production of texts or to analyze the psychology of their characters (see Prophesy and Psychology).

Among the Prophetic Books, the two that have garnered the most attention are Ezekiel and Jonah. For example, the psyche of Ezekiel has long proven to be fertile ground for Freudian psychoanalysis. D. J. Halperin argues that the prophet's behavior and the book's imagery suggest a troubled childhood of rejection by his mother and abuse by a dominant male, while the descriptions in Ezekiel 8:7-12 and the shocking allegories in Ezekiel 16 and Ezekiel 23 reveal a revulsion of female sexuality. These troubling characteristics should raise questions, he believes, regarding the book's authority and usefulness. Halperin's interpretation of passages has been questioned, as have his efforts to reconstruct the psychological makeup of a person from snippets drawn from an ancient text. E. F. Edinger, on the other hand, uses a Jungian lens to analyze the prophet. J. J. Pilch proposes that the opening chapters are best understood as an altered state of consciousness experience, while D. Jobling proposes that the prophet's concern for purity and orderliness reflects anal-retentive symptoms.

Jonah has attracted several Jungian readings. A Lacocque and M. A. Corey mine the narrative for what they consider to its symbolic potential. They contend that the book reflects the difficult process of the self's journey toward individuation, that condition of wholeness where the ego overcomes barriers and is reconciled to the shadow self. Their Jungian archetypes include Jonah as the ego, the sea as the anger of the unconscious, the ship's hold as the deep reality of repression, and the flight from Nineveh as the effort to avoid facing the dark side of our person.

In this increasingly therapeutic age, it is not surprising that psychological research has been utilized to engage the prophets in multiple ways. While many studies, such as those cited for Ezekiel and Jonah, focus on the possible emotional composition of the prophets, psychological approaches have gone in other directions as well. For example, R. P. Carroll uses the social psychological theory of cognitive dissonance to look at a number of prophetic texts, especially from the book of Isaiah (Carroll 1979). Carroll explores what he perceives were the hermeneutical techniques within the prophetic literature to resolve the failures of predictions and to comprehend the interplay between contingencies related to human behavior and decisions and divine sovereignty in connection with those predictions. D. G. Garber, in turn, employs literary trauma theory (particularly those arising from experiences of the bombing of Hiroshima) to explain Ezekiel's vivid imagery.

W. G. Rollins helpfully sets forth a wide range of topics in need of future research. His list includes the conscious and unconscious factors at work in the writing of biblical literature and in the interpretative process, the archetypal nature and power of biblical material, the psychodynamics inherent within texts, the psychoanalysis of biblical characters, the presence today of biblically related religious phenomena (e.g., conversion, glossolalia, dreams, demonic possession), the salutary and constructive impact of the Bible on individuals and communities over time, and the greater integration of psychology with the study of biblical psychology and anthropology.

3.4. Gender. Social-science research has been brought to bear on prophetic texts by *feminist scholars. Comparative ethnography has been applied by feminist scholars to explore the roles and behavior of women within the religious world of ancient Israel. Anthropological sensibilities have helped broaden interest in biblical studies beyond possible female participation in official clerical positions and cultic ceremonies, which are the primary interest of the biblical material, to include gender-specific practices within that complex religious culture. Research into the economic and religious roles of women in households and village communities of traditional agricultural societies is shedding new light on biblical texts.

P. A. Bird, for instance, demonstrates that women's actions that are reported in the OT are principally an extension of female domestic roles. Snapshots appearing in the prophetic literature include the baking of raisin cakes for the Queen of Heaven (Jer 7:17-18; 44:15-25) and weeping for Tammuz (Ezek 8:14). Cooking and mourning, for the most part, were understood as tasks for women. C. Meyers presents an array of ritual behaviors usually exclusive to women that would have been connected especially to childbearing and the raising of children. These very well could have been designed to assure fertility, a safe pregnancy, delivery and lactation. Some customs, such as the washing of newborns and rubbing them with salt (Ezek 16:4-5), and the existence of female religious professionals, such as midwives, sorceresses (Is 57:3) and diviners (Ezek 13:17-23), are still evident in that part of the Mediterranean today (see Divination, Magic). On the basis of these comparative studies, Meyers has argued that the status and function of women within the complex peasant households and local societies of ancient Israel, which were largely domestically focused, were more significant than many suppose.

Working from the perspective of the shift from a redistributive village economy to the rise of a command economy and latifundialization with the advent of the monarchy, A. A. Keefe redefines Hosea's tropes. The woman and her sexuality are explained as symbols for productive land; the relationships with other lovers in the book's opening chapters represent the commercial ventures and political arrangements of Israel's elite with surrounding states. The prophet denounced the official cult that legitimated this systemic injustice, not the fertility beliefs of the people. G. Yee utilizes ideological criticism and various social sciences to read OT texts. She discusses the regulation of sexuality and agricultural modes of production in her interpretation of Hosea and appropriates trauma research to the message of Ezekiel.

4. Future Directions.

The expectation is that the application of social-science research into the study of prophetic literature will continue within the broad categories that have characterized this work for over a century—socioeconomic and religious critique, the context of the prophets, and psychological approaches—even as scholars probe new areas or pursue greater precision in older studies. Interest in matters related to gender, of course, will continue.

A newer voice that is becoming more prominent is that of postcolonial criticism (Sugirtharajah). Like ideological criticism and certain strands of feminism, it moves beyond a critique of oppressive interpretations to an analysis of what are deemed unacceptable attitudes within the Bible, yet its concerns lie with the colonial perspectives, such as nationalism and ethnicity, embedded in the text. Its critique of liberation theologies is that they privilege the Bible, the Christian tradition and institutions, whose monopolistic roles in the history of the Third World sometimes have been problematic. By nature, it is multidisciplinary. A related area, diaspora research, increasingly is important among minority scholars, who find multiple parallels between the biblical material and, for instance, immigrant experiences (Lee Cuéllar).

The social sciences have provided more precision in the interpretation of textual particulars. These approaches have explained customs, religious rituals, and sociopolitical and economic structures and dynamics, all of which have added greater realism to multiple passages in the HB. This concreteness allows for the better visualization of the OT and, where suitable, its appropriation for ethical reflection. Nevertheless, the caveats mentioned earlier (i.e., the problem of the availability of data, the inadequate grasp of theory, the challenges of historical reconstruction) should encourage scholars to be careful in positing hypotheses and to avoid grandiose claims. A certain degree of speculation is unavoidable, and models are subject to revision or replacement by more viable constructs. The history of social-science research in OT studies attests to both the variety and the tenuousness of these proposals. Nevertheless, the opportunity to better grasp the context and message of the prophets makes these efforts worthwhile.

SPIRIT OF YAHWEH

The majority of references to the Spirit of Yahweh in the OT occur in the prophetic literature from the exilic period and after. In total, the term rûah is used 389 times in the OT, including eleven instances in the *Aramaic chapters of Daniel (Even-Shoshan, 1063-66). The term rûah is applied to God in approximately 107 references. This number includes the phrase “Spirit of Yahweh” (rûah yhwh), which occurs twenty-seven times, and “Spirit of God” (rûah ʿēlōhîm), which appears fifteen times in Hebrew and five times in Aramaic. Due to the prominence of “Spirit” [rûah] references in many OT contexts, this article provides a brief synopsis of this term in the Pentateuch, the Former Prophets and the Writings.

The immediate context of rûah usually indicates whether the term refers to a human anthropological function (approximately 167 occurrences) or a wind (approximately 115 times). Yet, within these contexts there may be a wide and complex range of meanings to indicate “mind,” “breath,” “heart,” “air” or similar terms (Tengström, 373-79; Hildebrandt, 1-27). When the term refers to a human function, it is used in an anthropological or psychological sense. A primary connotation of rûah in relation to humankind is its function as the animating principle of life. Due to the importance of context for the meaning of Hebrew words, the interpretation of rûah in regard to humankind, God or wind is at times tentative. Moreover, the question often arises whether the Spirit of Yahweh in the OT is understood as an actual person or hypostasis. Systematic theologians debate this matter extensively (for a good synopsis, see Berkhof, 87, 95-97). A biblical analysis indicates that the OT authors advance in their understanding of the Spirit of Yahweh’s roles, function and pervasive activities. This is evident from the increase of references to the rûah, which intensify during Israel’s history to the exilic period. References grow in quantity as well as in the range of meaning in relation to the Spirit’s functions in creation, the life of Israel as a nation, leadership roles and prophecy. This development in the understanding of the rûah, which typically indicates the powerful presence of God to effect the divine will, may be seen in two examples. In Psalm 51 the psalmist refers to the rûah four times to show how the rûah interacts with humankind through interpersonal ways. In one reference the psalmist uses the epithet “Holy Spirit” to express the plea that God would not remove his presence from his life. A similar reference is made in regard to the nation of Israel where the “Holy Spirit” is grieved by the nation’s response. There is no doubt that in Isaiah 63:10-11 this term refers to the presence of God in an active role in Israel’s life.

1. The Spirit of God in the Pentateuch
2. The Spirit of Yahweh in the Former Prophets
3. The Spirit in the Writings
4. The Spirit of Yahweh in the Latter Prophets

1. The Spirit of God in the Pentateuch.

The OT begins with the phrase rûah ʿēlōhîm to feature the work of the Spirit of God in creation (Gen 1:2). This reference presents the presence and activity of God in bringing forth the created world through the agency of the word and the Spirit (Hildebrandt, 28-66; Tengström, 385). The theme of creation in the OT rests on the conception that the Spirit of God brings order out of chaos. What God commands in regard to the created world, the Spirit shapes into reality (Ps 33:6; Is 40:13). Furthermore, humankind is created and animated by the breath of God (Gen 6:17). The rûah may also refer to a variety of human dispositions (Gen 26:35; 41:8; 45:27; Ex 6:9; Num 14:24). Often the translation of rûah as “wind” indicates an instrumental usage by God to accomplish a divine purpose (Ex 10:13, 19). The rûah causes the floodwaters to recede (Gen 8:1); the wind from God also brings the plague of locusts over the land of Egypt (Ex 10:23) and parts the Reed Sea (Ex 14:21) to provide Israel with an escape route. This intervention from Yahweh is also recorded in the Song of the Sea, where “the blast [rûah] of your nostrils” (Ex 15:8) and “you blew with your rûah” (Ex 15:10) describe the agency whereby Israel is delivered from Egypt. After this exceptional event, Israel is established as a nation in a covenantal relationship with Yahweh (Hildebrandt, 67-72).

In addition to these foundational concepts, the Pentateuch also presents a number of references to God’s influence in providing leadership skills to specific individuals. The first instance of this phenomenon occurs when Pharaoh recognizes a special endowment of wisdom in Joseph, who also has the ability to interpret dreams. Joseph’s unique ability is attributed to the rûah ʿēlōhîm, whose presence earns Joseph the leadership position as vizier of Egypt (Gen 41:6). Moreover, similar expressions are made in reference to practical leadership qualities or skills as given by the Spirit for a particular task. Those involved in the tabernacle construction and the making of sacred garments are given “wisdom” (hokmâ), which gives them the special abilities for their tasks (Ex 28:3). Specifically, Bezalel is “filled” (mālê) with the rûah ^ʾ*ēlōhîm* (Ex 31:3; 35:31), which not only provides the ability and knowledge for work in all kinds of crafts, but also gives Bezalel and Oholiab the ability to teach others their skills (Ex 35:34; cf. Ex 36:1-2).

Another aspect introduced in the Pentateuch regarding the influence of the rûah for leadership in Israel involves prophecy. An extraordinary experience occurs with seventy elders who “prophesy” when the rûah comes upon them (Num 11). These elders are not designated as prophets. The term nābi’ (“prophet”) does appear fourteen times in the Pentateuch, in reference to Abraham (Gen 20:7), Aaron (Ex 7:1) and the paradigmatic Moses (Deut 34:10-12). The biblical evidence that Moses gave leadership by the rûah yhw̄h is implicit for the most part in the Pentateuch, but it is made explicit in Numbers 11 and in Isaiah 63. Moses was instructed by Yahweh to call seventy officials and leaders together. “Then the LORD came down in the cloud and spoke to him, and took some of the Spirit that was on him and put it on the seventy elders. And as soon as the Spirit rested on them, they prophesied. But they did not continue doing it” (Num 11:25 esv). Implicitly, the rûah that is understood to be on Moses is now distributed among the seventy elders. This narrative provides some background to Moses’ role as God’s exemplary prophet (Deut 18:15-18), mediator and intercessor for the nation (Ex 33:12-16; Num 11:1; 12:13; 14:16-19). In this context Moses expresses the programmatic desire that Yahweh should put the rûah on all of his people (Num 11:29).

Joshua was among the seventy who experienced Spirit reception and prophetic utterance (Num 11). As for wisdom, Joshua is identified as being filled with the rûah hokmâ for leadership. Moses placed his hands on Joshua (Deut 34:9) to commission him, and with the rûah Joshua was enabled to lead Israel in the conquest of Canaan (cf. Num 27:18). In another instance, the coming of the rûah on the enigmatic Balaam also results in the activity of prophecy. When the rûah ^ʾ*ēlōhîm* comes upon him, he is inspired with two oracles (Num 24:2-24). The consequences of Balaam’s prophecies indicate features normally associated with the “later” prophets of Yahweh. His “inspired” oracles have extensive future implications for Israel.

2. The Spirit of Yahweh in the Former Prophets.

The concepts introduced in the Pentateuch take considerable shape or development in the literature of the Former Prophets. In the book of Judges there are seven references to the rûah yhw̄h (Judg 3:10; 6:34; 11:29; 13:25; 14:6, 19; 15:14). In each occurrence the phrase indicates a special provision from the Lord to four individual leaders who are enabled by the Spirit of Yahweh to accomplish deliverance from oppressors. In each case there are violations to the covenantal relationship that have led to Israel’s oppression. When Israel cries out for deliverance, the Spirit of Yahweh comes upon Othniel, Gideon, Jephtah and Samson at different times “to effectuate Yahweh’s salvation of His covenant people” (Martin, 22). In Judges the use of rûah yhw̄h features the covenantal relationship with Israel and the Lord’s intention to bless his chosen people. This emphasis continues into the period of the monarchy, where the rûah comes upon Saul and David to enable their leadership in Israel (1 Sam 10; 16). In addition to the undergirding of leadership functions, the prophetic element initiated in Numbers 11 continues to develop. For Israel’s first king, the coming of the rûah yhw̄h/^ʾ*ēlōhîm* causes Saul to prophesy (1 Sam 10:6, 10; 11:6; 19:20, 23). The nature of this “ecstatic” outburst is an external manifestation of prophesying that serves as a public indicator of Spirit reception to authorize Saul as the designated leader. The rejection of Saul as king is made complete when the rûah yhw̄h departs from him (1 Sam 16:14). The rûah that gave Saul authority and power to conquer the enemy is now replaced by the evil rûah, which is characterized by mental anguish, fear and depression. This experience for Saul introduces elements of ecstatic prophecy that sometimes leads to behavioral aberrations (1 Sam 19:20-24) and conflict between prophets (1 Kings 13; 18:28-29; 22:10-28) (see Hildebrandt, 159-62, 179-87).

After Saul is rejected as king, David is elected by Yahweh (1 Sam 16:1-12) and anointed by Samuel. Consequent to his anointing, “the rûah yhw̄h rushes upon David from that time onward” (1 Sam 16:13). This act of anointing symbolizes the Spirit’s endowment on the king, who is authorized and enabled to carry out leadership duties in Israel. At the end of his reign as king, David attributes his successes to the rûah on him (2 Sam 22) and claims prophetic inspiration: "The Spirit of the Lord spoke through me, his word was on my tongue" (2 Sam 23:2). Furthermore, the rûah yhw is shown to be active in the Elijah and Elisha narratives (1 Kings 18:12; 2 Kings 2:16), which explains some of the unique miracles and transfer motif in these episodes. These prophets led the fight against apostasy in the nation. When Elijah is taken away by the Spirit of Yahweh (1 Kings 18:12; cf. 2 Kings 2:16), his prophetic authority is transferred to Elisha (see Hildebrandt, 174-79).

3. The Spirit in the Writings.

References to the activity of the rûah are limited in the Writings, but there are several commentaries on concepts initiated in the Pentateuch. God breathes life into his creation and thereby animates, renews and sustains the cyclical patterns that bring life and fertility to each generation of humankind (Job 26:13; 32:8; 33:4; Ps 104:30; 147:18). Wisdom in the proverbs emanates from God and may be compared to a spring that is poured out, as in Proverbs 1:23: "I will pour out my rûah to you." Wisdom is like a charismatic gift of the Spirit that may be poured out like an anointing oil or in the sense of revitalizing God's people (Is 44:3). Furthermore, the continued presence of God with his people is evident. Providential care and guidance are given by the rûah (Ps 33:4-9; 139:7; 143:10). After his sin with Bathsheba, David fears for the loss of the rûah, which he knew would debilitate him as king. David pleads with God to not take the Holy Spirit from him (Ps 51:11). In 1-2 Chronicles the Levitical priests give prophetic leadership to the community. Inspired speech often is connected to the rûah coming upon the priests (1 Chron 12:18). The Spirit of prophecy continues to be as vital in the exilic period as it was during the monarchy (2 Chron 15:1, 8; 18:23; 20:14; 24:20). The Chronicler names more than twenty-four of these prophets! Two notable summaries are made by Nehemiah. This first one provides a historical review of Yahweh's dealings with Israel that highlights the preservation and guidance of the nation by Yahweh's Spirit. "Because of your great compassion you did not abandon them in the wilderness. By day the pillar of cloud did not fail to guide them on their path, nor the pillar of fire by night to shine on the way they were to take. You gave your good Spirit to instruct them. You did not withhold your manna from their mouths, and you gave them water for their thirst. For forty years you sustained them in the wilderness; they lacked nothing, their clothes did not wear out nor did their feet become swollen" (Neh 9:19-21 NIV). Nehemiah also notes the role of the prophetic word: "For many years you were patient with them. By your Spirit you warned them through your prophets. Yet they paid no attention, so you gave them into the hands of the neighboring peoples" (Neh 9:30 NIV). Yahweh gave his "good rûah to instruct them," to provide for them, and to sustain them on their journey. The nature of their instruction came through the prophets, who were endowed with the Spirit, but not often were they receptive to the prophetic word.

4. The Spirit of Yahweh in the Latter Prophets.

The word rûah does not appear in all of the Prophetic Books (it is not used in Obadiah, Nahum, Zephaniah). When it is employed, it has a variety of connotations, from wind to breath to the presence of Yahweh. In Daniel rûah occurs fifteen times, including eleven in the Aramaic chapters. It occurs infrequently in Hosea (7x), Amos (1x), Jonah (2x), Micah (3x), Habbakuk (2x), Haggai (4x), Zechariah (9x), Malachi (2x). Jeremiah (18x) uses it mainly in reference to the wind as God's instrument of judgment. In the absence of Spirit references in these prophets there is more of an emphasis on the word of Yahweh. However, the occurrence of rûah with a developed theological significance intensifies during the exile and postexilic period, where rûah appears often in Isaiah (51x) and in Ezekiel (52x). Although Joel only refers to the rûah twice (Joel 2:28-29 [3:1-2 MT]), it deserves emphasis as a "theologically important statement concerning the outpouring of the spirit at the eschaton" (Tengström, 373). In this section, the discussion will mainly concern the occurrences of rûah that denote an influence among God's people (judgment and restoration) and the rûah in prophecy and in the leadership of individuals.

4.1. The Spirit of Yahweh and Israel: Judgment and Restoration. The prophetic literature serves as a record of God's dealings with Israel according to the covenant established at Mount Sinai (Ex 19). The prophets present their messages of judgment for *covenant breach and often use the word rûah to indicate God's *wrath that may come upon his people like a "scorching breath." Furthermore, Isaiah uses the epithet "the Holy Spirit" to personalize the divine grief that is caused when Israel breaks the covenantal agreement (Is 63:10). This is evident in the indictment of Isaiah 1, which proclaims a perverted cultus and Israel's broken relationship with God. However, the sins of Israel will be dealt with through a process of cleansing and judgment. "The LORD will wash away the filth of the women of Zion; he will cleanse the bloodstains from Jerusalem by a rûah of judgment and a rûah of fire" (Is 4:4). The word mišpāt, used several times here, is a legal term for "right judgment" in the sense of a judicial decision rendered by the intervention of Yahweh. A cultic purifying is implied that brings individuals and the community into a right relationship with Yahweh. In the prophetic literature this procedure of judgment and cleansing is the prerequisite to Yahweh's "pouring out of the Spirit" on his people (Is 32:15; 44:3; Ezek 39:29). In Isaiah 4:4 the sins of Israel will be cleansed by Yahweh's purifying work through his rûah. This concept is developed further in Isaiah. "See, the Name of the LORD comes from afar, with burning anger and dense clouds of smoke; his lips are full of wrath, and his tongue is a consuming fire" (Is 30:27). The breath (rûah) of the Lord is likened to a stream of sulfur (Is 30:33), and the wrath of God may be poured out in fiery anger (Ezek 21:31; 22:31). When the breath of Yahweh blows, the grass withers and the flower fades (Is 40:7). In these passages the opposite effect of God's beneficence, which is often "poured out" on his people through the Spirit, is experienced. In this sense, God comes like a consuming fire that burns, refines and, on occasion, destroys.

The prophet Isaiah also uses this metaphor to declare God's judgment on the enemies of Israel, who are punished by a "scorching wind [rûah]" (Is 11:15; cf. Is 27:8; 30:28; 33:11; 40:7; Hos 13:15). This may refer to the hot east sirocco or metaphorically to a foreign power. In these passages the presence of God is manifested in a theophany that not only destroys the enemies of Israel but also purifies the nation through a mitigated punishment (cf. 2 Kings 17:17b-18). This is God's manifested power of judgment, sometimes for Israel's foes, but at times also turned upon his people (Goldingay 1997, 13). Isaiah also prophesies that God's judgment will be meted out by "the branch from Jesse," who will exercise judgment by the Spirit (Is 11:15). Through his intervention the remnant will be restored.

An illustration of Israel's covenantal breach occurs in Isaiah 30:1: "'Woe to the obstinate children,' declares the LORD, 'to those who carry out plans that are not mine, forming an alliance, but not by my Spirit [rûah], heaping sin upon sin.'" This oracle is given during the time of revolt led by Hezekiah against Sennacherib (703-701 BC) (see Kaiser, 283-85). Rather than turning to Yahweh for security, the leaders turned to Egypt for protection even though Egypt was also weak and in need of assistance. The prophetic rebuke specifically addresses the leaders who devised their plans apart from the direction and oracle of Yahweh (cf. Jer 37:17-21; 38:14-28). Instead of consulting "my rûah," the leaders contrived an alliance with Egypt and ratified it according to their plans and wisdom. Another passage sets forth the antithesis between trust in God and trust in humanity: "But the Egyptians are mere mortals and not God; their horses are flesh and not spirit [rûah]" (Is 31:3). The difference in the nature of God and flesh, and the strength of God and flesh, are here distinguished (cf. Ezek 28:2, 9; Hos 11:9) to indicate the necessity for dependence on God and the Spirit. In an oracle of judgment for Edom, God's actions are illustrated in the way he can intervene: "For it is his mouth that has given the order, and his Spirit [rûah] will gather them together" (Is 34:16). The frequent connection between the spoken word and the rûah that will carry it out is clear in this passage.

Isaiah 63 is a reflection on Yahweh's vengeance as well as his deeds accomplished on behalf of Israel. It takes the form of a community lament, however, because God's gracious acts for the chosen people were met with rebellion rather than praise and adoration. The consequence of their sin was due to their poor response to Yahweh's blessings. Isaiah records the lament: "Yet they rebelled and grieved his Holy Spirit. So he turned against them as their enemy, and he himself fought against them" (Is 63:10). The result of their transgression was that they “grieved his Holy Spirit,” indicating the sorrowful response of the rûah due to the consequence of Israel’s failure to acknowledge the one who “brought them through the sea” and who it was that set “the Holy Spirit” among them to guide and deliver them: “Then his people recalled the days of old, the days of Moses and his people—where is he who brought them through the sea, with the shepherd of his flock? Where is he who set his Spirit of holiness among them, who sent his glorious arm of power to be at Moses’ right hand, who divided the waters before them, to gain for himself everlasting renown, who led them through the depths?” (Is 63:11-13a NIV). This passage marks an important step toward the use of “Spirit” “in relation to God in which each and all of his acts can be attributed to his Spirit or to God’s Holy Spirit” (Westermann, 389). The community of faith recognizes the miracle of the *exodus and the resulting “rest” as the provision of Yahweh by his rûah (Is 63:14). They now lament their improper response, which grieved the rûah and caused their punishment. Moreover, they realize that restoration may be affected by the renewed work of the Spirit on their behalf.

4.2. The Spirit of Yahweh and the Messianic Servant. In the Former Prophets several kings were anointed for their royal roles. This act symbolized the presence of the rûah yhwh to prove the authority and provide abilities for the role of “judge” or “king.” The term “anoint” gives rise to the concept of the messiah (1 Sam 10:1-2; 16:13; 2 Sam 5:2; 6:21) and indicates the special relationship of the anointed one to Yahweh. Anointing is a sacramental sign that confers authority to act and is tied closely to the bestowal of rûah for enablement. The externally flowing oil represented the internal reality of the Spirit’s filling. The four main messianic qualities connected to kingship and anointing are (1) the election of an individual; (2) anointing by priest or prophet; (3) Spirit endowment; (4) the public demonstration of the gift in bringing about victory over enemies (Knierim, 114-15).

This is the background to some of the messianic concepts presented in the book of Isaiah. The prophet presents some of the characteristics of the ruler whom Yahweh will raise up (Is 11:1-2). The charismatic endowment of the rûah that characterizes his rule is emphasized by the fourfold use of rûah in this passage. The rûah yhwh will “rest” upon him and qualify him for his task. This term for “rest” (nûah) is reminiscent of the Spirit resting on the elders (Num 11:25-26) and on Elisha (2 Kings 2:15). The first two qualities given by the Spirit are “wisdom” (skill necessary for the application of knowledge) and “understanding” (discernment necessary for proper administrative functions). The king also receives the rûah of “counsel” to assist him with the intellectual ability and volition required to make correct judgments. The rûah is the motivating power of the king’s rule that bestows the necessary leadership virtues characteristic of ideal kingship. He receives the rûah of “knowledge” indicative of an intimate relationship with Yahweh (see Messiah).

This ideal ruler will mete out judicial pronouncements with righteousness and justice. It is probable that Isaiah 11:1-9 brings the military charisma of the judges and the judicial charisma of the king together. Thus, the wisdom of Solomon for judicial administration (1 Kings 15:23; 16:5, 27; 2 Kings 18:20) and the martial charisma of Saul and David are merged to include the two main functions of the messianic role (Mettinger, 249). His reign is characterized by wisdom and compassion through which all may find help (Is 11:3-5). Some of these concepts are also presented in Isaiah 9:6-7, where a son is born to reign on David’s throne.

Several texts stand out in the book of Isaiah that usually are referred to as the Servant Songs (Is 42:1-9; 49:1-13; 50:4-11; 52:13—53:12), but Isaiah 61:1-3 should also be included in this category (see Servant of Yahweh). It is mainly in Isaiah 40—55 that the prophet focuses attention on the servant of Yahweh. The significant themes reiterated in these chapters include the investiture of the rûah (Is 42:1), the proclaiming of good news (Is 40:9; 41:27; 52:7) and various acts of mercy (Is 42:5-9). In Isaiah 40—42 the rûah has a central role for the exiles. Yahweh has not left them and assures them that he has chosen a servant (ʿebed) through whom salvation will come (Is 41:8-10). In Isaiah 42:1 the ʿebed is Yahweh’s chosen one, whom he will uphold for the task entrusted to him. The relationship between Yahweh and the chosen servant is intimate, as expressed by the term “delight.” It is by Yahweh’s power and presence (rûah) that the success of the servant’s mission is assured. The promise of the rûah comes before the extent of his service is presented. His task, characterized by *justice (mišpāt) and righteousness, has far-reaching consequences for the nations. As a central term of the text, mišpāt is the characteristic feature of the servant's role (cf. Is 9:6; Jer 21:11). The descendant of David on whom Yahweh's breath will rest is given wisdom, understanding, counsel, might and recognition (all qualities relevant in Is 40—42) to enable him to decide for the poor and weak of the earth with right and faithfulness (Goldingay 2005, 154).

The coming of the Spirit on the servant will be evident by his character and in the way he serves others. His calm, quiet disposition and the manner of his service contrast with that of the soldier (Is 42:2). Through the rûah he takes care to represent the helpless and brings forth justice in "truth" (Is 42:2-3). He is kept faithful to his role, and regardless of the consequences, justice will be established. In his law (tôrâ) the islands will place their hope and trust. The scope of the servant's task is broadened from that of a focus on the nations to a universal ministry (Is 42:4; cf. Is 2:13). The task is further elaborated on in Isaiah 42:6-7, where the servant will be made a "covenant for the people." Through the servant Yahweh will effectively transform others. The servant will be a covenant pledge for the world because he embodies the covenant and perpetuates it for Israel (Dumbrell, 192-94). This far-reaching ministry is made possible by the Spirit-endowed servant.

A further consequence of the servant's ministry is to open blind eyes, to liberate prisoners from dungeons, and to free prisoners who dwell in darkness. The subject of the infinitives in the Hebrew text is not as immediately evident in Isaiah 42:7 as in Isaiah 61:1-3. Both texts proclaim the salvation and spiritual illumination to come. They will be liberated from their captivity through the work of the anointed servant of the Lord, who announces, "The *rûah yhw*h is upon me" (Is 61:1). The words in the prophet's mouth are characteristic of the Davidic king whom Yahweh raises up as the royal servant. The authority of the proclaimed message and the actions carried out by the servant are attributed to the inspiration and power given by the Spirit. This reaffirms that restoration and order will yet be realized through the work of the servant, whose twofold task is marked by the rûah. The first task involves the proclamation of "good news to the poor;" of "freedom for the captives" and of "release from darkness for the prisoners." He is to proclaim "the year of the LORD's favor and the day of vengeance." The second task involves several activities. He is sent to "bind up the broken-hearted," to "comfort all who mourn," to "provide for those who grieve," and to bestow on them "a crown of beauty," "the oil of gladness" and "a garment of praise." The servant is endowed with the Spirit for this broad program of restoration. The exiles are not to abandon hope, but instead look for the deliverer whom Yahweh has chosen and equipped to address the present and future concerns of the community.

4.3. The Spirit of Yahweh and Israel: Covenantal Restoration. The threat of judgment that the prophets presented "by the word of the LORD" came to pass on Israel as well as on their enemies. This was not the last word, however, for intermingled with the word of judgment came words of hope for restoration. During the exilic period the prophets grew in their understanding of the *rûah yhw*h. They applied the necessity of the Spirit's involvement for new life and transformation in the people as well as in nature. The reality of the *rûah yhw*h with Israel revitalized expectations of restoration to their land (Skiba, 1-3). The prophets not only gave adequate reasons for the exile of God's people, but they also spoke of a new beginning and a return to Israel. In order to experience the restoration and renewal prophesied, however, the people were called to respond in repentance, faith and covenant loyalty (Hildebrandt, 91-103).

The hope for restoration and all that it implied is particularly evident in Isaiah 40—55, which presents vivid images of the restoration longed for. There will be fertility and an abundance of water in the land (Is 40; 41:17-20; 49:19-26). The people of God will be reestablished in a covenantal relationship with Yahweh (Is 55:3-5; 45:9-23). Cities will be rebuilt and repopulated, and God's blessings will abound (Is 44:24-28). The content of Isaiah 32 refers to a future time when renewal within the nation will take place by the coming of the rûah. Renewal will not come until "the rûah is poured upon us from on high." The phrase "from on high" refers to the heavenly abode of Yahweh, from where the Spirit of God descends (cf. Is 57:15; Jer 25:30). Verbs that refer to the rûah as being "poured out" are frequent in prophetic literature (Is 32:15; 44:3; Ezek 39:29; Joel 2:28-29 [3:1-2 מַט]). They portray metaphorically the blessings brought by the Spirit just as the rain brings about the fructification and fertility of the earth. The coming of the Spirit, which will change the character and nature of the people, indicates a new attitude to the lordship and rule of God. "For I will pour water on the thirsty land, and streams on the dry ground; I will pour my Spirit [rûah] on your offspring, and my blessing on your descendants" (Is 44:3 NIV). In this process the prophetic word inspired by the rûah will have a primary role in the covenant renewal (cf. Is 59:21).

Ezekiel, who prophesied during the years 593-571 BC, presents a similar message after a period of time when many prophets avoided the term rûah (notably Jeremiah). Ezekiel emphasizes Yahweh's work in the exilic community to vindicate his name (Ezek 36:20-23) and cleanse his people by a new creative act that would restore the people to a covenant relationship with God (Zimmerli, 568). The essence of the "new thing" that God would do concerned the persistent sin of Israel that defiled the land. The problem was Israel's apparent inability to fulfill the command of obedience and faithfulness to the covenant bond (Ezek 2:3-8; 15—16). Now Yahweh will intervene: "I will give you a new heart and put a new spirit [rûah] in you; I will remove from you your heart of stone and give you a heart of flesh. And I will put my Spirit [rûah] in you and move you to follow my decrees and be careful to keep my laws" (Ezek 36:26-27 NIV [cf. Ezek 11:19; 18:31; 37:14]). The Spirit of Yahweh "transforms" the human spirit to motivate a new and favorable response to the covenant.

The terms employed in these passages are reminiscent of Jeremiah 31:31-34, which signifies the internalization of religion by way of the "new thing" that Yahweh was ready to do (North, 236-37). Although the new covenant indicates new features such as the universal knowledge of God (Jer 31:34), universal peace, security, prosperity and possession of the Spirit (Is 4:2; Jer 32:41; Ezek 34:25-27; 37:26; Hos 2:18; Joel 2:32), it is not new in the sense of "better." It was new in the sense that Yahweh was prepared to put the *law in the hearts of the people, enabling them to live in accordance with the covenant obligations through the power of the rûah. The goal of Yahweh's actions was to bring about a new attitude toward him whereby the covenantal reality of "I will be their God, and they will be my people" is experienced as originally intended (Jer 7:11; 11:4; 24:7; 30:22; 31:1, 34; Ezek 36:28).

The intervention of Yahweh in the circumstances of God's people involved gathering the people to their own land (Ezek 36:24), purifying and cleansing them from defilement (Ezek 36:35), and replacing the "heart of stone" with a "new heart" and a "new spirit." The intent of this is clearest in Ezekiel 36:27, which indicates that Yahweh's Spirit would be given in order to motivate the recipients to follow his decrees and keep his laws. Yahweh would actively participate in human obedience and as a result vindicate his name (Ezek 36:36). Moreover, the personal knowledge and presence of God, which often were limited to the priests and prophets, would be made available to all of God's people.

A metaphor of Israel's restoration is presented in Ezekiel 37, where the term rûah appears ten times. The vision of the valley of bones is structured in two sections, beginning with a vision (Ezek 37:1-10) and ending with the interpretation (Ezek 37:11-14). The question put to the prophet is whether the bones can come to life. His answer indicates the thrust of the whole passage: only God knows whether the nation can be restored to their former glory, which depends on the coming of the Spirit. The term rûah in Ezekiel 37:5, 6, 8, 10 is closely related to the "breath of life" given to all human beings, apart from which existence is impossible. The prophet features the renewing of the covenant relationship to show a development from the "life spirit" (Ezek 37:1-8) to Yahweh's Spirit (Ezek 37:9-14). Yahweh's purifying and sanctifying work prepares them to receive Yahweh's spirit (Launderville 2007, 141).

Yahweh declares, "I will put my Spirit [rûah] in you and you will live, and I will settle you in your own land" (Ezek 37:14). The purpose of this event is to make clear to Israel that God is the one who brings to fulfillment the divine promises and thereby vindicates his name. The emphasis of the passage is on the supernatural, life-giving power of Yahweh, who alone can renew and restore the nation back to life in their land. This idea is reiterated in Ezekiel 39:29, where Yahweh will reveal himself by gathering the exiles and by "pouring out" his rûah on the house of Israel. "I will no longer hide my face from them, for I will pour out my Spirit [rûah] on the house of Israel, declares the Sovereign LORD.” Despite future threats against the nation, Yahweh pledges to bless and abide with Israel to give new life in the land as a symbol of his presence. “Ezekiel proclaimed that Yahweh would make the Israelites into authentic symbols of him by placing his Spirit in them. This participation in Yahweh’s reality would enable them in their bodily existence to proclaim Yahweh’s sovereign power. Israel’s exile would be replaced by a return to a land that would enjoy abundant fertility. But most of all, the presence of Yahweh’s Spirit in the Israelites would enable them to be obedient and thus to send a true picture of what Yahweh was like through their collective existence” (Launderville 2007, 381).

A similar message is presented in the book of Joel, which consists of a judgment oracle (Joel 1:1—2:12) followed by an oracle of *salvation (Joel 2:18—3:21). At the heart of the book is the passage concerning God’s eschatological promise: “And afterward I will pour out my Spirit [rûah] on all people” (Joel 2:28). This phrase is a transition from the oracles of judgment to a message of hope and promise for a more distant time (Wolff, 65). It is then that Yahweh will “pour out” (šāpak) the rûah on “all flesh” (cf. Ezek 39:29; Zech 12:10). The rûah is poured out in this context by God to convey his immediate presence to the recipients, which provides a new and vibrant relationship with God. A refreshing, revitalizing work is implied. “The pouring out of God’s spirit upon flesh means the establishment of new, vigorous life through God’s unreserved giving of himself” (Wolff, 65). “The promise of the spirit of Yahweh functions here as the guarantee of the fulfillment of his promises, especially the promise of the knowledge of Yahweh” (McQueen, 40). This announcement is as revolutionary as the “new heart” and “new spirit” prophesied in Jeremiah 31:33-34 and in Ezekiel 36:26-27.

Yahweh’s action in pouring out the Spirit has extensive effects. “I will pour out my Spirit on all people. Your sons and daughters will prophesy, your old men will dream dreams, your young men will see visions. Even on my servants, both men and women, I will pour out my Spirit in those days” (Joel 2:28-29). The thrust of the passage indicates that the coming transformation brought about by the rûah will radically change social conditions in the community. All people will be privileged possessors of the Spirit, not just the prophets. In fact, both sons and daughters will function as prophets. All people will have access to the words of Yahweh and to communion with him. Social status will no longer be a criterion for Spirit reception. The programmatic desire of Moses is here affirmed and moved a step closer to fulfillment: “Would that all Yahweh’s people were prophets” (Num 11:29 [cf. Ex 19:3-6]). The charismatic endowment of the gift is extended to the whole community (see Tyra, 49-50).

The oracles of Haggai in 520 bc address Zerubbabel the governor and Joshua the high priest of Judah. After the edict of Cyrus (ca. 538 bc), a number of exiles returned to Judah under the leadership of Sheshbazzar (Ezra 1:11), Ezra (ca. 458 bc) and Nehemiah (ca. 445 bc). Although these oracles are primarily addressed to the leaders of Judah, they are also for the whole community, which was distressed by the opposition to their temple building and discouraged by the poor harvest (Hag 1:3-12; cf. Ezra 5:14-16).

To encourage the returnees, Haggai’s message affirms the presence of Yahweh with them (Hag 1:13; 2:5, 14). Yahweh also takes an active part in motivating the leaders and people alike. When he acts, he moves upon the human spirit to effect his purposes. Yahweh “stirred up” the rûah of Zerubbabel, Joshua and the remnant to motivate and inspire God’s people to complete the house of the Lord.

In Haggai 2:5 it is the rûah yhw that is with the remnant to encourage and assure them. They are reminded that as Yahweh was with the people throughout the exodus events, so now he abides with them (cf. Ex 29:45). The emphasis in Haggai on the presence of God is connected to the *temple, which was the symbol of God dwelling among the people (see Divine Presence). It is the place from where the divine blessing and shalom issue. The remnant is assured of Yahweh’s continued presence by the rûah among them that encourages them to complete the work of temple building. A similar emphasis is made by a contemporary of Haggai. Zechariah’s prophecy shows concern for the temple building, the community and the new age. His oracle addresses the anointed leaders, who need strength for their work. The word of the Lord to the governor is, “Not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit [rûah]”

(Zech 4:6). The completion of the temple construction cannot be accomplished by human strength alone. The rûah yhw will grant the necessary resources to enable the remnant in their building of the temple.

4.4. The Spirit of Yahweh in Prophecy. The importance of prophecy in Israel is clearly evident from the large corpus of prophetic literature in the OT. Moreover, the prominent leadership provided by prophets is noted from the Pentateuch through to the Writings. A foundational understanding in this literature is that prophecy is inspired by the Spirit of Yahweh (see Flattery, 93-111). The rûah comes upon the prophet to commission and provide divinely inspired oracles. This is illustrated in Isaiah 48:16, where the prophet says, "And now the Sovereign LORD has sent me, with his Spirit." And Yahweh says, "I foretold the former things long ago, my mouth announced them and I made them known; then suddenly I acted, and they came to pass" (Is 48:3). This is the particular work of the Spirit that inspires the prophetic word and then brings it into reality. The prophet is conscious of the Spirit's presence with him and is confident of the authority that he possesses in his prophetic ministry. From the exemplary prophetic leadership of Moses, who was empowered to perform "awesome deeds" (Deut 34:12), to Elijah, Isaiah, Ezekiel and many others, the Spirit of Yahweh enabled their ministry.

Usually, prophets receive a "call" to ministry (Ex 3; 1 Sam 3; Is 6; Jer 1). Ezekiel has one of the more dramatic call experiences, where the rûah is very active in communicating the presence and glory of God (Launderville 2004, 361). Not only so, but also the Spirit of Yahweh transports Ezekiel and "lifts him up" (Ezek 8:3; 11:1, 24; 43:5) to show him visions and revelation of the prophetic word. The prophet claims to receive the divine message and inspiration when "the Spirit entered into me" (Ezek 2:2; 3:24). The prophet Micah exudes a similar confidence in Yahweh's power and inspiration. "But as for me, I am filled with power, with the Spirit of the LORD [rûah yhw], and with justice and might, to declare to Jacob his transgression, to Israel his sin" (Mic 3:8). Micah is full of "power" to bring Yahweh's message. He is sustained by the Spirit to stand in the midst of opposition and courageously proclaim the word of the Lord to a rebellious people. "The empowering Spirit of Yahweh confers on Micah everything the opposing religious leader's lack, all that had made them credible religious authorities in the first place, such as revelations, special knowledge, and insight into the future" (Wessels, 42).

This level of empowerment is necessary because the prophets not only were ridiculed and ignored but also persecuted and killed. Zechariah also faced this problem. In summary of the response of the populace to the prophets, Yahweh says, "But they refused to pay attention; stubbornly they turned their backs and covered their ears. They made their hearts as hard as flint and would not listen to the law or to the words that the LORD Almighty had sent by his Spirit through the earlier prophets. So the LORD Almighty was very angry" (Zech 7:11-12 NIV).

Yahweh extends his grace and *forgiveness to Israel through the message of hope in Isaiah 59, which is a reflection by the community on their past sins of apostasy, deceit and injustice. In this passage the prophet assures and encourages the disheartened community: "'As for me, this is my covenant with them,' says the LORD. 'My Spirit [rûah], who is on you, and my words that I have put in your mouth will not depart from your mouth, or from the mouths of your children, or from the mouths of their descendants from this time on and forever'" (Is 59:21). This prophecy points to the expectation of the realization of the prophetic word for all Israel. The word and the rûah operate together and assert the reality that the covenant promises will be fulfilled from generation to generation in the experience of God's people (Is 42:6; 49:8; 54:10; 55:3; 61:8). The word is an assurance that the rûah will not depart from the people. Here the prophetic charisma is connected with anointing, which is "metaphorical, conveying the idea of full and permanent authorization to carry out the prophet's God-given assignment" (Blenkinsopp, 223). It is a prophetic assignment that includes speaking as well as action. This brief summary of the Spirit's role in prophecy features the positive elements of Yahweh's inspiration of the prophets. However, the veracity of the prophetic word is an issue that requires testing and validation, which often leads to prophetic conflicts (1 Kings 22:19-23; Is 19:13-14; 29:9-10) (see Hildebrandt, 182-86; Hamori).

SUFFERING

Suffering in the modern world is readily associated with experiences that sometimes overlap one another—physical, emotional or psychological pain. However experienced, pain and suffering often are inseparable (Swenson, 1-13). This point holds true in the ancient world as well, and particularly for the Prophetic Books of the OT. No single word exhausts the concept of suffering in this corpus. A constellation of terms, idioms and metaphors depicts this experience that, for the prophets, remains no respecter of persons. Both Israel and the nations suffer. Moreover, the created order bears the marks of suffering. And the prophets provocatively suggest that God himself suffers on account of his people and world. Each of these will be taken in turn in this article.

1. Suffering and Theodicy.

This article centers on the topic of suffering in the prophets rather than a broader discussion of theodicy. Of course, the two are related, but the latter often is understood as a philosophical attempt to explain *evil and suffering within the purposes of God. That particular approach arrives late in the eighteenth century from G. Leibniz. He combined the Greek terms theos ("God") and dikē ("justice") to create a neologism: theodicy. This term was used to describe his attempt to philosophically explain the relationship between God, evil and suffering (Laato and de Moor, 1-23). If understood in that way, the prophets cannot be said to provide such a response, not least because it is framed outside of biblical categories.

However, if by "theodicy" one intends various attempts to understand God's actions in the world in particular ways and at particular times, especially in the light of perceived evil and suffering, then this corpus does provide such material. Suffering and theodicy are related even if not explained with a kind of philosophical-systematic logical precision (for more on this, see 6 below).

2. The Language of Suffering.

The Prophetic Books identify suffering with a myriad of terms, but prominent among them are the verbs šm and ns accompanied with specific language describing pain or *sin. But these expressions tell only a portion of the story. Images and metaphors abound in the prophets that prominently depict pain at individual, communal and even cosmic levels. Some notable ones are the mourning *land (Is 24:4; 33:9; Jer 4:28; 12:4, 11; 23:10; Hos 4:3; Amos 1:2), the incurable wound (Jer 6:7-14; 8:21; 10:19; 14:17; 15:18; 30:12; Hos 5:13; Mic 1:8-10; Nah 3:19), bereavement and mourning (city personified [Is 3:26; Jer 31:15]; people [Jer 6:26]; *creation [Is 24:1-20]); divine violence (Jer 20:7; Ezek 16; 23) and, of course, the Suffering *Servant (Is 40—55; esp. Is 53; cf. Is 61:1-3).

3. Survey of Research.

At present, no work specifically addresses the question of suffering in the prophets, even though research on the related field of theodicy abounds (see Laato and de Moor, 1-23; Crenshaw 2005). Yet it is possible to outline a general scholarly narrative on suffering used to negotiate its trajectory in the prophetic material. This traditional narrative, by and large, is organized along developmental lines in the history of Israel's religion.

In the early stages of Israel's religion the Hebrews viewed the world mechanistically and personally. As such, both God and world remain comprehensible and generally followed certain rules. If one sinned against God, then what one got in return was judgment for sin, which was a specific kind of suffering (see Retribution). The converse, of course, was true as well: obedience brought blessing from God. Other ancient Near Eastern peoples may have attributed suffering (either individual or corporate) to fitful or strange moods of the gods, but because of the constancy of Israel's God, the Hebrews' suffering could be attributed to divine judgment against sin (Gerstenberger and Schrage, 15-20).

This "retribution and reward" approach to suffering informed the Israelite prophetic imagination. The prophets during the monarchical period serve as "covenant enforcers" who reminded God's people that judgment follows upon sin. God's people are called to repentance in order to avert or shorten the experience of judgment and suffering (von Rad, 54). The fall of the northern kingdom in 722 BC reinforced this point for those who remained in Judah, reminding the Judahites of the necessity of obedience to God.

This notion was bolstered, it is argued, throughout the monarchical period until Josiah's death in 609 BC at the battle of Carchemish. Josiah, the great reformer who had served God so faithfully, died, and the people of God were threatened with *exile. This trauma of exile became a reality, but it was only one in a series of tragic and painful events: the deportation of the Judahite elite (597 BC), the siege and destruction of Jerusalem (587 BC) and a final military blow to the region in 582 BC. In this period the prophetic voices questioned the veracity of "retribution and reward" theology (Peake, 4-11). The (Deuteronomic) faith advocated by Josiah and his reforms became a problem for explaining the suffering that God's people experienced (Gottwald, 47-62). So, Habakkuk and Jeremiah begin to raise the issue of the undeserved suffering. In their writings, God's ways become a kind of "dark riddle" in the face of pious faith that is enduring undeserved pain (Peake, 11).

The issue of righteous suffering takes a turn in the exilic prophets, especially in the visions of Isaiah 40—55 and Zechariah. God's people indeed suffered because of sin, as Jeremiah and Ezekiel hold, but only for a little while (Zech 1—2). Further, suffering was understood as a means to bear witness to God's ways in the world (Is 42:1-4). In the final analysis, however, God's people would be restored back to their land in *Zion; present suffering is not final. This great hope is then taken up in the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah in restoration and return. And as God's ways thereby are vindicated, the exilic prophetic voices give meaning to suffering in the midst of confusion and pain (Heschel, 145-58).

In the later stages of prophetic thinking on suffering, God's people had to wrestle with the fact that the return to God's land was not as grandiose as Israel might have imagined. They still bore the weight of an occupying force in their land, and the exigencies of the return brought new challenges to God's people. The response to these new demands is found in the growing prophetic testimonies of *apocalyptic and *eschatological hope for God's people as seen in, for example, Isaiah 24—27; 56—66; Zechariah 9—14; and later, Daniel (Blenkinsopp, 212-39; Sawyer, 102-4). These texts proclaim God's ultimate vindication of his people and his purposes in the world in a future hope. In the "last days" divine vindication will be on display for all nations to see. Further, the righteous will suffer no more, but the wicked will receive their just punishment. Although late in Israel's history, the developing apocalyptic hope provides a (future) perspective of God's ways in the midst of ongoing strife and pain.

This rather tidy historical approach to suffering in the prophets has broken apart in the past few decades, and indeed it was never quite established from the start. The prophetic texts did not overly lend themselves to this developmental view without significant modification through historical reconstruction of the materials. Further, the prophetic voices themselves present nagging questions of righteous suffering as well as retributive suffering throughout the early and late periods of the history of Israel. Hosea, for one, bears the marks of a righteous sufferer from the early days of Israel's monarchy prior to the fall of the northern kingdom. And as A. Peake noted a century ago, one of Jeremiah's distinctive contributions lay in his unique participation with Judah in suffering despite his faithfulness to Yahweh (Peake, 11-16). Still, as a figure, he symbolizes the state of his very nation: imprisoned, under threat and facing the impending judgment of God through exile (McConville, 61-78). In this way he perhaps bears the suffering of his people in himself (Fretheim, 156-66).

Still, some of the main lines of this historical reconstruction remain. Apocalyptic prophecy as a particular response to suffering is still regarded as a late innovation in prophetic thinking (Blenkinsopp, 212-39). Many still visage the hope on display in Isaiah 40—55 and Zechariah 1—2 as a kind of "answer" to the prophetic confusion concerning suffering in the exilic period (Willey, 105-261; Maier, 161-88). And finally, the "retribution and reward" view of early Israelite prophecy is still upheld, with various modifications (see Krašovec). But divergence in the scholarship underscores the fact that the complexities within the prophetic texts problematize overly simplistic schematizations or historical reconstructions.

Recent scholarship moves beyond the purely diachronic reconstructions of prophetic thought (Nissinen). These attempts to negotiate and explain the reality of suffering in the prophetic material have ranged widely in approach. During the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries, research on Ezekiel and Jeremiah draws upon the insights of *psychological analyses to explain the suffering on display in these books (Joyce; Ellens and Rollins, 141-294; Smith-Christopher, 75-104). One notes also an increase in feminist and postcolonial readings on the prophets that explore suffering from the perspective of the marginalized and read against oppressive ideologies latent or explicit in the biblical text (Mandolfo, 29-54, 79-119; Yee, 81-134; Baumann, 85-222). Finally, narrative and ideological readings have been employed on Jeremiah, Isaiah and Ezekiel to suggest that "crime and punishment" views of suffering in these books may be construed otherwise (Mills; O'Brien).

Along with these ideological and psychological approaches, synchronic explorations on the biblical material explore the responses to suffering in the OT. J. Crenshaw sees five kinds of prophetic attitudes on theodicy and, thereby, suffering: personal affront at God's acts, questioning God's character, explaining historical events through relationship between God and Israel, restorative suffering, understanding suffering through the divine order of creation (Crenshaw 2003). Both M. Thompson and W. McWilliams discover a variety of sources of suffering in the prophetic material and a number of responses to pain in them. Finally, it is appropriate to mention theological accounts of suffering have that been marshalled from the prophetic material (Gowan; Berrigan). In these works the prophets give voice to suffering but also a resolution to the same in and through the work of God through Israel.

4. Causes of Suffering.

Even though the prophetic texts present a variety of causes of suffering, two primary ones stand out: sin and enemies. *Sin is a major cause of suffering for Israel, the nations, the created world and even God himself. Enemies create suffering from within and without Israel. Other causes of suffering will be addressed as well at the end of this section, but these are distinctive and should not be put on the same level as suffering that comes as a result of sin or enemy action.

4.1. Sin.

4.1.1. The Sins of Israel. God is connected to suffering in the prophetic corpus, particularly through his punishment for sin, both for Israel and the nations. For Israel, God as the one who deals with sin becomes evident in Isaiah 3, where God's judgment draws the haughty people of Jerusalem to shame and mourning in the face of disaster. Instead of finery, in divine judgment God's people will wear "sackcloth"; instead of pleasantness, they will experience "rotteness," "baldness" and the "branding" of exile (Is 3:18-24). "Your men shall fall by the sword, and your mighty men in battle. And her gates shall lament and mourn; empty, she shall sit upon the ground" (Is 3:25-26). This theme of mourning over God's judgment is taken up across the corpus of Isaiah (Is 22:12), Jeremiah (Jer 12:11; 14:2), Ezekiel (Ezek 2:10) and the Minor Prophets (Amos 5:16; 8:1-10).

Isaiah's Song of the Vineyard and the succeeding woe oracles in Isaiah 5 illustrate in lucid detail the pain that Israel's sin creates. God plants a vineyard and expects it to produce good grapes of "justice" and "righteousness," only to watch his beloved vineyard produce "wild grapes" of "injustice" and an "outcry" (Is 5:7). Israel's sin brings God pain, and the woe oracles that follow the song (Is 5:8, 11, 18, 20, 21, 22) detail Israel's various legal breaches, which were summarized by the rubric "injustice" and "outcry" in Isaiah 5:7. As such, the woes belong with the song and should be interpreted in light of it. These comprise the substance for the metaphor of "wild grapes": improper land development, drunkenness/self-indulgence, pervasive lying and sin, and disregard for God's plans. All are transgressions that, in turn, bring the land to ruin. In response, God will punish the sinful people for their iniquity (Is 5:5-6). Despite his work to nurture Israel into producing good fruit, his beloved people have spurned his care and produced sin. This, in turn, pains God. His statement in Isaiah 5:4 is anguished: "What more could I do for my vineyard that I have not done in it?"

As the foregoing example reveals, sin is not just an abstract concept in the prophets; it is something actually done among God's people that brings forth suffering and pain. Amos's proclamation of judgment against Israel and Judah horrifically presents a society governed by lies, corruption, cruelty, neglect and sexual perversion that leaves the vulnerable abused and suffering (Amos 2:4-8). Jeremiah too decries his people for their treachery, tainted wealth, crimes, inability to administer justice and lack of care for the vulnerable in society (Jer 5:27-28; cf. Jer 6:28-30). Sin surely brings about divine punishment, but it also creates a society where suffering and oppression become the norm.

The sins of Israel's leaders in particular become a source of pain for the populace writ large, as evidenced by the critique in Micah 3:1-3 (cf. Amos 8:4-8). The sins of the leaders "tear the skin off" of God's people, leaving them mutilated. Isaiah identifies the suffering of God's people from sin as a kind of "sickness" in Isaiah 1:5-6. It is real and present, even if the people do not recognize it. And when one interprets the enemies of Habakkuk 1:1-4 as God's wicked people, then there is a kind of "violence" and "devastation" that brings the prophet to cry out to God in pain, "How long have I cried for help, but you do not listen?" (Hab 1:2).

4.1.2. Sin and the Suffering of Creation. Sin also causes creation itself to mourn. Recent research insightfully delineates the "mourning earth" metaphor in the prophets as testimony to the power of sin as a source of pain (Hayes). "How long will the earth mourn, and the grass of every field wither? From the evil of those who dwell in it, the beasts and birds are swept away" (Jer 12:4). Other texts in the prophetic corpus describe the suffering land (Is 24:1-20; 33:7-9; Jer 4:23-28; 12:1-4, 7-13; 23:9-12; Hos 4:1-3; Joel 1:5-20; Amos 1:2). The metaphor delineates a close relationship between human sin and a broken world. Sin does not just affect the human condition; it infects the created order so that it "mourns" and suffers over its demise.

4.1.3. Divine Suffering. Finally, it is important to note that *God suffers because of his people's sin (as in Is 5:4, noted above). T. Fretheim extensively explores this point and suggests that God suffers with, and for, his people (Fretheim, 107-48). First, God suffers because of the people's rejection of him (Is 1:2-3; 54:6; 63:7-10; 65:1-2; Jer 2; 15:5-9; 18:13-15; Hos 9—11; 13:4-6). The so-called divine laments in the prophetic corpus speak to this reality in a distinctive manner (Jer 9:9; 12:7-12; 15:5-9; 48:29-33; Ezek 27:3-11, 26-36). In these texts God suffers pain at human sin against him, which then leads him to enforce judgment against it (see Long; Smith). Second, God suffers with those who are suffering (Is 15:5; 16:9-11; Jer 9:10, 17-18; 12:7; 31:20; 48:30-36). In these texts God mourns with the mourning, hurts with the hurting, and thereby identifies with suffering from the “inside.” A. Heschel in particular outlines the notion of God suffering with peoples in his magisterial work on the prophets. Finally, God suffers for humanity (Is 43:23-24; 48:9; 57:11; Jer 15:6; Ezek 20:21-22; 24:12; Mal 2:17). In these texts God becomes “weary” of restraining his judgment against the rebellious. The point in these texts is that God suffers on account of the peoples’ sins and delays judgment. In so doing, he suffers for the sins of humanity. And although God’s patience gives way to judgment, punishing a rebellious people (see Fretheim, 138-48), still God’s move toward redemption and reconciliation is sure, so that the suffering of God and Israel is caught up in divine restoration and healing: “I will heal their backsliding; I will love them freely. For my anger is turned away from him” (Hos 14:4). This account of God suffering for people is different from vicarious suffering as exemplified in the Isaianic Suffering Servant (see 5.2. below).

4.2. Enemies.

4.2.1. Enemies from Within. Sin represents only one of the sources of pain; the prophetic corpus reveals that internal and/or external enemies are a major source of suffering. A focus upon enemies comprises what is known as the Feindklage in the *lament tradition, and this formal element appears prominently in Habakkuk (but also Jeremiah). In Habakkuk 1:2 the prophet complains to God about the “guilty” who surround the “innocent.” These wicked few may be Judahites who oppress the righteous in Habakkuk’s day, leaving the prophet pleading to God for help.

A similar theme of enemy threat emerges throughout the book of Jeremiah. The prophet is abused by God’s people for declaring the word of the Lord. Jeremiah states that he has become a “laughingstock” among wicked Judahites who will not respond to God’s word (Jer 20:7-8; cf. Jer 23:1-22; 26:1-15; 36; 38:1-8; 43:1-7). This complaint comes as a result of Jeremiah’s encounter with Pashhur, but, as suggested below (see 4.3.2), it also should be understood as a complaint about his divine calling as well. Still, Jeremiah’s suffering derives from God’s people: internal strife because of Judahite sin (Jer 20:7-8; 23:1-11), Judahite abuse and rejection (Jer 26:1-15; cf. Amos 7:12); prison (Jer 37:11-21); being cast into a cistern (Jer 38:1-8); and ultimately exile (Jer 43:1-7). All of these experiences of pain come directly from enemies within Israel, God’s rebellious people (see Fretheim, 149-66).

4.2.2. Enemies from Without. The pain that comes as a result of divine judgment is real for Israel, but for enemy nations as well. This is evident in the series of oracles against the *nations in the prophetic corpus (Is 13—23; Jer 46—51; Ezek 25—32; Joel 3:9-17; Amos 1—2; Nah 1—2). In their literary contexts, the oracles against the nations are designed to provide encouragement to God’s people, but this support is necessary precisely because of the suffering that the nations inflict upon God’s people. Because of their violence against his people and for their sins, God enacts judgment against them. Indeed, there is a tacit understanding in some of the prophetic material that even when used by God, the enemy nations go beyond God’s intended discipline for Israel and are ripe for God’s judgment as a result (Is 10:5-7; Hab 2:4a; Zech 1:14-17).

External threats create pain for Israel. In Habakkuk 1:12-17 the prophet complains that God should not use the Babylonians, who will ruin the earth and destroy God’s land. For the prophet, the horror of it all stems from the fact that God is using idolaters to carry out his punishment (Hab 1:15-16). Enemy nations, even if ordained of God, are a source of great suffering (see Heschel, 159-86) because they wreck God’s people and land in warfare. Moreover, for Habakkuk, this invading army will maul other defenseless peoples in their march down the Levant (Hab 1:6-17).

Hezekiah’s response to the Assyrian army in Isaiah 36—37 illustrates this point as well. When the Assyrians advance to Jerusalem, Hezekiah’s message to Isaiah is a prayer for help in a “day of distress, of rebuke, and of disgrace” (Is 37:3). The king is terrified in the face of the Assyrian juggernaut, and this leads him to enact rites of mourning over disaster. Further within Isaiah, the theme of divine comfort in Isaiah 40—55 (e.g., Is 40:1-7; cf. Zech. 1—2) testifies to the pain that enemy invasion and exile produces.

Enemy threat is a significant theme in Joel and Amos. In Joel, “a nation has come up against” God’s land whose power lays God’s “vine” to waste (Joel 1:6). This attack and threat lead to lamentation and deep sadness (Joel 1:8-12). Further, enemy threat from the nations that surround Israel and Judah comprises the substance of the woe oracles in Amos 1, giving way to judgment speech against them in the text. Although Amos employs this negative experience as a rhetorical strategy to pronounce judgment against Israel and Judah respectively, the vivid memory of the enemies’ actions reminds God’s people of the suffering that they inflicted.

4.3. Other Causes of Suffering.

4.3.1. Illness. Sickness is a source of suffering in the book of Isaiah. Hezekiah’s illness and impending death (Is 38) draw him to prayer, weeping and misery (Is 38:2). There is no explanation or rationale as to the cause of his sickness. It is due neither to sin nor to deliberate divine action. Rather, this illness (and death) may be understood as a stark and terrible reality of life. His mortality is not, then, seen to be a good thing but rather a point of deep suffering, a cause for prayer for deliverance and healing (Is 38:10-20).

4.3.2. Prophetic Burden. The burden of prophetic proclamation comprises a source of pain. This might best be understood as a subset of suffering with God as its ultimate source, but nonetheless it is particularly tied to the experience of the prophet and his call. Perhaps nowhere is this more evident than in the prophecies of Jeremiah. In Jeremiah 20:9 the prophet proclaims that the divine message that he is to preach leaves him wearied and pained. The word of God is like a “burning fire” in Jeremiah’s bones, so that he is “weary” from holding it in. The fatigue and suffering that accompany the prophetic task are on display in his so-called confessions (Jer 11:18-12:6; 15:10-21; 17:14-18; 18:18-23; 20:7-13; 20:14-18). In these texts the prophet complains to God about the message that he has been given to preach, God’s actions in the world, and the suffering that the prophet himself endures. These prayers highlight the pain and struggle of proclaiming God’s word in Jeremiah’s day. They are intensely confrontational, yet intimate, and they disclose a deep (yet dogged) faith in God. The confessions elucidate what Jeremiah states earlier in Jeremiah 6:11: the burden of proclaiming God’s message, particularly a dark message of judgment, leaves Jeremiah “weary” and hurting.

4.3.3. Sign Acts. The suffering of the prophets becomes evident especially through the *sign acts that God commands his seers to perform (see von Rad, 52-53; Lundbom, 208-18). Sign acts are lived-out demonstrations of the prophets’ messages that bring a degree of power to the messages themselves. They draw God’s people to feel and understand the certainty of the word of the Lord. Many of them are not particularly pleasant, and these are the sign acts that will be explored here (for further discussion, see Lundbom, 208-18; Lindblom, 165-73).

The sign acts of the eighth-century BC prophets illumine suffering in obedience to the Lord. Hosea’s tumultuous marriage is a lived-out demonstration of God’s tenuous relationship with God’s people (Lindblom, 166-69). The strain and pain of both relationships leave the prophet (and God) suffering (e.g., Hos 2:14-15; 9:10-13; 10:11; 13:4-6; cf. Mic 6:3). Likewise, Isaiah suffers for God’s word. In Isaiah 7 he is commanded to name his child “Shear-jashub,” meaning “a remnant shall return.” This name implies the impending doom of destruction and exile, which is heightened both in Isaiah 8, with the naming of Isaiah’s second child as “Mahershalal-hash-baz” (meaning “spoil hastens, plunder quickens”), and in Isaiah 20, when God commands Isaiah to go about the city naked and barefoot as a symbolic message to avoid Israelite allegiance with Egypt. In each of these symbolic actions God’s word is brought to bear uniquely in the life of the prophet. The prophet experiences physical discomfort (especially in his nakedness) in order to proclaim the message of the Lord.

Jeremiah’s and Ezekiel’s sign acts also reveal suffering in obedience to God’s word. Jeremiah is forbidden to take a wife or have children in order to proclaim that parents and children would die in Jerusalem (Jer 16:1-4). Accompanying this symbolic action, Jeremiah is forbidden from mourning and feasting in order to heighten God’s message concerning the appropriateness of divine judgment (Jer 16:5-9). Jeremiah breaks a pot at the potsherd gate in Jerusalem to reveal the imminence of divine destruction (Jer 19:1-15), and he is commanded to bear a yoke on his neck to proclaim that exile is coming (Jer 27:1-22). Each of these actions is set within the context of Jeremiah enduring pain over the proclamation of God's word (cf. Jer 11:18-12:6; 15:10-21; 17:14-18; 18:18-23; 20:7-13, 14-18). Thus, these sign acts are an extension of the pain that comes from the burden of prophecy.

Ezekiel too employs symbolic actions and suffers because of them. He is commanded to be mute except when speaking God's word (Ezek 3:26-27), he lay paralyzed on his side at the command of God to indicate the sin and punishment of Israel (Ezek 4:4-6), he ate only small amounts of food to symbolize the starvation that accompanies siege (Ezek 4:9-11), he ate unclean food to symbolize the reality of eating in exile (Ezek 4:12-17), he shaved off his hair and beard, burning and scattering it to represent the burning of Jerusalem and scattering of its inhabitants (Ezek 5:1-17). The prophet is also forbidden (like Jeremiah) from mourning over death. But for Ezekiel, the pain is all the greater because he is forbidden from mourning the death of his wife (Ezek 24:15-27). In each of these sign acts God commands the prophet to suffer in various ways in order to proclaim and exemplify the certainty of his divine messages (Friebel, 13-78).

5. Responses to Suffering.

5.1. Complaint. S. Balentine reveals the primacy of complaint *prayer when one is confronted with suffering (Balentine, 118-98). This point holds true in some of the prophetic material. The complaint is a means to negotiate pain and bring it before the heavenly throne in hopes that God will end suffering. As indicated above, Jeremiah holds forth complaints when confronted with suffering—both his own pain over the prophetic burden and the suffering of his people. Likewise, in Habakkuk 1—2 the prophet cries out to God because of rebellion within his own people (Hab 1:1-3), God's use of idolaters to achieve his purposes (Hab 1:12-17), and the attack of the enemy that will destroy the earth (Hab 1:12-17). These prophetic complaints are not faith-less prayers but rather are faith-filled prayer, aware that only God can alleviate these distresses.

5.2. Acceptance. The prophets also accept suffering as a result of sin. The almost Janus-like responses of both Jeremiah and Habakkuk emphasize this point. Although both are quite contentious in their complaints, there comes a point when they accept God's judgment. For both, suffering is accepted. Jeremiah desists from complaint after Jeremiah 20, accepting the reality of judgment. But the acceptance of suffering (even its embrace) is crystallized in Habakkuk's powerful testimony: "I will wait for the day of distress to come, for a people who will attack us" (Hab 3:16).

Yet perhaps the most significant example of accepting suffering appears in the Suffering Servant in the book of Isaiah (for the most comprehensive work to date on this topic, see Janowski and Stuhlmacher). In Isaiah 53:1-12 the servant accepts his suffering on behalf of sinful Israel. He embraces his suffering in two primary ways: at the hands of God's people, and at the hands of God. In the first place, his own people cause him to suffer: he is a "man of sorrows" who knew "sickness," "rejection" and what it was to be "despised" (Is 53:3). His own people disdain him and ignore him: they "did not pay attention to him" (Is 53:3b). Further, God's people (like Job's friends) wrongly relate his suffering to his own sin (Is 53:4), only to find that there was no sin in him at all (Is 53:7-9). He accepts suffering not because of his own sin, but rather because he bears the iniquity of his own people in and through his pain. The notion of vicarious suffering is present here, and the servant of the Lord suffers on behalf of, and bears the sins of, God's people: "he was pierced for our transgressions; crushed for our iniquities" (Is 53:6), "and Yahweh caused our iniquity to fall upon him" (Is 53:7). Because of his work, the sins of God's people are dealt with (Janowski). And further, because of the servant's suffering, the suffering and death of exile might be turned back. Within Isaiah, the servant bears Israel's sin, iniquity and even their diseases (Is 53:4-6; cf. Mt 8:14-17) so that the storm-tossed and comfortless Zion (Is 54:11) will be comforted and restored (Is 54:12-14). This happens precisely because the servant accepts and even embraces his experience of suffering, and then he takes the suffering of Israel upon himself (see Servant of Yahweh).

5.3. Repentance. Another response to pain, especially when suffering due to sin, is *repentance. The prophets time and again call for repentance, even if that call is matched by the “hardness” of Israel’s hearts or the willfulness of their souls. Still, the suffering caused by sin is meant to draw out repentance. Divine judgment is God’s deliberate abandonment of his people due to their sinful ways, and his return to them becomes the comfort that alleviates their suffering. Yet wrapped up with God’s return to his people is the return of his people to God. This “return” or “repentance” is a significant response to suffering in the prophets. In Jeremiah 24:7 the prophet calls God’s people to repent in the vision of the figs: the return of God to his people is matched with a return in repentance to him (cf. Jer 31; Zech 1:3; 10:9; Mal 3:7). Joel 2:12-13 calls upon God’s people to return to him with “all their heart” in the face of foreign invasion. This call for repentance is evident as well in the inclusion of divine abandonment/return to the temple in Ezekiel 8–11; 43:1-12. The temple’s restoration is generated in part by human repentance: “Now let them put away their whoring and the corpses of their kings far from me, and I will dwell in the midst of them forever” (Ezek 43:9; cf. Ezek 43:10-11). Isaiah 44:22; 55:7; Zechariah 1:6 call for repentance in the face of the pain of exile. Although repentance is a different response to suffering than complaint or acceptance, the comfort that accompanies it is very real in the prophets.

6. The End of Suffering.

6.1. Isaiah. Distinctive to Isaiah, suffering is defeated in and through the work of the Suffering Servant. In Isaiah 51–52 God presents a picture of comfort in the midst of suffering and judgment. Israel will see the Lord comfort and redeem Zion (Is 51:3; 52:1-7). These actions arrive because of God’s appointment of the Suffering Servant (Is 53:1-12), as demonstrated above. The servant will bring glorification instead of humiliation to God’s people and ease their pain (Is 61:1-3). Still, this future remains indeed just that, as God’s people face the threat of “hardening” throughout the Isaianic corpus, and thereby they face the threat of suffering in the present (see Uhlig).

Further, it is evident that the servant’s work will bring comfort and healing not only to Israel, but also to the nations and even creation itself (Is 65). Instead of a rebellious and broken people who oppress their neighbors (as in Is 5), Isaiah’s vision is for a renewed humanity and created order where justice and righteousness springs up in all the world (Is 27:1-6), where God’s instruction is a fountain for all nations, where war is abolished, and where instruments of war are instead refashioned to prepare for the harvest of life-giving food (Is 2:1-5; cf. Mic 4:1-7).

6.2. Jeremiah and Ezekiel. These prophets portray the end of suffering in two different ways. For Jeremiah, it comes for Israel in the form of a new covenant marked by devotion to God, return to God’s land, and peace and justice being operative amongst God’s people (Jer 30–33). God’s people and land will be renewed and will not be “uprooted or overthrown” ever again. In this vision suffering that comes through exile will be a memory but never again a reality (Jer 31:40). In Ezekiel, the experience of Israel’s suffering is overcome by the renewed and restored *temple in Ezekiel 40–48. The temple is almost cosmic in size, scope and significance. Indeed, as God’s people see this vision of the renewed temple, they discover that after the punishment and suffering of exile God will dwell in the midst of his people forever: “the LORD dwells there” (Ezek 48:35). Jeremiah’s new covenant is not the central feature here as much as the presence of God in the midst of the people, dwelling in the temple forever.

6.3. The Minor Prophets. The end of suffering can be understood in the Minor Prophets by observing their presentation of Israel. There, Israel is caught up within a movement of history that becomes meaningful within the purposes of God (see Seitz, 189-219). And it is a history that gives a perspective on suffering. Israel undergoes nothing less than a *death and a resurrection in the Minor Prophets. Although they may suffer and even die in exile, his purposes with them will be achieved: Israel will rise again from exile and death (see Hos 5–6; 11; see also Gowan, 9-16, 38-50). In this, God is affirmed as the life-giving and death-defeating Lord.

For the postexilic group reading or hearing the Minor Prophets as a whole, this message would remind them that God is justified as righteous. Despite all that has happened, God will enact Israel’s restoration. This restoration encompasses not just Israel, but all of creation as well (cf. Mic 4), because God is the Lord of creation itself. The recurrence of the language of Exodus 34:6-7 reinforces that while God’s judgment is in force, it still remains an extension of the “steadfast love of the LORD,” so that his mercy and compassion might be demonstrated (Hos 2:21-23; Joel 2:13-14, 18; Amos 9:9-15; Jon 3:7-10; 4:2; Mic 7:18-20; Nah 1:3; Hab 3:2; Zeph 3:16-20; Zech 1:15-17; 8:8, 13; 10:6). The destructions of the northern and southern kingdoms were justified because of sin, but God in his mercy will restore his people and land, even creation itself, because of his justice and righteousness (Mic 4:1-7). This vision of restoration effectively presents the (future) end of suffering.

Still, a real tension persists. The glorious restoration still stands far off. Notwithstanding real historical returns to the land (as Haggai and Zechariah confirm), in the canonical presentation of the Minor Prophets God’s “day” of vindication is pressed forward eschatologically, creating space between the “now” of suffering and the “not yet” of justice and restoration (Mal 3:16—4:6). There remains an existential challenge of waiting and watching for God’s future redemption. This “now and not yet” dimension leaves the reader sensing the certainty of God’s salvation from suffering and sin. Yet its eschatological focus leaves room both for waiting expectantly for that future hope and for prayer and honest questioning in the meantime (cf. Hab 1; Mic 1:8-9). In light of the future, God’s people persevere in pain but still press forward in faith.

7. Conclusion.

Suffering remains a complex feature in the prophets. It is borne by individuals and community, Israel and the nations, creation and even God himself. There are a number of sources and responses to suffering as well. None can be discounted. But the future of suffering is certain: it will be swallowed up by the decisive act of God in the future.

The NT picks up this theme and finds that future resolution to suffering in Christ. As the evangelists and apostles interpreted the life and death of Christ, they found in the OT and in Jesus’ teaching the resource to understand the meaning of both Christ’s and their own suffering. Christ’s suffering deals the death blow to sin and sets the world to rights in an ultimate vindication of God’s actions with his creation (Wright, 553-653). The evangelists affirm that as he suffered and died in the manner described in Isaiah 43; 53, the man Jesus took the sin and the suffering of Israel, as well as the world, upon himself. The evangelists’ understanding coheres with Jesus’ own self-understanding (see Stuhlmacher, 150-53). The victory of God in Christ puts an end to suffering.

Still, the NT affirms that while suffering and death have been dealt a death blow and will finally be defeated at the consummation (drawing upon the images of new creation in Is 65 and of restored Zion in Isaiah and the Minor Prophets), the NT repeats that suffering remains an ever-present reality for the church. Indeed, as L. Jervis maintains, suffering is at the very center of the gospel itself: those who follow Christ will experience pain in their life. Suffering represents the battlefield of Christian growth, a marker of a broken world, and a part what it means to be “in Christ.” Still, suffering may be borne in the manner of Christ: “By virtue of our being caught between the time of Christ’s resurrection and the time of our own we recognize that we will suffer as we hope for glory” (Jervis, 109). This insight draws attention to the fact that for the NT, suffering can be borne because Christ is victoriously raised (Mt 28; Lk 24; Jn 20—21; Acts 2; Phil 1:19-30) and new creation is assured (Rom 8; Col 3:1-4; Rev 21). Still, suffering should not be sought after: it is a marker that the world is out of joint, waiting to be fully clothed in a new creation in which suffering will no longer be operative. Instead, Christians ought to hope in Christ and bear suffering when it comes, knowing that future glory is assured.

TEMPLE

The various terms for the temple reflect a fundamental anthropomorphic metaphor: God lives in the temple just as a person lives in a house and a king in a palace. The splendor and character of a house/temple/palace reflects the personality and power of its resident, and so the character of the God of Israel is reflected by the architecture and furniture of the temple and the activities that take place in it. However, the differences between a god and a king also lead to distinctive features. There is no need for a bed or bathroom in the temple (at least for its divine resident), for Yahweh is not defined by sexual differentiation or by human physical needs. Israelite temples have much in common with other temples, but the theological distinctives of belief in Yahweh required adaptation on occasion. What was important was not so much the form and goal of *worship but rather the identity and character of the god to whom worship was offered.

Most of the prophetic texts referring to the temple and its worship are negative. Interpreting these depends on significant assumptions about the development of the history of Israelite religion (McKane; Klawans, 75-100). J. Wellhausen emphasized the Canaanite origin of Israel's worship, allowing paganism easy entry. Setting themselves over against the institutions of temple and priesthood, the prophets were heroic individuals who highlighted the priority of ethical behavior and belief in one God. M. Noth, on the other hand, proposed an early intertribal league with a central sanctuary. The prophets therefore did not see a fundamental contradiction between the temple institution and authentic covenantal behavior summed up in, for example, the Ten Commandments. Prophets are guardians rather than innovators.

Their ultimate goal was to recall the people of Israel to their proper calling and to reform God-given institutions that had been corrupted (Janzen, 155). Prophetic rhetoric employs hyperbole and the radical threat of judgment in order to provoke *repentance. The relative lack of positive statements stems from the fact that the role of the prophets is to address a society that is deeply compromised, and promises for the future are less likely to bring repentance than warnings of judgment.

Some scholars even consider that prophets played a key role in the temple. Cultic prophets answer the requests of supplicants with a word from God, and it is the corruption of this class of prophets that is condemned in Micah 3:5-7 (Johnson, 34). However, the texts in the prophets and the psalms cited to support this view can be interpreted in other ways, and there is no explicit evidence for a significant role for prophets in worship. Scholars also suggest that the temple *liturgy is reflected in some of the forms and vocabulary used by the prophets. The doxologies in Amos (Amos 4:13; 5:8-9; 9:5-6) make use of the so-called hymnic participle (e.g. "the one who forms the mountains" [Amos 4:13]), often found in psalms of praise (e.g., Ps 136). However, it is uncertain how far the prophets creatively adapted or subverted temple forms, or whether these forms were more widely used and indeed may have originated outside a cultic context.

The consensus view is that the prophets do make a contribution to Israel's life, but one that is different from that of the priests and distinctive (Jer 18:18). The "reform" approach is closer to the truth, even though how much we can know about the early history of Israel and its worship remains fiercely disputed. But the prophets did not simply demand a return to the past. The creative imagination of the prophets sought to move beyond the past to the new. On-going institutions such as the temple tend to emphasize the continuity and assured character of *God's presence, whereas the prophets point to a time of crisis and the need to make radical changes. It is not surprising that the fiercest critics of the prophets came from within the temple establishment. Yet, from a canonical perspective, the integration of *ethics and worship is a priestly as much as a prophetic ideal.

7. Conclusion

1. Terminology of the Temple.

"Temple" is the normal translation of hēkāl, which elsewhere refers to the palace of a king (Is 39:7; Dan 1:4). It is a loanword from the Akkadian ekallu, which normally means "palace" and more rarely "temple." The Akkadian is derived ultimately from Sumerian Ē.GAL, which means "large house," whether of a wealthy person, a king or a god. Thus, the temple is also the "house of Yahweh" (bēt ywh), the equivalent to the house of the king (Jer 21:11). God's presence is thus localized in a "place" (māqôm [Hos 5:15; Jer 7:12]). To look on the temple (Jon 2:4) and come before Yahweh (Is 37:14) is to encounter the living God. It should be noted, though, that Hosea probably refers to the land of Israel when he refers to the house of Yahweh (Hos 8:1; 9:8, 15). Because God is holy and the temple takes on a corresponding holiness when it is consecrated to him, it is his "sanctuary" (miqdāš [Ezek 5:11]) or "holy place" (qōdeš [Mal 2:11]). The location of the Jerusalem temple is *Zion, an elevated ridge where the present Temple Mount is found (Zech 8:3). Since in Canaanite thought the gods lived on a mountain, the divine and cosmic significance of the temple as Yahweh's dwelling place is polemically indicated by titles such as "Mount Zion" (har-šîôn [Is 4:5]) or "my holy mountain" (har qodsî [Obad 16]). It often is difficult to know how far references to Jerusalem incorporate the divine presence associated with the temple. In Isaiah 2:3 the poetry sets in parallel mountain of Yahweh, house of the God of Jacob, Zion and Jerusalem.

2. Eighth-Century BC Prophets.

The eighth-century BC prophets know of the Solomonic temple, but few details of its construction and character were relevant for their concerns, which were largely theological and ethical. They were alert to attitudes and behavior that compromised the proper role of the temple in the life of the people. The only legitimate temple is in Zion/Jerusalem, where Yahweh is present to speak and warn (Joel 3:16; Amos 1:2). The prophets frequently condemn worship outside the temple. The high places (bāmôt) were traditional Canaanite places of worship (Is 15:2; 16:12), and there was a consistent danger of their becoming the focus of the worship of Baal and other gods (Hos 10:8; cf. Jer 19:5; Ezek 6:3). Both Hosea and Amos attack the northern kings for setting up alternatives to the Jerusalem temple as a means of legitimizing their independent political status. Preeminent among these is Bethel, which is literally the "house of God" and the place where God revealed himself to Jacob (Gen 35:1). Amos's opponent, the high priest Amaziah, insists that it is the "sanctuary [miqdāš] of the king" and the "house [i.e., temple] of the kingdom" (Amos 7:13). It has altars for *sacrifice (Amos 3:14; 4:4), priests, and a golden calf that Hosea fiercely condemned as idolatrous (Hos 8:4-5).

For the prophets, false religion is inseparable from immoral behavior. In his condemnation of the northern kingdom, Amos juxtaposes social and economic oppression with drinking wine in the house of God bought with unjust fines (Amos 2:8). The consequences will be defeat and death of the people (Amos 2:13-16) and the destruction of the high places and sanctuaries (Amos 7:9). For Hosea, kindness (hesed) and a living knowledge of God are more important than sacrifice (Hos 6:6). The lack of such qualities will lead to exile, where the absence of the temple will mean no opportunity to exercise the covenantal privileges of offerings and sacrifices (Amos 9:4). The continuation of the worship of Israel is contingent upon the active pursuit of righteousness, for the object of that worship is "a god of justice" (Is 30:18) (Heschel, 198-200) (see Justice, Righteousness). The continuing existence of "the mountain of the house" is never unconditional (Mic 3:12).

3. Isaiah of Jerusalem.

Isaiah 6 offers a vivid and positive interpretation of temple worship. Some regard it as a vision of Yahweh's temple in heaven, with no necessary connection to what took place in the Solomonic temple. However, the opening mundane note (Is 6:1) and Isaiah's location in Jerusalem (Is 7:3) suggest that the vision is evoked by the earthly temple worship, perhaps on one of the major festivals. In common with ancient Near Eastern ideology, the temple is the link between heaven and earth (Wyatt, 147-82). In worship the barriers between the heavenly and the earthly dwelling of God become transparent. The priestly servants of the temple have as their counterparts the angelic hosts that serve Yahweh, and the antiphonal singing of the Levitical choirs may have inspired Isaiah's account of the praise of the seraphim (Is 6:3). The smoke that filled the temple might reflect the copious use of incense (Is 6:4; cf. 1 Kings 9:25). The throne where Yahweh sits as king is high and lofty (Is 6:1), symbolized by the location of the temple on Mount Zion and by the flight of steps that probably separated the main hall from the innermost room (Monson, 290).

At the same time, the heavenly temple transcends all earthly realities. The size of the heavenly temple far exceeds the impressive but limited size of the Jerusalem temple, and even then it is too small for the incomparably great God of Israel, the hem of whose robes alone fills the space. The uniquely emphatic "Holy, holy, holy!" uttered by the seraphim reflects the most intense presence of Yahweh at the very heart of his heavenly/earthly temple. The holiness of Yahweh's person has to be preserved in its focused fullness, for to see God is to die (Judg 13:22). Isaiah wisely looks no higher than God's lowest clothing, and the smoke provides another protective barrier (cf. Lev 16:12-13). In the light of Israel's aniconic tradition, it is highly unlikely that there was any image or representation of Yahweh in the earthly temple that evoked his appearance. The throne above the cherubim in the innermost room of the temple is empty, for Israel's iconography is linguistic and metaphorical, not physical (Mettinger, 187).

Isaiah's dismay has a moral as well as an ontological basis. Impurity is a ritual category, but it may be caused by moral evil, and such impurity is absolutely incompatible with divine holiness. Isaiah recognizes that he is unclean and so is undone (Is 6:5). Yet a large part of the temple sacrificial system concerned the purification of sins through the blood of animal sacrifices. Here, unusually, he is purified by a live coal from (presumably) the heavenly incense altar, perhaps reflecting an unknown temple purification ritual.

The presence of God in the temple is the source of life, blessing, forgiveness and protection. When Jerusalem is besieged by the Assyrians, the Rabshakeh ironically misunderstands Hezekiah's removal of the high places and altars (Is 36:7). Hezekiah's godly dismay is represented by his going to the house of Yahweh (Is 37:1). When he receives a letter, he spreads it "before Yahweh" in the temple and then prays for *salvation to the God who is "enthroned above the cherubim" (Is 37:15-16). The pleas of the *prayer do not presume a positive answer, but they receive an assurance of salvation from Isaiah (Is 37:21-35). It was most fitting to pray in the temple, but Hezekiah's answered prayer on his sickbed demonstrates that the temple was not essential for conversing with God (Is 38:2, 5).

4. Jeremiah.

Jeremiah is a priest and had access to parts of the temple (Jer 35:2), but his prophetic ministry takes place outside the temple and is highly critical of the people's attitude toward it. The assurance of God's presence and protection represented by the temple, so vividly demonstrated in the defeat of Sennacherib's armies in the time of Hezekiah, seems to have become an easy assumption over the course of the next century. This is analyzed and contradicted in the great temple sermon of Jeremiah 7 (cf. Jer 26:1-6). Many attribute the account to a Deuteronomistic editor, since it reflects the preaching style of Deuteronomy and its concern to set before the people a stark contrast between Torah obedience and disobedience (Jer 7:23-24). However, the diction is distinctive and could well represent a style of preaching adopted by Jeremiah, among others.

The prophet warns the people against trusting in the "temple of Yahweh, temple of Yahweh, temple of Yahweh" (Jer 7:4). The triple repetition conveys the deterioration of a theology of God's presence in the temple to a "meaningless mantra" (Fretheim, 132) that may be a parody of the thrice holy acclamation of Isaiah 6:3. While the temple remains "my house" (Jer 11:15), this heightens rather than lessens the demand for a corresponding righteousness of life (Jer 7:5-7). Jeremiah undermines the acclaimed holiness of the temple by describing it as a den of robbers (Jer 7:11), yet it is appropriate that it is precisely here that he announces God's word (Jer 7:2; 19:14; 26:2). The real threat of abandonment by God and destruction is proved by the historical example of the Shiloh temple, where the presence of God's name did not prevent judgment on an evil people (Jer 7:12). The people attack Jeremiah for this comparison, perhaps interpreting the destruction of Shiloh in the north as a sign of God's blessing on Jerusalem (Jer 26:9). But the doctrine of election can never trump the demand for upright behavior. Just as blessing on all of life flows from God's presence in his temple among a righteous people, so God's anger on *evil will lead to an equally comprehensive judgment that includes temple, people, *animals and land (Jer 7:20).

Although the moral dimension is primary, the speech also condemns religious practices external to the temple, such as the women making cakes of the Queen of Heaven (Jer 7:18) and the offering of sons and daughters on the high place of Topheth (Jer 7:31). This indicates that Hezekiah and Josiah's programs of centralization of worship in the temple (2 Kings 18; 23) were incomplete and often ineffective. Jeremiah 17:12 is a triple acclamation of praise of the temple, perhaps from a temple hymn or liturgy: "throne of glory, on high from the beginning, place of our sanctuary [miqdāš]." Some regard this as contrary to Jeremiah's critical attitude to the temple, but a reference to the heavenly dwelling of God would provide a strong contrast to the corrupted earthly temple.

Jeremiah, in contrast to Ezekiel, has little interest in the specific features of the temple. The ark, which had disappeared by the time of the exile, will not be remembered or remade (Jer 3:16). The ark was regarded as the footstool of God's throne (2 Kings 19:15; 1 Chron 28:2), but this title is now transferred to Jerusalem (Jer 3:17). The absence of explicit references to a new temple suggests to some that Jeremiah did not regard this as necessary (Clements, 102), a view reinforced by the absence of a number of references to the temple and the cult in the LXX. However, the expectation of a restored temple is implied by the Hebrew text. Jeremiah 33:17-18 describes the sacrifices offered by a restored priesthood, and it is a natural assumption that these would take place in a temple. After the fall of Jerusalem, Jeremiah announces the Lord's vengeance on the Babylonians for destroying the temple (Jer 50:28; 51:11), suggesting a future restoration. A broader consideration is that the general prophetic attitude to the future includes a temple, so that its omission in the shorter form of Jeremiah is perhaps accidental rather than polemical.

5. Ezekiel.

A priest as well as a prophet (Ezek 1:3), Ezekiel has a unique interest in the temple, both in its abuse and in its reconstruction. The defilement of the sanctuary is a catastrophic undermining of the entire structure of holiness that preserved God's presence in the land, and it is given a preliminary statement in Ezekiel 5:11. This is then expounded in Ezekiel 8, which records how Ezekiel is taken by the Spirit from *exile in Babylon to the Jerusalem temple. Four scenarios, which may be drawn from different times and occasions, highlight the depth of Israel's apostasy in the place that is meant to be wholly devoted to Yahweh's. A "statue of jealousy" (sēmel haqqin'ā [Ezek 8:3, 5]) is perhaps a symbol of Asherah, the mother-goddess of the Canaanite pantheon. However, M. S. Odell points out that Ezekiel's usual words for *"idol" are not used and so proposes that it is a votive statue, a human figure representing the "zeal" (an alternative translation of "jealousy") of the worshiper (Odell, 104-8). Second the prophet sees a secret room with representations of images prohibited in the second commandment (Ezek 8:10; cf. Deut 5:8-9; see also Deut 4:17-18). They may also depict unclean creatures (Lev 11) that are incompatible with the holiness of the temple. The seventy elders represent the people's apostasy in a travesty of the original *covenant (Ex 24:1-9). Their idolatry complements the third scenario, women worshipping Tammuz, probably a Babylonian fertility god. Finally, twenty-five men are described as bowing towards the sun in the east, literally and metaphorically turning their back on Yahweh. Significantly, these cultic sins are juxtaposed with the social sin of violence (Ezek 8:17). The quality of religion in the temple mirrors and reinforces the quality of moral behavior outside.

It is possible that those involved interpreted their actions as legitimate forms of Yahweh worship. For example, the sun may have been honored as one of Yahweh's host of heaven rather than as another god or equated with Yahweh. Ezekiel, though, condemns any such assimilation or syncretism. The fourfold account leads to a corresponding four-stage departure of the glory of Yahweh. The lex talionis (punishment matching the crime) is even more evident if the journey of Ezekiel 8 is progressively inward, toward the heart of the temple. The "sanctuary" (Ezek 8:6) describes the whole area, while "house of Yahweh" (Ezek 8:14, 16) describes the temple, and the "palace of Yahweh" (Ezek 8:16) refers to the main hall (Block, 1:285). The increasing holiness of these areas toward the innermost most holy room is an architectural reinforcement of the narrative structure that cumulatively portrays comprehensive disobedience of the first commandment (cf. Ex 20:3).

The glory thus retreats from the entrance of the gateway of the inner court (Ezek 8:3) to the threshold of the house (Ezek 9:3), to the entrance of the east gate (Ezek 10:18-19), and finally to the mountain east of the city (Ezek 11:22-23). The presence of Yahweh that manifested itself in glory in the building of the temple (1 Kings 8:11) has withdrawn, and with it any protection of the city and nation from invasion and defeat. Yet this is not a total abandonment, for Yahweh promises that he will be to the exiles a miqdāš mē'at (Ezek 11:16), an enigmatic phrase referring to time ("a sanctuary for a little while") or quality ("a sanctuary to a limited extent"). It minimizes the importance of the Jerusalem temple, but also hints that the story is not ended. It may refer to forms of access to God possible in exile, such as prayer or the ministry of Ezekiel. The close of the first half of the book announces that Yahweh will profane his sanctuary (Ezek 24:21), anticipating the desecration of the temple by the Babylonians. The temple has become for the Israelites "the pride of your power, the delight of your eyes and the desire of your souls," but the people's trust in the strength, beauty and usefulness of the temple is illusory and must be banished before a better temple can be constructed.

The climax of the prophecies of resurrection, gathering and restoration of the people in Ezekiel 37 is the promise of a sanctuary (miqdāš) in the midst of the people (Ezek 37:26, 28) and a dwelling place (miškān) over them (Ezek 37:27).

The echoes of the covenant with the ancestors (Ezek 37:26) and with the people at Sinai (Ezek 37:27) emphasize that this is the ultimate fulfillment of God's past promises of presence. This dramatic affirmation then becomes the basis for a vision of a new temple in Ezekiel 40—48. Many see signs of redactional layers in this section, but there is nothing definitely later than the sixth century BC, and the vision can be regarded as a complex unity.

The extensive description of the temple is primarily concerned with the boundaries and practices that maintain the holiness of the temple and guard the presence of Yahweh. Ezekiel is brought to a very high mountain (Ezek 40:2), the traditional home of the gods in Canaanite mythology and the basis for claims about Zion's superiority (cf. Ps 48). It is the polar opposite of the valley of dry bones (Ezek 37:1-14) in Ezekiel's theological geography. Like the tabernacle, the temple consists of a series of divided spaces that communicate increasing holiness. Horizontally there is a square outer court (Ezek 40:17-19) and inner court (Ezek 40:44), where the equality of the sides is possibly a sign of perfection or holiness (Stevenson, 42). The temple itself has three sections: the vestibule ('ulām [Ezek 40:48]), the main hall or nave (hēkal [Ezek 41:1]) and the most holy place (qōdeš haqqōdāšim [Ezek 41:4]). The graded holiness of the whole is reinforced vertically by a series of steps at the entrances of the courts and the temple (Ezek 40:6, 34, 49). The outermost wall has three massive gates. There are none to the west, since the temple and a mysterious building (Ezek 41:12) occupy that side. The military nature of the gates emphasizes the need for a strict separation between the holy and the impure, for Ezekiel has previously shown how the absence of such separation led to the first temple's destruction (Ezek 8—11).

A series of chambers surrounds the outer and inner courtyard, probably places for storage, cooking, and eating. The temple is the dynamic stage for sacrifices and processions. The east gate is where the glory of Yahweh enters the temple (Ezek 43:1-5), reversing the departure described in Ezekiel 8—11. It then remains shut, symbolizing God's permanent presence in the temple. Worshipers must use the other two gates, although the prince is allowed to eat in the east gate, a sign of his rank but also of his limited and defined role in the temple hierarchy. The spaces of the temple, differentiated according to their holiness, are related to the different groups mentioned. The roles of the actors and the restrictions on their movements contribute to the overall goal of ensuring that ordered worship takes place according to the relevant laws. Foreigners and the uncircumcised are barred from entry (Ezek 44:4-8), whereas Levites guard the gates and slaughter the animals for sacrifice brought by the citizens (Ezek 44:10-14). The Zadokite priests alone are responsible for offering the fat and the blood in the main hall (Ezek 44:15-16) because they, unlike the Levites, had proved faithful (Ezek 44:10, 13, 15). Nothing is said about the high priest or holy of holies, perhaps because the potent atonement performed there (see Lev 16) is no longer needed.

The purpose of the temple is to provide access to Yahweh, who is the source of life and blessing in a new Eden (see Gen 2:10). That this is not limited to the center but affects the whole land is symbolized by the stream that flows from the temple and becomes a river of life for all (Ezek 47:1-12). The renewal of the environment is a further result of the return of Yahweh and the restoration of the temple. The temple is also at the center of the city (Ezek 48:21), which is called "Yahweh is there" (Ezek 48:35), a fitting conclusion to the theme of God's presence that is so central to the theology of Ezekiel.

The status of Ezekiel's temple has been much debated. The detailed measurements and laws might indicate a realistic program of restoration aimed at avoiding abuses found in the Solomonic temple. Yet this is not a blueprint for builders (Stevenson), and there are ideal or utopian features, such as the river flowing from the temple (Ezek 47:1-12). Yet the mundane detail also indicates that it is not depicting an eternal heavenly reality, as in Isaiah 6. One suggestion is that it refers to spiritual realities rather than physical possibilities (Block, 2:505), although "spiritual" must not take on an inner or individual nuance that undercuts the material and corporate character of Ezekiel's temple. Another perspective is that Ezekiel presents an extended theological meditation, expressed in a symbolic structure of meaning that transcends the present and provides a critical alternative to the current state of affairs (Blenkinsopp, 199, 237). The vision combines elements of both prophetic and apocalyptic eschatology, but the presentation is located in the present rather than the future: "The vision merges mythic space with historical geography and then situates the prophet in this transformed space" (Odell, 537).

One problematic interpretive trend regards these chapters as a final, definitive solution, whether right or wrong. But prophetic visions are not to be interpreted rigidly; they are statements of intent open to flexible reinterpretation in later, different circumstances. This is what Ezekiel himself is doing in taking up features of the Solomonic temple and the priestly portrayal of the tabernacle but developing them in creative ways that respond to contemporary problems. Ezekiel's map is not reality; it correlates truths about Israel's calling and God's character in ways that acknowledge the deficiencies of the past and pledges hope in a God who promises to dwell once again in the midst of his people. The radical differences of his temple from that of Zerubbabel did not threaten the vision's authenticity, which only became a problem in a later era that read the texts more flatly. In turn, the book of Revelation selectively takes aspects of Ezekiel's temple and integrates them in a vision that incorporates other biblical texts and a grasp of God's radical new revelation in Christ (Rev 21). A common identity in Christ makes internal distinctions within the temple-city unnecessary, all the sacrifices are subsumed under Christ's once-for-all sacrifice, and the greater holiness achieved leads to worship in the three-dimensional perfection of a cubic temple-city (Rev 21:16).

6. Postexilic Prophecy.

The fall of the temple led to a variety of responses to the worship of God in a "templeless age" (Middlemas). These included continued (though limited) worship (Jer 41:5), anguished lamentation focused on the catastrophe of the exile (Lamentations), and assimilation to the religion of the conquerors (the target of Second Isaiah's polemic). But the prophets retain a firm grasp on the sovereignty and purposes of God, who is the source of hope through and beyond judgment. Ezekiel (Ezek 20:40-42) and Second Isaiah (Is 44:28) prepare the people for a return to Jerusalem and the renewed presence of God in the midst of his people.

Ezekiel and others had emphasized that the temple was not necessary for God's continuing presence. It is not surprising that some regarded its rebuilding as a lesser priority, especially in a time of drought and economic hardship (Zech 8:10). However, in 521 BC, sixty-seven years after the destruction of the temple, Haggai accuses the people of neglecting to rebuild the house of the Lord and instead looking to their own houses and well-being (Hag 1:2-4). The “therefore” of Haggai 1:10 highlights the correlation between how the people honor God and how God blesses them (or not). The promise that Yahweh is with them (Hag 1:13) emphasizes that the temple represents but does not exhaust the assured presence of God. When the people lament that the rebuilt temple suffers in comparison to the glory/splendor (kābôd) of the Solomonic one (Hag 2:3), Haggai prophesies a shaking of the universe and the nations (Hag 2:5-6) that will fill the temple with a greater glory and bring prosperity/peace (šālôm [Hag 2:9]). The temple focuses the returnees’ dreams and hopes of a God-given better life, which is anticipated even now in a promise of blessing (Hag 2:19).

Zechariah, Haggai’s contemporary, knows that Yahweh has a holy dwelling (mā’ôn) in heaven (Zech 2:13), but he looks to the rebuilding of the earthly temple (Zech 1:16; 4:8-10). The vision of the lampstand (Zech 4:1-5) is based on one of the original furnishings of the temple but is freely adapted to highlight the joint significance of king and high priest in the new order. In a related but distinct oracle (Zech 4:6-10), the role of the royal heir, Zerubbabel, is emphasized over that of the high priest in the building and ritual rededication of the temple that his ancestors David and Solomon originally designed and built. The “head stone” of Zechariah 4:7 may be the foundation stone, but D. L. Petersen suggests that it was a “former stone” from the first temple, thereby emphasizing continuity with the temple’s previous status and role (Petersen 1974). There are several allusions to the temple in the second part of the book (Zech 9–14). In a difficult verse, the wages of a shepherd are thrown into the house of the Lord (Zech 11:13), possibly reflecting the temple’s role as a treasury or bank. The last two verses of the book imaginatively extend a priestly degree of holiness (cf. Ex 39:30; Lev 23:20) to the cooking pots of the temple precincts, the city and even the land (Zech 14:20-21).

The postexilic texts of Isaiah emphasize

Yahweh’s abiding sanctuary in heaven (Is 57:15), which also allows him to dwell with the humble (Is 63:15). An earthly temple is not essential for access to him. Isaiah 66:1-4 emphasizes the priority of God’s temple in heaven, which makes an earthly temple or earthly worship unnecessary and even an abomination. Yet the wider canonical context implies that this is not to be read as an absolute rejection. Israel’s material faith ultimately requires the restoration of Jerusalem and Zion (Is 24:23; 66:20), which will include a renewed sanctuary of glory and beauty (Is 60:13) that is a prestigious center of sacrifice (Is 60:7). To earlier prophecies of instruction and justice for the nations (Is 2:3-4) is added a promise that the temple will be a universal house of prayer (Is 56:7).

Whereas Haggai and Zechariah encourage the construction of the temple, Malachi evaluates the ongoing worship in it (Japhet). Like the preexilic prophets, he wishes to reform the abuse of worship. He condemns the priests for imperfect sacrifices that show a lack of honor (kābôd) for God (Mal 1:6-10). Wrong attitudes nullify any value to the temple (Mal 1:10), and in ironic contrast, the nations can give Israel lessons in pure offerings (Mal 1:11; cf. Is 19:16, 19; 56:5). Malachi also accuses the people of robbing God by not bringing the fullness of tithes to the temple (Mal 3:8-9). Only reversing this behavior will lift the curse on Israel’s crops and bring blessing and honor among the nations (Mal 3:10-12).

Various dates for Joel have been proposed, but its portrait of the temple makes good sense in a postexilic setting. The call to lament assumes a working temple where offerings are brought and priests intercede for the people (Joel 2:15, 17). Joel’s vision of the eschatological future includes a temple that will be the source of a fountain of water for the land, a physical and symbolic sign of blessing (Joel 3:18). This provision reverses the disasters announced in Joel 1–2 and flows from God’s promise to live in the midst of Israel (Joel 2:27).

7. Conclusion.

The prophets witness to a varied response to the temple, depending on the particular historical, social and moral context of their ministry. The question of the temple is closely bound up with the maintenance and preservation of Yahweh’s presence and holiness, which is the source of peace and prosperity. The prophets do not condemn the temple as unnecessary, but they do point out how it can be compromised by idolatrous and unjust behavior. The temple of Solomon is caught up in the judgment announced by the prophets on the people's sinfulness. Its destruction at the exile (587 bc) provides the space for Ezekiel's visionary temple, and a key register for faith in Yahweh was the building of Zerubbabel's temple. This falls far short of what the previous temple stood for, and the prophecies of a renewed temple incomparable in glory and splendor lead to a heightened hope for God's restorative action.

A recurrent assumption is that Yahweh's palace/temple is in heaven (Mic 1:2). This may have a physical counterpart on earth, but the heavenly temple is primary and inviolable; the earthly one a conditional gift. The temple may be a limited earthly and material construct, but it was regarded as an effective, essential and often awesome means of drawing close to God. The omnipresence of God is a relatively superficial affirmation compared with meeting God in a defined space and time. The prophets often apply a hermeneutic of suspicion to the temple, but this is a contextual rather than an absolute standpoint. The temple is a gracious gift of God that has a continuing role (whether in vision or reality) in articulating the practical possibilities of an authentic meeting with God in worship.

But worship is only one dimension of the prophetic conception of the temple. If the temple is properly administered and becomes the holy center of the life of a holy people, then there are personal, national and cosmic consequences. The prophetic vision of the temple as the source of water that flows out to the land is a vivid expression of this belief. When the Lord is present in his temple, then the people will know fertility and blessing, the nations will be instructed into the ways of peace, and the very cosmos will be transformed. The prophetic conception of the temple thus prepares for the coming of Jesus Christ, who is seen as the ultimate focus of God's presence among his people (Eph 2:21-22).

TEXT AND TEXTUAL CRITICISM

This article discusses the Hebrew text of the OT Prophetic Books and the textual criticism and textual problems of those writings. The article also discusses the textual resources available for the study of the text of the Prophetic Books in both Hebrew and Greek, especially the biblical materials available from Qumran and the Judean Desert. Although the textual critic also makes use of the other ancient versions—the Targum (Aramaic), the Peshitta (Syriac), the Vulgate and the Old Latin (Latin)—these versions will not be discussed in this article. As a general rule, the versions just listed, especially the Targum and the Vulgate, tend to stay very close to the traditional text of the Hebrew Bible. To a lesser extent the article also discusses recent theories of the history of the text of the Hebrew Bible as it pertains to the Prophetic Books.

1. General Considerations
2. The Biblical Text at Qumran
3. Textual Resources and Scholarly Tools for the Text of the Prophets

1. General Considerations.

1.1. Textual Criticism. Textual criticism of the Hebrew Bible involves the study of the various textual witnesses and manuscripts of the Bible in order to identify and correct mistakes in the text. As with any text that has been transmitted by hand for a long period of time, the ancient copyists sometimes made mistakes, and those mistakes were not always noticed and corrected. The *Dead Sea Scrolls (DSS) preserve many examples of scribal/copyist mistakes. Many times the mistakes were then corrected by the original scribe or by a later one. Sometimes, however, scribal errors were not noticed, and later scribes continued to copy the mistakes, even when the text no longer made sense. One of the primary goals of the textual criticism of the Hebrew Bible is the detection and correction of ancient scribal mistakes. In order to do that, textual critics make use of every available piece of evidence, particularly ancient biblical manuscripts in Hebrew such as the DSS. Textual critics also make use of the ancient translations of the Bible, especially the Greek translation, the Septuagint (LXX), since it is complete and a very early witness to the text of the Hebrew Bible.

It is easy to understand that textual critics make use of ancient Hebrew manuscripts to study the Hebrew text of the Bible. Comparing texts in the same language makes sense. However, we also make use of ancient translations to study the text of the Hebrew Bible, and when we do so, we must first do our best to understand that translation on its own terms. The LXX is an especially important resource for the textual criticism of the Hebrew Bible. We know that it is the earliest translation of the Hebrew text, begun in the third century BC, probably with the Pentateuch, and probably completed for the rest of the Hebrew Bible by the first century BC. The LXX began life as a translation but quickly became the Scriptures for Greek-speaking Jews and later for Christians throughout the Mediterranean world. The LXX became Greek literature. When we use the LXX for the textual criticism of the Hebrew Bible, it is important that we read and understand the entire composition with which we are concerned. It is not enough to read the words of the verse that one is interested in. We must understand the broad context and how the translator worked before we can use the Greek text to correct or reconstruct the Hebrew text. When we use the LXX, we must retranslate it into Hebrew, using knowledge of the techniques of the translator. When we have done this, we produce hypothetical variant forms of the Hebrew text. There is, naturally, greater uncertainty with such reconstructed variants in comparison to ancient Hebrew manuscripts, but we need every piece of evidence that we can secure in order to understand the text better. So even though translated variants from the Greek or another ancient translation are less certain, we use them with due caution in our attempt to correct the text.

In discussing the text and the necessity of the textual criticism of the Hebrew Bible, it is important to clarify assumptions about the text and its history. All textual witnesses, the Hebrew texts as well as the Greek, may have simple scribal mistakes. One of the advantages that the DSS give us is that they preserve many examples of ancient scribal errors and how the scribes corrected their mistakes when they caught them. These mistakes need to be recognized and corrected by the textual critic, but in addition to correcting ancient scribal errors, both accidental and intentional, it is important to recognize where the different witnesses to a composition differ from each other and why.

For example, recognizing how and why the Hebrew and Greek versions of the book of *Jeremiah differ from each other leads us to a new understanding of those witnesses to the text. The Hebrew and Greek versions of Jeremiah are not copies in Hebrew and Greek of the same composition. Scholars now understand that the Hebrew version of Jeremiah, which is the version translated in most English-language Bibles, is actually a revised and slightly expanded version of the book. The Greek version of Jeremiah, however, seems to be a copy of an earlier version of the book that was translated from an older, shorter and differently organized Hebrew copy of Jeremiah. The Hebrew version of Jeremiah became canonical in Judaism and in those varieties of Christianity that used Jerome's Latin translation of Jeremiah, which he based on the Hebrew text. But in Eastern Christianity, wherever the Greek Bible or its daughter translations were used, the older version of the book of Jeremiah remained the canonical form, just as it had been in earliest, Greek-speaking Christianity.

The differences between the Hebrew and Greek versions of the book of Jeremiah represent a clear and obvious example of where the Hebrew and Greek versions of a biblical book can differ from each other. However, differences on a lesser scale exist in many other books of the OT as well. For example, the book of Joshua in the Greek version seems to preserve a shorter, older version of the book than the Hebrew version of Joshua. In addition, the book of *Ezekiel in the Greek version seems to reflect a slightly shorter version of the book than the Hebrew version. The situation in the book of *Daniel is similar, but more complicated. There are two versions of the Greek translation of the book of Daniel, the LXX and a version attributed to Theodotion, which came to dominate in most of the Greek manuscripts of Daniel. The point here is that scholars now recognize that in addition to preserving variant readings, the Greek Bible and the Hebrew manuscripts from Qumran also preserve variant literary editions of books in the Hebrew Bible. The versions that were chosen to become the canonical forms of some biblical books consistently seem to be later literary editions. The older versions, preserved sometimes in the Greek and Hebrew witnesses to the text, actually preserve older versions of the composition. In other words, the same biblical manuscripts that we use in the textual criticism of the Hebrew Bible also show us the last stages in the literary growth of the biblical text. The comparison of differing editions of a composition is the scholarly practice known as literary criticism, which studies the growth or development of a literary composition.

1.2. The History of the Biblical Text. The Hebrew text of the OT Prophetic Books that most biblical scholars use is based on a single manuscript copied and annotated in the year AD 1009. This is the famous St. Petersburg Codex, formerly known as the Leningrad Codex (B^{19A}). This codex, the oldest complete copy of the Hebrew Bible, is annotated with vocalization, accentual systems and comments on the text collectively known as Masorah in the upper and lower margins of each page as well as in the spaces between columns. The St. Petersburg Codex has been the base text for the most widely used critical edition of the Hebrew text, the Biblia Hebraica, since 1937. It is a superb exemplar of the Masoretic Text (MT) of the Hebrew Bible, which is normative in Judaism and has been the basis for most Christian translations of the OT. In the Biblia Hebraica Quinta the Masoretic notes to the text are translated, which can provide the student of the text with many useful details. The Minor Prophets volume of Biblia Hebraica Quinta was published in 2010. Another very important medieval manuscript of the Hebrew Bible is the Aleppo Codex. This manuscript is slightly older than the St. Petersburg Codex (AD 960) but is, unfortunately, incomplete. The Aleppo Codex is used as the base text, where extant, of the Hebrew University Bible. The Hebrew University Bible has published volumes for the books of Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel. The first volume of the Minor Prophets is in preparation at this time.

With the publication of the biblical DSS, scholars now have copies of Hebrew biblical manuscripts that not only provide many variant readings and valuable information for the correction of the text but also allow us to recover the last stages in the composition of some of the biblical books. These manuscripts range in date from c. 275 BC to c. AD 68. All of them are technically “pre-Masoretic” copies of the biblical books without vocalization, accentual systems or Masorah. The biblical manuscripts from the Judean Desert in both Hebrew and Greek also show us the diversity in the text of the developing Bible during the last two centuries BC and the first century AD.

2. The Biblical Text at Qumran.

With the completed publication of the approximately two hundred biblical scrolls from Qumran, the nature of the biblical text known from this collection of manuscripts, which probably represented the library or collection of the Jewish group resident there, has become clearer. It is now evident that the Jewish community at Qumran possessed a collection of biblical and nonbiblical manuscripts that exhibited a great deal of variety in terms of the type of biblical text. Before the discovery of the scrolls, scholars had known of the MT, the LXX and the Samaritan Pentateuch. In a recent study, E. Tov analyzed the biblical scrolls from Qumran and divided them according to their relationships with forms of the OT previously known by scholars. Tov found that approximately 47.1 percent of the biblical manuscripts known from Qumran may be designated as “proto-Masoretic” or “proto-Rabbinic” because they are most closely related to the form of the Hebrew text preserved in the medieval MT. Only 2.5 percent of the Qumran scrolls were most closely related to the Samaritan text of the Pentateuch and are therefore called by some scholars “pre-Samaritan” texts. Another small group of texts, only 3.3 percent of the total, were most closely related to the Hebrew source of the LXX. Finally, 47.1 percent of all biblical manuscripts fall into the category that scholars call “non-aligned” texts. These are biblical scrolls that are independent and therefore do not show any particular affiliation with the known types of text. Of the groups of biblical scrolls from Qumran just mentioned, all except the pre-Samaritan group are known for the Prophetic Books. Especially well-known are the Jeremiah manuscripts from Cave 4 at Qumran 4Q71 and 4Q72a, which are very close to the Hebrew source of the Greek book of Jeremiah, which differs in both length and order of material from the Hebrew book of Jeremiah, as was discussed briefly above.

At Qumran there was remarkable diversity in the text of biblical books, but the two largest groups of biblical manuscripts were the non-aligned group and the proto-Masoretic group. When we look beyond Qumran to biblical manuscripts found at other locations in the Judean Desert and from slightly later in time, the picture begins to change. At other locations, such as Masada and the Wadi Murabba'at, the only text type attested among biblical manuscripts is the proto-Masoretic. In other words, as Tov has argued in another study, the proto-Masoretic text type becomes the dominant text type shortly after the first Jewish war against Rome, which ended in AD 73. By that time, and later, all biblical manuscripts in Hebrew from the Judean Desert are of the same textual tradition. These proto-Masoretic texts may be thought of as ancestral to the medieval MT, known from the Aleppo Codex and the St. Petersburg Codex. The proto-Masoretic text type probably was, for the most part, the basis for the Aramaic translations known as the Targum and later still, in the time of Jerome, for the Vulgate. Consequently, the Targum and the Vulgate frequently do not differ dramatically from the MT and therefore seldom contribute much in the study of the problems of the Hebrew text. They are, however, important in the study of the history of the exegesis of the text and its translation. The biblical texts from Qumran and the Judean Desert, regardless of their text type, are important early witnesses to the Hebrew text of the developing Bible and are therefore of first importance for the textual critic. Second in importance for the study of the text is the LXX.

3. Textual Resources and Scholarly Tools for the Text of the Prophets.

3.1. Introduction and Scholarly Resources. In this section I briefly discuss the state of the Hebrew and Greek versions of the text of each of the prophets in the order in which they occur in the Hebrew Bible. I will also mention especially important tools and/or manuscripts for the study of the Prophetic Books. The reader is urged to consult the bibliography, where all the major textual resources are listed. This article is not a textual commentary on the books of the prophets. Therefore, I will not discuss individual difficult passages, but rather present an overview of current scholarly understandings of the text of the Prophetic Books.

The MT of the Prophetic Books is available for all of the prophets in the Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia, based on the St. Petersburg codex. In the next edition of the Biblia Hebraica, the Biblia Hebraica Quinta, only the Minor Prophets volume is available. The Hebrew University Bible, which is based on the Aleppo Codex, is available for Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel. The first volume of the Minor Prophets in this important edition is due soon. The Greek text of the prophets is available primarily in the Göttingen Septuagint volumes. There are separate volumes for Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and a single volume for the twelve Minor Prophets. There is also an excellent edition of the Greek scroll of the Minor Prophets from Naha]Hever. This is an important manuscript for the study of the Greek text of the Minor Prophets and for the history of the Greek and Hebrew texts of the prophets. In addition, the biblical manuscripts from Qumran are now available in a convenient single volume that presents the Hebrew texts in canonical order along with a listing of textual variants. This volume is based on the publication of these manuscripts in the Discoveries in the Judaean Desert series and so makes a consultation of those volumes unnecessary other than for technical work.

3.2. Isaiah. The MT of the book of Isaiah has a large number of hapax legomena (words occurring only once in the Bible) and rare words, which can make it very difficult to understand. There are also a number of passages where the text is problematic.

From Qumran we have a total of twenty-one manuscripts of the book of Isaiah. Scholars are fortunate to have the entire scroll of Isaiah from Cave 1 at Qumran, 1QIsa^a. This manuscript is the only biblical scroll completely preserved, and it is one of the longest we know of, 7.34 m in length. The scroll was copied by two different scribes between 150 and 120 BC. This means that although 1QIsa^a was discovered at Qumran, it was not copied there, since it predates the founding of the settlement. 1QIsa^a is available in three editions, including the forthcoming two-volume edition by E. Ulrich and P. Flint. Although 1QIsa^a shows thousands of variants from the MT, many of these are orthographic in nature; that is, they consist of spelling differences. Nevertheless, 1QIsa^a is extremely important in the study of the text of Isaiah. Also from Cave 1 is 1QIsa^b, which is not as well preserved as 1QIsa^a and stands closer to the MT in terms of its text. There are eighteen manuscripts of Isaiah from Cave 4 and one manuscript from Cave 5, and while most of these are relatively small, they are potentially important for the study of the text of Isaiah. Finally, there is also a fragment of Isaiah from Murabba'at. The LXX of Isaiah, which is thought to date from the mid-second century BC, appears to be a free, even paraphrastic, translation that is also interpretive. It is therefore not as helpful for the reconstruction of the Hebrew text as might be hoped. It is unlikely that the translator had a Hebrew text before him that was radically different from the MT; rather, scholars think that the translator was contemporizing his translation to make it refer to issues and concepts of the translator's own time.

3.3. Jeremiah. As is well known, the MT of Jeremiah differs dramatically from the LXX version of Jeremiah. The Greek text is shorter than the Hebrew by one-sixth (17 percent). The Greek version deviates from the order of some of the chapters in the Hebrew version. For example, most obviously, the prophecies against the nations in Jeremiah 46–52 in the MT are found after Jeremiah 25:13 in the LXX version. In this case, the manuscripts of Jeremiah from Qumran help us to understand why these versions of Jeremiah are different from each other. Two of the five Jeremiah manuscripts from Cave 4 at Qumran, 4Q71 and 4Q72a, correspond to the Greek version of Jeremiah in terms of the arrangement of the content of the book and the length of the book. This correspondence is understood to indicate that it is most likely that the LXX translators of Jeremiah had as their Hebrew source a manuscript very much like 4Q71 and 4Q72a, and that they neither abbreviated their text nor rearranged the content. Tov and others have argued that the pattern of differences between the MT and the LXX most likely indicates that the version found in the MT reflects a revised and expanded version of the form of Jeremiah found in the LXX. In other words, LXX Jeremiah is best understood as an earlier, “first” edition of the book. The version found in the MT is best understood as a “second” edition of the book, which the ancient scribes reorganized and expanded slightly. It is the “second” edition that became normative in Judaism, but the “first” edition was initially, until the time of Jerome, the form of the book used by Greek-speaking Christians, and is still used by Greek-speaking Christians. Although there is some discussion of this model for understanding the textual history of Jeremiah, most scholars find it convincing. In the first volume of his commentary on Jeremiah, W. McKane provides detailed discussion of the textual evidence. He is not entirely convinced by this explanation of the different forms of the text.

3.4. Ezekiel. The situation in the book of Ezekiel is similar to that in Jeremiah, but the differences between the Hebrew version and the Greek version are not so dramatic. The LXX version of Ezekiel preserves a slightly shorter version, by only 4-5 percent. In Ezekiel, unlike Jeremiah, rearrangement of content is not an obvious characteristic of the difference between the two versions. There are recensional differences in Ezekiel 7 only. Although older commentaries usually describe the pluses in the MT text of Ezekiel as "glosses," Tov has argued that they are evidence of recensional differences. The Greek translation of Ezekiel is relatively literal, and this is understood to support the idea of recensional differences. To summarize, the MT text of Ezekiel is thought by some scholars to be a later and slightly longer edition than the LXX version of Ezekiel. Unfortunately, for Ezekiel we do not have the convenient Hebrew manuscript copies from Qumran that support the hypothesis, which we do have for Jeremiah. There are six fragmentary copies of Ezekiel from Qumran and one fragment from Masada.

3.5. Daniel. The book of Daniel is unique in several ways. First, although Daniel is grouped with the Prophetic Books in the Christian canon, most scholars would classify the book of Daniel, or at least Daniel 7–12, as apocalyptic, a genre related to prophecy but quite distinct from it. Apocalyptic writings in the Christian canon are limited to Daniel and the book of Revelation, although parts of Zechariah 9–14 are similar. Second, Daniel is written in a mixture of *Hebrew and *Aramaic. Daniel 1:1–2:4a and Daniel 8:1–12:13 are written in Hebrew; Daniel 2:4b–7:28 is written in Aramaic. Third, as mentioned above, there are two distinct versions of the Greek translation of Daniel. The better-attested version is attributed to an early Christian writer, Theodotion. The less well-attested version is that of the LXX. The LXX translation is longer than the Hebrew/Aramaic form preserved in the MT and varies from it considerably. The LXX of Daniel arranges the chapters in this order: 1–4; 7; 8; 5; 6; 9–12, a sequence that may go back to the original translation. Although the LXX version of Daniel is longer, it also contains some minuses in comparison to the MT, and the style can be paraphrastic. The version attributed to Theodotion is closer to the MT. This may have been what led to its adoption by the Christian churches, possibly under the influence of Origen. Both the LXX and the Theodotonic versions of Daniel were known to the writers of the NT. The history and relationships among the Greek versions is much debated by scholars and remains unclear. Much work remains to be done, especially on the Greek version assigned to Theodotion. From Qumran we have a total of eight manuscripts of Daniel, some of which are quite fragmentary. All these manuscripts come from the Second Temple period. The Daniel manuscripts from Qumran do not deviate in significant ways from the MT. The shifts between Hebrew and Aramaic and vice versa are preserved in the Daniel manuscripts in agreement with the MT of Daniel. The shorter version of Daniel, preserved in the MT, is also attested in the Qumran manuscripts.

The book of Daniel in its Greek versions has also accrued additions to the story that are not attested in either the manuscripts from Qumran or in the MT.

3.6. The Twelve Minor Prophets. Most scholars assume that the collection of the twelve Minor Prophets was complete by the beginning of the second century BC, based on this reference from Sirach: "May the bones of the Twelve Prophets send forth new life from where they lie, for they comforted the people of Jacob and delivered them with confident hope" (Sir 49:10 NRSV). This may be correct, but it is likely that the Greek collection of the Minor Prophets developed somewhat differently than the Hebrew collection, since the order of the first six books differs between the two collections. The order in the Hebrew texts is Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah. But in the LXX the eighth-century BC prophets are grouped together so that the order is Hosea, Amos, Micah, Joel, Obadiah, Jonah. The LXX of the Minor Prophets is thought by many scholars to be the work of a single translator. In seven of the prophetic books the Greek and the Hebrew texts are quite close to each other. As might be expected, however, where the Hebrew text is difficult or corrupt, as in Hosea or Micah, the Greek text can be quite different from the Hebrew.

The text of the twelve Minor Prophets is known from eight or nine copies from Qumran, seven or eight of which are from Cave 4. The uncertainty in number has to do with one manuscript, 4Q168, which is a fragment of Micah so small that it is uncertain whether it is the remains of a scroll containing at least part of the book of Micah or the remains of a commentary on the book of Micah. Scholars assume that the other manuscripts from Qumran, which are fragmentary and usually do not preserve the transitions between the Prophetic Books, originally contained all twelve Minor Prophets. However, only two of the scrolls from Cave 4, 4Q77 and 4Q82, actually do preserve transitions and thus were likely to be scrolls of the Twelve. One of the two oldest copies of the Minor Prophets from Cave 4 at Qumran, 4Q76, which dates from the middle of the second century BC, also preserves a dramatically different order of the books. The scroll is quite fragmentary, but most of the second and third chapters of the book of Malachi are well preserved. The ending of Malachi is clear on the leather, and so is the fact that on a piece of the following column there was another composition. The editor of the manuscript has reconstructed the meager remains as the beginning of the book of Jonah. This makes sense of the letter remains on the leather, and there are also other fragments of Jonah preserved from 4Q76. If the reconstruction is correct, then we have evidence that the order of the twelve Minor Prophets in the mid-second century BC was not yet set, and that there were at least three different arrangements of the collection in circulation at that time. 4Q76 is one of the oldest manuscripts found at Qumran, and it would have been copied relatively close to the time of the translation of the Minor Prophets into Greek.

This makes one of the other Minor Prophets scrolls from the Judean Desert even more interesting. We are extremely fortunate to have a scroll of the Minor Prophets from Nahal Hēver that dates from the last half of the first century BC. This scroll, 8Hēv 1, is a Greek manuscript. One of the interesting characteristics of this scroll is that although it is in Greek, it preserves the books of the Minor Prophets in the same order as the Hebrew text, and so, because of its date, it is the earliest evidence for the order of the Minor Prophets that becomes canonical in the MT. In the Nahal Hēver scroll the book of Jonah precedes the book of Micah just as it does in the MT. This is especially interesting for a Greek manuscript of the Minor Prophets, and it gives an important indication of the nature of this manuscript. This scroll is not a copy of the LXX; rather, this scroll is a careful revision of the older Greek translation to bring the Greek version closer to the Hebrew text that the reviser had access to. That Hebrew text was not identical to the MT, but it was very close to it. The older Greek translation with which the reviser began was itself not very different from the MT. Nevertheless, the reviser did succeed in correcting the old Greek translation in numerous places where the older Hebrew text, which the original translator used, differed from the MT. The Nahal Hēver copy of the twelve Minor Prophets gives us a window into the development of both the Hebrew and the Greek texts of the Bible, which were changing and being repeatedly revised and adapted to each other.

Finally, from Wadi Murabbaʿat we have another copy of the twelve Minor Prophets, this one in Hebrew, which preserves a large amount of material and is close to the MT in its textual type. The Murabbaʿat Minor Prophets scroll, Mur 88, dates to the time of the Bar Kokhba revolt (c. AD 132-135). The Murabbaʿat scroll is a proto-Masoretic text and is evidence for the dominance of that text type in Palestine by the first part of the second century AD.

Although the twelve Minor Prophets seem to have been copied on a single scroll at least as early as the second century BC (4Q76, 4Q77), there is no indication that the individual books of Minor Prophets were ever considered as one composition. The nonbiblical scrolls from Qumran that cite and comment on the Prophetic Books always comment only on individual books from the twelve Minor Prophets. The twelve Minor Prophets are never viewed as a single prophetic work, even though they are copied on a single scroll and therefore treated as a single "book" in terms of the format of the collection. A significant movement has developed among some specialists on the Minor Prophets to approach the collection and interpret it as a single "book" (for a summary and discussion of this approach as well as an opposing view, see Ben Zvi, Nogalski and Römer) (see Book of the Twelve).

TRUE AND FALSE PROPHECY

As long as two or more people have disagreed on anything, the necessity of discerning between true and false claims has been a factor in human relationships. If those disagreements happen between sanctioned or sacred leaders, such as prophets, the stakes are heightened. Depending on the situation and method of discernment, the life of the community and that of the prophet might also hang in the balance. If those disagreements are then canonized within the authoritative Scriptures of a community, the difficulties mount. The OT in general and prophetic literature in particular testify to a wide range of claims and counterclaims among various biblical prophets and other biblical texts and characters that begs for discernment about what is true or false.

At the core of the study of true and false prophecy lie questions of authority and interpretation, not only for original audiences hearing a prophecy for the first time, but also every audience ever since. Can authority be detached from context and use? Can any interpretation claim universal correctness? Whose interests are being legitimated by what ideology? What are the social and political effects of a particular reading? In short, can one distinguish a true prophet from a false prophet? If so, how and by what criteria?

6. Conclusion

1. Classic Texts in True and False Prophecy.

The Torah (Genesis through Deuteronomy) gathered accounts and issued laws to warn against those who might lead Israel astray. The story of Pharaoh's sages and sorcerers challenging the greatest of all prophets, Moses, and losing (Ex 7:8-11) underscores later laws against deceit-prone prophets and others using magic, *divination, witchcraft and necromancy (Lev 19:26; Deut 18:10-11; Num 22:7; Josh 13:22; Jer 14:14; 27:9; 29:8; Ezek 13:6-9; Mic 3:6-7; Zech 10:2). In the shift of generations from those who left Egypt to those who would enter the promised land, Moses is portrayed in the book of Deuteronomy as delivering a constitution of sorts, in which are included specific laws regulating the message and lifestyles of prophets after Moses (Deut 13:11-18; 18:15-22).

The Prophets (Joshua through Micah), as a collection, collate stories in grand historical sweep, telling what went wrong along the way such that Israel ended up being exiled twice, first to Assyria and then to Babylon. This second part of the Hebrew *canon also gathers together, as if exhibits in a court case, the messages of those prophets who had warned of such a tragic outcome. In a sense, a grand argument is being made, after the fact, that God had sent prophets all along the way warning of disaster if the people did not listen. The truth of their message was manifest in it having come to pass. Interwoven into this collection were stories of great prophets such as Samuel, none of whose words failed to come to pass (1 Sam 3:19-20), and accounts of major competitions between prophetic groups that revealed true prophets from false ones (Elijah and Elisha versus Jezebel's prophets [1 Kings 18-22]; Jeremiah versus Hananiah [Jer 27-28]). Late in the prophetic period these claims and counterclaims of prophets seem to have taken a toll such that one prophet sees a day when prophecy itself will cease (Zech 13:1-6a). Such a prophecy projected onto the end of the world raised the stakes, as other prophets countered with their own visions of the end of days, if not the end of prophecy.

2. Prophet Versus Prophet.

The prophets Isaiah and Micah prophesy that the end of the world as they understand it will happen when the nations of the world "beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks" and study *war no more (Is 2:4; Mic 4:3). By contrast, the prophet Joel, in his imagined end-of-the-world scenario, calls on the nations to "beat [their] plowshares into swords and [their] pruning hooks into spears" (Joel 3:10) in order to prepare for an *apocalyptic mother of all battles. Both prophetic utterances quote Yahweh (God) as their source of authority. Readers of Isaiah, Micah and Joel rightfully assume that all are true prophets insofar as their messages have been canonized in sacred Scripture. So, which is it? Will the world end in peaceful resolve or in violent warfare?

In another case among many, Moses, the greatest of all prophets (Deut 34:10), declares that God will punish future descendants for the sins of their ancestors (Ex 34:7b). The prophet Ezekiel, by contrast, says that each person is held accountable for his or her own deeds and will not be punished for the sins of his or her ancestors (Ezek 18:20). So which is it? Are we punished for our parents' sins or not? If we are punished for their sins, what is the justice in that? Who are we to question Moses? On the other hand, Ezekiel seems to do just that.

When the Hebrew Bible was being translated into Greek (the Septuagint), the translators decided that in at least some instances the conflict between prophets was so severe that they simply changed the original text itself. Rather than simply translate the standard Hebrew word for "prophet" (nābî), which was used for prophets on both sides of the debate, the translators picked sides and used the Greek term pseudoprophētēs ("false prophets") to indicate to the reader their discernment of the matter (Jer 6:13; 26:7, 8, 11, 16; 27:9; 28:1; 29:1, 8; Zech 13:2). Whether or not translators helped separate true prophets from false prophets by means of textual emendation, prophetic conflict would remain a focus of discernment for readers of Scripture down through the ages. By what criteria, then, might a discerning Bible reader decide questions of truth or falsehood provoked by dueling prophetic utterances? Or in the words of God's people in the book of Deuteronomy, "How can we recognize a word that the LORD has spoken?" (Deut 18:21).

3. The Standard Account of the Search for Criteria.

The story of OT research in true and false prophecy is an account of the interplay between the ambiguities of the biblical text itself and the particular biblical scholar's assessment of the nature of prophecy as a whole (Petersen). Early studies focused almost exclusively on the person or personal character and attributes of the prophet (Quell; Mowinckel). So, for example, it was argued that a false prophet could be determined by the prophet's evil intentions or immoral character. Jeremiah charges false prophets with adultery and lying (Jer 23:14). Isaiah adds drunkenness to the list (Is 28:7). Micah accuses false prophets of his day of being motivated by greed (Mic 3:5-7). Such moral criteria were picked up later by Jesus, who said that true and false prophets could be identified "by their fruits" (Mt 7:16). A closer reading of the biblical data, however, would indicate moral ambiguity in the lives of some noted true prophets: Hosea marries a prostitute at God's bidding (Hos 1:1-2); Isaiah runs naked in public for three years, a scandalous breach of decency (Is 20:2-3; cf. Gen 3:7; 9:21; 2 Sam 6:20); Jeremiah lies to Babylonian princes at King Zedekiah's bidding (Jer 38:14-28); Elisha curses a group of boys who make fun of his baldness, a curse that results in bears mauling forty-two of them (2 Kings 2:23-25). Furthermore, there is no evidence to suggest that Hananiah, the very prophet explicitly labeled a "false prophet" by the Septuagint translators, was, on moral grounds, any less righteous than Jeremiah (Jer 28). And so, it became fairly obvious that a prophet's moral character or person was not necessarily a foolproof gauge of a prophet's claim to truth.

Other scholars focused on the message of the prophet as key to understanding prophecy in general (von Rad, 1972; Westermann). Forms of speech such as Yahweh speeches and salvation or judgment oracles were categorized. Sources of tradition, particular settings, themes of *covenant, holy *war or *wisdom were deemed crucial to understanding a prophecy's meaning. So it was that biblical scholars turned to message-centered criteria for discerning the true prophet from the false prophet. Since Moses was deemed the quintessential true prophet without equal (Deut 34:10-12), his message to the pilgrim wanderers in the exodus and beyond established a baseline set of criteria for determining true prophets from false prophets ever since (Deut 13:1-5; 18:15-21).

According to Deuteronomy 18:18-19, a true prophet speaks "in the name of the LORD," with words put into the prophet's mouth by God. Claim of divine inspiration is central to such a call, a call often reluctantly accepted by the true prophet (Is 6; Jer 1; Ezek 1). The format of such prophetic speech is found throughout prophetic literature under the introductory formula "Thus says the LORD," often labeled a "Yahweh speech" by scholars. But could not anyone seeking validation of his or her prophetic utterance simply attach such an introductory formula to it? Would that necessarily make it true? As if to respond to such a possibility, Moses ups the ante. If a prophet speaks in the name of the Lord, but the prophecy does not come to pass or prove true, then the prophet is false (Deut 18:22). And in order to deter frivolous prophecies, the penalty for false prophecy is death (Deut 18:20). Fulfilled prophecy as a criterion of truth works wonderfully and definitively provided that the time frame for fulfillment is short enough to see it come to pass or not. To the degree that the promised outcome of a prophecy can be shuttled off to some distant indefinite future, its value as evidence of truthfulness is greatly diminished. Furthermore, the criterion of fulfillment is helpful only in cases of predictive prophecy, not in other types of prophecy that simply speak truth to various listening publics.

In other cases, some modern secular prophets or ancient non-Israelite prophets (Num 22–24) have been known to predict quite accurately events that have indeed come to pass (Overholt). Some even conjure omens and offer miraculous signs as proof of their status as true prophets. What then? Moses, in Deuteronomy 13:1-5, warns against taking such miracle-manifesting criteria too seriously, especially in instances where the prophecies lead away from God to the devotion or worship of other gods. Jeremiah warns his community against prophets who prophesy in the name of the Lord (Yahweh) or under the rhetorical banner “the burden of the LORD” and who may even perform miraculous deeds but are false prophets nonetheless because of their loyalty to other gods (Jer 23:13, 27, 37-40). False prophecy is thus linked closely with *idolatry—two sides of the same interpretive coin. More than any other criteria where slippage occurs in the discernment process, Moses (Deuteronomy) and Jeremiah declare that true prophecy always leads to *worship of the one true God.

Messages of hope and well-being or other positive prophecies could be signs of falsehood leading people astray (von Rad, 1933). Positive, affirming messages too often supported the status quo, the establishment, royal prerogatives or Zionist ideology. Even though such prophecies may have had good theological backing, often they were used at the wrong place or time. Jeremiah, for example, uses historical precedent in making his case against Hananiah, whose prophecies were full of optimism and hope. Certainly, Hananiah’s prophecy mirrored the hopeful true prophecies of an earlier time (Is 7:4-9; Hos 14:2-9). Jeremiah argues instead that all prophets in preceding generations who were deemed true prophets only ever “prophesied war, famine, and pestilence” (Jer 28:8-9). Prophets who proclaimed, “Peace, peace” when there is no *peace were deemed false by Jeremiah (Jer 6:14). Jesus later uses a similar argument, saying, “Woe to you when all speak well of you, for that is what their ancestors did to the false prophets” (Lk 6:26). Apparently, if a prophet suffered or was despised, and if the prophet prophesied only doom and gloom, then one could assume that the prophecy was true. Of course, such criteria did not account for the many imaginative positive prophecies offered by nearly every true prophet in Scripture (Is 9; 40; 60; Ezek 37; 40–48; Amos 9) or for the possibility that a false prophet might also suffer, be despised and prophesy doom and gloom.

If the message of a prophet did not prove to be altogether sufficient for deciding its truth claims, the study of prophetic literature began to focus on the response of the audience or the vox populi (popular voice of the people) as a determinate factor (Crenshaw; Van der Woude). Was a prophet able to persuade others to believe in the truth of the prophecy? In most cases, a certain segment of the population was persuaded, while others were not. As a result, an increased polarization happened between prophets, between people for and against the prophet, resulting in claims and counterclaims ad infinitum. On the one hand, once convinced, true believers rarely were dissuaded by any disconfirming evidence. On the other hand, others began to find prophecy to be inadequate as a source of inspiration or guidance and began to look elsewhere for spiritual direction. Such chaotic polarization led to a deep suspicion of prophecy as a whole (Carroll), which became the impetus for its supposed demise as a phenomenon during the period between the two Testaments.

As if to underscore the difficulties for determining criteria for discerning true from false prophecies, the story in 1 Kings 13 seems to upend all the categories of discernment at once. In the story, a “man of God,” a younger prophet made so “by the word of the LORD,” predicts a grand reformation under a new king, Josiah, and gives as his proof a sign that the rival altar at Bethel will soon be destroyed. King Jeroboam, no doubt feeling threatened, tries to harm the prophet. In his attempt to do so, the king's hand withers and the altar is destroyed, evidence that seems to validate the "man of God" as a true prophet. The king asks the prophet to restore his hand to full health, which the prophet does. Well and good. The king then invites the "man of God" home for a meal. The prophet declines initially because the Lord had told him not to enter Bethel. The "man of God" leaves. The scene changes to tell of an "old prophet" from Bethel, whose sons tell him about this amazing younger prophet and all he did that day. The old prophet searches after the young prophet and invites him home to Bethel to eat. The young prophet repeats his orders from the Lord that he is not to go to Bethel. The older prophet makes a counterclaim, noting his own prophetic credentials and that, after all, an angel of the Lord came to him telling him to bring the young prophet back to Bethel with him to eat a meal. The young prophet obliges and returns to Bethel with the older prophet. While they are eating, the angel of the Lord comes to the old prophet again, this time telling the old prophet to tell the young prophet that he has disobeyed the Lord by coming back to Bethel. The young prophet then leaves and is killed by lions on the road because of his disobedience. When the old prophet hears the news, he retrieves the body and buries it and declares that the young prophet's prophecies about the fall of Bethel will come to pass, which years later did happen—a noteworthy confirmation indeed. So in this case the old prophet is "false" by the moral criteria of deceiving the young prophet into disobeying, even though the old prophet is "true" by the criteria of being told this by God via the angel of the Lord. The young prophet is "false" by the moral criteria of disobedience and is punished for it, but he is "true" by his prophecies coming true. The old prophet is "true" by moral criteria of hospitality and by the criteria of fulfillment. He confirms the prophecy from the angel of the Lord about the young prophet's disobedience, his restoration and the fall of Bethel.

Clearly, the ambiguous multidimensional possibilities surfacing in this story prompt many questions. Does a false assessment of the historical situation turn a true prophet into a false prophet for that particular historical hour? Is false or true prophecy a permanent state, or can true prophets become false and false true depending on the circumstance? Does a prophet's title, motivation, call or use of right genre automatically deem the prophet true? Were prophets ever completely assured of their own status, or did they walk between certitude and doubt most if not all their days? Are canonical prophets (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Joel, Amos, etc.), by the criteria of being canonized in sacred Scripture, always true in every context, or must critical judgment be passed on them in every context, including their present canonical context and our own? If so, how are such judgments made?

4. Canonical Hermeneutics in True and False Prophecy.

It seems that the decision to determine the truth or falsehood of a prophecy is complex enough that the decisive factor in such determination can never be fixed exclusively on prophetic intention or character or genre or message or theological content or historical hour or audience reception. However, by triangulating or cross-vectoring a number of these factors together, in an accumulating process of sorts, it might be possible to argue for the truth or falsehood of a prophecy in its use across time from its original setting to the present day. By showing how a tradition or prophecy or text was used across time in its various settings within Scripture (innerbiblical exegesis) and its use across time in various postcanonical contexts (comparative midrash), one gets a sense of the range of possible uses and a range of more truthful applications in a variety of settings and situations (Sanders) (see Intertextuality and Innerbiblical Interpretation).

At a basic level, one might simply triangulate the actual historical context (time, place) of the prophet or prophecy with the actual message or content being proclaimed by the prophet with the interpretative slant of the prophet. This has sometimes been called the "hermeneutic triangle." In general, a prophet in biblical literature almost always operates in two modes of interpretation, one of critique, the other of support. Theologically, for the true prophet the universality of God's love critiques narrow particularities, while at the same time God's grace inevitably affirms the unique particularities at the core of human identity—critique and support, two opposing forces held together by God. So it is that almost always a true prophet will do both, if not in a given oracle, then most likely within the scope of the entire work (or prophetic book) of a biblical prophet over time. One can almost always triangulate how a biblical prophet interpreted a particular tradition or text or idea in a particular setting or context. And then, by dynamic analogy, one can identify corresponding contexts in one's own time to apply an identified prophetic text in one of the two dominant hermeneutic modes, to support the situation or to offer constructive criticism. Over time or depending on the context, the most truthful prophetic mode requires one to do both, prophetically critique as necessary and construct positive alternatives as obligatory.

5. Making Prophecy Come True (An Example).

By way of example, let us return to the end-time scenarios of Isaiah (Is 2:2-4) and Joel (Joel 3:9-17). Both are true prophets by dint of their inclusion in the biblical canon. Both claim validation using the "Yahweh speech" form. Both claim to speak for God. Isaiah dreams of a day of universal peace. Joel pines for the day of universal war that will serve as precursor to Yahweh's peaceful reign. Both seek to persuade their audiences to their own version of end-time events. Both used a similar tradition, similar concepts and language about plowshares and swords. Both versions were heard in original contexts and later read at various times as well. By the time of their inclusion into the canon of Scripture, both were known in postexilic times. The Babylonian *exile created a situation in which all prophecy, however unequivocally stated prior to the exile, was now open-ended and contingent. Earlier promises of the inviolability of the *land, monarchy, *temple and community were made contingent by the experience of exile. The exile would forever establish the fact that even unconditionally stated prophetic promises could henceforth be understood as being conditional and might not come to pass. The story of the prophet Jonah only confirms the contingent nature of all biblical prophecy. People might choose to *repent, necessitating a reevaluation of an otherwise straightforward prophetic utterance.

In any case, Isaiah, in his plowshare prophecy, uses a hermeneutic of prophetic critique, arguing against narrow exclusive understandings of a renewed *Israel, welcoming into the fold all nations living in peaceful coexistence. Micah's version of Isaiah's speech (Mic 4:1-5) is even more inclusive. Joel, by contrast, uses a hermeneutic of constitutive support, advocating for the bloody vindication and exclusive particularity of winners (Israel) and losers (the nations of the world).

Today's reader of these two texts reads them side by side in Scripture. The texts await the decision of readers as to what will become of the texts' rhetorical and political fates. The persuasive power of Isaiah and Joel reaches far beyond the historical limits of the Bible, of which Joel and Isaiah are a part. The determining factors, then and now, lie in the ongoing rhetorical power of the ancient and the modern reader to convince his or her audience to accept one reading over another. Which version of the end of the world is true, and which one is false?

It is a disservice to Isaiah and Joel and ethically irresponsible to attempt to harmonize their differences or merge the two into one story, as if both are true in some grand scheme still unknown to us. Nor is it appropriate to mellow the harshness of their differences by positing a temporal gap between them, as if Joel's bloody account prepares the world for Isaiah's peaceable vision. Using the explicit language of Isaiah, Joel rejects Isaiah's peaceful version as ineffective for his own time. Joel's politics precluded Isaiah's. Each prophet believed his point of view and operated under the burden of being accused of uttering falsehoods by those not persuaded. Indeed, the ethic of personal responsibility undertaken by both prophets cannot be underestimated, even if that responsibility sometimes was shuffled into the heavens with the claim that this was Yahweh's word.

The prophet's *rhetoric of persuasion was his own. His use of a Yahweh speech underscores his efforts to persuade. He had to make his case and risk the consequences. The canonical juxtaposition of Isaiah and Joel in Scripture, even when tempered by a history of their use, has sponsored mutually exclusive constructions of the outcome of history.

When it comes to choosing to live by Isaiah 2:2-4 or Joel 3:9-12, today's readers may hesitate to take the same risk that Isaiah and Joel took in declaring their views publicly. Indeed, from the perspective of one reading, the other can rightly be deemed false. In principle, Yahweh can return to *Zion, in accordance with Joel's reconstruction of events, as a violent and exclusive God, or, as Isaiah envisions, Yahweh can return to Zion with Torah in hand and an invitation of inclusion to all nations to join Yahweh there. Yahweh cannot do both, though Yahweh may do neither. In other words, on the surface of things, Yahweh alone appears to be the final arbiter between Joel and Isaiah with regard to their truthful predictions of the destiny of the world. But in fact and effect, we have been given the moral responsibility for making one or the other of these prophecies come true.

The more authoritative one claims these texts to be "the *word of God," the more serious becomes the reading. The problem simply and gravely moves from a literary one to a theological one. Can we so easily shift the moral blame for the outcome of human destiny to God, arguing, as some have, "We cannot do ethics for God"? But we are not so much doing ethics for God as accepting God's way of doing ethics—that is, rising to argue, as did our prophetic forebears, for or against lesser and better ways of living our lives. This is not human hubris. It is merely recognizing the co-creative role that God has given humans to prophesy, in the first place, and then construct a better world accordingly. One honors God in so doing.

The present ethical task is either to advocate for one reading over the other or to read neither. The mutually exclusive claims of these scenarios and the bloody record of history allow no alternative. We today cannot choose to live by both Isaiah's account of human destiny and Joel's. The truth of either Isaiah's version of human destiny or Joel's is not yet decided. We can choose Joel's version as true prophecy to our judgment or Isaiah's to our blessing. What is at stake here is not God, but we ourselves. God will survive another failed prophecy, another exile, another fatal miss. With God there can always be another return, a new creation, an old prophecy resurrected. The question for us in a new millennium has to do with our survival and the quality of the future of our children, to whom we will pass the conflicting traditions of both Joel and Isaiah.

6. Conclusion.

The ambiguity of the criteria for discerning true prophecy from false prophecy within the Bible itself honors a biblical pluralism that must be fully embraced. To say this is at once humbling and demanding. It is humbling to know that for every voice in Scripture, for every interpretation of Scripture, there is likely to be its opposite. It is demanding in that biblical pluralism in no way relieves the reader of Scripture from the responsibility of making judgments of and commitments to specific texts as bearing truth claims for a specific historical hour or time, all the while acutely aware of his or her own potential for false prophecy (mistaken application). Indeed, the Bible's plural nature heightens the responsibility of the reader to "rightly divide the word of truth" to the best of his or her ability. But we are not alone.

There may not be objective criteria that will forever assure us of our use and discernment of Scripture, nor criteria that allow us to decide in advance how best to apply biblical texts for every situation. However, interpreting texts within a confessional community does provide a "stable enough" environment that has an objectifying quality to it. Interpreting texts together, as if invited to do so by God (Is 1:18; 43:9, 26; 50:8), allows us to make reasoned judgments about the truth or falsehood for understanding a particular text or its interpretation for our particular time and place. Of course, such a community must allow for individual prophetic voices to be heard (see 1 Cor 14) in order to ward off groupthink, status quo temptations and spiritual atrophy. In the end, the negotiating of true and false prophecy comes down to simple trust in God's Spirit to inspire the purest of motives, God's grace to forgive failed tests of discernment, and God's strength to again risk interpreting aright.

TWELVE, BOOK OF THE

The Book of the Twelve functions as a collection of twelve individual prophetic works and as a single prophetic book. According to the MT, the twelve prophets include *Hosea, *Joel, *Amos, *Obadiah, *Jonah, *Micah, *Nahum, *Habakkuk, *Zephaniah, *Haggai, *Zechariah and *Malachi. The LXX version presents a different order, including Hosea, Amos, Micah, Joel, Obadiah, Jonah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi, although other sequences also were known in antiquity (Ben Zvi 1996a). The scrolls from the Judean wilderness (see Dead Sea Scrolls) generally present the same order as the MT, but one manuscript (4Q76) places Jonah after Malachi (Jones). Each individual work within the Twelve begins with its own superscription or narrative introduction that identifies the prophet and often provides information concerning the historical background of the work, its literary characteristics and its major concerns.

1. Canon, Arrangement, Formation
2. Modern Study
3. The Individual Books

1. Canon, Arrangement, Formation.

The Book of the Twelve is counted as one of the twenty-four books of the Tanak in Judaism and as twelve of the thirty-nine or forty-six books of the OT in Christianity. The book is called têrê 'āsār in Jewish tradition, which is Aramaic for "the twelve (prophets)." Early Christian tradition refers to it as hoi dōdeka prophētai or to dōdekaprophēton, which mean, "the twelve prophets" in Greek. The Latin term prophetæ minores ("the minor prophets") first appears in early patristic sources, such as Augustine's City of God, where it refers only to the relatively small size of the individual prophetic works. The Twelve generally appear as the fourth book of the Latter Prophets in the Tanak (b. B. Bat. 14b), but the Talmud also stipulates that only three lines separate the individual books of the Twelve whereas four lines normally separate biblical books (b. B. Bat. 13b). Christian canons generally place the Twelve before or after Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Daniel in the prophets of the OT. Although Greek versions of the Christian OT tend to reflect the LXX order noted above, the arrangement varies widely among the manuscripts. With the increasing use of the Vulgate, the Roman Catholic and Protestant Churches sometimes adopt the order found in the MT.

Many interpreters argue that the arrangement of the Book of the Twelve is based on chronological principles, but close examination of the sequence of books in each of the two versions indicates that neither one is arranged according to a chronological scheme (Sweeney 2000, xv-xxix). Both sequences do, however, represent concerns with the punishment of Israel and Judah during the monarchic period and with the restoration of Jerusalem and the *temple in the postexilic period. Both versions begin with Hosea, which metaphorically portrays YHWH as a husband who divorces the bride Israel to portray the disruption of their relationship, and both conclude with Malachi, which states that YHWH hates divorce and calls upon the people to hold firm to the *covenant (see Marriage and Divorce). The theme of the *Day of YHWH, a day of punishment for Israel/Judah and the *nations when YHWH's sovereignty is manifested at *Zion, permeates both versions of the Book of the Twelve.

The LXX version presents an initial concern with the punishment of the northern kingdom of Israel, which then provides a model for understanding the experience of Jerusalem/Judah and the nations. Hosea, Amos and Micah each take up the judgment of the northern kingdom as a primary concern, although each also indicates concern with Jerusalem and Judah. Hosea condemns Israel but calls for it to return to YHWH under the rule of a Davidic king. Amos condemns the northern Israelite sanctuary at Bethel and looks forward to the rise of a new Davidic king. Micah compares Israel to Judah and anticipates restoration under a Davidic king after both suffer punishment. Joel then marks a transition within the sequence of books insofar as it focuses on Jerusalem and the threat of attacking nations on the Day of YHWH. Obadiah, Jonah and Nahum follow with specific concerns for YHWH's judgment of the nations. Obadiah relates YHWH's judgment of Edom on the Day of YHWH. Jonah focuses on YHWH's mercy for Nineveh when it repents, and Nahum focuses on YHWH's judgment of Nineveh for its abuse of Israel and defiance of YHWH. Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai and Zechariah then focus on Jerusalem. Habakkuk raises the question of theodicy in asking why YHWH brings the Neo-Babylonian Empire against Judah. Zephaniah calls for a purge of Jerusalem and Judah on the Day of YHWH. Haggai demands that the people rebuild the Jerusalem *temple in order to realize YHWH's worldwide sovereignty and blessing. Zechariah points to the combat that will engulf the world following the reconstruction of the temple as YHWH's sovereignty is ultimately recognized by Israel, Judah and the nations at Zion. The book of Malachi concludes with an exhortation to hold to the covenant in anticipation of the Day of YHWH.

The MT presents a very different sequence in which the books concerned with the fate of the northern kingdom of Israel are interspersed among those concerned primarily with Jerusalem and Judah. The resulting sequence emphasizes the fate of Jerusalem from the outset, particularly since the books concerned with northern Israel also signal an ultimate concern with Israel's reunification with Jerusalem/Judah. The MT begins with Hosea and ends with Malachi, so that it too employs the metaphorical portrayal of marriage to depict the tension in the relationship between YHWH and Israel and the concern to call upon the people to maintain the relationship despite suffering of conquest and *exile that they have endured. Although Hosea addresses the fate of northern Israel, its frequent references to Judah and its concern for reunification of Israel and Judah under a Davidic monarch signal its concern with Jerusalem. The placement of Joel ensures that the questions of Jerusalem and the threat posed by the nations will set the agenda for the rest of the sequence. Amos calls for judgment against northern Israel and its reunification with Judah under the rule of a restored Davidic monarchy. Obadiah calls for the punishment of Edom and its submission to Israel at Zion on the Day of YHWH. Jonah tempers Obadiah's message with the contention that YHWH will show mercy to Nineveh when it repents, but later books indicate YHWH's judgment against Nineveh when it oppresses Israel. Micah presupposes that Assyria and later Babylon will be YHWH's agents of punishment against Israel and Judah prior to their restoration around Jerusalem under the rule of a Davidic monarch. The rest of the sequence is identical to that of the LXX version. Nahum celebrates the downfall of the oppressive Nineveh as an example of YHWH's *justice. Habakkuk reassures readers of YHWH's justice by pointing to YHWH's plans to punish the Chaldeans or Neo-Babylonians for their oppression of Judah. Zephaniah calls for a purge of Jerusalem on the Day of YHWH. Haggai calls for the restoration of the temple and the house of David under Zerubabel. Zechariah outlines the significance of the restoration of the temple, as Israel, Judah, and the nations will ultimately recognize YHWH at the Jerusalem temple. Finally, Malachi calls for its audience to maintain the covenant while waiting for YHWH's manifestation on the Day of YHWH.

The differences in sequence and hermeneutical perspective in the two versions of the Book of the Twelve raise questions concerning the historical formation of each. The LXX form, with its interest in viewing the experience of northern Israel as a model for that of Jerusalem and Judah, appears to reflect the concerns of Judah in the late monarchic, exilic and early postexilic periods, when the nation was attempting to come to grips with the theological significance of the threat posed by Babylon. Such a concern begins in the Josianic reform, when Israel's destruction is understood as YHWH's judgment, which in turn motivates the purification of the temple as a part of a national effort at restoration and rededication to YHWH. With Josiah's death and the realization that Jerusalem and Judah would also suffer at the hands of the Babylonians, the groundwork was laid for the hermeneutical perspective now apparent in the LXX form of the Book of the Twelve. The MT form, with its emphasis on the fate of Jerusalem, appears to reflect the concerns of Judean elements during the Persian period from the time of the rebuilding of the temple through the reforms of Ezra and Nehemiah, who focused on the restoration of Jerusalem as the holy center of Persian-period Judah and the world at large.

Although the two versions of the Book of the Twelve have different sequences that point to differing hermeneutical agendas, both share an *intertextual relationship with the book of Isaiah that points to a very different understanding of the significance of world events for understanding divine purpose (Steck 1991). Like both versions of the Book of the Twelve, Isaiah contends that YHWH brought the nations to punish Israel and Judah for wrongdoing and to reveal YHWH's sovereignty throughout the world. But Isaiah identifies the manifestation of YHWH's sovereignty with the rise of the Persian Empire, particularly the rise of the Persian monarch Cyrus, who is identified as YHWH's messiah and temple builder (Is 44:28; 45:1). It thereby calls upon its audience to accept this state of affairs and to submit to the Persian Empire as the will of YHWH. The Book of the Twelve is very different. Although it too presupposes that YHWH brought the nations to punish Israel and Judah as part of the process by which YHWH's sovereignty is revealed to the world, it calls upon its audience to fight against the nations that oppress Israel/Judah/Jerusalem under the rule of YHWH and the Davidic monarch in order to realize the promised restoration of Jerusalem. Such a scenario is particularly evident when one considers the role of the very famous "swords into plowshares" passage in Isaiah and the Twelve. Isaiah 2:2-4 envisions a scenario of world *peace in which Israel will join the nations in a pilgrimage to Zion to learn YHWH's Torah and to end *war. The Book of the Twelve cites this passage at three points and presents a very different scenario of YHWH's or Israel's warfare against the nations in order to realize this goal. The citation of Isaiah 2:2-4 first appears in Joel 3:10, which calls for the people to beat their plowshares into swords and their pruning hooks into spears to carry out YHWH's judgment against the nations on the Day of YHWH. Micah 4:1-5 cites the passage but states that Israel and the nations will serve their own deities prior to the rise of the Davidic monarch who will subdue the oppressive nations. Zechariah 8:20-23 likewise cites the nations' call to make a pilgrimage to Zion as an introduction to its scenario of YHWH's battle against the nations in Zechariah 9—14 that will result in their recognition of YHWH at the Jerusalem temple. Whereas Isaiah calls for submission to Persia, the Book of the Twelve calls for warfare against the oppressive nations to realize the recognition of YHWH's sovereignty at Zion. Such differences point to debate within the Second Temple period Jewish community, expressed through the writing and redaction of prophetic (and other) literature, concerning its relationship with the Persian Empire.

2. Modern Study.

Modern critical research on the Book of the Twelve begins in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries with the work of H. Ewald (Ewald, 73-81) and C. Steuernagel (Steuernagel, 669-72). Ewald employed the superscriptions of the individual books of the Twelve as a basis for explaining the order in which the books entered the collection. He posited that the Book of the Twelve was formed in a three-stage process that began in the seventh century BCE with Joel, Amos, Hosea, Micah, Nahum and Zephaniah. A second stage in the postexilic period saw the additions of Obadiah, Jonah, Habakkuk, Haggai and Zechariah 1—8. A third stage dated to Nehemiah's later years included Zechariah 9—14 and Malachi. Steuernagel posited a seven-stage process of formation that begin in the seventh-century BCE reign of King Josiah ben Amon of Judah and continued through the third century BCE. Steuernagel's stages included (1) Hosea, Micah, Zephaniah; (2) Amos; (3) Haggai, Zechariah 1—8; (4) Nahum 2—3; (5) Habakkuk, Nahum 1; (6) Zechariah 9—14; (7) Joel, Obadiah and Jonah.

K. Budde's 1922 study was the first major redaction-critical study of the individual books that comprise the Book of the Twelve (see Editorial/Redaction Criticism). Noting the long-recognized principle that the Book of the Twelve was both a single book and a collection of twelve individual compositions, Budde attempted to explain how such a collection would come together. Budde observed the relative lack of narrative material in the Book of the Twelve when compared to the other prophetic books of Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel. He argued that the Twelve Prophets were formed in the fourth-third centuries BCE to provide authoritative prophetic Scripture. The final redactors of the Book of the Twelve deliberately excluded narrative material in an effort to eliminate the so-called human material so that the divine word of the Prophets could be presented together with the Torah.

Budde's work was largely dismissed, but it provided the impetus for a 1935 study by R. E. Wolfe, who also attempted to reconstruct the redactional process that formed the Book of the Twelve Prophets. Wolfe applied a source-critical analysis to the Book of the Twelve in an effort to distinguish the authentic prophetic material from later inauthentic additions. He posited a redactional process that extended from the eighth through the third century BCE in which earlier material is expanded and reworked during the course of the book's composition. Wolfe's work has been largely dismissed because of his subjectivity in reconstructing the redactional formation of the Book of the Twelve.

D. Schneider's 1979 dissertation employs a combination of canon-critical and redaction-critical approaches to posit that the present form of the Book of the Twelve is the product of four-stage compositional process. The first stage is an eighth-century BCE collection of Hosea, Amos and Micah as presented in the LXX. The second includes the seventh-century BCE books of Nahum, Habakkuk and Zephaniah, added during the exile by a Josianic reform party. The third is the late exilic collection of Joel, Obadiah and Jonah. And the fourth is the fifth-century BCE collection of Haggai, Zechariah 1—8, Zechariah 9—14 and Malachi.

Contemporary interest in redaction-critical study of the Book of the Twelve appears among a number of scholars who based their work on the redaction- and tradition-critical methodology of O. H. Steck (Steck 1998; see also Steck 1991), who called for an all-encompassing compositional assessment of a work from its earliest layers to its final glosses. P. Weimer's 1985 redaction-critical study of Obadiah identifies six layers of composition. Lexical features of each of these layers correspond to passages in other individual books of the Twelve that he also considers to be the work of later redaction. The result is a redaction-critical model for the composition of the Book of the Twelve as a whole. E. Bosshard's 1987 study points to lexical and thematic parallels between the Book of the Twelve and Isaiah. He identifies major redactional interest in the Day of YHWH tradition and Edom as a symbol of the nations that will be judged by YHWH as part of an overall scenario in which both Israel/Judah and the nations will be judged prior to the restoration of Jerusalem. Such parallels with Isaiah appear in Joel 2:1-11; Obadiah 5-6, 15-21; Zephaniah 2:13-15; 3:14-18. A 1990 study by Bosshard and R. G. Kratz argues for a three-stage process by which Malachi was added as part of the final redaction of the Book of the Twelve and indeed the Prophets as a whole. E. Bosshard-Nepustil's 1997 monograph attempts a detailed explanation of the intertextual relationship between the Book of the Twelve and Isaiah 1—39 by positing an Assyrian-Babylonian layer that appears in passages from Joel, Habakkuk and Zephaniah, beginning in the eighth century BCE and extending through the fall of Jerusalem in 587 BCE. A subsequent Babylonian layer concerned with the significance of Cyrus appears in passages from Joel, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah and Zechariah from the late-sixth century BCE.

J. D. Nogalski's two-volume 1993 study employs a combination of catchword associations, thematic associations and redaction-critical arguments to propose a five-stage redaction of the Book of the Twelve. An initial collection of Hosea, Amos, Micah and Zephaniah was edited by Deuteronomistic circles in the sixth century BCE to form the first layer. A second collection including Haggai and Zechariah 1–8 appeared in the sixth century BCE. The two collections were combined and edited in stages through the late-fourth century BCE that included Joel, Obadiah, Nahum, Habakkuk and Malachi. B. M. Zapff's 1997 study attempted to relate the redactional formation of Micah to stages posited by Steck, Bosshard-Nepustil and Nogalski. A. Schart's 1998 monograph builds upon the work of these scholars by positing a six-stage process that begins with an initial layer in Hosea, Amos, Micah and Zephaniah that is expanded in subsequent stages by material in Nahum—Habakkuk, Haggai—Zechariah, Joel—Obadiah, and Jonah and Malachi.

Problems have emerged, however, in critical discussion of the work the Steck school. Critiques by E. Ben Zvi (1996a), B. A. Jones and M. A. Sweeney (2000; 2001) point to a variety of factors that undermine such work and demonstrate the need for analysis of each book within the Twelve. Ben Zvi points to the role that titles, superscriptions and introductions to each of the twelve books play in presenting them as discrete works within the larger framework of the Book of Twelve: each of the books is meant to be read as a distinct literary work within the whole. Both Jones and Ben Zvi point to the unstable structure or sequence of the Book of the Twelve within the ancient manuscript tradition, particularly in the scrolls from the Judean wilderness and the many orders evident in the Greek manuscript tradition and patristic canon lists. The variety of orders undermines catchword arguments that presume the order of the MT as normative. Sweeney's 2000 commentary on the Book of the Twelve points to the hermeneutical significance of the differing sequence of books in the MT and LXX (Codices Vaticanus and Sinaiticus) traditions that emphasize either the fate of Jerusalem (MT) or the fate of northern Israel as an exemplar for the fate of Jerusalem (LXX). Sweeney's 2001 study points to individual compositional histories for works included in the Book of the Twelve, such as Hosea, Amos, Micah, Zephaniah, Nahum and Habakkuk. J. Wöhrle's massive 2006–2008 study considers the individual compositional histories of each of the books in the Book of the Twelve. He posits a model that begins with Hosea, Amos, Micah and Zephaniah that is combined with the exilic collection of Haggai and Zechariah, and later with Joel. The final stages of composition see the addition of Obadiah, Jonah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zechariah 9–14 and Malachi.

Collections of studies on the Book of the Twelve appear in edited volumes by J. D. Nogalski and M. A. Sweeney, and by P. L. Redditt and A. Schart. A forthcoming volume based on a 2011 Münster conference, "Perspectives on the Formation of the Book of the Twelve," will be edited by R. Albertz and J. Wöhrle.

The remainder of this article focuses on each of the books that comprise the MT order of the Book of the Twelve.

3. The Individual Books.

3.1. Hosea. The superscription in Hosea 1:1 places Hosea in the reigns of the Israelite monarch Jeroboam ben Joash (786–746 BCE) and the Judean monarchs Uzziah (783–742 BCE), Jotham (742–735 BCE), Ahaz (735–715 BCE) and Hezekiah (715–687 BCE). The reason for the chronological discrepancy between the reigns of the Israelite and Judean kings is not known, although it may be that Hosea was forced to leave Israel for Judah because of his criticism of the dynastic house of Jehu, of which Jeroboam was a member. The period given for Hosea's career was particularly bloody, as four of Israel's last six monarchs were assassinated while Israel veered between a policy of alliance with Assyria and alliance with Aram before finally suffering invasion by the Assyrians. The dynasty of Jehu (842–815 BCE) began in revolt against the house of Omri and shifted Israel's political position from a very troubled alliance with Aram to a far more stable alliance with Assyria that ensured Israel's power and prosperity for the balance of the Jehu dynasty's reign. In the aftermath of Jeroboam's reign, his son Zechariah (746 BCE) was assassinated by Shallum (746 BCE), who sought to break Israel's alliance with Assyria so that it might ally with Aram instead. Shallum in turn was assassinated by Menahem (745– 738 BCE), who returned the nation to its alliance with Assyria. Menahem's son Pekahiah (738-737 BCE) was assassinated by Pekah (738-732 BCE), who broke relations with Assyria once again to ally with Aram. Pekah was killed during the course of the Syro-Ephraimic war, when Assyria invaded Aram and Israel following their attack on Judah in 734-732 BCE. Although Assyria subdued Israel, the country revolted in 724 BCE under the leadership of King Hoshea. The result was the complete destruction of Israel by 722/721 BCE and the deportation of many surviving Israelites.

Based upon Israel's experience of bloodshed and invasion during this period, the book of Hosea addresses the problem of such evil by positing that the nation was suffering punishment because it had abandoned YHWH. By employing his own marriage to Gomer bat Diblaim and the birth of their children as a metaphor for YHWH's relationship with Israel, Hosea draws upon the traditional portrayal of Israel as the bride of YHWH to charge that Gomer/Israel had engaged in harlotry by pursuing other lovers, prompting Hosea/YHWH to punish the wayward bride with divorce. Such a portrayal presupposes Israelite conceptions of pagan Canaanite religious fertility rites and Israel's political relations with Assyria and Egypt. The book does not consider judgment to be the final word, but calls upon its audience to repent and return to YHWH. For Hosea, such a return called for both religious and political action, including a rejection of Canaanite religion and a return to YHWH together with a rejection of Assyria and a return to alliance with Aram, the homeland of the biblical ancestors.

Many interpreters (e.g., H. Wolff 1974; Yee) employ a broadly thematic approach in their assessment of the structure of the book as Hosea 1—3 (narratives concerning Hosea's marriage); Hosea 4—11 (oracles of judgment followed by restoration); Hosea 12—14 (additional oracles of judgment followed by restoration). But close attention to the Hebrew syntax and narrative perspective of the book and the role of *repentance in its presentation indicates a very different structure that is designed to convince its audience to reject alliance with Assyria and to return to YHWH and alliance with Aram (Sweeney 2000). The superscription in Hosea 1:1 introduces the main body of the book in Hosea 1:2—14:8 and the concluding exhortation in Hosea 14:9:

Call for Israel's Return to YHWH (Hos 1:1—14:9)

- I. Superscription (Hos 1:1)
- II. Body of the book: appeal for Israel's return (Hos 1:2—14:8)
 - A. YHWH's instructions to Hosea to marry a harlot and give their children symbolic names (Hos 1:2-11)
 - B. Hosea's speeches to Israel (Hos 2:1—14:8)
 1. Hosea's appeal to his children for their mother's return (Hos 2:1—3:5)
 2. YHWH's basic charges against Israel: abandonment of YHWH (Hos 4:1-19)
 3. Specification of YHWH's charges against Israel (Hos 5:1—13:16)
 4. Appeal for Israel's return to YHWH (Hos 14:1-8)
- III. Concluding exhortation concerning YHWH's righteousness (Hos 14:9)

Following the superscription, the body of the book appears in Hosea 1:2—14:8. The anonymous narrative in Hosea 1:2-11 introduces this section with a portrayal of YHWH's instructions to Hosea to marry a harlot and to have children with her. This narrative establishes the metaphorical portrayal of YHWH as the husband of the wayward wife Israel in order to illustrate Hosea's understanding of the tension in Israel's relationship with YHWH as a cause for the dangers that Israel faces in its relationship with Assyria. By arguing that Gomer/Israel is acting as a harlot, the prophet contends that the threats posed to Israel are punishment for abandoning YHWH, and that Israel must return to YHWH (and an alliance with Aram) in order to ensure its well-being. The names given to each of the children symbolize the tension. The name "Jezreel," the first son, recalls the site where Jehu overthrew the house of Omri and established his own dynasty (see 2 Kings 9—10). Tension with Aram prompted Jehu and his successors to turn to the Assyrians for support, which provided the basis for Israel's power and prosperity during the Jehu dynasty's reign (see 2 Kings 13—14). The name of the daughter, "Lo Ruhamah," means "no mercy," signifying YHWH's lack of mercy for the purportedly recalcitrant bride. Likewise, the name of the second son, “Lo Ammi,” means “not my people,” signifying YHWH’s willingness to break the relationship.

The book turns to Hosea’s own prophetic speeches in Hosea 2:1–14:8. Each subunit begins with an imperative in which the prophet addresses his Israelite audience. The first appears in Hosea 2:1–3:5 with the prophet’s appeal to his children for their mother’s return. Ultimately, the prophet/YHWH envisions a restoration of the relationship when Israel returns to the wilderness to renew the marriage/covenant as in the days of the exodus from Egypt and the wilderness period when Israel was formed as a nation. The Judean setting for the final composition of the book is evident in Hosea 3:5, which holds that return to YHWH entails northern Israel’s return to the house of David.

The second major speech by the prophet appears in Hosea 4:1–19, which lays out YHWH’s charges against Israel. The metaphor of marriage gives way as the prophet presents YHWH’s charges that Israel has abandoned its covenant. Hosea’s statements indicate that the people lack knowledge of YHWH, but the passage also emphasizes a combination of natural images and the legal language of the courtroom to charge that Israel has violated YHWH’s commandments. Such an approach presupposes the blessings and curses of legal codes that promise rain, crops and security in the land if the people observe YHWH’s commands, and drought, famine and exile if they do not (see Deut 28–30; Lev 26).

The third speech cycle appears in Hosea 5:1–13:16, which takes up specific discussion of the general charges made in Hosea 4. Throughout this passage Hosea and YHWH alternate as speakers. The reader must pay close attention to the use of pronouns and other indicators to determine the identity of each. Hosea begins in Hosea 5:1–7 with an address to the priests, the nation and the king to charge Israel with harlotry or abandonment of YHWH throughout its history. A lengthy speech by YHWH in Hosea 5:8–7:16 emphasizes YHWH’s reluctance to accept the people because of their alliances with Egypt and Assyria (Hos 5:13–14; 7:11–12). Hosea 8:1–14 focuses especially on the establishment of illegitimate kings and the golden calves in Samaria as symbols of Israel’s rebellion and return to Egypt. Hosea 9:1–13:16 presents an overview of YHWH’s relationship with Israel throughout history. YHWH’s voice frequently cites episodes of Israel’s apostasy to provide background and justification for the current threat. YHWH envisions no end to the relationship and anticipates Israel’s repentance. The other motif that holds this section together is the fertility and natural growth of creation, which asserts that YHWH, not Baal, is the creator deity.

Hosea 14:1–8 concludes the prophet’s speech to Israel in Hosea 2:1–14:8 with an appeal for Israel’s return. This constitutes the rhetorical goal of the book and demonstrates that the prophet’s images of judgment are intended to prompt a return by the book’s audience rather than to announce irrevocable judgment.

The concluding verse of the book, Hosea 14:9, calls upon readers to recognize YHWH’s righteousness.

3.2. Joel. The book of Joel emphasizes the central importance of threats to Jerusalem and its deliverance from the nations on the Day of YHWH. Joel is notoriously difficult to date, since the superscription in Joel 1:1 simply notes Joel ben Pethuel without reference to historical setting. The extensive references to other biblical literature—for example, Exodus 10:1–20, 21–29 (Joel 1–2); Isaiah 13:6 (Joel 1:15); Ezekiel 30:2–3 (Joel 1:15); Amos 1:2; 9:13 (Joel 3:16, 18); Obadiah; Micah 4:1–4 // Isaiah 2:2–4 (Joel 3:10); Zephaniah 1:14–15 (Joel 2:1–2); 2 Chronicles 20:20–26 (Joel 2:28–3:21)—indicate that the book must date to a relatively late period, in the fifth or fourth century BCE (H. Wolff 1977; Crenshaw).

Joel often is perceived to be a protoapocalyptic book. Its portrayal of the portents in heaven and earth on the Day of YHWH—the darkened sun and stars, the moon turned to blood, the pouring out of the divine “spirit” (rûah [lit., “wind”]) on all flesh prior to judgment against the nations—suggests an apocalyptic scenario of cosmic disruption. Familiarity with the climate of the land of Israel indicates that this is no cosmic upheaval but rather a description of the very real effects of the so-called east wind or sirocco (Heb “Sharav”; Arab “Khamsin”), a phenomenon like the Santa Ana winds of the American southwest that typically appears in Israel at the transitions between the dry and wet seasons.

The Sharav blows so much dust and dirt that it obscures the sun during the day and gives the moon a reddish cast at night. It threatens crops and people, and therefore it frequently serves as a natural agent of divine action in the HB (e.g., at the Red Sea in Exod 14–15). Insofar as Joel portrays the threat posed by hostile nations to Jerusalem as a locust plague that is defeated by the east wind, the book serves as an enduring assurance of YHWH's pledge of protection for Jerusalem.

Many scholars argue that the original material in Joel 1–2 was expanded by later authors in Joel 3–4 MT, but such claims are based on the purported apocalyptic character of the later chapters. Indeed, the book displays a coherent literary pattern of YHWH's response to national *lamentation at a time of threat. Joel's use of liturgical forms marks him as a figure who stands within priestly circles (see Liturgy and Cult). The structure of the book may be portrayed as follows:

YHWH's Response to Judah's Appeals for Relief from Threat (Joel 1:1–3:21)

- I. Superscription (Joel 1:1)
- II. Body of the book: YHWH's response to Judah's appeal (Joel 1:2–3:21)
 - A. Prophet's call to communal complaint concerning the threat of the locust plague (Joel 1:2–20)
 - B. Prophet's call to communal complaint concerning the threat of invasion (Joel 2:1–14)
 - C. Prophet's announcement of YHWH's response to protect people from the threat (Joel 2:15–3:21)

Following the superscription in Joel 1:1, the body of the book in Joel 1:2–3:21 is organized to present YHWH's response and reassurance of protection to Judah's complaint concerning the threat posed by the nations, here portrayed as locusts that threaten both crop and city. The initial call for communal complaint by the prophet in Joel 1:2–20 presupposes the typical form and setting of the psalms of complaint or lamentation (e.g., Ps 7), which appeal to YHWH for deliverance at a time of threat. It draws heavily on the Exodus tradition of the locust plague (Ex 10:1–20) to portray the threat against Jerusalem. Such portrayals are typical of the Day of YHWH tradition, which presupposes YHWH's role as creator and depicts in natural or cosmic terms (see, e.g., Is 2; 13; 34; Obadiah; Zeph 1).

The prophet's discourse then shifts to the imagery of military invasion with a second call for communal complaint in Joel 2:1–14. Such a shift effectively demonstrates the correlation between the natural and human worlds so frequently articulated in biblical tradition. The prophet announces YHWH's deliverance in Joel 2:15–3:21. YHWH's response culminates in warfare in the Valley of Jehoshaphat against the nations that threaten Jerusalem. The tradition reverses Isaiah's and Micah's calls to turn swords into plowshares (Is 2:2–4; Mic 4:1–5) and recalls Jehoshaphat's victory over the Ammonites and Moabites who threatened Jerusalem in the Valley of Baracah/Blessing (2 Chron 20:20–26). Altogether, Joel upholds the tradition of YHWH's role as the creator who defends Zion from evil.

3.3. Amos. The superscription of Amos indicates that it is set against the background of the rise of the Israelite state under the rule of Jeroboam ben Joash (786–746 BCE) and his Judean vassal, Uzziah ben Amaziah (783–742 BCE). Although northern Israel was powerful during this period, the prophet Amos points to problems in the kingdom that in his estimation will bring about disaster for the state. Amos does not mention the rising power of the Assyrian Empire, although his oracles are set in the period immediately prior to the time of Assyria's westward expansion beginning in 745 BCE. Rather, the reasons for his condemnation of Israel appear to lie in his Judean identity. Amos was a shepherd and tender of sycamore trees who lived in the Judean town of Tekoa, located south of Jerusalem in the Judean wilderness overlooking the Dead Sea. As a vassal of Israel, Judah was compelled to pay a heavy tribute. Such tribute fell upon the Judean population at large, and Amos appears to have traveled to Bethel, the royal sanctuary of the northern kingdom of Israel, in order to pay a portion of Judah's tribute. Amos points repeatedly to the poverty of his people, who have suffered disasters and yet still have to pay tribute to the north. But Israel was an Assyrian ally during this period and would have been forced to pay tribute to Assyria.

The book of Amos is organized rhetorically to present an argument for the overthrow of the sanctuary at Bethel and an exhortation to seek YHWH. Following the superscription in Amos 1:1 and the associated motto in Amos 1:2, which emphasizes YHWH's association with Zion or Jerusalem, the book begins broadly with a focus on judgment against the nations that surround Israel, and then it narrows its focus to Israel and finally to Bethel, before concluding with a call for the restoration of Davidic rule over all Israel. Although the prophet's oracles emphasize judgment against the northern kingdom, they include calls to seek YHWH (Amos 5:4, 6) to indicate the prophet's ultimate intentions. The structure of the book may be outlined as follows:

Exhortation to Seek YHWH (Amos 1:1—9:15)

- I. Introduction (Amos 1:1-2)
 - A. Superscription (Amos 1:1)
 - B. Motto: YHWH roars from Zion (Amos 1:2)
- II. Exhortation proper (Amos 1:3—9:15)
 - A. Oracles against the nations (culminating in northern Israel) (Amos 1:3—2:16)
 1. Damascus/Aram (Amos 1:3-5)
 2. Gaza/Philistia (Amos 1:6-8)
 3. Tyre/Phoenicia (Amos 1:9-10)
 4. Edom (Amos 1:11-12)
 5. Ammon (Amos 1:13-15)
 6. Moab (Amos 2:1-3)
 7. Judah (Amos 2:4-5)
 8. Israel (Amos 2:6-16)
 - B. Indictment of northern Israel (Amos 3:1—4:13)
 - C. Call for repentance of northern Israel (Amos 5:1—6:14)
 - D. Amos's vision reports: call for destruction of Bethel and rise of the house of David (Amos 7:1—9:15)

The introduction for the book in Amos 1:1-2 identifies Amos as a shepherd from the Judean town of Tekoa and notes that his work is placed two years prior to a major earthquake. The motto indicates the prophet's Judean identity, a foundational issue throughout the book, by stating that YHWH roars from Zion/Jerusalem.

The initial oracles against the nations begin the prophet's discourse with a very broad perspective. Although many claim that they represent YHWH's or Amos's universal moral perspective, the nations listed are all Israel's neighbors, and all the events noted stem from their interrelationships with Israel during the ninth century BCE. During that period Aram successfully attacked its ally Israel, and the various nations listed actively supported the move or failed to come to Israel's aid. The rhetorical strategy of the prophet in his indictment of each nation is clear: he condemns each one for its past transgressions against Israel and YHWH and thereby wins over his Israelite audience. Amos then begins to focus on his true target and concludes the sequence with a lengthy diatribe against Israel that highlights its abuses against the poor, in this case, the people of Judah (see Wealth and Poverty).

The second segment of the discourse, Amos 3:1—4:13, focuses specifically on the prophet's charges against the northern kingdom of Israel. He points to signs of coming judgment to claim that YHWH is bringing judgment against the nation as in the past (e.g., Sodom and Gomorrah). The third segment of the discourse, Amos 5:1—6:14, continues to emphasize charges against Israel but couples them with calls for the people to seek YHWH and to reject Bethel and the other northern temples. Overall, Amos envisions the Day of YHWH as a day of YHWH's judgment against Israel (Amos 5:18-20).

The final segment of Amos's discourse appears in his vision reports in Amos 7:1—9:15. The prophet relates the experiences that prompted him to speak his message at the Bethel sanctuary. It is striking that in each case Amos cites an image or an event that would represent a common experience of the ancient Israelite/Judean farmer, but he sees in each an expression of the will of YHWH. He notes the plague of locusts (Amos 7:1-3), a common and recurring threat to ancient (and modern) farmers, that eat the crop and leave little behind after the king's portion of the harvest has been taken. He notes the fires that dry up the deep (Amos 7:4-6), a common occurrence at the end of Israel's dry, summer season. In both cases, he sees them as communications from YHWH and successfully appeals to YHWH to show mercy. The third vision, YHWH holding a plumb line (Amos 7:7-9), again employs a common image of a weighted line used to measure the straightness of a wall. This weighted line was an essential tool in a culture in which house walls were built by hand from stone foundations and mud brick, for an error would quickly result in the collapse of the typical Israelite two-story house. Here it serves as a metaphor for measuring Israel's moral straightness. A brief editorial narrative in Amos 7:10-17 informs the reader of the circumstances of Amos's speech at the Bethel temple, and how he is expelled from Israel for his charges against temple and monarch. The fourth vision, in Amos 8:1-14, employs a pun on Amos's presentation of a basket of summer fruit (qayis) at the Bethel sanctuary, which YHWH states represents the end (qēs) of Israel. The final image in Amos 9:1-10 of YHWH calling for the destruction of the Bethel capitals draws upon the imagery of a temple altar in operation, with the carcasses of sacrificial animals, the knives, the blood, the fire and the smoke, all of which evoke images of destruction. For Amos, such images call for the destruction of the sanctuary itself.

Amos concludes his vision sequence with a call in Amos 9:11-15 for the fallen booth of David. Although many see this as a postexilic addition, it expresses the prophet's Judean viewpoint and hopes for a restoration of Davidic/Judean rule over the north as it was in the days of Solomon (Paul; Sweeney 2000).

3.4. Obadiah. The superscription in Obadiah 1a identifies the book as "the vision of Obadiah." Traditional interpreters identify Obadiah with the ninth-century BCE Israelite official who assisted Elijah (1 Kings 18), but there is no evidence that the present work is to be identified with that official. The dependence of Obadiah 1-7 on Jeremiah 49:7-22 and the explicit references to the exiles of Israel and Jerusalem in Obadiah 19-21 indicate a late exilic or early postexilic dating for the book (Ben Zvi 1996b, 99-109; H. Wolff 1986, 37-42). The body of the book, Obadiah 1b-21, presents an oracular condemnation of Edom for its treachery against Jerusalem. The oracle begins with a prophetic messenger formula in Obadiah 1b¹⁻⁵, which introduces the prophet's call to punish Edom in Obadiah 1b⁶⁻¹²⁻⁷ and the announcement of punishment against Edom in Obadiah 8-21. The structure of the book appears as follows:

- I. Superscription (Obad 1a)
- II. Oracle concerning the condemnation of Edom (Obad 1b-21)
 - A. Prophetic messenger formula (Obad 1b¹⁻⁵)
 - B. Oracle proper (Obad 1b⁶⁻¹²⁻²¹)
 1. Call to punish Edom (Obad 1b⁶⁻¹²⁻⁷)
 2. Announcement of punishment against Edom (Obad 8-21)

3.5. Jonah. The portrayal of the prophet Jonah draws on 2 Kings 14:25, which presents Jonah ben Amittai as an eighth-century BCE prophet who foresees the greatness of Jeroboam ben Joash's (786-746 BCE) restored kingdom of Israel. There is, nevertheless, no evidence that the book of Jonah presents a historical account of the prophet's life. The narrative makes extensive use of irony, parody and exaggeration—for example, a prophet of YHWH attempts to flee from YHWH; the pagan characters of the narrative acknowledge YHWH; a great fish swallows Jonah, who remains in the fish for three days; YHWH saves Nineveh, which ultimately destroys the northern kingdom of Israel. The book is designed to examine the matter of YHWH's justice and mercy.

Many interpreters maintain that the book poses a conflict between the universalism of YHWH and the particularism of the Jewish community, but such a construction of the issue arises largely from a misreading of the book informed by anti-Jewish stereotypes. Jonah is not a selfish and petulant figure who questions why YHWH's mercy should be shown to Gentiles; rather, he is a prophet who has foreseen the greatness of Jeroboam II, and presumably he also has foreseen that Nineveh, the capital of the Assyrian Empire, will ultimately destroy his own nation in 722/721 BCE, only a few years after Jeroboam's reign. Why should YHWH show mercy to a nation that ultimately will serve such a destructive purpose? Such a question raises the question of YHWH's righteousness and fidelity to the covenant with Israel. Ultimately, the book argues that YHWH responds to repentance with mercy, which has important implications for the exilic or postexilic Judean audience of the book. Repentance brings YHWH's mercy and the possibility of restoration.

The book includes two distinct and yet parallel parts that emphasize the contrast between

Announcement of Judgment Against Edom (Obad 1-21)

Jonah's attempt to flee his initial commission to condemn Nineveh (Jon 1—2) and his frustration over YHWH's mercy when Nineveh repented (Jon 3—4). The structure of the narrative appears as follows:

YHWH's Mercy Toward a Repentant Nineveh (Jon 1:1—4:11)

- I. Jonah's attempt to flee from YHWH (Jon 1:1—2:1)
 - A. Jonah's attempt to flee YHWH's initial commission (Jon 1:1-3)
 - B. Jonah's encounter with the sailors during the storm (Jon 1:4-16)
 - C. Jonah's prayer to YHWH from the belly of the fish (Jon 2:1-10)
- II. Encounter between YHWH and Jonah concerning YHWH's mercy toward a repentant Nineveh (Jon 3:1—4:11)
 - A. YHWH's renewed commission to Jonah and its outcome (Jon 3:1-10)
 - B. YHWH's assertion of the right to mercy in encounter with Jonah (Jon 4:1-11)

The two parallel episodes highlight the contrast (and comparisons) between YHWH's two commissions to Jonah. In each half, YHWH commissions Jonah to condemn Nineveh, but something entirely unexpected happens: Jonah, the prophet of YHWH, attempts to flee from the sovereign of the universe (Jon 1—2), and YHWH reverses judgment and grants mercy to Nineveh (Jon 3—4).

The first half of the book, Jonah 1—2, prepares the reader for the primary examination of issues in Jonah 3—4. Jonah 1—2 includes three basic episodes, each of which begins with action by YHWH that serves as the basis for action by the other major protagonists of the narrative. Jonah 1:1-3 presents YHWH's initial commission to Jonah and his unexpected attempt to flee. The absurdity of the situation is highlighted by the portrayal of Jonah's experiences on board ship in Jonah 1:4-16. YHWH brings a storm that threatens to sink the ship. While Jonah sleeps soundly in the hold, the pagan sailors call upon Jonah to pray to YHWH and offer to sacrifice themselves in a futile attempt to stop the storm. They finally and reluctantly accede to Jonah's advice that they throw him into the sea. In Jonah 2:1-11 Jonah finally acknowledges YHWH and prays for mercy, until YHWH prompts the fish to vomit him out onto dry land.

The second half of the book, Jonah 3—4, focuses on the primary questions of YHWH's righteousness and fidelity in relation to the questions of judgment and mercy. In Jonah 3 YHWH commissions Jonah once again to announce judgment against Nineveh. The prophet obeys, and the unexpected happens when Nineveh actually listens and repents. Even the animals of the city repent. Jonah 4 presents Jonah's indignation at YHWH's mercy toward Nineveh and the key examination of the issues posed in the book. Jonah cites the merciful aspects of the formulaic characterization of YHWH from Exodus 34:6-7 and, exasperated at having the message of judgment reversed, demands that YHWH take his life. But such a reversal highlights the purpose of the prophetic judgment speech: it is designed not to serve as irreversible judgment but rather to convince people to change. To illustrate the principle of pity or mercy, YHWH provides a castor bean plant to give Jonah shade and comfort and then sends a worm to destroy it. Despite his sorrow at the loss of the plant, Jonah still contends that he would rather die than give up his anger at YHWH. At this point, YHWH concludes the book by asking Jonah (and the audience of the book) if YHWH should not pity Nineveh, with its one hundred twenty thousand people and many animals, just as Jonah had pitied the plant. The answer to YHWH's rhetorical question is, of course, yes. Such an answer is particularly important to the postexilic Jewish community, which viewed the Babylonian exile as an expression of divine judgment, and the restoration as an expression of divine mercy that resulted from community repentance. Such a portrayal is designed to call for the people to repent and rebuild as exilic and postexilic Judah sought restoration.

3.6. Micah. The superscription attributes the book to Micah the Morashtite, who lived in the days of the Judean kings Jotham (742-735 BCE), Ahaz (735-715 BCE) and Hezekiah (715-687 BCE). Micah's hometown is identified with Moresheth-Gath, a town on the southwestern border of Judah and Philistia, near the Philistine city of Gath. This location is where the Assyrian king Sennacherib concentrated his attack against Judah at the time of Hezekiah's revolt in 701 BCE. It enables readers to understand that Micah was a war refugee who had to flee his home for Jerusalem as the Assyrians advanced. Such a portrayal informs his images of suffering on the part of the people and his anger at the monarchies of Israel and Judah for bringing disaster upon the heads of the people.

Micah appears to have a very different perspective than that of his contemporary Isaiah ben Amoz. Both include nearly identical versions of a famous oracle (Is 2:2-4; Mic 4:1-5) that calls for nations to come to Zion to learn YHWH's Torah and turn their swords into plowshares to bring about world peace, but each book has a very different perspective as to how such an idyllic scenario is to be brought about. Isaiah maintains that YHWH will judge the entire world (Is 2:6-21) and invites Jacob/Israel to join the pilgrimage of the nations to Zion to submit to YHWH (Is 2:5). Ultimately, the book of Isaiah calls for Israel/Judah to submit to punishment by Assyria and Babylon and finally to the rule of Persian monarch Cyrus, who is identified as YHWH's messiah (Is 44:28; 45:1). Whereas Isaiah calls for submission to the rule of the nations, most notably Persia, as the will of YHWH, Micah calls for the overthrow of the oppressive nations and restoration of a righteous Davidic monarch. The reference to the Babylonian exile in Micah 4:10 and the intertextual references to Isaiah 2:2-4; 14:24-27; 2:6-21 in Micah 4:1-5; 5:4, 9-14 indicate that Micah's oracles were edited during the early Second Temple period, when the question of Judah's relationship with the Persian Empire was in question.

Many interpreters follow a diachronic composition-historical model for the structure of the book that posits that Micah's authentic oracles appear in Micah 1—3, and collections of later materials appear in Micah 4—5; 6—7. Close attention to the linguistic structure of the final, synchronic form of the book indicates that Micah's oracles were edited to raise the question of Jerusalem's (or Israel's) future in the aftermath of the Babylonian exile. It begins in typical fashion with the superscription in Micah 1:1, and the balance of the book, Micah 1:2—7:20, is formulated as a prophetic announcement concerning YHWH's future exaltation of Jerusalem at the center of the nations. Micah 1:2-16 begins with a portrayal of YHWH's punishment of Samaria as a paradigm for that of Jerusalem. Micah 2:1—5:14 provides a detailed overview of the process of punishment and restoration for Jerusalem. Micah 6:1-16 appeals to the people of Israel/Judah to return to YHWH as a prelude for this process, and Micah 7:1-20 expresses the prophet's trust that YHWH will act to bring the restoration about once the punishment is complete. The structure may be portrayed as follows:

Announcement of YHWH's Future Exaltation of Jerusalem at the Center of the Nations (Mic 1:1—7:20)

- I. Superscription (Mic 1:1)
- II. Announcement of YHWH's exaltation of Jerusalem proper (Mic 1:2—7:20)
 - A. YHWH's punishment of Samaria as paradigm for Jerusalem (Mic 1:2-16)
 - B. Process of punishment and restoration for Jerusalem: Babylonian exile, new Davidic monarch to punish oppressive nations (Mic 2:1—5:14)
 1. Concerning the process of punishment (Mic 2:1-13)
 2. Concerning YHWH's plans to punish and exalt Jerusalem (Mic 3:1—5:14)
 - C. Appeal to Israel/Judah for return to YHWH (Mic 6:1-16)
 - D. Liturgical psalm of confidence in YHWH (Mic 7:1-20)

Following the superscription in Micah 1:1, the body of the book is organized to convince the reader that YHWH will act to exalt Jerusalem at the center of the nations after having brought punishment for the erroneous decisions of the kings of Israel and Judah. Micah 1:2-16 begins the sequence with a trial scenario in which the prophet accuses Samaria and Jerusalem of transgression that brought the Assyrians as conquerors against both nations.

The second major component of the book appears in Micah 2:1—5:14, which presents the exile of the northern kingdom as the model and impetus for that of the south in the later Babylonian period. The initial subunit is a woe speech in Micah 2:1-13 that accuses the leadership of Israel with lack of concern for the people, who must flee for their lives while the leaders act as if they were drunk. The prophet then turns to the future of Jerusalem in Micah 3:1—5:14. He begins in Micah 3:1-8 with accusations of injustice and disregard for the welfare of the people in general, and then he turns specifically to Jerusalem in Micah 3:9-5:14. The claim in Micah 3:9-12 that Jerusalem and Zion will be destroyed indicates that, unlike the urbane Isaiah, the rural Micah had no stake in the claims of Davidic or Zion theology that YHWH would protect Jerusalem forever. Micah 4—5 begins with the portrayal of world peace as the nations stream to Zion, but it shifts to the process by which that ideal is achieved when it focuses on the nations that oppressed Israel until YHWH would redeem them in Babylon (Mic 4:10) together with the rise of the Davidic monarch who would defeat the nations and restore the *remnant of Jacob in the midst of the nations.

Micah 6:1-16 appeals to the people for righteous action or observance of YHWH's justice and demands that they not act like the notorious king Ahab ben Omri of Israel (cf. 1 Kings 17-22).

Micah 7:1-20 concludes the book with a liturgical expression of confidence that YHWH will act to realize the plans laid out in the book.

3.7. Nahum. The book of Nahum celebrates the downfall of Nineveh, capital of the Assyrian Empire, which had destroyed northern Israel in 722/721 BCE and oppressed Judah for about a century. The superscription of the book identifies it simply as "the oracle concerning Nineveh" and "the vision of Nahum the Elkoshite." Nineveh fell to a combined force of Babylonians and Medes in 612 BCE, two years after the fall of Assur in 614 BCE and three years prior to the final defeat of the Assyrian army at Haran in 609 BCE. The book refers to the fall of Thebes ("No-Amon" [Nah 3:8-10]) to the Assyrians in 663 BCE. Although some scholars attempt to date the book to this period, it appears to represent a precursor for Nineveh's destruction. Nahum 3:8-10 portrays Nineveh as a city surrounded by the waters of the Nile. The Nile did run through the Egyptian city of Thebes, but the portrayal more closely resembles Nineveh, which was protected by moats formed by the Khusur canal that ran through the city. Control of the water in the moats was a decisive factor in the Babylonian/Median conquest of the city.

The portrayal of Nineveh's conquest is a key factor in the rhetorical strategy of the book, which is designed to convince its audience that YHWH is indeed the powerful and just sovereign of all creation who punishes Nineveh for its abusive treatment of other nations. Following the superscription in Nahum 1:1, the body of the book appears as a prophetic maššā' ("oracle") in which the prophet attempts to convince his audience to abandon their doubts about YHWH's justice and power to recognize YHWH as the cause of Nineveh's destruction. The prophet employs a form of the disputation speech to challenge the contention of a Judean audience that Assyria's domination of the world showed that YHWH lacks power or righteousness. The prophet attempts to refute the notion that YHWH is powerless by pointing to the fall of Nineveh as an act of YHWH (Sweeney 2000, 419-47). The argument proceeds with an initial masculine-plural address to Judah and Assyria in Nahum 1:2-10 that challenges their low estimation of YHWH's power with a partial acrostic poem in Nahum 1:2-8 and a rhetorical question: "How do you reckon/consider YHWH?" (i.e., "What do you think about YHWH?"). Nahum 1:11—2:1 follows with a feminine-singular address to Judah asserting that the fall of Nineveh and the end of its oppression are an act of YHWH. A key statement is Nahum 1:11, which, read correctly, says, "From you has gone forth wrong thinking about YHWH, worthless counsel." Nahum 2:2—3:19 then concludes the book with a second masculine-singular address to Nineveh and the Assyrian king that again asserts YHWH as the true cause of Nineveh's destruction. The structure of the book appears as follows:

Argument that YHWH is the True Power of the World (Nah 1:1—3:19)

- I. Superscription (Nah 1:1)
- II. Oracle proper: refutation of contention that YHWH is powerless (Nah 1:2—3:19)
 - A. Address to Judah and Assyria challenging their low estimation of YHWH (Nah 1:2-10)
 - B. Address to Judah asserting that the end of Assyrian oppression is an act of YHWH (Nah 1:11—2:1)
 - C. Address to Nineveh and the Assyrian king asserting that the fall of Nineveh is an act of YHWH (Nah 2:2—3:19)

3.8. Habakkuk. The book of Habakkuk raises questions concerning YHWH's role in raising the Neo-Babylonian Empire as a threat against Jerusalem and Judah. The two superscriptions for the book (Hab 1:1; 3:1) identify each portion of the book with Habakkuk the prophet. Nevertheless, the portrayal in Habakkuk 1:6 of the rise of the Chaldeans (i.e., the Neo-Babylonian dynasty founded in 625 BCE by Nabopolassar) provides an indication of the historical context. When Nabopolassar's son Nebuchadnezzar defeated Egypt in 605 BCE and took control of Judah, many in Judah saw the Babylonians as foreign oppressors rather than former allies from the days of King Josiah. Habakkuk raises the question as to why YHWH would bring an oppressor against Judah. Although many interpreters argue that Habakkuk's portrayal of the wicked must initially refer to Judeans, the usage of the term throughout the book indicates that it refers to the Babylonians as "the wicked who swallow the righteous" (Hab 1:13; cf. Hab 1:12-17). The portrayal of the Babylonian king as the wicked oppressor who will be destroyed by YHWH (Hab 2:5-20) is opposed to the depiction in Habakkuk 2:4 of "the righteous who shall live by their faith [in YHWH]."

The two-part structure of the book is indicated by the superscriptions in Habakkuk 1:1; 3:1. Habakkuk 1:1—2:20 is a prophetic mašša' ("oracle") that presents a dialogue between Habakkuk and YHWH concerning YHWH's righteousness. Habakkuk laments to YHWH over the oppression of the righteous by the wicked in Habakkuk 1:2-4; YHWH claims to have brought the Chaldeans in Habakkuk 1:5-11; Habakkuk demands to know how YHWH can tolerate such wickedness in Habakkuk 1:12-17; and Habakkuk 2:1-20 portrays YHWH's assurances that the wicked oppressor ultimately will fall. The prayer of Habakkuk in Habakkuk 3:1-19 draws on the imagery of theophany to assert that YHWH will respond to Habakkuk's complaint by destroying the oppressor. The structure of the book appears as follows:

Oracle and Prayer Concerning YHWH's Righteousness (Hab 1:1—3:19)

- I. Habakkuk's oracle: dialogue concerning YHWH's righteousness (Hab 1:1—2:20)
 - A. Superscription (Hab 1:1)
 - B. Oracle proper (Hab 1:2—2:20)
 1. Habakkuk's initial complaint to YHWH concerning oppression of righteous by wicked (Hab 1:2-4)
 2. YHWH's response: YHWH brought the Chaldeans (Hab 1:5-11)
 3. Habakkuk's second complaint: why tolerate evil? (Hab 1:12-17)
 4. Report of YHWH's response: oppressor will fall (Hab 2:1-20)

- II. Prayer of Habakkuk: petition for YHWH to act (Hab 3:1-19)
 - A. Superscription (Hab 3:1)
 - B. Prayer proper: YHWH will act (Hab 3:2-19a)
 - C. Instructions for the choirmaster (Hab 3:19b)

3.9. Zephaniah. The superscription for the book of Zephaniah (Zeph 1:1) places it in the reign of King Josiah of Judah (640-609 BCE), who promoted a program of religious reform and national restoration for Judah as the Assyrian Empire declined. Many interpreters argue that Zephaniah has been heavily redacted in the postexilic period to produce a supposed typical three-part structure of the book—punishment against Jerusalem/Israel (Zeph 1:2—2:3); punishment against the nations (Zeph 2:4—3:8); eschatological *salvation for Jerusalem/Israel and the nations (Zeph 3:9-20)—that emphasizes eschatological judgment and salvation of the entire world. But close examination of the literary features of the book indicates that, after the superscription, the body of the book exhibits a two-part structure that reflects the rhetorical effort to convince the people to support Josiah's reform. Zephaniah 1:2-18 announces the coming Day of YHWH (cf. Is 2; 13; 34) as a day of punishment and *sacrifice for those who would adhere to foreign gods. Zephaniah 2:1-3:20 presents an exhortation to seek YHWH—that is, to support Josiah's reform. It is based upon the exhortation in Zephaniah 2:1-3 and the prophet's explanatory address in Zephaniah 2:4-3:20. Zephaniah 2:4 points to the destruction of the Philistine cities as the basic evidence of YHWH's actions, and Zephaniah 2:5-15 and Zephaniah 3:1-20 respectively point to YHWH's actions against selected nations and the projected restoration of Jerusalem as further reason to support the reform. The structure appears as follows:

Exhortation to Seek YHWH (Zeph 1:1—3:20)

- I. Superscription (Zeph 1:1)
- II. Body of the book: exhortation to seek YHWH (Zeph 1:2—3:20)
 - A. Announcement of the Day of YHWH against Baal worshipers (Zeph 1:2-18)
 - B. Exhortation to seek YHWH (Zeph 2:1—3:20)

1. Exhortation proper (Zeph 2:1-3)
2. Substantiation: YHWH's actions (Zeph 2:4—3:20)
 - a. Basis for exhortation: destruction of Philistine cities (Zeph 2:4)
 - b. Punishment of nations (Zeph 2:5-15)
 - c. Restoration of Jerusalem (Zeph 3:1-20)

3.10. Haggai. The book of Haggai is set in the second year of the reign of King Darius of Persia (520 BCE) and appears as the prophet's call for the people of Jerusalem to support efforts to rebuild the Jerusalem temple (cf. Ezra 3; 6). Haggai is mentioned together with Zechariah in Ezra 5:1; 6:14 as a prophet who called for the building of the temple at the time that Zerubbabel ben Shealtiel, the grandson of King Jehoiachin of Judah, and Joshua ben Jehozadak, the high priest, returned to Jerusalem to commence the reconstruction efforts. During this period, the Persian Empire was wracked by internal conflict as several major figures fought to gain control of the empire following the death of Cambyses, the son of Cyrus, in 522 BCE. Darius, the son-in-law of Cyrus, ultimately won control of the empire.

The book of Haggai presents a series of oracles, dated to the year 520 BCE, in which the prophet lays out his calls for the rebuilding of the temple and the designation of Zerubbabel as YHWH's regent. Haggai 1:1-15a begins with a narrative concerning the people's compliance with the prophet's first oracle, which calls upon the people to rebuild the temple so that YHWH will provide rain and good harvest. Haggai 1:15b—2:9 presents the prophet's second oracle, concerning the future glory of the new temple, to which the nations will bring gifts to acknowledge YHWH's sovereignty. Haggai 2:10-23 presents two oracles that respectively call upon the people to complete the temple to ensure community purity and announce Zerubbabel as YHWH's signet ring, a metaphor for regent, who will ensure the overthrow of the nations that subjugate Judah. The structure of the book appears as follows:

Oracles About Rebuilding the Temple and Recognition of Zerubbabel as YHWH's Regent (Hag 1:1—2:23)

- I. Narrative concerning compliance with YHWH's instruction to build the temple (Hag 1:1-15a)
- II. Narrative concerning future glory of the Jerusalem temple (Hag 1:15b—2:9)
- III. Narrative concerning purity of land and establishment of Zerubbabel as YHWH's regent (Hag 2:10-23)

3.11. Zechariah. Zechariah presents an account of the visions and the oracles of the prophet Zechariah concerning the significance of the temple's restoration. The book is set in the second and fourth years of the reign of the Persian monarch Darius, 520 and 518 BCE (see Zech 1:1, 7; 7:1). When Darius, the son-in-law of Cyrus, came to the throne following the unexpected death of his brother-in-law Cambyses, Persia was plunged into civil war as several figures attempted to seize control of the empire. Darius had authorized Zerubbabel ben Shealtiel, the grandson of King Jehoiachin of Judah, and the priest Joshua ben Jehozadak to return to Jerusalem in 522 BCE to begin construction of the second temple. The narrative setting of the book therefore coincides roughly with the years of the building of the temple in 520-515 BCE.

Most modern interpreters argue that Zechariah is a composite book like Isaiah insofar as Zechariah 1—8 appears to represent the visions of the prophet Zechariah, whereas Zechariah 9—14 represents a later apocalyptic scenario. Many also argue that Zechariah 9—11 and Zechariah 12—14 are separate compositions that should be designated as Second Zechariah and Third Zechariah. Both of these blocks are designated as a prophetic maššā' ("oracle") in Zechariah 9:1; 12:1. Although past interpreters have dated Zechariah 9—14 to the Hellenistic period, many scholars recognize that those chapters may well date to the Persian period (e.g., Petersen 1995).

A synchronic literary reading of Zechariah shows the literary coherence of the book, particularly when the structural role of the date formulae in Zechariah 1:1, 7; 7:1 are taken into consideration. Whereas the conventional two-part structure of Zechariah 1—8; 9—14 or three-part structure of Zechariah 1—8; 9—11; 12—14 is based on diachronic or historical consideration of the origins of each respective block, the date formulae indicate a two-part structure for the book in which the narrator guides the reader into a presentation of the prophet's eight visions and two major oracles (Sweeney 2000, 561-67; cf. Conrad). Zechariah 1:1-6 presents the introduction to the book with YHWH's initial word to the prophet, and Zechariah 1:7-14:21 presents YHWH's later words to the prophet concerning the visions in Zechariah 1:7-6:15 and the oracles in Zechariah 7:1-14:21. The literary structure for the book appears as follows:

Visions and Oracles About the Significance of the Restoration of Jerusalem (Zech 1:1—14:21)

- I. Introduction to the book: YHWH's initial word to Zechariah (Zech 1:1-6)
- II. Narrative presentation of YHWH's later words to Zechariah: visions and oracles (Zech 1:7—14:21)
 - A. Visions (Zech 1:7—6:15)
 1. Divine horses: YHWH's anger against nations and plan to restore Jerusalem and the temple (Zech 1:7-17)
 2. Four horns: restoration of temple altar; scattering of Israel and punishment of nations (Zech 1:18-21)
 3. City with walls of fire: restoration of Jerusalem (Zech 2:1-13)
 4. Ordination of Joshua ben Jehozadak (Zech 3:1-10)
 5. Menorah and two olive shoots: Zerubbabel and foundation stone (Zech 4:1-14)
 6. Flying scroll: justice for land from the temple (Zech 5:1-4)
 7. Woman in ephah basket: iniquity sent to Shinar/Babylon (Zech 5:5-11)
 8. Four chariots proclaim crowning of Joshua ben Jehozadak (Zech 6:1-15)
 - B. Oracles (Zech 7:1—14:21)
 1. Question concerning continued mourning for the temple (Zech 7:1-7)
 2. Answer: YHWH wants rejoicing and righteous action for restoration of the temple (Zech 7:8—14:21)
 - a. Call for righteous action (Zech 7:8-14)
 - b. Summation of former prophets: call for righteous action (Zech 8:1-17)
 - c. Zechariah's report of YHWH's oracles concerning restoration of Zion as holy center for the world (Zech 8:18—14:21)

The introduction to the book (Zech 1:1-6) signals the concern with earlier prophetic tradition by constructing Zechariah's identity in relation to the figure of Zechariah ben Yeberechiah in Isaiah 8:1-4 (cf. the references to Zechariah bar Iddo in Ezra 5:1; 6:14) and by its references to the "former prophets" (Zech 1:4). By referring to the calls for repentance made to the ancestors by the former prophets, the introduction prepares the reader to anticipate the realization of the claims made in the following material.

Zechariah 1:7—6:15 lays out a sequence of the prophet's visions, each of which is based upon his observations of activities connected with the building of the new temple and its preparation to serve as the holy center of creation. The first vision (Zech 1:7-17) draws upon the typical use of horse-mounted messengers by the Persian Empire to portray the four horsemen who announce YHWH's plans to rebuild the temple. The second vision (Zech 1:18-21) draws upon the imagery of workers constructing the four-horned altar for the temple (cf. Ex 27:2) to symbolize the scattering or exile of Israel in all directions and the punishment of all nations that carried out the exile. The third vision (Zech 2:1-13) draws upon the imagery of workers laying out the plans for the reconstruction of the temple and the city to depict Jerusalem as an unwallled, holy city, ringed by fire, much like the Persian holy city of Pasargadae, as a representation of YHWH's presence in the center of the nations. The fourth vision (Zech 3:1-10) portrays the ordination of Joshua ben Jehozadak as high priest for service in the new temple (cf. Ex 28—29; Lev 8—9). The fifth vision (Zech 4:1-14) describes the temple menorah, "candelabrum," flanked by two olive branches to symbolize YHWH's presence and the role of the two anointed figures, the royal Zerubbabel and the priestly Joshua, at the foundation of the new temple. The sixth vision (Zech 5:1-4) employs the image of the flying scroll to symbolize the reading of Torah from the "porch" of the temple as the basis for the holy life of the people. The seventh vision (Zech 5:5-11) portrays the removal of a woman in an ephah basket to Shinar, the site of Babylon, to symbolize the purity of the priests and the offerings made at their ordination. The eighth and final vision (Zech 6:1-15) presents the images of four chariots and the priest

Joshua ben Jehozadak seated on the throne to symbolize the reestablishment of the temple. Many argue that the passage originally had Zerubbabel as the royal figure seated on the throne, particularly since his absence from the temple consecration portrayed in Ezra 6 suggests that the Persians removed him when they concluded that he might attempt to restore Judean independence (cf. Hag 2:20-23).

The narrative account of the transmission of YHWH's word to Zechariah in Zechariah 7:1—14:21 poses a question concerning mourning for the lost temple in Zechariah 7:1-7 and answers the question with a lengthy depiction of rejoicing and righteous action at the restoration of the temple in Zechariah 7:8-14:21. Three sub-units, each introduced by the prophetic word transmission formula, lay out YHWH's concerns. Zechariah 7:8-14 begins with an oracle concerning YHWH's call for righteous action that reiterates concern with the reasons for the exile. Zechariah 8:1-17 recalls the earlier words of the prophets to emphasize that restoration will follow the period of punishment. Zechariah 8:18—14:21 calls for joy at the restoration of the temple by portraying how the nations will come to seek YHWH (see Zech 8:18-23). The two major prophetic mašša'ot ("oracles") in Zechariah 9—11 and Zechariah 12—14 respectively present YHWH's judgment against the shepherds—that is, the three Persian kings Cyrus, Cambyses and Darius, who failed to bring about YHWH's purposes as articulated in Isaiah 40—54 (see esp. Is 44:24—45:1)—and YHWH's judgment against the nations.

3.12. Malachi. Malachi calls for the return of the people to YHWH and rejects the notion of divorce, which had been employed metaphorically to represent the rupture of the relationship between YHWH and Israel at the beginning of the Book of the Twelve in Hosea. Nothing is known of the prophet Malachi. Many suspect that he did not even exist, since the name in Hebrew means simply, "my messenger/angel," and the term does not appear elsewhere in the Bible as a proper name. The book's concern with the neglect of the temple and the marriage of Jewish men to pagan women suggests that it is to be set some time prior to the arrival of Ezra in Jerusalem in the late fifth century or early-fourth century BCE. The literary form of Malachi appears as follows:

Parenetic Address to Priests and People Calling for Proper Reverence for YHWH (Mal 1:1—4:6)

- I. Superscription (Mal 1:1)
- II. Body of the book: parenetic address proper (Mal 1:2—4:6)
 - A. First disputation: YHWH loves the people (Mal 1:2-5)
 - B. Second disputation: people and priests have mishandled cultic matters (Mal 1:6—2:16)
 - C. Third disputation: justice will be done on the Day of YHWH (Mal 2:17—3:5)
 - D. Fourth disputation: call for proper treatment of YHWH's tithes (Mal 3:6-12)
 - E. Fifth disputation: YHWH's justice will be realized on the Day of YHWH (Mal 3:13—4:3)
 - F. Concluding summation: observe YHWH's Torah (Mal 4:4-6)

Following the superscription (Mal 1:1), the body of the book (Mal 1:2—4:6) appears as a parenetic address to priests and people designed to convince them to provide proper reverence and support for YHWH and the temple. This section includes six disputation speeches that challenge popular perceptions to argue for such adherence to YHWH. Malachi 1:2-5 contends that YHWH loves the people. Malachi 1:6—2:16 argues that both people and priests have mishandled cultic matters. Malachi 2:17—3:5 answers concerns about YHWH's justice to contend that the Day of YHWH's justice is about to arrive. Malachi 3:6-12 calls for the proper treatment of YHWH's tithes. Malachi 3:13—4:3 again asserts that YHWH's justice will be realized on the Day of YHWH. The concluding statements (Mal 4:5-6) sum up the argument by calling for observance of YHWH's Torah and announcing the return of the prophet Elijah prior to the expected Day of YHWH (cf. 2 Kings 2, which contends that Elijah did not die but instead ascended to heaven in a fiery chariot).

TWELVE, BOOK OF THE: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION

For centuries it was known that the twelve so-called Minor Prophets together formed a single book. This was simply seen as a scribal convention without any implications for the interpretation of the individual writings. However, beginning in the 1990s, the number of studies that treat the Book of the Twelve as a redactional and meaningful entity expanded substantially. Several articles that present a research history to the Book of the Twelve have been published (Nogalski 1993a, 3-12; Scharf 1998a; 1998b, 6-21; 2008; Wöhrle 2008, 2-14; also, A. Scharf maintains a website that provides a regularly updated bibliography on questions related to the Book of the Twelve: <<http://www.uni-due.de/EvangelischeTheologie/twelve-00start.shtml>>). In this article only the most important studies will be mentioned.

1. Terminology.

When dealing with the Book of the Twelve, it is helpful to define some central concepts in a concise way. The "Book of the Twelve Prophets" (or, in short, "Book of the Twelve") shall denote the final edition of the Hebrew original. This is in accordance with the Hebrew text tradition:

In the Codex Leningradensis, the final note after the last verse of Malachi contains the term "the Twelve." In the Babylonian Talmud, the book is called "The Twelve Prophets" (baba bathra 14b). In contrast, the expression "the minor prophets," referring to their length, stems from Latin sources ("prophetiae minores," Augustine, City of God 18.29).

The Greek term Dodekapheton is reserved, contrary to general usage, to refer only to the Greek translation of the Book of the Twelve. It is imperative to note that within the Greek tradition an important shift in understanding the Dodekapheton occurred when the Christian communities appropriated the Dodekapheton as part of their own canon. In cases where it is relevant to do so, this article distinguishes between the Jewish and the Christian Dodekapheton.

In what follows, the term "writing" refers to a text attributed to a single author by the scribal tradition. The Book of the Twelve comprises twelve such writings, which are presented as individual compositions, each from a single author, whose name is given. An exception is the writing of Jonah, where the author of the narrative remains anonymous and the prophetic sayings remain seamlessly embedded in the narrative. For our present purpose, the difference between a "writing" and a "book" is that a book was published and disseminated as a self-contained literary unity. In the case of the precursors to the Twelve, it is assumed that different writings were combined in order to be published as one book.

The concept of "author" also has to be defined precisely. A writing has an implied author, to whom the sayings that are presented in the writing are attributed. For example, all sayings in the book of Amos are ascribed to the prophetic figure Amos, who is named in the superscription. However, critical scholarship regards this authorship as fictitious, since many sayings in the book of Amos actually come from later redactors who published their own work under Amos's name. If it is relevant to differentiate between the implied author and the historical person who in most cases stands behind the oldest layer of tradition included in the writing, this article speaks of that historical person as "the historical prophet," leaving aside the question of whether the historical person qualifies as a "prophet" in the sense of the sociology of religion (see Prophecy, History of).

2. Hebrew Text Transmission.

The Book of the Twelve as a whole lacks a separate heading. This distinguishes it from the other three Prophetic Books of the Hebrew canon, Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Instead, the Book of the Twelve contains four writings that possess headings that resemble (in the case of Is 1:1 remarkably closely) the headings of the other three Prophetic Books of the Hebrew canon: Hosea 1:1; Amos 1:1; Micah 1:1; Zephaniah 1:1. In this way scribes clearly marked that the Book of the Twelve comes from different authors and different times. Nevertheless, this does not rule out the fact that the Twelve is conceived as one book, just as the Psalter is conceived as one book comprising different collections of psalms and likewise lacks a heading for the book as a whole.

The oldest external evidence for the existence of a Book of the Twelve is found in Sirach 49:10 (ca. 175 BC), where it is stated that “the twelve prophets brought healing to Jacob and helped him with confidence.” Since one cannot imagine what kind of motive an author would have to speak of “twelve prophets” unless they had been combined on one scroll, the Book of the Twelve must have existed by the time Sirach wrote his short evaluation.

The oldest extant manuscripts of the Book of the Twelve were discovered in Cave 4, located very close to the Qumran settlement (see Dead Sea Scrolls). They clearly demonstrate that the twelve Prophets—Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi—were written on a single scroll. The very fragmentary scrolls consistently display a special scribal technique. The separate writings did not always begin at the top of a new column. Instead, between the writings only three empty lines were left in the same column in order to distinguish the individual writings (for the edited manuscripts, including photographs and transcriptions, see Fuller). This writing technique demonstrates that the twelve individual titles were understood neither as separate books nor as a homogenous book like that of Isaiah. The scribes wanted to highlight some new form of unity.

Although the manuscripts were found in the same cave, they come from different times and represent different text types. The oldest manuscript, 4Q76, probably dates to the mid-second century BC, the latest one to the first century AD. As with other textual witnesses, some manuscripts should be identified as forerunners of the medieval Masoretic standard text. G. Brooke calls these texts “proto-Masoretic” (4Q77; 4Q81) (Brooke, 32). But there are other textual traditions. One manuscript, 4Q78, is very close to the LXX, but the majority of texts stand on their own (“nonaligned”) (4Q76; 4Q80; 4Q82). In another location in the Judean Desert, the Wadi Muraba‘at, a scroll was found that is very close to the Masoretic text type (see Text and Textual Criticism).

Within the later Masoretic text tradition, as represented by, for example, Codex Leningradensis, the Masorah at the end of each writing counts the words and verses of this writing (e.g., Malachi: “fifty five verses [pēsûqîm]”), but at the end of the last writing, Malachi, the Masoretes count in addition the total verses of the book and state that the middle verse of the book is the verse “Zion will be overthrown” (Mic 3:12) (At least this is the case in Codex Leningradensis according to BHS. The text edition of BHQ [Gelston], however, has only final notes to the individual writings. Nevertheless, in the margin to Mic 3:12 it is noted that this is the middle of the book.) Another Masoretic manuscript, the Aleppo Codex, presents only the total number of verses for the whole of the Book of the Twelve at the end of Malachi (the scanned folio is available for viewing at <<http://www.aleppocodex.org>>).

3. Greek Text Transmission.

The Book of the Twelve was translated into Greek when significant numbers of communities outside of the land of Israel no longer spoke *Hebrew as their native language and demanded a comprehensible but also reliable and standardized text of this important canonical document. The task probably was carried out by a single translator located in Egypt in the second half of the third century BC. The translator strived very hard to yield a literal, word-for-word translation, and uses the principle that every Hebrew word has a single Greek equivalent throughout the whole book (principle of concordance).

The translation of the Hebrew Book of the Twelve into the Greek language was part of the largest translation project of ancient times, the so-called Septuagint. After the Torah was translated, the Prophetic Books followed, among them, presumably at an early stage, the Book of the Twelve. For the sake of clarity of names, one should designate the Greek version of the Twelve by its Greek name, Dodekapropheton. As in other cases the translator used a Hebrew Vorlage for this translation that was very close to, but certainly not identical with, the Masoretic text type. In addition, his copy contained some misspellings (e.g., the interchange of some letters) and very few additions. This Vorlage was translated as literally as possible. The Vorlage certainly was different from the original Jewish LXX, but the Vorlage is lost completely and can only be reconstructed. An interesting find was a Greek scroll from Nahal Hever (for the edited scroll, see Barthélemy; Tov). This certainly is not a Christian manuscript, as the name of the God of Israel is written in paleo-Hebrew letters. But how exactly its relation to the original LXX version can be described is still open to discussion. Most influential was the hypothesis by D. Barthélemy: the scroll represents a text type that was secondarily adjusted to the proto-Masoretic Hebrew text of its time. Finally, the Christian communities appropriated the LXX and adopted it in their Greek OT. This stage of the textual development is well attested by comparably well-preserved copies of the text (for an exhaustive description of the manuscript situation, see Ziegler, 7-119). All efforts to reconstruct the original LXX version must start from there. As one can easily imagine, it is notoriously difficult to decide in each individual case whether variants within the Greek text tradition are of Christian origin or were created within the process of translation from the Hebrew.

4. The Sequence of the Writings.

Among the Hebrew manuscripts from the Judean desert there are eight manuscripts from the caves in the vicinity of Qumran and one scroll from the Wadi Murabaʿat. The Masoretic order is well attested in Qumran and in Wadi Murabaʿat. All manuscripts in which the sequence of the writings can be seen on text-external grounds confirm the Masoretic order. There is only one possible exception. In the oldest manuscript, 4Q76 Malachi, the last writing seems to be followed by another one. According to R. Fuller, the very few traces of letters after Malachi belong to Jonah (see Text and Textual Criticism). P. Guillaume has questioned his hypothesis, but his arguments are unconvincing. If there were a different sequence, this not only may be evidence for a late inclusion of the book of Jonah into the collection of the Twelve, but also may have some implications for how the narrative of Jonah was understood, at least by one copyist. First, one can say that the preserved sequence was stable; copyists did not accept the variant of 4Q76 but rather followed the later, so-called Masoretic order. According to O. Steck, the narrative of Jonah would serve primary didactic needs in the final position (Steck 1996). Nineveh probably no longer was understood as the historical capital of Assyria but rather as an example for any hearer (or reader) of the prophetic message (Gerhards, 7.2). Jonah could serve as an example to illustrate the proposition in Malachi 3:7 that Yahweh will relent from his punishment as soon as the people heed the prophetic message and repent, exactly as Jonah experienced.

Between the sequence of the writings in the Dodekapropheton and that of the MT there is a difference in the sequence of the first six writings. The easiest explanation for this reorganization is that the translator of the original LXX placed Amos and Micah adjacent to Hosea and left the sequence of the remaining writings intact. The reason for this was that he noticed that the superscriptions of these books cohere markedly and evoke the impression that they prophesied at roughly the same time. In addition, only these three prophets directly address Samaria, the capital of northern Israel, whereas the other writings address Judah and Jerusalem.

5. The Jewish Septuagintal Interpretation of the Book of the Twelve.

Since a translation of a text into a different language always implies some form of interpretation, the Jewish LXX version of the Twelve contains the first complete, consistent interpretation of the whole book. The translator had to decide which Greek equivalent represents the sense of the Hebrew expression most accurately for every single word. Besides that, he had to decipher unusual words that he did not have in his lexicon, correct misspellings, and make sense of incomprehensible clauses as much as possible. Although it certainly was the intention of the translator to represent the original meaning of the Hebrew as accurately as possible and to avoid any deliberate change, in fact it was unavoidable that his own interpretation crept into the translation through his attempt to provide the original meaning (for a very good presentation of the LXX of Amos, see Glenny). A few examples may suffice to illustrate the way in which this translational interpretation was achieved.

The translator found the expression yhwh šēbā'ôt many times in his Hebrew text. Concerning the Tetragrammaton, he did not keep the name "YHWH," but instead translated the word as 'ādōnāy, which was read in the synagogue instead of the name of God, with the Greek word kyrios ("Lord"). The Jewish community in Egypt had adopted this Greek title for gods for the designation of YHWH, and the translator followed this usage. In contrast, he dealt differently with the Hebrew word šēbā'ôt. One cannot be sure, of course, but there is a good chance that it was the translator who coined the neologism pantokratōr as an equivalent to šēbā'ôt. Whether the translator had this intention or not, the title pantokratōr came to mean "the almighty," which became an important attribute of God's essence.

Hosea 5:2 provides another example of an innovative translation. Here the translator chose the word paideutēs ("educator") as a self-designation of God. This title seems to be important for him, because he uses the verb paideuō ("to educate") four more times (Hos 7:12, 14, 16; 10:10) (Bons).

A last example comes from Amos 9:11-12. The Hebrew text envisions the rebuilding of the fallen booth of David and his city. In addition, Edom and all the *nations, which are called by God's name, will be brought under Israelite rule. The LXX translator brings in a new tone: "that the remnant of humankind and all the Gentiles upon whom my name is called may earnestly seek me, says the Lord." This new interpretation is based on two different readings of the Hebrew: "humankind" (Heb 'ādām) instead of "Edom" (Heb 'ēdōm), and "seek" (Heb dāraś) instead of "possess" (Heb yāraś). The result is that the picture of the eschatological restitution of Israel differs markedly from that presumed by the Hebrew text. According to the Hebrew text, Israel will possess the foreign nations, whereas in the LXX Israel and the rest of humanity peacefully and jointly seek the Lord.

6. The Christian Greek Old Testament.

The NT authors, although at least some of them presumably were capable of reading and understanding Hebrew, relied on the Jewish Scriptures in their Greek versions. The early Christian communities produced no copies of these Scriptures of their own, but rather used those exemplars common in the synagogues. In some cases it is possible that the Christian authors translated a passage on their own, but this would have happened while bearing the official Greek text in mind. The text of the Greek version would not differ from that of their Jewish home communities. However, the way that the Scriptures were conceived was completely dominated by the conviction that Jesus of Nazareth was the *Messiah of Israel, whom the prophets had proclaimed as coming to save the whole world.

When the Christian communities decided to have a collection of authoritative Scriptures for themselves, apart from that of the Jewish communities, they did so by appropriating the Jewish Scriptures that were part of their own heritage and expanding them by a collection of decidedly Christian writings. The concepts of an "Old Testament" and a "New Testament" came not from the NT authors themselves but rather from later Christian scribes, who combined the Jewish Scriptures and the authoritative Christian writings into one book, comprising two parts.

As D. Trobisch has convincingly argued, it was in this stage that new scribal practices were introduced that made sure that the reader read the OT books according to a Christian hermeneutic. The most important one is the use of the so-called nomina sacra ("holy names"). The name of God, kyrios in Greek, and the concepts "God" (theos), "Christ" (christos), and "Jesus" (Iēsous) were written only with the first and the last letter of the word with a line above the letters in order to signal the abbreviated writing style. Later, even more nomina sacra were written in this style. It is only from this stage of the transmission of the Greek text that extant copies have survived. The reconstruction of the Jewish LXX version must start from and heavily rely on this text. All of the ancient Christian interpreters, from whom commentaries of the Twelve survived, relied on such a text form.

Although it is clear that Christian readers conceived the Book of the Twelve as reflecting a stage of salvation history that culminated in the coming of Jesus Christ, it is remarkable that they only rarely adjusted the text of the prophets to the supposed fulfillment in Christ. Even in passages where the NT authors quote the prophetic texts verbatim, but in a different wording than the LXX version, they very much hesitated to correct the prophetic text on the basis of the NT quotation. An example is the quotation of Amos 9:11-12 in Acts 15:16-17. There, Amos 9:11 obviously differs from the LXX version, whereas Amos 9:12 exactly follows the LXX. The scribes, however, did not eliminate this tension. The Christian scribes obviously did not care so much about the exact match of the wording as long as the sense of the passage referred to Jesus Christ clearly enough.

7. Ancient Interpretations.

7.1. Sirach. In Sirach 49:10 the Twelve are mentioned for the first time. In a long review of the honored men and fathers of Israel that begins in Sirach 44:1, the author summarizes what they contributed to the history of Israel. The author follows the historical sequence, grouping together Hezekiah with Isaiah, and Josiah with Jeremiah, who is followed by Ezekiel. In Sirach 49:10 the Twelve are taken together and a single message is attributed to them, a message of comfort and hope. (The concepts stem from the Greek version. Fortunately, among the Hebrew fragments of Sirach this passage is also attested [Smend; Vattioni; Beentjes]. Although fragmentary, the Hebrew text proves that the Greek version translated this passage very literally.) Since the Twelve consist of prophets who are dated before and after the Babylonian *exile, it is interesting that Sirach places the Twelve before the exile. Their message, however, is presented not as predicting the destruction of Jerusalem as Jeremiah (Sir 49:6), but rather as a message of consolation and hope. This prediction was only partly realized by the rebuilding of the *temple in the period of Zerubbabel and Joshua and the walls of Jerusalem under the leadership of Nehemiah (Sir 49:11-13). Since Micah was famous for having predicted the destruction of the temple on *Zion (Mic 3:12; cf. Jer 26:18), it is noteworthy that Sirach emphasizes the hopeful passages within the Book of the Twelve. This may be explained by a reading strategy that leaves the fulfilled prophecies aside—that is, the doom oracles that were fulfilled by the Babylonian exile—and concentrates on the unfulfilled prophecies that still are relevant for readers after the exile.

7.2. New Testament. Within the NT the Book of the Twelve is cited thirty-three times. This is less than half of the citations of Isaiah (72x), but clearly more than Jeremiah (10x) and Ezekiel (5x). Apparently, the Book of the Twelve contains some ideas that could be related to Jesus Christ and could not be found elsewhere. Most importantly, the prophecy of Amos 9:11-12 was used as a proof-text by James at the apostolic convention in Jerusalem to resolve the conflict between Peter, Barnabas and Paul, on the one hand, who promoted the idea that non-Israelite Christians need not to be circumcised, and their Pharisaic opponents, on the other, who maintained the opposite. It is not totally clear what kind of interpretation James presupposed in his speech (Acts 15:13-21), but it is clear that he thought that the crucifixion and resurrection of Jesus Christ included the foreign nations into Israel in such a way that they did not become Israelites but instead kept their own ethnic identity (see Prophets in the New Testament; Schart 2006).

8. Ancient Christian Commentaries on the Twelve.

8.1. Theodore of Mopsuestia. Only a few commentaries on the Book of the Twelve from the ancient church have survived more or less completely. Especially noteworthy is the commentary by Theodore of Mopsuestia (ca. 350-428), who represents the Antiochian school of exegesis. Because Theodore later was banned by the official church, his many commentaries on biblical books were mostly destroyed. Luckily, however, his commentary on the Twelve survived in its entirety in the original Greek (Hill 2004, 2). The commentary presumably stems from around 375. Theodore is rightly praised by modern scholars as a precursor to the historical-critical understanding of the Book of the Twelve, insofar as his preeminent goal is “to bring clarity” or perspicuity (saphēneia) to the scriptural text (Hill 2004, 307). He flatly rejects the allegorical approach and tries to understand the prophetic message completely within its original historical situation as intended for the audience at that time. He is very clear that the authors of the OT had no understanding of a trinitarian God; whenever God is referred to as “father” or “spirit,” this is not meant in a trinitarian way, as if “father” (i.e., God) is understood as comprising three persons (Hill 2004, 28; Merx, 120). Likewise, Theodore insists that the Israelite prophets foresaw the coming of a worldly king who would restore the nation. This hope was fulfilled by the coming of Zerubbabel. Jesus Christ came in at a later stage of the divine world order, or oikonomia (Hill 2004, 25-26).

Only in one case is this distinct: the passage that envisions the pouring out of the *Spirit on all flesh in Joel 2:28-32. Under the influence of Peter’s quotation in Acts 2, Theodore insists that “the reality of the account was found to be realized in the time of Christ the Lord” (Hill 2004, 23). In no other case did he find an announcement of Jesus Christ, but rather a completely human and Jewish king, Zerubbabel. A good example is Amos 9:11-12, regarding which Theodore states that the vision of Amos was fulfilled in Zerubbabel, who restored *Israel after the Babylonian destruction (Hill 2004, 172). Only after he had clarified the original meaning does Theodore mention James’s application of Amos 9:11-12 in Acts 15, but he does not think that this represents the original meaning but only the apostle’s secondary usage of this text. Nevertheless, it is clear to Theodore that James disclosed the true outcome (ekbasis), which was not available to the ancient Israelites (Merx, 128).

The copy of the Twelve that Theodore had before him belonged to the text type of the so-called Antiochian text, which differed from the widely accepted Alexandrian text. He does not comment on this different text type. Obviously, he knew that his Greek text was the translation of a Hebrew Vorlage, because in rare cases he refers to the Hebrew, whereby in these cases it is clear that he is relying on the expertise of others (Merx, 121-22). Unfortunately, he does not mention their names. As a result, it remains unclear whether he used Jewish sources. Theodore decidedly defends the divine inspiration of the Greek version by referencing the legend about the seventy translators of the LXX that was first attested in the Letter of Aristeas and was adopted by Christians, whereby it was inferred that the seventy translated not just the Torah but the entire collection that Christians hold as their Greek OT (Merx, 125).

Interestingly, the sequence of the writings of the Twelve attested by Theodore followed the Hebrew order and not that of the mainstream Christian codices. The sequence must have been revised by someone in order to match the Hebrew one. Theodore does not comment on this difference in sequence, even if he was aware of it. Apparently, he sees no important difference in meaning between the order of his Greek text and that of the other Greek manuscripts of his time. In any case, we have no comments by him on those differences. Theodore is, however, seriously interested in establishing the historical sequence of the prophets. He tries to identify the historical background of each prophet as best the scarce information of the writings allows. In his introduction to Haggai he establishes the following sequence: Hosea, Joel, Amos and Micah dealt with the ten tribes of northern Israel; Obadiah prophesied against the Edomites at the time of the return; Jonah and Nahum confronted Nineveh; Habakkuk and Zephaniah addressed Judah and Jerusalem and spoke of the Babylonian threat; Haggai is the first to speak after the return from captivity (Hill 2004, 306-7).

The historical background allows him to resolve the famous tension between the portrayals of the Assyrian capital, Nineveh, in the writing of Jonah, on the one hand, and in that of Nahum, on the other. In Jonah the Ninevites respond in a very positive way—they believe in God and turn away from their evil deeds—to the unbelievably brief message, which Theodore conceives only as a short version of what Jonah had really said. In Nahum, however, the prophet confronts Nineveh again in a very harsh way and announces Nineveh’s immediate downfall, as if none of the things that the book of Jonah narrates had taken place. Theodore concludes that Nineveh must have returned to its evil behavior. And he sees a pattern of God’s behavior in those cases. As in the case of the Egyptian Pharaoh or the Assyrian king Sennacherib, God allows Israel’s enemies to attack Israel, but when they overstate their case and try not only to do harm to Israel but also begin “warring against God,” God unleashes severe retribution against them (Hill 2004, 246).

8.2. Cyril of Alexandria. Cyril of Alexandria (d. 444) may be chosen as an example of allegorical interpretation. He wrote a commentary on the Twelve in the early years of his episcopate. Cyril certainly was interested in the historical meaning; however, he thinks that a deeper meaning is hidden in many passages, and that the commentator must bring these out. A famous example is the journey of Jonah in the fish. Cyril has no doubt that this event really happened to the historical prophet. However, since Jesus already adopted Jonah as a sign for himself, it is imperative that Jonah's journey is developed at a "spiritual level" (theōria pneumatikē) (Hill 2008, 148). That means that it is understood as a shadow of Christ's death and resurrection. What happened to Jonah "describes in shadows, as it were [hōs en skiais], the mystery of the incarnation [oikonomia] of our Savior as well" (Hill 2008, 148).

A second example is found in the interpretation of Amos 9:11-12. Again Cyril admits that the historical reference (historia) to the rebuilding of the "tent of David" is the restoration of the Jews, "when Cyrus released them from captivity" (Hill 2008, 128). However, "the deeper meaning closer to reality [esōterō kai alēthesteros] would be in Christ" (Hill 2008, 128). In this sense, the fallen tent refers to the fallen human race suffering from death. The restitution happened when Jesus Christ was resurrected and with him those who believe in him (Hill 2008, 128).

8.3. Jerome. Jerome (ca. 347/348-419) wrote commentaries on all of the writings of the Book of the Twelve between the years 393 and 406 (Höhmman, 41). He was very influential for several reasons. First, he knew Hebrew and was capable of correcting the LXX translation toward the Hebrew version known at his time. Second, he was familiar with Jewish exegesis and consulted it regularly. In so doing, he offered an accurate portrayal of the Jewish interpretation of the shared Scripture and fostered the understanding of the Jewish religion. Third, he compared the different Greek versions (Septuagint, Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, the Quinta of Origen's Hexapla). Fourth, writing in Latin, he conveyed the Greek exegetical tradition to the Latin-speaking western half of the Roman Empire. Similar to Cyril, Jerome tried, as best he was able, to establish the historical sense of the text—for example, by using his knowledge of Hebrew and the land of Israel. On the other hand, from Origen he learned to find an allegorical meaning.

Throughout his commentary on Amos, for example, he interprets all statements about Judah and Jerusalem as referring to the church (ecclesia), whereas all statements about Samaria or Amaziah or Jeroboam are conceived as referring to the heretics. When commenting on Amos 9:11-12, for example, he states that a Christian reader of this passage must follow the example of the apostles and apply a spiritual reading: the image of the rebuilding of the fallen tent of David refers to the central Jewish cultic place, the synagogue, which was rebuilt through the resurrection of Christ (resurrectio domini) as the Christian community (Höhmman, 313 // 481). The phrase "the rest of humankind" (reliqui hominum), which is, as Jerome rightly observes, found in the LXX version and not in the Hebrew, refers to those among the Jewish people, who came to believe in Jesus Christ (qui iudaico populo crediderunt) (Höhmman, 313 // 481).

9. Martin Luther.

Martin Luther represents an important step in the history of interpretation of the Twelve because he produced very influential translations of the Prophetic Books from the Hebrew into German. In 1532 he published a translation of all of the Prophetic Books (As G. Krause has shown, Luther made use of the translation of the Prophetic Books by L. Hetzer and H. Denck [1527], who translated from the Hebrew. But on the other hand, these two authors had already been influenced by Luther's translation of Hosea for his course work [Krause, 19-61]).

Luther relied neither on the Latin Vulgate, which was the normative Bible version of the medieval period, nor on the Greek version, which had been the normative version of the ancient church. Instead, he relied on the Hebrew text alone. This usage of the Hebrew became a normative principle for all Protestant communities and even influenced scholarly exegesis in the Roman Catholic Church.

Luther did not write a commentary on the Twelve as a whole, but published interpretations of Jonah (1526), Habakkuk (1526) and Zechariah (1527) (for a convenient overview of all sources on Luther's exegesis of the Minor Prophets, see Krause, 1-6). However, while serving as a professor for biblical studies, he did give lectures on all of the Twelve during the years 1524-1526. These lectures were written down by his students, and some of them later were published (the lectures on the Twelve Prophets are collected in WA 13).

In the forewords (Vorreden) to his translations Luther gave a rough sketch of his understanding of the Twelve, targeting lay readers of the Bible. He clearly set the prophets within their historical setting and established their historical sequence on the basis of the superscriptions of the books, thereby considering Hosea as the oldest, albeit contemporary with Joel, Amos and Micah. He conceived of the prophetic office (Amt) as twofold: on the one hand, the prophets have to preach the law, which results in harsh judgment speeches against their disobedient Jewish fellows; on the other hand, they had to proclaim the gospel, which culminates in the announcement of the coming of Jesus Christ and his kingdom (foreword to Hosea [1545]). In addition, Luther states that at least some of the prophets had to suffer severe persecution from their addressees, who sometimes even went so far as killing the prophets. In this way, they prefigure the fate of Jesus Christ (foreword to Hosea). Luther does not think that the christological interpretation needs an allegorical method. For him, the announcement of Christ is obviously the literal meaning of the prophetic texts (Hermle, 4.1). In fact, Luther does not apply an allegorical methodology at all. When he comes to an interpretation that modern scholars would consider allegorical, he would argue that the historical sense of the text itself is meant in an allegorical way. A good example is the marriage of Hosea in Hosea 1. Since for Luther it is completely unimaginable that God ordered the prophet to take a harlot and have children with her, this action must be understood as a sign enacted (see Sign Act) to demonstrate the sin of the people (foreword to Hosea). However, as Krause has noted, Luther significantly reduced the number of passages that he considered as unambiguously speaking about Jesus Christ—for example, Hosea 6:1-3 speaking about the resurrection of Christ, in comparison with his exegetical forebears in the ancient and medieval church (Krause, 365, 369). At the same time, he found some additional texts where the prophets spoke of God's grace and human faith in a way completely in line with the NT (Krause, 364, 380, 383-84).

10. Modern Historical-Critical Approaches.

On the basis of a modern historical-critical approach, F. Delitzsch (1813-1890) discovered the catchword phenomenon that stitches the writings of the Twelve together. Each of the writings, mostly in its first chapter, repeats at least one significant phrase or even verse from the writing immediately before it, in most cases from its last chapter (cf. Hos 14:1 // Joel 2:12; Joel 3:21 // Amos 1:2; Amos 9:12 // Obad 19; Jonah 4:2 // Mic 7:18-19 // Nah 1:2-3; Hab 2:20 // Zeph 1:7). Especially significant is the overlap between Amos 1:2 (Yahweh roaring from Zion) and Joel 3:21 (Delitzsch, 91-93) (the catchword phenomenon later was intensively studied by J. Nogalski [see below]). H. Ewald (1803-1875) used the superscriptions as data for the reconstruction of the redaction history of the collection and proposed the thesis that the six writings Joel, Amos, Hosea, Micah, Nahum, Zephaniah, in this sequence, formed a precursor to the Book of the Twelve (Ewald, 1:74-75). K. Budde (1850-1935) was the first to postulate a *redaction that worked across the different writings. According to him, the redactor eliminated biographical narrative material from the writings in order to give more weight to the *word of God. However, the major breakthrough for understanding the Book of the Twelve as a whole was the Harvard dissertation by R. Wolfe, submitted in 1933 (Wolfe 1933; for a summary of the dissertation, see Wolfe 1935). He elaborated the complicated hypothesis that the different writings were put together by redactors who simultaneously edited several different writings in order to combine them into a single book. Wolfe coined the term "strata hypothesis" and differentiated between thirteen layers that successively worked on four collections: first Amos and Hosea were combined; second, a redactor formed the Book of the Six, comprising the preexilic prophecies (Amos, Hosea, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah); third, this book was expanded with the inclusion of Joel, Jonah and Obadiah, thereby forming a Book of the Nine; finally, the Book of the Twelve was formed. Probably because he set out his thesis without serious source-critical arguments, his important contribution was left unheeded for decades.

Research on the Twelve attained new heights after World War II with the outstanding commentaries of H. Wolff (1911-1993) and W. Rudolph (1891-1987), but these commentators concentrated their work on the historical prophets. In his commentary on Hosea, for example, Wolff explained the brevity of many texts by the thesis that they were written hastily by eyewitnesses of the oral communication. He completely ignored the work of Wolfe and analyzed the growth of the writings of the Twelve completely within their individual literary boundaries. B. Childs (1923-2007), in his Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture (1979), shifted the interest away from the historical prophet to the final redaction of the books. (Childs did not address the question of what it might mean for a canonical understanding to take the Book of the Twelve as a whole, but he did supervise D. Schneider's 1979 dissertation on the unity of the Book of the Twelve.) For some reason, the dynamic of the research on the Twelve gained renewed impetus after the breakup of the Soviet Union. In 1990 P. House brought a wind of change to the debate when he examined the literary devices that let the Book of the Twelve appear as a deliberately styled unity. His analysis dealt with the Book of the Twelve as if it were a unified narrative, exploring its genre, structure, plot, characterization and point of view. According to him, the writings were arranged in such a way that the reader faces a thematic development: the first six writings (Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah) concentrate on the sin of Israel; the next three (Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah) depict its punishment; and the last three (Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi) envision its restoration. This study clearly developed the idea of the Twelve as a unified book, but at the same time it completely ignored the redaction-historical dimension of this unity.

The reaction from the redaction-historical side came quickly. In 1991 O. Steck published a study of the interrelation of redactional processes within the book of Isaiah and the Book of the Twelve (Steck 1991). He was aware that his very complicated model of different Fortschreibungen ("relectures") was preliminary in several respects, especially because it lacked sound and detailed source-critical examinations of the key passages, as well as well-balanced criteria for determining whether similar passages, even passages that share significant lexemes, belong to the same redactional layer or cite or allude to each other, and if so, in what direction the dependence goes. However, J. Nogalski, who wrote his dissertation under Steck's supervision, brought a widely acknowledged breakthrough. His two volumes on the subject in 1993 began with an extensive study of the catchword phenomenon, already noted by Delitzsch, and on this basis developed an impressive picture of the successive growth of the Book of the Twelve (Nogalski 1993a; 1993b) (see Intertextuality and Innerbiblical Interpretation).

Nogalski attributed the most extensive redactional activity to the "Joel-related layer," which made the immediate coming of the *Day of Yahweh the dominant theme of eleven writings. This redaction combined a preexisting "Deuteronomistic corpus" (Hosea, Amos, Micah, Zephaniah) with Nahum, Habakkuk, Haggai, Zechariah 1—8, Joel, Obadiah and Malachi. Subsequently, Jonah and Zechariah 9—14 entered the collection.

Contemporary with Nogalski or inspired by him, a couple of studies appeared in quick succession. The first to follow with a book-length study was A. Schart. In his 1998 book Die Entstehung des Zwölfprophetenbuchs he began with an analysis of the openings of the writings. After having differentiated between the different types of beginnings—the different types of superscriptions and the different forms of narrative expositions—he judged that these differences must come from different redactors who successively added more writings to the collection but at the same time reworked the older collection that they had inherited. For the first time since Wolfe, Schart tried to assign every single verse of the Twelve to his six postulated redactional layers. According to him, the collection started with the combination of older versions of Hosea and Amos onto a single scroll in order to present the prophetic message that had foreseen and announced the downfall of northern Israel together with its capital, Samaria. At the next stage he more or less confirmed Nogalski's "Deuteronomistic corpus," for which he preferred the label "D-corpus." He then divided Nogalski's "Joel-related layer" into three layers: a redaction that inserted Nahum and Habakkuk; a second redaction that added Haggai, Zechariah and other passages that envisioned a hopeful restoration after the judgment had been executed; and a third redaction that brought in Joel and Obadiah and formed a book comprising ten writings. The final redaction added the satirical narrative about the fate of Jonah and a collection of disputation speeches under the name of Malachi.

J. Wöhrle has offered the most recent study. His two volumes contain an independent source-critical analysis of every writing of the Twelve except for Hosea (Wöhrle 2006; 2008). Wöhrle added a lot of additional evidence to some hypotheses as postulated by Nogalski and followed by others. His study of what he calls the Vierprophetenbuch ("Book of the Four Prophets" [Wöhrle picked up the name Vierprophetenbuch from Albertz, 164-85]), which is more or less identical with Nogalski's "Deuteronomistic corpus," brilliantly confirms this hypothesis by demonstrating how the redactor of this Book of the Four deliberately alluded to the book of Kings. In addition, there are several new interesting hypotheses—for example, the Gnadenkorpus, which is dominated and unified by allusions to the famous definition of God's gracious and compassionate essence in Exodus 34:6-7. Likewise, Wöhrle's proposal to differentiate between three layers that deal with the nations (Fremdvölker-Korpus I, Fremdvölker-Korpus II, Heil-für-die-Völker-Korpus) is stimulating. However, these need further evaluation.

11. Conclusion.

Over the past few decades it has been successfully demonstrated that the Book of the Twelve must be conceived as a redaction-historical unity comparable to the other Latter Prophets, but with the marked difference that in the case of the Twelve it is openly stated that the book was composed by different authors. Even the names of the prophets that stand behind the book are explicitly given. The Book of the Twelve presents "the prophets" as a continuous chain of persons throughout history following one another, occasionally overlapping chronologically, and sharing basically the same task and message (see Formation of the Prophetic Books). It is of great importance that this chain was not construed as a homogenous growth of knowledge, but rather as one with conflicting positions that can claim equally to have immanent experiences of God's presence and to refer back to the community's normative tradition (see Prophecy and Tradition).

Concerning the method in regard to what kinds of evidence can be gathered in order to correlate redactional activities in one writing to those in another, Schart remains fundamental with his reflections on how one can gather evidence for the thesis that Hosea and Amos once were parts of a single book (Schart 1998b, 133-50).

Among the many theses about the redaction history of the Twelve, it is difficult to find some models that are more stable than others, but it seems wise to separate four major stages, no matter how many other layers one is inclined to accept.

The most convincing and broadly accepted thesis is that older versions of Hosea, Amos, Micah and Zephaniah formed a single corpus. The best evidence for this is the system of superscriptions that synchronize every prophet with the contemporary kings of Israel and Judah (see Israelite History). It seems as if this system wants to convey the impression that the kings Hezekiah and Josiah responded with their reforms to the message of these prophets. This corpus certainly contains substantial affinities with Deuteronomistic ideas and concepts, but it should not be identified with the editors of the book of Kings. It probably had at least one precursor. The thesis of a scroll that comprised Hosea and Amos is still worth further consideration.

It is self-evident that someone must have combined individual writings into the Book of the Twelve Prophets. This final stage may be called the "final redaction." There is some evidence that Jonah was among the last writings that came into the Twelve.

Between the D-corpus and the final redaction there must have been at least one stage, but probably there were more. One of them implemented the hope of the coming of the eschatological "day of the Lord," which even in the final form characterizes the Book of the Twelve. This eschatological concept permeates the writing of Joel through and through. As a result, it still commends itself that at least one layer of Joel was part of this stage.

Research on the Book of the Twelve must continue in order to find firmer ground. Nevertheless, it seems promising to parallel this research with that in the other Prophetic Books. O. Steck rightly has stressed the fact that the book of Isaiah and the Book of the Twelve are the most similar of the Prophetic Books. E. Bosshard-Nepustil has elaborated this idea in his massive 1997 study Rezeptionen von Jesaja 1-39 im Zwölfprophetenbuch. The idea of a parallel and mutual development of the book of Isaiah and the Book of the Twelve needs to be evaluated anew. The results of such undertakings should be expounded for the canonical books and compilations outside the prophets in order to appreciate whether one might be able to find similar redactional processes in their textual backgrounds. The Torah and the process of its development should be considered in light of the studies undertaken regarding the compositional history of the Book of the Twelve.

VISIONS, PROPHETIC

A prophetic vision is a form of divine revelation that comes by means of a visible or visualized experience. The biblical vocabulary of “vision” (hāzôn, mar’â, etc.) alone is not a reliable guide to the identification of prophetic visions, in that a number of visions do not use this vocabulary, and in other places this vocabulary is used to encompass an extensive range of prophetic experience. Recent attempts to define the genre of the prophetic vision report are more promising, though not without their own difficulties.

1. Prophetic Visions and the Biblical Vocabulary of Visions
2. Defining the Genre
3. Prophetic Visions in the Old Testament

1. Prophetic Visions and the Biblical Vocabulary of Visions.

The biblical vocabulary of “visions” is grouped around two Hebrew roots, hāzâ and râ’â, both of which mean “to see.” From hāzâ comes several words for “vision” (hāzôn, hizzāyôn, hāzôt, maḥazeh) and the word hōzeh, denoting one who sees a vision. From râ’â comes mar’â (“vision”) and rō’eh (“seer”). There is a high degree of semantic overlap between these two sets of words. For example, Daniel 10:14, 16 use both hāzôn and mar’â to refer to the same vision (cf. 1 Sam 3:1, 15; Is 30:10; Joel 2:28).

A typical use of “vision” vocabulary occurs in 1 Samuel 3:1-21, where the narrator says, “In those days the word of the LORD was rare; there were not many visions [hāzôn]” (1 Sam 3:1). As indicated by the parallelism, a vision was a means by which the word of the Lord was revealed. In this case, the visual element is not primary, in that Samuel’s “vision” (mar’â [1 Sam 3:15]) consisted of words spoken to him by the Lord. The final verses of the chapter describe the nexus between prophecy, visions and the word of the Lord: “Samuel was attested as a prophet of the Lord” (1 Sam 3:20) and “The LORD continued to be seen [râ’â] at Shiloh, for in Shiloh the LORD revealed himself to Samuel by the word of the LORD” (1 Sam 3:21).

The relationship between visions and prophecy is further described in several key passages. According to 1 Samuel 9:9, “The prophet of today used to be called a seer [rō’eh].” The mark of true prophecy was that a prophet had received a vision from the Lord: “When a prophet of the LORD is among you, I reveal myself to him in visions [mar’â]” (Num 12:6). Jeremiah 23 says that false prophets “speak visions [hāzôn] from their own minds, not from the mouth of the LORD” (Jer 23:16), whereas the true prophet is the one who has “stood in the council of the LORD to see [râ’â] and to hear his word” (Jer 23:18). The mark of the prophet is that the revelation received had come from “the mouth of the LORD,” and the prophet had “heard his word.”

It is perhaps for this reason that “vision” vocabulary is used to refer to a wide range of prophetic activity, whether or not there is any visual component. The entire book of Isaiah is described as “the vision [hāzôn] . . . that Isaiah the prophet saw [hāzâ]” (Is 1:1 [cf. 2 Chron 32:32]). Similarly, Nahum 1:1 speaks of “the book of the vision [hāzôn] of Nahum,” and Habakkuk 1:1 introduces “the oracle that Habakkuk the prophet saw [hāzâ].”

It is beyond the scope of this article to canvass the whole range of prophetic activity that is described as either ḥāzôn or mar'â. The present enquiry will be limited to “prophetic visions” in which there is a visual component to the revelation.

A typical example of one such vision is found in the opening chapter of the book of Ezekiel. In Ezekiel 1:1 the prophet says, “The heavens were opened and I saw visions [mar'â] of God,” and in the subsequent verses he goes on to relate the first of these visions: “And I looked and behold: a windstorm coming out of the north, an immense cloud with flashing lightning and surrounded by brilliant light. The center of the fire looked like glowing metal, and in the fire was what looked like four living creatures” (Ezek 1:4-5a). The book of Ezekiel uses vision vocabulary (mar'â) in Ezekiel 8:1; 40:3; 43:3 to introduce other blocks of vision reports.

However, not every vision is marked by “vision” vocabulary. For example, the vision of the valley of the dry bones (Ezek 37:1-14) uses neither ḥāzôn nor mar'â. Likewise, other passages commonly recognized as prophetic visions do not use key terminology. For example, Zechariah’s eight night visions are nowhere described in the text as “visions,” nor are the visions in Amos 7—9 (although the prophet is described by others in Amos 7:12 as a ḥōzeh [“seer”]).

There is semantic overlap between the vocabulary of “visions” and “dreams.” Not all dreams are prophetic visions (e.g., Gen 20:3; 31:10, 24; 37:5; 40:5), but a prophetic vision may come by way of a dream (e.g., Dan 7; cf. Zech 4:1, which implies that the preceding vision in Zech 3 occurred during sleep). In a number of places, “visions” and “dreams” are used synonymously: “When a prophet of the LORD is among you, I reveal myself to him in visions [mar'â], I speak to him in dreams [ḥālôm]” (Num 12:6); “And it will be like a dream [ḥālôm], a vision of the night [ḥāzôn laylâ]” (Is 29:7 [cf. Job 4:13; 7:14; 20:8; 33:15]). Furthermore, Joel 2:28 prophesies that in the last days, “Your sons and daughters will prophesy, your old men will dream dreams [ḥālôm], your young men will see [ra'â] visions [ḥizzayôn].”

This brief survey of the biblical vocabulary of “visions” demonstrates that word studies cannot provide a sufficient basis for the identification and analysis of the genre of the prophetic vision, and that another approach is needed to define and analyse the genre.

2. Defining the Genre.

There have been a number of different approaches to the definition of the genre of the prophetic vision. The following four scholars illustrate the diversity of approaches: J. Lindblom categorizes visions based on the differing psychological experience of the prophet; B. Long subdivides visions into three “types” based on “the interconnections between structure, content, and intention” (Long, 354); S. Niditch arranges symbolic visions along an evolutionary chronology of the tradition’s historical development; A. Behrens follows a strict form-critical approach.

2.1. Johannes Lindblom (Psychological). In Prophecy and Ancient Israel, Lindblom develops a taxonomy of prophetic visions based on the nature and psychology of the prophetic experience (see Prophecy and Psychology) with three classifications: ecstatic visions, symbolic perceptions and literary visions.

Lindblom defines an ecstatic vision as a revelation experienced in the form of visual perceptions, as distinct from an audition, which is a revelation experienced in the form of auditory perceptions. The vision is “received in trance or ecstasy, or in a mental state approximating thereto. These perceptions are not caused by any object in the external world, but arise within the soul” (Lindblom, 122). Lindblom subdivides this category into pictorial visions and dramatic visions. In a pictorial vision, the focus of attention is the objects or figures that are seen, such as Amos’s visions of locusts consuming the harvest (Amos 7:1-3) and fire devouring the land (Amos 7:4-6). In contrast, the essential element of the dramatic vision is the actions performed by figures that appear in the vision, as seen for example in the vision in Ezekiel 8—11.

In Lindblom’s second category, symbolic perception, a real object is seen by means of natural sight but is “conceived of as something particularly significant and interpreted as a symbol of another, higher reality” (Lindblom, 137). Examples of this category are Amos’s perception of the basket of ripe fruits (Amos 8:1-2) and Jeremiah’s perception of the almond tree (Jer 1:11-12).

Lindblom’s final category is the literary vision, in which “a prophet receives an inspiration in the form of a visual creation of the imagination” (Lindblom, 141). The prophet is not “seeing” a vision in an ecstatic state, but rather is “producing” a vision in literary form. Examples of this are the visions in Zechariah 1–2; 6:1–8, which Lindblom argues are “products of the imagination of the prophet, although he was in a state of inspiration” (Lindblom, 145).

Lindblom’s categorization is based on the inner psychology of the prophetic experience. However, the biblical texts often do not provide sufficient information to determine what “actually” happened in the mind of the prophet, and the method must rely on a speculative reconstruction of the “original” prophetic experience by supposition, analogy and inference.

2.2. Burke Long (Typology). Building on the earlier work of M. Sister and F. Horst, Long identifies three types of “vision reports.” Long’s first type is the “oracle vision,” marked by a “short report, dominated by question-and-answer dialogue, wherein the visionary image is simple and unidimensional, providing an occasion for oracle” (Long, 357). Examples include Jeremiah 1:11–14; 24:1–1; Amos 7:7–8; 8:1–2; Zechariah 5:1–4.

Long’s second type is the “dramatic word vision,” marked by “a report which depicts a heavenly scene, or a dramatic action, a situation altogether supramundane taken as a portent presaging a future event in the mundane realm” (Long, 359). Examples include 1 Kings 22:17, 19–22; Isaiah 6; Jeremiah 38:21–22; Ezekiel 9:1–10; Amos 7:1–6; Zechariah 1:8–17.

Long’s final type is the “revelatory mysteries vision,” marked by “a report whose basic intent is to convey in veiled form, secrets of divine activity and events of the future. Visionary imagery is symbolic, sometimes bizarre, and there is always a pattern of dialogue whose purpose is to decipher its esoteric significance” (Long, 363). Examples include Daniel 8; 10–12; Zechariah 2:3–4; 4:1–14; 5:5–8; and the extrabiblical visions in 2 Baruch 22–30; 36–37; 3 Baruch; 4 Ezra 9:26–10:59; 11–12; 13.

S. Amsler rightly comments that typological approaches such as those of Sister, Horst and Long are based on artificial and overlapping classifications (Amsler, 363n8). These classifications are imposed on, rather than emerge from, the visions.

2.3. Susan Niditch (Tradition History). Ni-ditch’s monograph The Symbolic Vision in Biblical Tradition differs from earlier works both because the focus is restricted to “symbolic visions” in particular, and also because it seeks to analyze the diachronic development of this tradition. Niditch identifies twelve “symbolic visions” as participants in one formal tradition and argues that this form has undergone three main stages of development in the biblical tradition.

The first stage, encompassing Amos 7:7–9 (plumb line), Amos 8:1–3 (ripe fruit), Jeremiah 1:11–12 (almond branch), Jeremiah 1:13–19 (boiling pot) and Jeremiah 24 (fig baskets), is characterized by simple form, style and content elements and a metaphorical symbolic usage (i.e., a symbol signifies X).

The second stage encompasses five visions of Zechariah (Zech 5:1–4; 4:1–6a, 10b–14; 2:1–4; 1:7–17; 6:1–8 [listed in order of formal development]) that, Niditch argues, demonstrate important developments in the form of the symbolic vision.

Taken as a group, Zechariah visions VI (scroll), V (menorah), II (horns), I (horse-rider teams), and VIII (horse-chariot teams) reflect other significant trends in the development of the symbolic vision form. One is the movement from the economical-rhetorical style, found in Amos and Jeremiah, to a more clearly prose medium. The lessening of concern with traditional-style repetition and with economy of language, key factors in the earliest stage of the form, is evident in all the Zechariah visions to varying degrees.

Secondly, Zechariah’s visions evidence increasing mythologization both in the symbol objects and in the way the symbols are related to their meanings. One might compare the stationary, mundane, non-ritualistic symbol objects of Amos and Jeremiah with the flying scroll of vision VI or the temple paraphernalia of V. The symbols of Zechariah visions II (horns), I (horse-rider) and VIII (horse-chariot) are explained within their own mythic terms; they are not declared a representation of something else. The “symbol = itself” equation in the visions of Zechariah is evidence of genuine mythic mentality. (Niditch, 74)

The third stage encompasses Daniel 7; 8; 2 Baruch 35–43; 53–76; 4 Ezra 11:1–12:39; 13:1–53 and demonstrates the symbolic vision form at its baroque and narrative stage.

Niditch’s approach argues for an evolving development in the form of the symbolic vision, but the evolutionary trend for which she argues does not adequately account for all symbolic visions. For example, Niditch describes Zechariah 2:5–9 and Zechariah 5:5–11 as “experiments” that have “strayed off the mainstream of development” (Niditch, 10n22).

2.4. Achim Behrens (Form-Critical). In Prophe-tische Visionsschilderungen im Alten Testament, Behrens offers a form-critical analysis of the genre of the prophetic vision report (see Form Criticism). Building on the 1976 dissertation of S. Reimers (“Formgeschichte der profetischen Visionsberichte”), Behrens argues that a prophetic vision report consists of two elements, the vision proper and the subsequent dialogue between the prophet and a heavenly figure, and that each of these elements typically shares a common form.

The vision element begins with the verb rāʾā (“to see”), usually in the Hiphil, with the Lord as the subject. This is typically followed by wēhinnēh (“and behold!”), which introduces a nominal “surprise clause” (Überraschungssatz) describing the content of vision.

The dialogue element usually begins with a wayyiqtol form of ʾāmar (“to say”), followed by a question if the speaker is the prophet or an imperative if the speaker is a heavenly figure. The dialogue always ends with a final word spoken by the heavenly figure. Table 1 demonstrates this pattern, using Amos 7:1-3:

Vision	verb rāʾā (“to see”)	“This is what the Lord God causes me to see [rāʾā Hiphil].”
	wēhinnēh + surprise clause	“And behold! [wēhinnēh] . . . he was preparing swarms of locusts after the king’s share had been harvested and just as the second crop was coming up.”
Dialogue	a wayyiqtol form of ʾāmar (“to say”)	“And when they had finished eating all of the greenery, I cried out [wāʾōmar].”
	question / imperative	“Lord God, forgive! How can Jacob survive? He is so small!”
	final word	“So the LORD relented. ‘This will not happen,’ the LORD said.”

Table 1. Vision and Dialogue Pattern in Amos 7:1-3

Behrens identifies thirty-one prophetic vision reports and provides a detailed analysis of thirty of them (Amos 7:1-3; 7:4-6; 7:7-8; 8:1-2; 9:1-4; Jer 1:11-12, 13-14; 24:1-10; Isa 6:1-11; Ezek 1:4—2:8; 2:9—3:9; 8:2-6; 8:7-13; 8:14-15; 8:16-18; 9:1-11; 11:17-25; 37:1-14; 43:1-9; Zech 1:7-15; 2:1-4; 2:5-9; 3:1-10; 4:1-14; 5:1-4; 5:5-11; 6:1-8; 1 Kings 22:17; 22:19-22; Dan 8:3-14; 10:5-14; 12:5-7 [listed according to the order of analysis by Behrens]; Ezek 43:1-9 is not included within the scope of his analysis). Behrens finds that these vision reports exhibit a high degree of conformity to the formal pattern described above, while noting some consistent variations (e.g., the vision reports that do not use a wēhinnēh surprise clause instead use rāʾā with the direct object marker [see 1 Kings 22:17, 19; Is 6:1; Amos 9:1; Zech 3:1]).

Behrens concludes that there are two streams of development in the tradition history of the prophetic vision report. The first stream commences with the visions in Amos 7—8, the oldest examples of the genre of the prophetic vision report. The influence of these visions on the developing tradition can be seen in Jeremiah 1:11-14 (word play like Amos 8:1-2) and Jeremiah 24:1 (Hiphil form of rāʾā). Jeremiah’s visions have in turn influenced Ezekiel’s vision in Ezekiel 2:9—3:9. The second tradition stream, which has the “throne vision” as a core motif, runs through Isaiah 6; 1 Kings 22:17, 19; Amos 9:1-4 and flows into Ezekiel 1:4—2:8a. Behrens argues that these two streams of tradition coalesce in Ezekiel 1—3, to which the visions in Ezekiel 8—11 add a priestly influence. Both Zechariah and Daniel then make use of this vision form (Behrens, 382-84). Behrens also concludes that there is a gradual and progressive disappearance from the visions of Yahweh, who is replaced by the emergence of intermediary beings (Behrens, 384).

Behrens’s work is the most thorough analysis of the form of the prophetic vision report to date, and it advances our understanding in important and helpful ways. However, it also demonstrates the problems inherent with any attempt to use formal criteria alone to define the genre, because these criteria can be, at the same time, both too narrow (excluding some valid prophetic visions) and too broad (including nonvisions). The prophetic vision in Daniel 7 is an example of the first problem.

This chapter is Daniel's report of his vision (hēzû, Aramaic equivalent of hāzôn) of four beasts, the Ancient of Days and one like a son of man. In the vision, Daniel asks a heavenly figure for the interpretation of what he sees, which is then given to him. Daniel 7 is manifestly the report of a prophetic vision, but it is not in the form of a prophetic vision report. Behrens describes Daniel 7 as sui generis (Behrens, 317). Exodus 3 provides an example of the opposite problem. God's appearance in the burning bush satisfies all of the formal elements in Behrens's schema. It begins with rā'â + wēhinnēh + a nominal surprise clause ("And Moses looked [rā'â], and behold [wēhinnēh]: the bush was burning in the fire, but it was not consumed" [Ex 3:2]). It contains a dialogue that begins with a wayyiqtol form of 'amar and contains both an imperative ("Take off your sandals") and a question ("Who am I, that I should go to Pharaoh?"), and in which the Lord has the final word. The fact that Exodus 3 satisfies all of Behrens's markers of the form suggests that formal criteria alone cannot be relied on to delineate the boundaries of the genre of the prophetic vision.

2.5. The Genre of the Prophetic Vision. We have seen that the genre of the "prophetic vision"/"prophetic vision report" cannot be defined exclusively by any set of formal criteria. What constitutes a prophetic vision must be decided with reference to content, and not merely with reference to form. For the purpose of the analysis that follows, a prophetic vision is a revelation that comes to a prophet by means of a visible or visualised experience.

However, the formal criteria (particularly those identified by Behrens) remain very useful because they identify a "normal" pattern to which a vision will conform to a greater or lesser degree. In the following overview of the prophetic visions in the OT, these formal criteria help to identify the particularities and peculiarities of each vision.

3. Prophetic Visions in the Old Testament.

3.1. Amos 7:1-3; 7:4-6; 7:7-9; 8:1-2; 9:1-4. Amos 7—9 contains five visions, structured as two pairs and a separate final vision. The first four visions are similar in form, with near identical opening ("Thus the Lord God/he showed me, and behold"). The fifth vision is shorter, commencing with "I saw."

The first vision (locusts that devour the land [Amos 7:1-3]) and second vision (fire that devours the land [Amos 7:4-6]) are alike in that both record a vision of judgment, the intercession of the prophet Amos, and the announcement that the Lord relents from bringing judgment. The next pair of visions offers no such escape from judgment. In the third vision (a wall tested with a plumb line [Amos 7:7-9]), the Lord declares, "I am setting a plumb line among my people Israel; I will spare them no longer." The ominous refrain "I will spare them no longer" is repeated in the fourth vision (a basket of summer fruit [Amos 8:1-2]). This vision involves a word play that is difficult to capture in English: the prophet sees "summer fruit" (qāyis), and the Lord announces that it is "time" (qēs). The final vision (Amos 9:1-4) reinforces the message of inevitable judgment of the previous two visions. In this vision, Amos sees the Lord standing beside the altar, issuing orders for the destruction of the *temple and judgment on the people, from which "not one will get away, none will escape."

There is continuing debate about the relationship between these five visions and the message of the rest of the book of Amos. There are various explanations of the connections between "vision" and "oracle" generally, the function of the third-person biographical account in Amos 7:10-17, which comes between the third and fourth visions, and the function of the oracles in Amos 8:3-14, which come between the fourth and fifth visions. However, most scholars tend to recognize a tight literary integration of the visions with the wider context of the book, irrespective of any prior oral or literary forms. As J. Watts rightly concludes, "'Vision' and 'word' belong together. The prophet's message cannot be understood apart from those great moments when God revealed his counsel and the prophet was allowed to see eternal meaning in temporal appearance" (Watts, 86).

3.2. 1 Kings 22:17, 19-22. 1 Kings 22 records two visions of the prophet Micaiah. In the first, Micaiah has a vision of "all Israel scattered on the hills like sheep without a shepherd." As the Lord explains, the people are like this "because they have no master" (due to the prophesied death of Ahab).

The second vision recounts Micaiah's vision of the *divine council, in which he sees “the LORD sitting on his throne with all the host of heaven standing around him on his right and on his left.” In this vision, one of the heavenly beings offers to be a lying spirit in the mouth of Ahab’s prophets in order to entice Ahab to his death at Ramoth Gilead. According to Jeremiah 23:18, access to the divine council is the mark of all true prophecy: “But which of them has stood in the council of the LORD to see or to hear his word? Who has listened and heard his word?”

3.3. Isaiah 6:1-11. Isaiah 6:1-11 is an example of a prophetic vision that is also the prophet’s call/commissioning (on the genre of the call narrative, see Habel). This vision departs from the standard form, in that the direct object marker (rather than wēhinnēh) is used to denote that which was seen. The prophet Isaiah sees a theophanic vision of the Lord in his heavenly temple. The prophet becomes a participant in this visionary scene, as he is first cleansed of his sin and guilt and then volunteers to be sent out to speak a message of judgment on behalf of the Lord. This vision of the “heavenly council” has elements in common with other texts in this setting (e.g., 1 Kings 22:17, 19; Job 1—2; Ps 82; Zech 3:1-10) (see Tidwell, 347-52).

Other prophetic calls similarly occur in the context of a vision. For example, the visions in Jeremiah 1 are embedded in Jeremiah’s prophetic call, Ezekiel’s call is bound up with the vision complex in Ezekiel 1—3, and the first “night vision” in Zechariah 1:8-17 functions as the call and commissioning of the prophet Zechariah (see Beuken 1967, 239-44).

3.4. Jeremiah 1:11-12; 1:13-14; 4:23-26; 24:1-10; 38:21-23. Jeremiah 1 contains two visions based on a “What do you see?” dialogue, which are similar in form to Amos 7:8; 8:2. The first is a vision of an almond tree (Jer 1:11-12), which, like Amos 8:1-2, depends on word play: the vision of an “almond tree” (šāqēd) points to the fact that the Lord is “watching” (šōqēd) to see his word fulfilled. The second is a vision of a boiling pot, tilting from the north, which symbolizes destruction coming from the north that is about to be poured out on Judah and Jerusalem.

This same “What do you see?” pattern is used and developed in Jeremiah 24:1-10, in which Jeremiah sees two baskets of figs, one good and the other bad. After seeing these two baskets, Jeremiah declares “the word of the LORD” that the good figs represent the exiles who have been taken to Babylon, and the bad figs represent those who will remain in the land or go to Egypt. In addition to these three visions in this form, Jeremiah records two other vision experiences. In Jeremiah 4:23-26 the prophet sees a vision of the “decreation” of the heavens and earth, laid waste by the Lord’s anger, and in Jeremiah 38:21-23 he recounts to Zedekiah a vision of the future that the Lord has shown him, in which the women of Jerusalem denounce Zedekiah for his misplaced trust.

Jeremiah’s visions (on which, see Zimmerli) are a vital part of the book’s message because they highlight one of the book’s key themes: the connection between “the word of the LORD” and true prophecy. In Jeremiah 23:28 the Lord declares, “Let the prophet who has a dream [hālôm] tell his dream, but let the one who has my word speak it faithfully. For what has straw to do with grain?” Some have taken this to mean that in the era of “classical” prophecy prophetic visions and dreams were not recognized as valid. For example, J. Barton quotes this verse and then concludes, “This appears to imply that true revelations from Yahweh do not come in visions or dreams” (Barton, ABD 5:493). This cannot be Jeremiah’s point, since this would invalidate the prophet’s own visions. Rather, Jeremiah’s critique of “prophet dreamer” in this verse is part of his wider condemnation of “the prophets.” In the book of Jeremiah the “true” prophets are always designated as the Lord’s prophets (e.g., “my servants the prophets,” “his servants the prophets”). In contrast, the prophets who speak falsehood are always referred to merely as “the prophets.” The “prophets” with their dreams in Jeremiah 23:28 are the same as the “prophets” in Jeremiah 23:16, who “speak visions [hāzôn] from their own hearts, not from the mouth of the LORD.” These so-called prophets have not “stood in the council of the LORD to see or to hear his word” (Jer 23:18). Jeremiah 23:28 is not a denunciation of all visions and dreams per se but rather is an attack on the false dreamers. From the outset, the reader knows that Jeremiah is not this type of prophet, since his visions are a revelation from the Lord of the *word of the Lord. This point is underlined by the formula “the word of the LORD was to me, saying,” which introduces visions in Jeremiah 1:11, 13; 24:4.

3.5. Ezekiel 1:1—2:8; 2:9—3:9; 8—11; 37:1-14; 40—48, Especially 43:1-9. Ezekiel 1—3 contains a vision complex in two parts. Ezekiel 1:1—2:8 recounts Ezekiel’s vision of the four fiery living creatures that support a throne, above which Ezekiel sees “the likeness of the glory of the LORD.” The theme of the “glory of the LORD” unites the three main vision complexes of the book (see Ezek 1:28; 3:23; 10:4, 18; 11:23; 43:4-5) and provides a major theological theme of the book: where is the glory of the Lord to be found? As T. Renz notes, this opening vision is foundational for what follows: the dark overtones of the storm and throne room theophany in the vision evokes biblical traditions of judgment that prepare the reader for the message of the first half of the book, and the cherubim chariot stresses the mobility of the Lord that is presupposed by the visions in Ezekiel 8—11 (Renz, 63-64). In Ezekiel 2:9—3:9 the focus shifts to Ezekiel’s reception of the word of the Lord, as the prophet is given a scroll inscribed with words of lament and mourning and woe and is commissioned to speak this word to the house of Israel. Ezekiel’s positive reception of the word of the Lord stands in stark contrast to the “rebellious house” of Israel.

Ezekiel 8—11 is a single vision composed of several scenes. Ezekiel is transported to Jerusalem, and, as in the first vision, he has a vision of the glory of the Lord enthroned above the living creatures (now identified as cherubim). Ezekiel is shown a worsening progression of “detestable” idolatry (Ezek 8), which brings judgment on the people of Jerusalem (Ezek 9) and causes the glory of the Lord to depart from his sanctuary (Ezek 10—11). This vision is a graphic announcement of impending judgment on Jerusalem, which will be reiterated by sign act and prophecy in the succeeding chapters.

The remaining visions in the book of Ezekiel are of a new Israel and a transformed society. In Ezekiel 37:1-14 the prophet sees the revivification of the valley of dry bones, representing the restoration of slain house of Israel. Ezekiel 40—48 is a complex of “visions of God” (Ezek 40:2) that unpack the promise of Ezekiel 37:24-28 and in which Ezekiel sees a renewed temple and city. A central part of this vision complex is the vision in Ezekiel 43:1-9, which reverses the effect of Ezekiel 8—11, as Ezekiel sees the glory of the Lord return to the temple. As H. Parunak concludes, “Chaps. 40-48 [emphasize] the restoration of the people to their land and the renewal of their cultus and of the Lord’s presence in their midst. The temple tour format of 8-11, including the adapted chariot vision as the bearer of the Lord, are changed from images of judgment to symbols of blessing” (Parunak, 74).

3.6. Zechariah 1:7-15; 2:1-4; 2:5-9; 3:1-10; 4:1-6a + 10b-14; 5:1-4; 5:5-11; 6:1-8. Zechariah 1—6 contains a sequence of eight visions, usually described as Zechariah’s “night visions” because they are introduced by the somewhat cryptic words “I saw the night” (Zech 1:8).

The vision sequence in Zechariah 1—6 has inherited its form from multiple sources. There are striking formal connections with Genesis 31:10-12. The phrase in Genesis 31:10 “and I lifted up my eyes and I looked in my dream and behold” provides the formal template for the majority of the night visions, and the otherwise curious departure from form in Zechariah’s seventh vision (which begins instead with the imperative “Lift up your eyes and look”) follows the pattern of Genesis 31:12.

However, Genesis 31 explains only some elements of the form of Zechariah’s visions. Two of the visions in Zechariah 4 and Zechariah 5 use the same “What do you see?” dialogue pattern utilized in Amos and Jeremiah, and as Niditch demonstrates, Zechariah 1—6 draws more widely on the tradition of the symbolic vision from both Amos and Jeremiah. Furthermore, Zechariah’s “angelic interpreter” seems to be a development of the man in Ezekiel’s vision who interprets the meaning of the visions (see, e.g., Ezek 47:1-12). Also akin to Ezekiel, the visions in Zechariah 1—6 are first-person vision reports (on the nature of Zechariah’s vision report, see Tiemeyer).

The “Joshua” vision in Zechariah 3 is different from the other night visions. Rather than drawing on the Amos/Jeremiah tradition, this vision bears striking similarities to scenes of the divine council like Isaiah 6 and 1 Kings 22. The connection with Isaiah 6 is especially strong: both passages denote that which is seen by the prophet using a direct object marker with a participial construction rather than the typical “surprise clause”; both omit the expected “I lifted my eyes and looked”; both have the prophet become a participant in the scene (see Is 6:8; Zech 3:5); both describe a cleansing from sin of an identified historical person. The Joshua vision in Zechariah 3 has been given a different form because it (like Is 6) is not merely a symbolic vision, but also a symbolic act that involves the prophet. The difference in function is marked by a difference in form.

The central theme of Zechariah’s eight night visions and interpreting oracles is that the Lord is returning to dwell in the temple in Jerusalem. The visions are concentric, both starting and ending with visions of horses going throughout the earth. There are clear (antithetical) parallels between the first three visions and the last three. In the first three visions the cumulative picture is of the return of the Lord and his people to Jerusalem, centred on the Lord’s house. These three visions encourage and enable a movement of God’s people toward Jerusalem. In contrast, the final three visions describe those who are “going out” (yōšē’ōt [Zech 5:3; 5:6; 6:1])—a movement away from Jerusalem in which *sin and iniquity are purged from the land and relocated to Babylon to a “house” to be built for it there. The eight night visions are represented diagrammatically in table 2.

Table 2. The Pattern of Zechariah’s Night Visions

These six visions form a frame around two central visions: the fourth vision (Zech 3) about Joshua as the “temple priest” and the fifth vision (Zech 4) about Zerubbabel the “temple builder.” These two visions describe the means by which sin is banished and the Lord will return to Zion. As a whole, these eight visions focus on the temple as the means by which the Lord will again dwell in the midst of his people in Jerusalem. The oracles embedded within the night visions and the oracle that concludes the sequence (Zech 6:9-15) work together with the eight night visions to depict and describe the imminent fulfilment of certain key promises of the “former prophets,” especially the return of God and his people to Jerusalem (visions one through three), the restoration of priesthood, temple and Davidic line (visions four and five + Zech 6:9-15), and the removal of sin and idolatry (visions six through eight) (see Stead, 127-32, 185-87, 212-14).

3.7. Daniel 7:2-28; 8:3-14; 10:5-14; 12:5-7. Like the visions the book of Zechariah, the visions in the book of Daniel incorporate both formal elements and motifs from other visions. For example, the visions that begin in Daniel 8:3 and Daniel 10:5 are introduced with the phrase “I lifted up my eyes and looked, and behold,” which is typical of Zechariah’s night visions. Similarly, the figure described as “a man dressed in linen” (Dan 10:5) is a development of a similar figure in Ezekiel 9:2. However, other parts of Daniel’s visions are without parallel. Daniel 7 recounts a vision that came by way of a dream and shares none of the formal markers of a vision as identified by Behrens. All of Daniel’s visions are recounted in the first person as vision/dream reports.

The visions in Daniel 7—12 straddle the language divide of the book: *Aramaic (Dan 2:4b—7:28) and *Hebrew (Dan 8—12). Daniel 7 provides a bridge between the court tales of Daniel 1—6 and the succeeding visions in Daniel 8—12. The court tales involve dreams and their interpretations (Dan 2; 4), and Daniel 7 is both dream and vision (see Dan 7:1). This bridging function perhaps explains why Daniel 7 is written in Aramaic, as its language reinforces its connection with Daniel 2—6, whereas its form links it with Daniel 8—12 (see Collins 1977, 17-19).

There is a chiasmic arrangement to Daniel 2—7 (Lenglet; Collins 1977, 11-12), with the vision of the four kingdoms in Daniel 7 corresponding to the statue in Nebuchadnezzar’s dream in Daniel 2. At the same time, the “symbolic vision” form in Daniel 7 is closely mirrored by Daniel 8 (see Lucas, 32-33, developing Collins 1993, 54-55).

Daniel 7 records a “vision” (Aram hēzû) of four beasts that represent four kingdoms. In his dream Daniel sees the fourth beast (kingdom) destroyed by the Ancient of Days, after which one “like a son of man” approaches the Ancient of Days and is given all authority, glory and power. Daniel is disturbed by these visions, so he asks “one of those standing there,” who then gives Daniel the interpretation of the dream (Dan 7:17-27).

Like the vision in Daniel 7, Daniel 8 involves a vision and an interpretation given by a heavenly being. As one named “Gabriel” explains (Dan 8:20-21), the twin-horned ram in the vision represents the kings of Media and Persia, and the goat represents the king of Greece. The vision recorded in Daniel 8 is set in the reign of the sacrilegious Belshazzar (Dan 8:1; cf. Dan 5:4), but the content of the vision is addressed to a much later period, when another sacrilegious ruler (Antiochus) would threaten God’s people. As J. Goldingay notes, Daniel 8 provides the context for the remaining visions: “The explanation of the symbolic vision in chap. 8 actually explains little, and this prepares the way for the following vision(s). Verse 8:27b thus leads into chaps. 9 and 10-12, which offer further reaffirmation and more explanation of the vision’s fundamental perspective. The chapter’s connection with the exile (its setting in the reign of the sacrilegious Belshazzar) links with the focus on the question—how long is this exile to last?—that concerns chap. 9. Its epiphany and detailed quasi-prophecies are paralleled on a larger scale by those of chaps. 10-12” (Goldingay, 208). Daniel 10–12 records a vision complex in which a heavenly figure, whom Daniel describes as “a man dressed in linen,” outlines for Daniel the “great war” (Dan 10:1) that is to take place between Persia and Greece and their successors, and in particular what the “King of the North” will do to the “beautiful land.”

The visions in Daniel 7–12 are the only fully developed examples of *apocalyptic literature in the OT. Some of the apocalyptic features found in these visions include a radical dualism between good and evil, a revelation that is mediated by an otherworldly being to a human recipient, animal and number symbolism and visions of the heavenly realms (see Collins 1979, 21-59). It is important that both the stories and the visions of book of Daniel are read together as providing complementary perspectives rather than opposing viewpoints. As E. Lucas notes, “The apocalyptic worldview of the visions is a development from the worldview of the stories, not a radical departure from it” (Lucas, 314).

WARFARE AND DIVINE WARFARE

Divine warfare is a recurrent theme in the prophetic literature of ancient Israel: God combats malevolent forces for and within the nation. Biblical use of the leitmotif reflects Israel's early theological traditions, engagement of other cultures, and victories and defeats.

1. Definition.

A useful starting point in the study of divine warfare is general warfare, which, for purposes of this article, is defined as violent conflict between nations over sovereignty and justice. General warfare is violent and involves the infliction of harm on an adversary, even harm resulting in death. It is also international or intertribal; it is not violence by or against individuals, families or small groups per se unless the social group represents the nation or tribe. In addition, warfare is political. States make war to defend or to gain territory, to secure access to resources, to enforce compliance with treaties, to maintain honor, or to ensure the conduct of internal affairs without external interferences. Wars demonstrate boundaries of control, and they are waged to protect the rights and properties of state and citizenry and to remedy injustices, inhumane conditions and crimes against humanity. The nonpsychological motivations in general warfare are economic and ideological: territorial sovereignty and civil justice.

Divine warfare, which also is violent, international and political, is waged under the aegis of a deity. The deity is envisioned to be a warrior who leads the army, engages the enemy, and protects the favored. Divine warfare is also cosmic: it involves natural and supernatural forces, terrestrial and celestial realms, and primordial, historical and *apocalyptic elements. At stake are not merely the reign of the monarch and safety of the nation, but the honor of the deity and the order of universe. Divine warfare may be defined as violent conflict between a deity and a preternatural, malevolent adversary, or between nation-states fighting under the aegis of patron deities, that demonstrates sovereignty and effects justice. In divine warfare a deity battles an evil antagonist, and in OT prophetic literature it is the God of Israel who assumes the role of warrior and engages adversaries of Israel and the divine order.

2. Etiology.

The idea of divine warfare is related to the outcomes and consequences of battle, which are unpredictable and often unintended. This theory is extrapolated from C. von Clausewitz's seminal work, On War, though the volume is not about divine warfare per se. Von Clausewitz defines war as "the continuation of policy by other means" (von Clausewitz, 87). The means to which he refers are violent actions that end lives, damage bodies, displace communities, destroy properties, harm environments and alter identities (Ames 2011). The violence is an extension of political process—"the continuation of policy" (German, Politik)—albeit an extreme extension. Warfare is the realpolitik of conflict resolution located on a continuum that devolves from resolution by consensus, to judgment by a third party, to bargaining by the principals, and, if they are intractable, to armed conflict resolved by the army that can inflict and sustain the greatest damage (Morgan; Fox). Might, according to the adage, determines right, though power does not constitute virtue and does not guarantee the outcome of battle. Military strength and strategy are critical factors, but they are not decisive. Von Clausewitz recognized that military campaigns are complex endeavors, and that nontrivial outcomes cannot be predicted with certainty. Victory is contingent upon elements beyond human control (e.g., weather) and is not always determined by the deployment of superior forces and the implementation of sound tactics. The outcomes and even the objectives of war depend on factors that politicians, commanders and citizens can never fully anticipate or manage. This observation suggests an explanation for the prevalence of the divine warfare throughout the ancient Near Eastern world: because the outcome of armed conflict depends on factors beyond human control, victory, when achieved, is attributed to the intervention of a higher power. The deity grants victory, and defeat is attributed to abandonment by the divine patron, typically due to transgression within the community. Thus, the outcome of battle is made contingent upon morality, not strategy.

The sages of ancient Israel recognized unpredictable elements in warfare and acknowledged the limits of human control, and they attributed Israel's victories to Yahweh, *God of Israel. The idea is expressed in the biblical proverb "The horse is made ready for the day of battle, but the victory belongs to the LORD" (Prov 21:31 NRSV). Resources and preparations are necessary but are not sufficient for the day, for God must intervene, and the people must follow God. The OT prophets attributed military achievements to Yahweh (Jer 51:14; Zeph 3:17), reaffirming one of Israel's oldest theological traditions: God is a warrior who fights for the nation (Ex 15:3; Deut 20:4; Judg 15:18).

3. Ancient Near Eastern Context.

Literary traditions and historic conflicts in the ancient Near Eastern world provide a framework for understanding divine warfare in OT prophetic literature.

3.1. Literary Traditions. Ancient Near Eastern literary analogs to the biblical leitmotif are "significant" (Kang, 7). For instance, Assyrian and Israelite prophetic texts abound with oracles assuring that the divine warrior will safeguard the nation and grant victory in a time of war, and those facing the enemy are commanded not to fear (Nissinen, 97-132): "Fear not, Esarhaddon! I will place you between my arm and forearm. In the midst of distress, I will va[nqu]ish the enemies of my king" (SAA 9 2.5 iii 29-32); "Do not fear, for I am with you, do not be afraid, for I am your God; I will strengthen you, I will help you, I will uphold you with my victorious right hand" (Is 41:10 NRSV).

The Sumerian Stela of the Vultures depicts Ningirsu wielding mace and net to conquer an invading army in a dispute over tillable lands. One side of the stela portrays the actions of Ningirsu, the patron deity of the city of Lagash, and the other the actions of Eanatum, the ruler of the city. The design captures the confluence of divine and human realms: the battle is fought by the ruler on earth with outcome determined by the deity in heaven (Lang, 47-48; Hamblin, 55-59).

The epilogue of the Laws of Hammurabi (xlix 18-li 91) is replete with gods whom Hammurabi invokes to destroy anyone who disregards his instructions or defaces his image, and the list includes warrior deities such as Zababa, Nergal and Ishtar. Hammurabi asks that Ishtar "smash his [adversary's] weapon on the field of war and battle, plunge him into confusion and rebellion, strike down his warriors, drench the earth with their blood, make a heap of the corpses of his soldiers upon the plain, and may she [Ishtar] show his soldiers no mercy; as for him, may she deliver him into the hand of his enemies, and may she lead him bound captive to the land of his enemy" (COS 2.131: 353).

The Exaltation of Inanna (iv 29-31) celebrates the military prowess of the goddess, who charges into battle in the guise of a storm—a common motif in divine warfare. The link between storm and battle in the ancient Near Eastern divine warfare motif is prominent in the mythology of the storm-god Baal, who rides the clouds into battle: "Ba'lu (himself) opens up the rift in the clouds, Ba'lu emits his holy voice, Ba'lu makes the thunder roll over and over again. His [holy] voice [causes] the earth [to tremble], [at his thunder] the mountains shake with fear. . . . The high places of the earth totter. Ba'lu's enemies grasp hold of (the trees of) the forest, Haddu's adversaries (grasp hold of) the flanks of the mountain(s)" (vii 25-37 [COS 1.86: 262-63]).

In the Baal Cycle the storm-god (Baal) defeats the sea-god (Yam) (iv 18-27). The metaphor of the tumultuous sea is a common trope. The armies rise and threaten like raging waters, which the divine warrior either stirs or stills. In ancient Near Eastern creation mythology the divine warrior battles sea monsters and constrains chaotic waters to create the primordial world. In the Creation Epic (iv 1-146) it is Marduk, the champion of Babylon, who defeats and dismembers the sea monster Tiamat to create the new world. The parallel between the creation of the universe and the defeat of the mythological sea monster (also called "Leviathan" and "Rahab") is evident in the Teaching of Merikare: "He made sky and earth for their sake, He subdued the water monster, He made breath for their noses to live" (COS 1.35:65, line 131).

Ancient Near Eastern metaphors of storm and sea are woven into biblical references to divine warfare. The God of Israel emerges from the clouds and attacks tumultuous armies, for Israel's divine warrior rules the skies and the seas. Nations that attack Israel are portrayed as raging storms and roaring waters that Yahweh must still (Is 17:12-14). Yahweh rides the clouds into battle (Is 19:1; 28:2; 29:6) and strikes enemies with hail and lightning: "The LORD will cause his majestic voice to be heard and the descending blow of his arm to be seen, in furious anger and a flame of devouring fire, with a cloudburst and tempest and hailstones" (Is 30:30 NRSV [cf. Is 29:6]). Anticipating a coming day of battle, Isaiah draws upon the mythological metaphors of the ancient Near East and declares, "On that day the LORD with his cruel and great and strong sword will punish Leviathan the fleeing serpent, Leviathan the twisting serpent, and he will kill the dragon that is in the sea" (Is 27:1 NRSV [cf. Is 30:7; 51:9-10]).

From the perspective of Israel's prophets, the power that created heaven and earth is the power that governs military conflicts, delivering the people of Israel from other nations and from unrighteous propensities within Israel, for Yahweh created the universe and rules the world with justice.

3.2. Historic Conflicts. Biblical perspectives on divine warfare reflect the embattled histories of Israel and Judah and the implications of victories and defeats.

The exodus from Egypt and the conquest of Canaan demonstrated that Yahweh is a warrior who fights to free the people of Israel and to secure a bountiful land for them. The Song of Moses, which celebrates the freedom of the formerly enslaved Hebrews, declares, "The LORD is a warrior" (Ex 15:3). The historical prologue of Deuteronomy reminded subsequent generations that the Lord formed the nation "by trials, by signs and wonders, by war, by a mighty hand and an outstretched arm, and by terrifying displays of power" (Deut 4:34 NRSV). The book of Joshua applies the "divine warrior" motif to Israel's occupation of Canaan, reporting that no one could turn back the invasion because God fought on the side of the Israelite army (Josh 23:9-10). Because Yahweh fought for the nation, Joshua was able to capture the "whole" land and establish *peace (Josh 11:23). The motif of the divine warrior in the biblical prophets builds upon the *exodus and conquest tradition that Yahweh fights for the nation. In Isaiah, for instance, the nation of Israel is told that it need not fear the Assyrians any more than it feared the Egyptians in the days of Moses, for Yahweh will destroy the empire (Is 10:24-26).

The fall of Samaria to the Assyrians in 721 BC (2 Kings 18:9-12), the fall of Jerusalem to the Babylonians in 586 BC (2 Kings 25:1-20), and the Persian defeat of the Babylonian Empire in 538 BC demonstrated that Yahweh would fight against the unrighteous, even if the unrighteous happened to be the people of Israel and Judah. These conquests also showed that armed forces unleashed by Yahweh must act with restraint, for all nations are subject to judgment for inhumanity borne of hubris. In the book of Isaiah, Yahweh refers to Assyria as "the rod of my anger" and declares, "The club in their hands is my fury" (Is 10:5 NRSV). Yahweh sent the Assyrians against Israel and Judah "to take spoil and seize plunder and to tread down" (Is 10:6b NRSV), but the political objectives of the Assyrians went beyond Yahweh's goal, for the Assyrians intended "to destroy" Israel and Judah (Is 10:7). For this reason, Yahweh intended to "punish the arrogant boasting of the king of Assyria" (Is 10:12b NRSV). The Babylonians, though they served as instruments of divine wrath, would also experience divine wrath due to their excesses: because they plundered, they would be plundered (Hab 2:8). Victories experienced early in the history of Israel and defeats experienced later provide a framework for understanding the dynamics of divine warfare.

4. Representative Texts in the Prophets.

The defining components of divine warfare can be observed in the book of Zephaniah, which inveighs against social corruptions and religious perversions that were condemned by Josiah's reform movement, around 621 bc (Zeph 1:1). The prophet announces a day of judgment that calls for repentance (Zeph 1:2—3:7) and a day of restoration that will bring celebration (Zeph 3:8-20). Yahweh is portrayed as a warrior who fights against the inhabitants of Jerusalem but who will also fight for the city, restore its exiled inhabitants, and live among them (Zeph 1:4; 3:17-20). First, the prophet envisions violence. Warfare on "the day of the LORD's wrath" (Zeph 1:18; 2:2-3) entails slaughter (with "sacrifice" used metaphorically in the text), pain and destruction (Zeph 1:7-8, 14-16); houses are razed; blood is spilt (Zeph 1:13, 17); and the complacent, who believed that Yahweh would not inflict harm (Zeph 1:12), are shown to be wrong. Second, nations, not individuals, are attacked. These include Judah, the Philistine city-states, Moab, Ammon, Ethiopia and Assyria (Zeph 1:4; 2:4-8, 12-13). Divine warfare, like general warfare, is portrayed as a matter of state, even though individuals endure the consequences. Third, issues of national sovereignty and civil justice are addressed. Warfare is waged because Zephaniah's Judeans had turned from Yahweh to follow foreign gods, including the Canaanite god Baal, the Ammonite god Milcom, and the Philistine god Dagon (Zeph 1:4-6, 9), while government and religious leaders have neglected to observe or enforce the law (Zeph 3:1-4). These acts of disloyalty challenge the sovereignty of Yahweh, who is also angered over instances of "violence and fraud" (Zeph 1:9), and these motivate the prosecution of war. Fourth, war is waged by God. In Zephaniah, Yahweh first discloses the coming onslaught of violence with seven first-person declarations, beginning with the statement "I will utterly sweep away everything from the face of the earth" (Zeph 1:2). The judgement is called the "day of the LORD" (e.g., Zeph 1:7, 14), and Yahweh is designated a warrior (Zeph 3:17). Fifth, though only Judah and a handful of neighboring countries are named, the conflagration in divine warfare is extensive and cosmic: "In the fire of his passion the whole earth shall be consumed" (Zeph 1:18b NRSV). The exaggerated language, of course, is poetic and may be hyperbole, but the exaggeration reflects the cosmic dimensions of divine warfare. According to Zephaniah, all earthly inhabitants perish, all earthly gods shrivel, and all nations praise *Zion.

In Isaiah, divine warfare is characterized as royal prerogative, for Yahweh reigns. Yahweh's role as divine warrior is related to his status as righteous sovereign, which is a double-edged sword because Yahweh corrects as well as protects the people of God. Isaiah 6:1-13 portrays Yahweh as a sovereign but offended monarch reigning from a heavenly throne, with royal robe flowing throughout the temple and filling the earth. The monarch sends Isaiah to issue a warning that the people of Israel would not heed "until [their] cities lie waste without inhabitant" (Is 6:11b). Yahweh intends to make war against unrighteous adversaries within and beyond the boundaries of Israel, for divine sovereignty encompasses all peoples. Isaiah 63:1-6 redeploys the symbolism of the royal robe in portraying Yahweh as warrior returning victoriously from Edom (Is 63:2-3). The prophet asks, "Why are your robes red, and your garments like theirs who tread the wine press?" Yahweh replies, "'I have trodden the wine press alone, and from the peoples no one was with me; I trod them in my anger and trampled them in my wrath; their juice spattered on my garments, and stained all my robes'" (Is 63:2-3 NRSV).

Yahweh opposes those who oppress Israel—a perspective that informs Isaiah's oracle against Babylon (Is 13:1—14:27). According to the oracle, Yahweh will personally summon an army of warriors (Is 13:2-5), the Medes, who will engage in violent slaughter and overthrow Babylon (Is 13:6-22): "Whoever is found will be thrust through, and whoever is caught will fall by the sword. Their infants will be dashed to pieces before their eyes; their houses will be plundered, and their wives ravished" (Is 13:15-16 NRSV). Thus, the offended sovereign will use organized violence to resolve a conflict that is both international and cosmic, a dispute both between Israel and Babylon and between the God of heaven and the nations of earth: the heavens will dim, and the earth will shake (Is 13:10-13). The oracle envisions exiled Israelites restored to their own land and exalted (Is 14:1-

2) and the fall of Babylon's king as a fall from heaven's heights to Sheol's depths (Is 14:12-20).

In Isaiah 45 the elements of divine warfare appear in Yahweh's speech to Cyrus, the Persian ruler who defeated Babylon. Yahweh directs the army of the ruler against other nations (Is 45:1) and prepares the way (Is 45:2). The ensuing victory demonstrates that Yahweh alone is god (Is 45:3-6), and deliverance rains down from the clouds and springs up from the deep, for the power of Yahweh created the world and brings *salvation (Is 45:8-12, 18-19).

Micah portrays Yahweh emerging from his holy *temple to trample the unrighteous in Israel and Judah (Mic 1:2-7, 10-16; cf. Mic 5:10-15), but God eventually will redeem (Mic 7:18-20). Hosea also envisions Yahweh waging divine war. Yahweh says, "I will come against the wayward people to punish them; and nations shall be gathered against them when they are punished for their double iniquity" (Hos 10:10 NRSV), and the sword falls not only on the men of Samaria, but also on women and children, born and unborn (Hos 13:16). Amos declares that Yahweh will defeat Israel and Judah (Amos 2:4-11), waging war against them as well as other nations guilty of war crimes (Amos 1:3—2:3). Yahweh, however, promises life to those who "seek good and not evil" (Amos 5:14; cf. Amos 9:8).

The theme of divine warfare is prominent in Habakkuk's *prayer (Hab 3), which expresses confidence that God will safeguard the lives of the righteous who exercise faith (Hab 2:4c). The prophet, having learned that God is rallying the warriors of Babylon to punish the unrighteous in Judah (Hab 1:2-11), has also received assurances of God's protection (Hab 2:1-20). One question that troubles Habakkuk is this: How can God use the unrighteous to punish the righteous? (Hab 1:13). Habakkuk's faith is expressed in a concluding prayer, a liturgical *lament, that asks God for mercy in the midst of *wrath (Hab 3:2b). The lament characterizes divine warfare as the onslaught of a storm: lightning flashes and brings death (Hab 3:3b-5, 9a, 11); thunder, winds and water destroy lands and dwellings (Hab 3:6-8, 10); and the wind-borne rider "tramples the sea" (Hab 3:14-15). The warrior God, however, enables the faithful to flee like deer (Hab 3:19).

The prophet Jeremiah also envisions Yahweh as a warrior. For instance, the message that Jeremiah sends to Zedekiah is a speech in which the God of Israel says, "I myself will fight against you" (Jer 21:5a NRSV), and elsewhere Jeremiah portrays Yahweh as the ultimate sovereign who is able to plan and to carry out wars at will (Jer 51:12). Yahweh is the "LORD of hosts," who is able to direct any army (Jer 51:14) and is able to do so because "it is he who made the earth by his power" (Jer 51:15 NRSV). Yahweh said this concerning the army of the Medes: "You are my war club, my weapon of battle: with you I smash nations; with you I destroy kingdoms; with you I smash the horse and its rider; with you I smash the chariot and the charioteer; with you I smash man and woman; with you I smash the old man and the boy; with you I smash the young man and the girl; with you I smash shepherds and their flocks; with you I smash farmers and their teams; with you I smash governors and deputies" (Jer 51:20-23 NRSV).

From the perspective of Israel's prophets, the armies of the nations are weapons in Yahweh's arsenal, but Yahweh the divine warrior also rides into battle with the army. Ezekiel's mysterious lightning storm that threatens from the north, and the wheels within wheels that make a tumultuous sound like an advancing army (Ezek 1:4-28), have glorious Yahweh in their midst (Ezek 1:28; 10:1-22). The vision draws upon the ancient Near Eastern imagery of the war chariot and the divine warrior riding upon the clouds. Visions of war also appear in Daniel, which strongly emphasizes the sovereign and universal reign of God (Dan 4:17, 26; 6:26; 7:27).

According to the prophets, divine warfare was waged for and against the people of God, but it was the experience of war that ultimately challenged and changed popular understandings. Prior to the fall of Samaria and the destruction of Jerusalem, Israel and Judah believed that God protected (Jer 7:8-11). The prophets declared that God also punished—a message challenged by false prophets and rejected by oppressive leaders—but the destruction of Jerusalem confirmed what the prophets had foretold. The restoration of exiles to Judah, however, demonstrated that God did not abandon the people. The Israelites learned that the political objective of divine warfare was related to justice, not citizenship, and the prophets envisioned a future in which war itself, with its many injustices, would be defeated. War, like *death (Hos 13:14), was an enemy to be defeated: "He shall judge between the nations, and shall arbitrate for many peoples; they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more" (Is 2:4 NRSV [cf. Mic 4:3]). Divine warfare could be waged against Israel's enemies or against Israel, but ultimately Yahweh the divine warrior would defeat war.

5. Theology and Ethics.

Israel's prophets believed that God is a warrior, and the "centrality of that conviction and its historical, cultic, literary and theological ramifications can hardly be overestimated" (Miller, 1). The characterization of God as a warrior affords hope for deliverance of the downtrodden and stands as a warning to oppressors, and it raises issues that are not merely academic, historical or literary, but are theological and ethical. Focal points are the sovereignty and justice of God and the perpetuation of violence in the pursuit of security, for those who choose to live by the sword are likely to die by the sword (Gen 9:6; Mt 26:52).

5.1. Sovereignty and Justice. Nations engage in warfare to maintain boundaries of sovereignty, and divine warfare expresses the all-encompassing sovereignty of the God of Israel, who directs and defeats antagonistic armies at will. In divine warfare the plans of God cannot be thwarted (Is 14:24-27). In the ancient Near Eastern world the prerogative of the sovereign to wage war to defend or to expand the empire was assumed, not disputed. It is likely that only the details of specific campaigns, their feasibility, logistics and tactics, would have been open to debate, not the pursuit or legitimacy of war itself. Divine warfare, as the designation implies, is an expression of divine will, embodied and expressed on earth by the king of the nation, and the will of the god or goddess would have preempted any substantive debate about the legitimacy of going to war. If the deity commanded war, whether through prophet, priest or monarch, the only choice before the citizenry was obedience or disobedience, though certain categories of people were exempt from fighting (see Deut 20:1-9; 24:5).

Holy war, as G. von Rad has argued, can be viewed as "a cultic phenomenon" (von Rad, 49), with the slaughter of enemy combatants and destruction of property, animals and individuals captured in battle regarded as offerings sacrificed to Yahweh. The God of Israel was characterized as a warrior who fought in the battle, and warriors were entitled to their share of the spoils (Elgavish). Yahweh led the campaign, and for this reason participation in holy war was construed to be an expression of allegiance and trust, and the Israelite warriors, who followed and were protected by Yahweh, were expected to fight opponents without fear, wholeheartedly embracing the Deuteronomic injunction "Do not lose heart, or be afraid, or panic, or be in dread of them; for it is the LORD your God who goes with you, to fight for you against your enemies, to give you victory" (Deut 20:3b-4 NRSV).

In ancient Israelite religion, however, divine war was not solely an expression of obedience and faith; it was an instrument of justice, "a legal judgment of Yahweh made for the purpose of resolving a dispute between Israel and neighboring states" (Good, 387). The judicial nature of divine warfare is evident in the proclamation that the prophet Joel issued to Israel, the nations and Yahweh, a call to arms that characterizes the defeat of nations that are hostile to Israel as an act of divine judgment: "Prepare war, stir up the warriors. Let all the soldiers draw near, let them come up. Beat your plowshares into swords, and your pruning hooks into spears; let the weakling say, 'I am a warrior.' Come quickly, all you nations all around, gather yourselves there. Bring down your warriors, O LORD. Let the nations rouse themselves, and come up to the valley of Jehoshaphat; for there I will sit to judge all the neighboring nations" (Joel 3:9b-12 NRSV).

Divine warfare was waged to effect justice, and the OT prophetic literature portrays the violence of divine warfare to be a measured response to unjust violent acts perpetrated against others and rooted in human arrogance and callousness. According to the prophets, the wars led or prompted by Yahweh purge or requite wickedness and redress grievances and injustices; they remedy wrongs and settle disputes (see Is 59:15-20; Jer 6:1-6; 21:11-12).

The justness of divine warfare, as portrayed in the OT prophets, is rooted in proportionality; that is, divine warfare, though violent, ostensibly inflicts retribution in proportion to the wrongdoing. Obadiah, predicting a time of violent judgment upon the nations that have sought to harm the people of Israel, explicates the principle of proportional justice that is at work in divine warfare. The prophet informs the errant nations, "As you have done, it shall be done to you; your deeds shall return on your own head" (Obad 15 NRSV). The book of Nahum, which celebrates the justness of the destruction of Nineveh and the demise of the Neo-Assyrian Empire (Crouch, 158-73), portrays Yahweh as a patient but powerful judge who is "slow to anger but great in power" and who "will by no means clear the guilty" (Nah 1:2b NRSV). Yahweh's *destruction of the city repays Assyria's aggression against other cities, and the rhetorical question that concludes the book summarizes the rationale: "There is no assuaging your hurt, your wound is mortal. All who hear the news about you clap their hands over you. For who has ever escaped your endless cruelty?" (Nah 3:19 NRSV). The city's suffering, like its cruelty to others, is correspondingly "endless." In divine warfare violence repays violence in equal measure, according to the spirit of the lex talionis, a proportional moral calculus that is rooted in Mosaic law codes (Ex 21:23-35; Lev 24:19; Deut 19:19-21) and is echoed in NT texts (Mt 26:52; Rev 13:10). The ancient Israelite ideal of proportional justice, though significantly refined in the prophets (cf. different standards of retribution in Ex 20:5 and Ezek 18:2), is never fully realized in actual combat situations, nor could it be. Although provisions for escaping violence are evident in some instances of divine warfare (see Jer 21:8-10), even just wars are filled with injustices. Warfare inflicts collateral damage that is immediate and lasting, and justice achieved through battle perpetrates its own evils. There are always innocent casualties, and violence begets violence (Mt 26:52).

5.2. Security and the Perpetuation of Violence.

Historical accounts and prophetic speeches about divine wars that chasten the righteous and deliver from corruption and oppression have for generations captured the imaginations of readers who turn to the OT prophets for insight, guidance and hope, and the prophetic literature offers these in abundance. Ironically, wars are fought to end wars. *Peace is ostensibly the objective, and the prophets set forth a vision of peace, with "swords beaten into plows." The assurance of a better world that devout readers draw from prophetic visions of divine warfare is powerful, but the hope is bound to violent imagery; the saving acts of God are wed to the harsh realities of war, and the warp and woof of salvation and destruction together form a metanarrative: readers see that deliverance for the righteous often entails the destruction of the wicked. This cannot be excised from a biblical theology of redemption or from the historical realities of justice, for it is embedded in both. Violence, though overtly condemned in some texts, is tacitly endorsed in others, and, unfortunately, the theme of divine warfare has been used to sanction violent activities in modern contexts (Juergensmeyer).

Because Yahweh the divine warrior is righteous and uses violence to establish justice, some will reason, incorrectly, that it is legitimate for humans to engage in violent acts. The violence embedded in biblical texts "cannot be glossed over" (Collins, 19-20) and "should not stand unchallenged" (Fretheim, 22). Empirical studies suggest that exposure to texts that are laden with violent imagery contributes to violence, aggression and decreased sympathy for victims (Berkowitz; Bushman et al.; Fanti et al.).

Of special concern is the desensitization that perpetuates violence against *women, a problem exacerbated by armed conflict (Leatherman). The divine judgments that the prophets typically list are war, famine and pestilence, and they use metaphors of rape, abandonment and humiliation (Gordon and Washington). Hosea, for instance, portrays God as a betrayed husband who abandons an adulterous wife to danger (Hos 2:1-13), and readers are expected to sympathize with the husband—a metaphorical representation of God engaging in divine warfare (Hos 2:1-23). R. Weems notes, "The metaphor of battered wife is admittedly a very risky trope to use to help shed light on questions of God's response to human failures" (Weems, 106; see Feminist Interpretation; Exum). In addition, the violent winds of war that Yahweh sends against Israel for rebellion include the slaughter of infants and unborn (Hos 13:14-16).

The theological and ethical dilemmas met at the intersections of the sovereignty of God, the justice of war, and the perpetuation of violence in texts that depict divine warfare are not easily resolved. Awareness of issues and empathy toward victims of violence are essential in understanding the divine warfare leitmotif and in minimizing misappropriations that perpetuate violence.

6. New Testament Appropriation.

The NT appropriates the theme but redirects the violence and largely transforms the prophetic tradition of divine warfare, which the early church interpreted in light of the life, death and resurrection of Jesus, “the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world” (Jn 1:29 NRSV). In the NT transformation of the theme, the divine warrior achieves victory by dying rather than killing.

In the book of Revelation the Lamb of God is a warrior who conquers (Rev 17:14) and “in righteousness judges and makes war” (Rev 19:11 NRSV), a warrior who “will tread the wine press of the fury of the wrath of God the Almighty” (Rev 19:15 NRSV). However, the Lamb of God, who brings salvation (Rev 7:10), does not sacrifice the enemy in holy war but is himself the sacrifice. The sword wielded by Jesus in the role of divine warrior is a proclamation of words that are able to destroy maleficent forces and to create a new heaven and earth (Rev 19:15). The apocalyptic imagery of the book of Revelation, which draws from the book of Daniel, does envision real martyrdoms and judgment (though the referent of symbols and extent of metaphorical language remains a matter of debate among contemporary interpreters), but the saints of God are delivered by the sacrificial death of the Lamb and are called to endure persecution, not to attack their oppressors (Rev 12:11). John advises the reader, “If you are to be taken captive, into captivity you go; if you kill with the sword, with the sword you must be killed. Here is a call for the endurance and faith of the saints” (Rev 13:9-10 NRSV). Faith and endurance are rewarded, and the redemption of the saints prompts a new song of praise (Rev 5:9; 14:3), not unlike the victory song of Isaiah 42:10-13.

The Synoptic Gospels identify Jesus as Isaiah’s Suffering Servant, who wages war by giving himself to deliver the people of God and to avenge wrongdoing (Is 53:1-12; cf. Mt 8:17). John the Baptist identified Jesus as the divine warrior of whom Isaiah spoke by proclaiming, “Prepare the way of the LORD, make his paths straight” (Is 40:3 NRSV; cf. Mt 3:3; Mk 1:3; Lk 3:4). The warrior and the restored people march to Zion in victory along a highway that is sacred and safe (Is 35:8-10), and Isaiah’s warrior restores health and wholeness to the people and to creation itself (Is 35:8-10). John the Baptist contrasted the baptism with water that he offered to the baptism of fire—divine war—that would attend the coming of the Lord Jesus (Mt 3:11-12). Moreover, in the Gospel accounts Jesus commands the natural elements and subdues the raging winds and waves (Mt 8:23-27; Mk 4:35-41; Lk 8:22-25), evoking Isaiah’s imagery of the divine warrior rebuking the nations, which “roar like the roaring of mighty waters” (Is 17:12; 43:2), and the imagery of the divine warrior delivering the Israelites from Egypt (Is 51:10), wielding the primordial power that created the world (Is 51:15-16). The actions of Jesus recorded in the Gospels echo the motif of the divine warrior who directs and defeats the monstrous forces of the sea (Is 27:1). Similarly, Jesus is the divine warrior whose chariot traverses the clouds (Mt 24:30; Mk 13:26; Lk 21:27; cf. Is 19:1; Dan 7:13). Jesus does provoke conflict (Mt 10:34-36; Lk 12:51-53), but he accepts the fate of death and cautions against the perpetuation of violence (Mt 26:52; Jn 18:11).

The early church reconceptualized participation in divine warfare, though participation in holy war in ancient Israel is honored for its expression of faith (Heb 11:34). The war waged by the church is not a physical struggle but rather a spiritual one, involving cosmic powers (2 Cor 10:3; Eph 6:12; 1 Pet 3:22). Christians are soldiers (Phil 2:25; Philem 2; 1 Pet 4:1) who endure hardship for the cause (2 Tim 2:3), and their fight is “the good fight of faith” (1 Tim 1:18; 6:12; 2 Tim 4:7). The divine warrior of Isaiah, who is armed for battle to effect justice and to redeem Zion (Is 59:15-20), and those who follow Jesus are also instructed to “put on the whole armor of God” (Eph 6:11 NRSV): truth, righteousness, readiness, faith and salvation (Eph 6:12-17) (see Neufeld).

WEALTH AND POVERTY

Socioeconomic motifs cast long shadows over all three sections of the OT. Students of the Pentateuch (Torah) investigate them via socio-historical (Pleins), socioliterary (Moore 2011) and comparative historical methods (Chelst), while students of the Writings (Ketubim) attend to mythopoeic (Girard), anthropological (Meyers), sociological (Whybray), sociohistorical (Washington) and rhetorical concerns (Sandoval). Similar variety appears in recent studies of Jewish rabbinic (Neusner; Ohrenstein and Gordon), puritan (Murphy) and apocalyptic literature (Gordon). The analysis here focuses on some of the ways in which the poverty-wealth polarity helps to structure and inform the message of the Prophets (Nebiim).

1. Canaanite Critique
2. Assyrian Critique
3. Babylonian Critique
4. Persian Critique

1. Canaanite Critique.

The Hebrew term kēnaʿānî (“Canaanite”) etymologically derives from the sphere of economics (translated “trader” in Zech 14:21 RSV, NRSV, ESV, NJPS; “merchant” in Prov 31:24 NIV), and this at least partially explains why the earliest Hebrew prophets so intentionally criticize the Canaanite economies with which they habitually (and satirically) interact (Jemielity, 148-95). One of their most self-contained critiques occurs in the narrative about Nathan’s “ewe lamb” parable, a māšāl designed to contrast the behavior of a nominally poor man alongside that of an avariciously wealthy man (2 Sam 12:1-4) (Moore 2003, 111-12). Another is Hannah’s Song (1 Sam 2:1-10), a lyrical poem praising Yahweh for his ability to control “poverty” (môrîš, lit., “[dis]inheritance”) as well as “wealth” (maʿāšîr) (1 Sam 2:7). Manipulating some of the motifs later picked up in Second Temple texts (Targum Jonathan, Pseudo-Philo, Gospel of Luke), this song affirms that Yahweh can both “protect the faithful” and “deal harshly with the self-sufficient” (Cook, 1). Expressed mathematically, it highlights the equation pulsating at the core of the Yahwistic imperative: “creation = acquisition + protection” (Moore 2011, 132, 207, 224).

1.1. Moses. Prophetically shaded portions of the Pentateuch portray Moses as a Hebrew prophet determined to warn his fellow refugees about the seductive temptations that they will soon have to face in the “promised land” of Canaan, especially in the towns already built, barns already stocked, vineyards already planted, and cisterns already dug (Deut 6:10-11) (Weinfeld, 44-57). Tempted by such prefabricated abundance, some will forget Yahweh, the deliverer who rescues them from centuries of slavery, not to mention the provider who sustains them for decades in the wilderness (Deut 8:1-10) (Hardmeier; Moore 2009, 190-94). Some will even begin to imagine that “my power and the might of my own hand have brought me this wealth” (Deut 8:17), when in fact only “Yahweh your God gives you the power to create wealth” (Deut 8:18) (Stansell). The fact that such motifs play so important a role in the Mosaic speeches at the beginning of the Deuteronomistic trajectory of the Nebiim is no accident. These socioeconomic motifs find deep roots in the great literature of Mesopotamia, eventually branching out into the Second Temple literature of the Alexandrians (Philo, Spec. 4.176-187), Hasmonaeans, Essenes and Nazarenes (Moore 2011, 168-222).

1.2. Elijah. From the mythopoeic epics discovered at Ras Shamra (Ugarit), it is clear that many second-millennium Canaanites worship a deity named baʿal (“husband, master, provider”), venerating him as the primary force responsible for providing socioeconomic security to his devotees (CAT 1.1-1.4; Handy, 169-79). Against this claim the prophet Elijah lodges several vigorous objections on behalf of his deity, Yahweh, thereby initiating a conflict that eventually leads to a dramatic showdown on Mount Carmel (1 Kings 18:20-46) (Moore 2003, 97-102). Where the Canaanite myths “illustrate the importance attributed to Baal’s precipitation” (Smith and Pitard, 15 [see CAT 1.16 iii 4-11; 1.19 i 42-46]), Elijah proclaims the Hebrew deity, Yahweh, to be the only true source of fructifying rain. Theologically, this contest covertly alludes to Baal’s death and defeat by his sibling brother Mot (Canaanite god of death), thereby contrasting the traditional Canaanite outcome with Yahweh’s victory (Hauser and Gregory, 79-82), but socioeconomically it preserves the actions of a Hebrew prophet determined to redefine “success” and “security” within monolatrous, Yahwistic parameters (Beck, 122; Moore 2003, 139-53).

Among the fascinating stories gathered up into the Elijah cycle (1 Kings 17—2 Kings 1) (Coote), the Naboth narrative poignantly illustrates the socioeconomic implications of this conflict by focusing serious attention on the Israelite king Ahab’s desire to impose a Baalist definition of “value” (mēhîr) on his Hebrew neighbors (1 Kings 21:2). To Ahab, the drone-consort of the Baalist princess Jezebel (Walsh, 321), “value” is a variable commodity defined by the fluid ups and downs of the Canaanite marketplace. To Naboth, however, the “value” of “ancestral land” (nahālâ) cannot be so cavalierly negotiated (Peterson; Veerkamp, 112).

Standing up to his “tradesman” king, Naboth stubbornly rejects the materialistic premise that ancestral land is no more valuable than any other kind of land (1 Kings 21:3), and Ahab responds to this rejection of his worldview by subjecting Naboth to the humiliation of a mock trial and public execution (Rand; Moore 2003, 37-44). Central to the Elijah cycle, the Naboth episode eventually concludes with the death of the Baalist king Ahab, followed by the public execution of his princess bride (2 Kings 9:30-37) (Huffman, 280-82; Moore 2003, 322-31).

1.3. Elisha. Early in the Elisha cycle (2 Kings 2—13) a widowed young mother falls into the ubiquitous, sticky web of socioeconomic debt slavery (2 Kings 4:1-7) (Moore 2011, 228-30), thereby occasioning an opportunity for the prophet Elisha to extend Yahweh’s grace. Defenseless and desperate, she cowers before the prospect of having her children sold into slavery by a scoundrel called “the creditor” (hannōseh [2 Kings 4:1]) (Chirichigno, 220; Moore 2003, 139-43), and Elisha responds to this Torah violator by securing for her a miraculous source of income, thereby removing both debt and creditor in one fell swoop (cf. Ex 22:22) (Brodie, 457-62).

Later in the Elisha cycle Elisha’s servant Gehazi gets caught in another sticky web: socioeconomic corruption (2 Kings 5:1-27). The textual framework in which this occurs follows the pattern of a typical literary chiasm (Moore 2003, 165):

Naaman’s reaction to the Israelite slave girl’s suggestion
The Aramean king’s reaction to Naaman’s request
The Israelite king’s reaction to the Aramean king’s letter Naaman’s obedience to the prophetic word
Elisha’s reaction to Naaman’s gift
Gehazi’s reaction to Elisha’s reaction
Elisha’s reaction to Gehazi’s corrupt behavior

Poised at the center of this chiasm stands Naaman’s obedience to the prophetic word, but enveloping the center, Elisha’s rejection of Naaman’s economic gratitude stands in sharp opposition to Gehazi’s attempt to take advantage of it. Thus, although this episode never overtly states the origin of Naaman’s leprosy, Gehazi contracts leprosy for the same reason Miriam does in the wilderness: willful disobedience (Num 12:10) (Moore 1994, 61-72). The problem highlighted in this chiasmic text is not just greed. Gehazi’s problem looks much like that of Achan, another Hebrew who unsuccessfully tries to test Yahweh’s patience (Josh 7:1). Compared to Achan and the Judahite man of God (1 Kings 13:26), in fact, Gehazi’s punishment looks rather tame. Occasionally it is appropriate for prophets to accept “gifts” (e.g., Elisha accepts a guest room from the Shunammite [2 Kings 4:10]). Yet prophetic leaders must be careful when it comes to money. Indeed, they must guard their hearts against a plethora of health-and-wealth traps, all having the potential to drag them away from their mission. Sometimes they must say no to innocent-looking invitations, whether from kings (Jeroboam [1 Kings 13:7]), potential employers (Balak [Num 22:18]) (Moore 1990, 97-109) or even colleagues (Ephraimite prophet [1 Kings 13:34]) (Moore 2003, 237-42). Although sometimes bribery is hard to define (Gordon and Miyake, 162), it must be avoided at all costs, not only because it violates Torah (Deut 10:17; 16:19; 27:25), but also because it is but a short step from accepting unsolicited “gifts” to preaching only what well-meaning donors want to hear (Mic 3:5) (Moore 2003, 164-71). Thus, by contrasting Gehazi’s greed with Naaman’s faith, this episode spotlights a persistent socioeconomic problem afflicting the ancient Hebrew (and indeed, every other) economy (Moore 2011, 225-28).

Another story impacted by the poverty-wealth polarity is the laconic episode of the four lepers (2 Kings 6:24—7:20), a story that, like the one preceding it, communicates its message through a literary chiasm (Moore 2003, 149):

Lepers suffer at city gate
“What have we got to lose?” questions
Testing and discovering the truth
“This is a day of good news!”
Testing and discovering the truth
“What have we got to lose?” questions
Military captain trampled at city gate

Like their cannibalizing sisters (2 Kings 6:28-29), these lepers have come to a place in their lives where they feel they have absolutely nothing left to lose. Forced to the very bottom of the food chain, they suffer as much contempt from “friends” as they do from “enemies.” If they go into the besieged city, they most likely will die because no one has any food to give them. If they remain at the city gate, they probably will die because the Syrian siege prohibits anyone from exiting or entering. Thus, their only option is to go out to the Syrian troops and throw themselves on their mercy. From a chiasmic perspective, their suffering parallels that endured by the cynical military captain (2 Kings 7:2), except that they eventually turn to hope, whereas he capitulates to despair. Where they ascertain a plan for survival, the captain resigns himself to a “cruel fate.”

Further, the utilitarian questions that they ask find a parallel in the utilitarian questions of the Israelite king. Where the lepers learn to ask appropriate questions, however, the king does not. In fact, this king refuses to trust anyone: not his officers or messengers and certainly not a bunch of outcast lepers raving on about “good news” (2 Kings 7:12-13). Paralleling the utilitarian questions of the king with the utilitarian questions of the lepers, this text emphasizes not only that it is important to ask questions, but also that it is important to ask appropriate questions.

The turning point comes not when the lepers discover the treasure abandoned by the Syrians, and not even when the Syrians retreat and the siege abruptly ends. The turning point comes when these suffering Hebrews begin to realize how inappropriate it is to hoard instead of share. Even though their initial reaction is to hoard their newly found treasure, eventually they “come to themselves” and decide to believe that newly discovered treasure must be shared, not hoarded (2 Kings 7:9-10; cf. Matt 13:44) (Moore 2003, 148-50).

1.4. Hosea. Hosea takes this prophetic critique of Baalistic consumerism to a whole new level, manipulating (1) the war-peace polarity to challenge what he perceives to be a defective notion of kingship (Otto, 77-86), as well as (2) the poverty-wealth polarity to criticize the way Israel’s leaders blatantly Baalize the Israelite economy. Israel constantly strives to be “rich” (ʿāšar) and “wealthy” (ʿôn), yet even when material gifts are given to them, they deny to Yahweh, the divine giver, the husbandly credit that he so richly deserves (Hos 12:8)

(Stienstra, 127-90). Instead, they credit Baal for their socioeconomic success, relying on false balances and other gimmicks to “oppress” (laʿāšōq) the poor in the process (Hos 12:7; cf. Zech 7:10) (Dearman, 309). Watching Israel play the role of Canaanite “tradesman” (kēnaʿan [Hos 12:7-8]), Hosea predicts that someday Yahweh will redefine the boundaries of his *covenantal relationship with his children, no matter how fervently they call him “Daddy Baal” (Hos 2:16) (Keefe, 122-24).

2. Assyrian Critique.

Like northern Israel, southern Judah falls into a number of socioeconomic traps laid out by Assyrian soldiers, bureaucrats, diplomats and businessmen (*CAH*² 3.2:71-141), creating a situation that inspires Hebrew prophets such as Isaiah to characterize them as “spoil” and “plunder” for eventual foreign consumption (Isa 10:6) (Childs, 78-93).

2.1. Amos. Unlike most Hebrew prophecies, Amos begins with a series of doom oracles against the nations, immediately followed by doom oracles aimed at Judah and Israel (Amos 1:3—2:16). Where the prophet indicts Judah for rejecting Torah, however, he condemns Israel for “selling the righteous for silver” (Amos 2:6). Intratextually he then parallels this sentiment with the phrase “acquire the poor for silver” a few chapters later (Amos 8:6), a parallel heightened by the fact that each of these verbs (mākar [Amos 2:6] // qānā [Amos 8:6]) directs attention to the same adjoining colon: “and the needy for a pair of sandals.” To ask why this prophet would direct such strong socioeconomic criticism against Israel instead of Judah is to ask why Israel would choose to pursue a life of mindless consumption over compassionate fellowship. Supported by a highly organized system of taxation, Israel’s wealthy elite fall headlong into the trap of desiring only comfortable lives for themselves, filled with “palatial private residences, conspicuous consumption, use of luxury items such as fine linen, expensive ornaments, and perfume, and nonproductive recreational activity” (Premnath, 127).

Amos uses such cutting language to criticize this behavior because underneath it he sees Israel abandoning the role of “covenant partner” for that of “godless merchant” (Lang, 482-85). Indicting the royal state officials for blatantly prospering at the poor’s expense, Amos predicts that soon these officials will have to explain their entitlement mentality to a much more hostile audience (Amos 3:9-11, 12b-15; 4:1-3; 5:11; 6:1-7) (Jaruzelska, 167). Indicting the Samarian patricians for “acquiring” (qānā [Amos 8:6]) and “crushing” (rāṣaš [Amos 4:1]) and “uprooting” (nāṭā) the poor (Amos 2:7), Amos predicts that soon their investment portfolio will find itself reduced to a single option: “Prepare to meet your God, O Israel!” (Amos 4:12).

2.2. Isaiah 1—39. Isaiah 5—11 discusses Judah’s rebelliousness, Yahweh’s decision to use Assyria as a disciplinary tool, Assyria’s assault on Yahweh’s “vineyard,” and Yahweh’s desire to root out godless arrogance wherever it exists (Seitz, 480). Judahite patricians pretending to uphold the law in order to collect more “acquisitions” (‘āmāl) will be punished first (Is 10:1) because the socioeconomic hoarding to which they have become addicted so viciously tramples down the hopes and aspirations of the poor (Is 10:2). Indeed, Isaiah predicts that on Yahweh’s “day of judgment” many Judahites will frantically scour the hills and caves for a place to hide their ill-gotten “gain” (kābôd), but they will not find one (Is 10:3). Where Amos criticizes the “cows of Bashan” for oppressing the poor and crushing the needy (Amos 4:1), Isaiah lays out a tour de force critique of all the personal items cluttering up the closets of Judah’s “cows”: anklets, headbands, crescents, pendants, bracelets, scarfs, headdresses, armlets, sashes, perfume boxes, amulets, signet rings, nose rings, festal robes, mantles, cloaks, handbags, garments of gauze, linen garments, turbans and veils (Is 3:18-23).

Assyria’s role in disciplining Judah will be to play the role of the Yahwistic “rod” (Is 10:5) or, to change the metaphor, the sharp scalpel in the hands of the divine surgeon as he cuts out the cancer of consumerism from Judah’s internal organs. The depth of this cancer is measured by the fervency with which Judah’s rulers spend their days looking for more and more ways to “engineer oppressive legislation” (Davies, 40) designed to “give themselves a legal foundation to justify their efforts to expand their property,” even when the result brings “disaster on their fellow citizens” (Wildberger, 213-14). Such behavior, moreover, is not limited to Israel’s leaders; it “extends to the people who look up to them and imitate them, because selfish covetousness is the characteristic of those who think that they have to live out a transitory life in their own strength and so employ every possible means to serve their self-preservation and self-assurance” (Kaiser, 76).

2.3. Micah. Micah sees in Jerusalem a city whose inhabitants “covet fields and seize them,” where the homes of the poor are unexpectedly and inappropriately thrown into foreclosure, where the “haughty” laughingly pretend to govern responsibly (Mic 2:2-3). Responding to these injustices, he predicts the coming of a day in which the Judahite economy will dramatically implode, when foreign troops will capture the fields earlier stolen from the poor, when orchards and vineyards will feed not Judah’s children but their foreign captors instead (Mic 2:1-5; 6:14-15). After this, however, another day will come when the ignorant will embrace knowledge, when those unjustly imprisoned will receive justice, and when those forced to eat the sour fruits of materialistic corruption will once again experience the sweet solace of socioeconomic security (Mic 4:2-4) (Moore 1993, 320-22).

3. Babylonian Critique.

After the Babylonians take over the Assyrian Empire (CAH² 3.2:229-75), and as they plan the Jerusalem invasion, Jeremiah describes the mercenary army gathered together under Nebuchadnezzar’s leadership as a “boiling pot” (sîr nāpūah) poised to spill over and scald every person unfortunate enough to be standing in his way (Jer 1:13-14) (Reimer, 231-32). From a Hebrew perspective, the main difference between Assyria and Babylon is that where the former falls short in plundering Jerusalem’s treasure, the latter does not (Moore 2003, 254-59, 343-50).

3.1. Jeremiah. Celebrating Josiah’s kingship as the triumph of Yahwistic “justice”* (mišpat) and “righteousness” (šēdāqā) over greed and corruption, Jeremiah condemns the Davidic king Jehoiakim for pretentiously and ridiculously “competing” (mēta āreh [Jer 22:15]) with other kings for “cedar,” manipulating a well-worn metaphor rooted in old Babylonian myths about “sacred cedar forests” (Moore 2011, 43-51). Where Jeremiah aligns this metaphor to the corruption fueled by Jehoiakim’s “plunder” (beša^c [Jer 22:17]), the Qumranic pesher to Habakkuk uses it to criticize the Jehoiakims of his day (beša^c [1QpHab IX, 5]). Where Jeremiah briefly toys with the idea that the poor may be too foolish to understand “Yahweh’s way” (Jer 5:4), he soon proclaims rich and poor to be “equally” (yaḥdāw) corrupt (Jer 5:5). Often the poverty-wealth polarity impacts Jeremiah’s language (note, e.g., the portrayal of Judah as a “partridge hovering over stolen eggs” [Jer 17:11]), but more often than not one finds the metaphorical playfulness of Hosea subsumed by Jeremiah into recurring lists (Jer 9:23) (Overholt; Lalleman-de Winkel, 231-32; Moore 1986, 395-401) and catchphrases (Jer 15:13; 17:3; 20:5), many finding intertextual echos in Isaiah (“wealth of the nations” [Is 60:5; 61:6; 66:12; cf. Zech 14:14]) and Ezekiel (“wealth carried away” [Ezek 29:19; 30:4]). Of particular interest is the fact that Jeremiah manipulates the aforementioned noun in the Naboth narrative (mēḥîr, “value” [1 Kings 21:2]) in repetitive phrases such as “your wealth [ḥayil] and your treasure [’ôṣār] I will give as plunder—not for their value [mēḥîr], but in exchange [LXX: antallagma] for your sins” (Jer 15:13 [see also Jer 17:3]) (Stuhlman, 17-18).

3.2. Ezekiel. Ezekiel indicts Judah for acting like a criminal gang interested only in shedding blood, defiling women, and “oppressing the poor” (Ezek 18:12), comparing their behavior to the avaricious rapacity of Sodom (Ezek 16:49), the materialistic consumerism of Phoenicia, and the oligarchical covetousness of Egypt (Ezek 27—30). Where Greek writers portray the Phoenicians as “tricky” (stratēgēma [Polybius, Hist. 3.78.1]), “devious” (apatēlia [Homer, Od. 14.288]) and “avaricious” (philochrēmatoō [Josephus, Ag. Ap. 1.62]), Ezekiel criticizes them for being “haughty” and “idolatrous” (Ezek 28:5) (Corral 67). Singling out the city of Tyre for “enriching the kings of the earth” with unnecessary, elitist “merchandise” (ma’ārāb [Ezek 27:33]), he metaphorically warns them that soon they will find themselves “shipwrecked” (nišberet), their expensive merchandise thrown into “deep water” (ma’āmaqē māyim [Ezek 27:34]) and sunk (cf. Zech 9:4). Survivors of this disaster will attempt to swim away, but dissatisfied business partners will make sure that they drown in their “denigration” (šāraq [Ezek 27:36]), and afterwards Yahweh will give Egypt’s wealth to the Babylonians as “payment” (pē’ullā) for engineering this “shipwreck” (Ezek 29:20 [cf. Is 45:14]).

3.3. Habakkuk. Habakkuk frames his prophecy within complementary metaphorical expressions. On land, the Babylonians look like angry real estate brokers more interested in foreclosure than development (Hab 1:5-11). On sea, they act like pirates determined to hook their captives like fresh fish for the marketplace (Hab 1:14-17). Thus, because “the Babylonian worships the tools by which he obtains this abundance as though they were divine,” Habakkuk emphasizes the socioeconomic point that “Babylon worships its military power because its military power brings such a high standard of living.” Where the Qumranic peshet to Habakkuk applies this critique to its historical context (1QpHab VI, 5-6), the contemporary question is “whether we in our own way deify the means to our high standard of living” (Roberts, 104).

3.4. Isaiah 40—66. To Judahites living in Babylonian captivity, an exiled Isaianic disciple predicts that Yahweh will provide for them just as he provided for their wandering ancestors, to the point of making water flow in the desert so that it might miraculously bear fruit (Is 41:17; cf. Ezek 47). Through the reconstructive work of his messiah Cyrus, Yahweh promises to replenish the second temple with the “products” (yēgî’a [Is 45:14]) of Egypt and the “merchandise” (sāḥar [Is 45:14]) of Ethiopia. To “fraudulent liturgists” still clinging to the reductionist belief that prayer and fasting alone can restore the temple to its preexilic glory, another Isaianic disciple writes that true fasting involves much more than mere abstention from food; it requires a firm ethical commitment to provide housing for the homeless (Is 58:7) and “refuge” (mā’ôz [Is 25:4]) for the poor (Creach, 50-73; Brueggemann, 187). Only when ethics and liturgy learn to complement each other will the “wealth of the nations” be available for rescuing Israel from its persistent poverty (Is 60:5, 11; 61:6; 66:12).

4. Persian Critique.

Eventual Hebrew repatriation into the province of Yehud, one of many districts taken over from the Babylonians by the Achaemenid administration of ancient Persia (Berquist), is difficult to understand because of “a decided lack of reliable sources” and the “ideological nature” of the sources in our possession (Carter, 21).

4.1. Haggai. Yet Cyrus’s decree (Ezra 1:2-4) inaugurates an era of tremendous change in Hebrew history as refugees of various stripes begin trickling back into the Persian province of Yehud, the old “land of Judah” (Ackroyd, 138-52, 232-56). The *land to which they return, however, suffers the persistent malaise of post-war recession as the earth withholds its “produce” yēbûl [Hag 1:10] (Meyers and Meyers, 27). Unlike Zechariah, Haggai explains the factors responsible for creating this recession not in mythological/visionary/oneiromantic categories (Mouton, 24-28) but rather as a measured divine response to the passive-aggressive procrastination permeating the minds of returning refugees. Sixty-seven years have elapsed since the destruction of the temple, and still it lies in ruins (Hag 1:1-15). Thus, while the factors responsible for this reticence can be attributed to ideological (Bedford, 301-10) or socio-economic concerns (Kessler, 243-56), the prophet castigates his audience for choosing to preoccupy themselves with personal matters instead of temple matters (Hag 1:9). From Haggai’s point of view, this is passive-aggressive rebellion, and the primary reason why the land now suffers the ravages of “drought” (hōreb [Hag 1:11], a term paralleled elsewhere in the prophetic corpus with the “noise of aliens” and the “song of ruthlessness” [Is 25:5]) (Hanson, 24-25). Where Israel’s neighbors exacerbate their troubles, viciously exploiting them to their own advantage (Zech 1:15), Haggai registers great disgust toward the consumerist mentality being imported into Yehud from an alien economy with an alien agenda (Kippenberg, 23, 87).

4.2. Zechariah. However one perceives the connection between the two prophetic books of Haggai and Zechariah (Boda, 392-93; Ben Zvi and Nogalski), Haggai’s socioeconomic critique continues on into Zechariah, albeit more symbolically. Referencing the warnings of the “former prophets” at the beginning and end of the night visions laid out in Zechariah 1–6 (Zech 1:4; 7:7, 12), Zechariah warns his audience that Yahweh’s *wrath can still cleanse corruption if and when the latter leads to the “exploitation” (āšaq [Zech 7:10]) of widows, orphans, resident aliens and the desperately poor. Like Haggai, he encourages his audience to recognize that the restoration of the temple is paramount (Zech 6:12-15); otherwise the “desolate land” (‘ereš nāšammā) upon which they are trying to eke out a living will never again become “desirable land” (‘ereš ḥemḏā) (Zech 7:14).

WILDERNESS, DESERT

In the prophetic literature "wilderness" (midbār), "dry place" (ʿārābā, šīyyā) and "desert" (yēšmôn) usually represent threatening natural environments beyond the reach of civilization, and as such they provide a setting for divine deliverance and judgment. It is both the place out of which Israel came following the exodus and the potential state to which they will return if they do not follow the commands of the Lord. The intransigence of both Israel and the nations leads to the possibility that each may become a "desolate place" (šēmāmā, horbā), the abodes of wild beasts and the world's uncontrolled elements. This risk notwithstanding, the wilderness represents an obstacle to *salvation that can be overcome with divine help, so that it is there that some of God's mightiest acts of salvation may be perceived. Indeed, the Lord provided miraculously for Israel in the wilderness after the *exodus, and the prophetic literature reflects critically on this experience. These reflections on wilderness wandering do little to remove the sense of danger inherent in such locales, instead heightening it to emphasize the threat that it represents and the great wonder that the Lord might overcome it once again.

1. Wilderness Imagery as General Concept
2. Specific Usages

1. Wilderness Imagery as General Concept.

"Wilderness" (midbār) and related words in its semantic field such as "dry place" (ʿārābā) and "desolate place" (šēmāmā) appear throughout the prophetic literature as flexible images in the hands of poets and tradents. Most often, they threaten *destruction and localize divine salvation, and they do so by drawing upon the lived realities of ancient Israel (Talmon 1966). Predominantly a community of subsistence farmers, the Israelites have a strong connection to the *land, and as a result the threat of wilderness was not one from which they were far removed, as drought or famine could ruin cultivated land in a single season (King and Stager). The image of a waterless region replete with sand dunes predominates when many imagine the ancient Near Eastern wilderness, but the land understood as wilderness is often rocky, scarred by torrent valleys and even desert vegetation depending on the exact location. The various wildernesses of the ancient Near East may have consisted of steppe, loess or any number of other less than hospitable environs, but the specific topographical details vary depending on the literary context and prove less important than the general sense that the wilderness is a place beyond human ken, far beyond the controlled environs of civilization. Indeed, the notion of wilderness itself implies contrasting domesticated space (Oelschläger). The imagery is particularly powerful in part because the actual wilderness in Israelite experience was both ubiquitous and near at hand. Characterized by *death, the wilderness threatens those who must travel through it, and ancient Near Eastern iconography imagines the borders of civilization as places where death resides, in part due to the fact that burial grounds were placed there (Keel). Thus, the wilderness was a powerful tool for the prophetic poet, whether the goal of the oracular pronouncement was woe or weal.

1.1. Wilderness as Threat of Judgment. Wilderness usually evokes negative associations, perhaps related to the Israelite experience of wilderness recounted in Exodus through Deuteronomy, and as a result it shows up often in prophetic speech threatening judgment (Talmon, TDOT 8:87-118). If Israel fails to heed divine commands to repentance, then they may be returned to a state of wilderness. The wilderness is uninhabited (Is 34:10; Jer 2:6), dark (Is 42:16; Jer 2:31), full of people and things uncontrolled by the surrounding societies (Is 9:3; Jer 9:25), the abode of jackals, ostriches, wild beasts (Is 33:9; 34:11; Jer 9:10-11; 10:22; 12:8-9; Mal 1:3) and even demonic beings (Is 13:21-22; 30:6; 34:8-15). The wilderness represents, then, a general place of death and disorder, and prophetic literature evokes this location to communicate the depth of divine anger and the risk Israel runs if they fail to repent. Jeremiah 4:26 makes the threat explicit: "I looked, and behold, the orchard was wilderness [hammidbār], and all its cities had gone to ruin on account of the LORD, on account of his burning anger" (see also Joel 2:3). Micah 1:6 describes the result of such punishment, declaring to Judah that Samaria was "a heap of stones." Hosea ties the fertility of the land to Israelite *worship, so that the cultivated land will be overtaken by the wild, yielding thistle and thorn rather than the fruit of the land, and in so doing, he demonstrates the union of people and land. When the people are punished, so also is the land (Davis; Marlow). Israel must repent, lest the Lord "turn her into a wilderness, and make her like a dry land" (Hos 2:5 [see also Hos 10:8]). In short, the wilderness is the opposite of the "desirable land" promised to and possessed by Israel (Jer 3:19), the future for the nation that rejects divine guidance.

At times the terminology of wilderness in the prophetic literature represents a land not yet cultivated by human hands, but in the prophetic literature it may also connote a state to which the land has returned after a period of civilization. In these cases the prophetic literature often employs the term "desolation" (šēmāmā), sometimes juxtaposed in biblical parallelism with midbār or ‘arābā (e.g., Jer 12:10). Israel stood under the threat that they would become a "place of desolation" (šēmāmā, sometimes horbā), as in Isaiah 64:9: "Your holy cities have become a wilderness [midbār]; Zion has become a wilderness [midbār], Jerusalem a desolate place [šēmāmā]." Such places elicit the pity and fear of nations that observe the wild nature of once-inhabited regions (e.g., Jer 6:8; 9:9). When Jeremiah prophesied that fields would once again be purchased in Judah, he comforted the people by refuting their discouraging words: "The field will again be bought in this land of which you say, 'It is a desolation [šēmāmā] with neither man nor beast. It is given into the hand of the Chaldeans'" (Jer 32:43). The people believed the land to have returned to its original wild state, but in the future it would once more be parceled out as fields for purchase. A desolate place is like the wilderness insofar as wild beasts pass through it, and there are no inhabitants (Ezek 14:15). Moreover, when the Lord threatens to make the land a "desolation" (šēmāmā), the land receives the threat, so that both the soil itself and the inhabitants of that territory stand under judgment (e.g., Ezek 15:8). Not only will Israel return to a state of desolation, but also the means by which such desolation might come is from the desert itself, as the "east wind" originates in the desert and scorches cultivated land (see Is 27:8; Ezek 17:10; Hos 13:15). In each of these instances the wilderness symbolizes the potential judgment of the Lord against Israel and the nations, which may receive similar judgment (e.g., Jer 49:13; 50:38; Zeph 2:9). The dangerous threat of the wilderness in their daily lives is used to great poetic effect as the prophets imagine the extension of the chaotic wilderness over the ordered lives of ancient Israelite communities.

1.2. Wilderness as Setting for Refuge and Deliverance. As foreboding as the wilderness is, it sometimes stands for the necessary land used to pasture and feed livestock, so that the loss of these "pastures of wilderness" is significant (Jer 23:10; see also Ps 65:10). Even the Lord mourns when such portions of the land receive punishment (Jer 9:9). The loss of such wilderness occasions the pleas of Joel, who laments twice in Joel 1:19-20 that "fire has devoured the pastures of the wilderness" (see also Amos 1:2). In these contexts the "pastures of the midbār" represent the intermediate locales between civilization and the wild, liminal places that exist somewhere between the safety of the village and the danger of the uncontrolled outlying lands (Oelschläger; Talmon, TDOT 8:87-118) (see also Joel 2:22 for this phrase, where the "pastures" are restored). On one occasion, the prophet Jeremiah seeks a refuge in the wilderness, a place to leave his people, “for all of them are adulterers, a gathering of cheats” (Jer 9:2). Given the daunting and dangerous nature of the place for which he yearns, the prophet here expresses the depth of his distress, as he believes the people comprise a greater threat to him than the desert. Here his retreat brings to mind Jesus’ time in the “wilderness” (erēmos). The Spirit leads Jesus to this place, but it is a place where Satan resides and tempts (Mt 4:1-11; Mk 1:12-13). The resonance is even more striking because Jesus understands himself to be a prophet (Lk 4:24).

In other places the threat of wilderness gives way to the full-throated hope for a *remnant (see Is 1:7), a reminder of the potential blossoms that may spring forth if only the people will return to the Lord. Second Isaiah (Is 40—55) provides the most striking instances of this wilderness transformation, sometimes in connection with the specific wilderness separating Israel in *exile from their land, but at other times evoking the more general image of blooming land at home in Israel. “For,” as Isaiah 51:3 puts it, “the LORD comforts Zion. He comforts all her waste places [horbôt], and will make her wilderness [midbār] like Eden, her desert [‘ārābā] like the garden of the LORD.” Remembering Zion as a land full of desolate places (horbôt, midbār, ‘ārābā), the prophet nevertheless perceives a future beyond that reality when Israel will blossom once more as at creation. The waste and void (tōhū wābōhū) of the wilderness will once again become the land of the promise. Unlike the wilderness, the Lord “did not create it [the land] a chaos [tōhū]. For dwelling he formed it. In secret I [the LORD] did not speak, in a place, a land of darkness; I did not say to the seed of Jacob, ‘In chaos [tōhū] seek me’” (Is 45:18-19). A God of order according to both Genesis 1 and Second Isaiah, the Lord continues to create order in wild places (Leal).

1.3. Occasional Uses. Of course, as a poetic symbol the wilderness sometimes functions in the prophetic literature in surprising or unusual ways. One example appears in Jeremiah 17:5-6, where the Lord describes “those who trust in human beings and . . . whose hearts turn away from the LORD”: “He shall be like a tree in the Aravah [“dry place,” but also a proper name], and he will not see that good is coming. He will live in stone deserts [hārērīm] in the wilderness, in a salted, uninhabited land [‘eres mēlēhā].” While this proves true in the literal, historical sense as a result of the Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem, it also communicates the arid nature of the life lived outside the presence of God. Instead of living in the safety of divine company, “in the desert” a person is far from God, under threat from the rest of the world. Also, in Jeremiah 2:31 the Lord asks via the prophet, “Have I become a desert to Israel?” Such a metaphor highlights the contrast between the blessed fruitful land, associated implicitly with the Lord, and that which receives no blessing and yields none. The Lord has been not a wilderness but rather a productive land whose provision to Israel knows no end. These two examples show that wilderness is not always intended as a literal state from which and to which Israel is headed, but that it also symbolizes a dry and difficult state and can even be applied occasionally in the prophetic literature to both human and divine agents (Talmon 1966).

2. Specific Usages.

Particular deserts appear throughout the prophetic literature, especially the “great wilderness” (Num 14:16; Deut 2:7; Judg 11:22) between Egypt and Palestine and the “wilderness of the peoples” (Ezek 20:35) between Palestine and Mesopotamia. A large number of other deserts occur in connection with particular cities or regions, itself a fact that shows the ubiquity of the wilderness and its proximity to settled civilization (e.g., “the wilderness of Moab” [Deut 2:8]). Such specific references move beyond the general threat or setting for salvation and draw upon earlier biblical traditions in their use of wilderness imagery.

2.1. Wilderness Wanderings. As the location of Israel’s wilderness wanderings, recounted especially in Numbers, “the great wilderness” between Egypt and Palestine is an especially important place in the imagination of the prophets. Amos 2:10 recalls the events immediately after the exodus succinctly and without much comment: “I brought you up from the land of Egypt, and I led you in the wilderness forty years to possess the land of the Amorite.” For Jeremiah, the time of wilderness wandering represents a honeymoon period for Israel: “I remembered concerning you—the steadfast love of your youth, the love of your betrothal period, your following after me in the desert [midbār], in a land not sown” (Jer 2:2 [see also Hos 2:17]). Indeed, in the barren wilderness the Lord cultivated the people: "Holy is Israel to the LORD, the first of his harvest" (Jer 2:3). The utopian vision of this time is remarkably dissonant with the complaint traditions of Exodus and Numbers, but here it is not too difficult to see the prophet's point in his particular memory. Israel was initially faithful but did not persist as the years passed.

Ezekiel, in stark contrast, remembers the time of wandering as a time of immediate betrayal, as in Ezekiel 20:1-26, summed up neatly by Ezekiel 20:13: "The house of Israel rebelled against me in the wilderness." In the wilderness Israel receives God's greatest gift, the statutes, commandments and Sabbaths (Ezek 20:11-12). Nevertheless, two successive generations of Israelites reject the Lord, so that the wilderness becomes the place where the Lord thought to pour out "wrath upon them in the wilderness to put an end to them" but decided against such a course of action so as not to profane his name among the nations (Ezek 20:13, 21). Thus, for Ezekiel, the wilderness becomes the location of rebellion, punishment and forbearance, a microcosm of the divine interaction with humanity over time (Leal). Both prophets engage the wilderness traditions critically, reading Israel's story in fresh ways to condemn Israel for their transgressions against the Lord (see also Hos 13:5-6).

2.2. Weal and Wilderness. In Isaiah the "wilderness of the peoples" between Palestine and Mesopotamia appears as the final obstacle to Israel's return to the promised land. Harkening back to the wilderness wanderings after the initial exodus from Egypt, here the wilderness is overcome entirely, so that the Lord once again sustains Israel miraculously in the wilderness. Thus, in Isaiah's well-known prophecy of Israelite return the wilderness features prominently: "In the wilderness clear the way of the LORD. Make straight in the desert a highway for our God" (Is 40:3-5 [see also Is 35:5-10]). Here, the Lord domesticates "the wilderness of the peoples" (Ezek 20:35) in particular, overcoming the final obstacle to Israel's return from exile. Elsewhere the desert is personified, a rejoicing agent in the salvific drama rather than an object. Thus, "wilderness and dry land will rejoice and desert shall rejoice and blossom like the crocus" (Is 35:1 [see also Is 42:11]). In this context the land itself is restored, not only imagined as an Israelite thoroughfare. The land, so inextricably intertwined with Israelite experience, here experiences *blessing instead of curse, and all of this takes place "so that they will see and know, consider and understand together, that the hand of the LORD has done this, that the holy one of Israel has created it" (Is 41:20) (on the land as a subject in its own right, see Davis; Marlow).

Hosea 2:14-23 imagines a new future for Israel in which the wilderness will once more be a place of Israelite devotion. Most strikingly here, the land responds to Ephraim's faithfulness by bursting forth with vegetation. Indeed, there will be a "covenant in that day with the beast of the field, with the bird of the heavens, and the creeping things of the soil" (Hos 2:20). Where once these forces represented a great threat to Israelite safety, in the future they will be in covenant relationship with Israel, such that they will be able to "lie down with trust." This new relationship to the wilderness represents not something separate from Israel's devotion to the Lord but instead an integral part of the same, as the subsequent verses demonstrate clearly (Hos 2:21-23; for a similar espousal between Israel and the land, see Is 62:4). This act of covenant with animals representative of the wild demonstrates not something new but rather a return to the Edenic state at the beginning of creation, as the allusions to Genesis 1:20, 24 demonstrate. In the future ordained by God the wilderness need not represent the most fearful place known to Israel; instead, Israel will exist in harmony with it, part of a new covenant with creation, similar to that "with all flesh" in Genesis 9:9-10.

WOMEN AND FEMALE IMAGERY

Recent studies on women in the OT favor *literary and *social-scientific approaches. Late twentieth-century biblical scholarship exhibited a rise in interest in women, in social-scientific methodologies, and a greater utilization of literary approaches, including metaphor theory. Sections 1-5 of this article utilize social background and *rhetorical analysis to explore what the prophets have to say about women. The world of Israelite women has been gleaned from critical readings of biblical texts themselves, especially legal texts and stories (e.g., Frymer-Kensky; Perdue et al.; Brenner). Additional information is gleaned from critical use of non-Israelite sources from the ancient Near East (e.g., van der Toorn). Archaeology contributes information about material culture. The biblical books of the prophets add incidental information to this picture, and interpretations of prophetic texts are informed by all these sources.

Sections 6-8 of this article address female imagery in the prophets. Prophetic metaphor is understood through the lens of the social world, historical context and rhetorical strategies. Analysis of biblical metaphor has burgeoned since the 1990s. Scholars in biblical studies, literature, linguistics and philosophy have increasingly come to see metaphor as an integral component of human thought and the construction of meaning. Rather than treating metaphor as a more interesting way of saying what could have been said literally, metaphor is understood to evoke a network of associations and construct a worldview. In Isaiah 13:8, “Pangs and birth-pains will seize them [the Babylonians]” (NRSV), the “tenor” (Babylonians) is informed by the “vehicle” (a woman in labor), but likewise the concept of giving birth is influenced by the tenor of terrified Babylonians (see Dille 2004, chap. 1).

Much of the prophetic corpus is in the form of poetry. As such, it requires reading between the lines and interpreting figurative language.

1. Women's Roles.

In Israelite society a woman's two primary roles were wife and mother. In the Prophetic Books references to these roles appear more in metaphor than to women themselves.

1.1. Marriage. Young women were under the authority of their fathers and, upon marriage, came under the authority of their husbands. A man could have more than one wife, but monogamy was increasingly the norm for nonroyals (Blenkinsopp, 64). Most references to marriage in the prophets are metaphorical or symbolic. Hosea is commanded to marry “a wife of whoredom” and marries Gomer (Hos 1:2-3) (see 6.1.1 below). Jeremiah is commanded by God not to get married or have children (Jer 16:2). A single lifestyle went radically against social expectations. As W. Holladay notes, “Celibacy was virtually unknown in Israel,” and childlessness “suggests worthlessness” (Holladay, 469). The command to Jeremiah served as a sign of the futility of starting a family in the face of the impending destruction of Jerusalem and widespread death of offspring. The catastrophe is exemplified in God's banishment of “the voice of mirth and the voice of gladness, the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride” (Jer 16:9 NRSV [see also Jer 7:23; 25:10]). But Jeremiah 33:10-11 provides a word of hope for a future when “there shall once more be heard the voice of mirth, and the voice of gladness, the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride” (NRSV). Joel calls for a national fast and beckons even the bridegroom and the bride to join in the solemnity. These examples highlight the time of marriage as one of life's highest joys (Is 61:10), and the abandonment of wedding “mirth” as a sign of great distress.

Despite his own single state, in his letter from Jerusalem to exiles in Babylon Jeremiah encourages them to build houses, to “take wives" for themselves and their sons, and to "give your daughters in marriage," presumably from within the exiled Jewish community (Jer 29:5-6). This was good news in the sense that life can go on in *exile, but bad news in the sense that the exile would not end soon.

We know nothing about Ezekiel's wife except that she accompanied him into exile and died in Babylon. God commands Ezekiel not to weep or observe any normal mourning practices. His abstention from mourning is meant to shock the exiles and serve as a sign that they too will experience profound loss with the destruction of the *temple and loss of their sons and daughters left in Jerusalem. But they are not to mourn (presumably because their own sins brought this about and/or because it is God's will) (Ezek 24:15-27).

The prophet Malachi specifically criticizes the priesthood of postexilic Judah on a number of counts, including divorce and improper *marriage (either their own or for permitting these in Judah). Malachi accuses men of abandoning the wives of their youth, a breach of *covenant (Mal 2:13-16). "Judah" has married "the daughter of a foreign god" (Mal 2:10-12), a reference to marriages to non-Jewish women who become a corrupting influence with their non-Yahwistic religion. B. Glazier-McDonald sees the two charges of divorce and intermarriage as interrelated. In the Persian period many Jewish men, in order to enhance their financial situation and social status, married non-Jewish women from wealthy families. At a time when monogamy had become the common practice, the desire to remarry led a man to divorce the Israelite "wife of your youth." Malachi condemns these practices.

1.2. Childbearing. The event and imagery of childbirth are powerful and are utilized by the Hebrew prophets in their rhetoric. Having many children was a blessing from God. Sons were important for building up the family (daughters left to join their husband's families), and children contributed their labor to agrarian families (Meyers, 27). Barrenness often was interpreted as a sign that God had "closed the womb." The extreme measures portrayed in Genesis to ensure progeny are indicative of this cultural value. Childbirth itself was seen as a dangerous process. Many infants did not survive birth. C. Meyers estimates that in early Israel nearly half of a woman's children did not survive to age five, and that five to six surviving children was typical. Furthermore, with multiple pregnancies, many women died in childbirth (Meyers, 28).

Loss of children is one of the greatest sorrows. Children and adult offspring died in war or famine, and infant mortality was high. A key component of the ideal age to come is that "no more shall there be in it [Jerusalem] an infant that lives but a few days" (Is 65:20 NRSV). Hosea describes childlessness as a threatened punishment from God for the unfaithfulness of Israel. In Hosea 9:11 he moves backward from birth, to pregnancy, to conception. "Ephraim's glory shall fly away like a bird—no birth, no pregnancy, no conception!" (NRSV). God then threatens, "Even if they bring up children, I will bereave them until no one is left" (Hos 9:12 NRSV). He then pronounces a curse on Israel: "Give them a miscarrying womb and dry breasts . . . Even though they give birth, I will kill the cherished offspring of their womb" (Hos 9:14-16 NRSV).

In connection with specially chosen people, the prophets speak of being formed in the mother's womb and even called or named in the womb (Is 44:2; 49:1, 5; Jer 1:5). This includes Jeremiah, whose wish that he had never been born is meant to shock (Jer 20:14-18; 15:10).

1.3. Women Prophets. Only Isaiah's wife is expressly called a "prophet" in the prophetic corpus (Is 8:1-4). W. Gafney argues that "the prediction, conception, gestation, and delivery of Maher-Shalal-Hash-Baz [is] depicting a joint prophetic undertaking between Isaiah and the Woman-Prophet" (Gafney, 104). Women prophets are mentioned elsewhere in the OT: Deborah in Judges 4—5, Huldah in 2 Kings 14:20, Miriam in Exodus 15:20. Miriam appears in Micah 6:4, where she is listed with Moses, Aaron and the prophet Balaam. Joel 2:28-29 refers to the eschatological age when "your sons and daughters will prophesy," and even "male and female slaves" will receive God's spirit of prophecy. God's spirit of prophecy is "poured out" on women and men alike. Like male prophets, women prophets could be condemned for speaking something other than the word of God (Ezek 13:17) (see 2.2.2 below).

1.4. Lamenting Women. In Israel, as in many cultures, women were official mourners (Meyers, 38). Jeremiah calls for "the mourning women," "the skilled women," to "raise a dirge" to signify doom for Jerusalem (Jer 9:17-22). Jeremiah seems to call on all women to lament: "Hear, O women, the word of the LORD" (Jer 9:20) (see Lament, Mourning). (This role for women is reflected in Jeremiah 49:3-5, although the weeping daughters of Rabbah may metaphorically represent the villages around the city of Rabbah [see BDB, 123, meaning 4].)

1.5. Royal Women. Jeremiah's warnings to the kings of Judah include their mothers and wives. The queen mother had a position of importance (the king may have had many wives but had only one mother). Jeremiah warns the king (possibly Jehoiachin) and the queen mother of impending exile (Jer 13:18); he warns that Jehoiachin (Coniah) and his recently widowed mother, Nehushta, will be taken into exile to Babylon (597 BC) (Jer 22:26; see also Jer 29:2). A. Brenner points out that Nehushta is one of only three Israelite/Judahite queen mothers to be called "Lady" (gēbīrā) (the others are Maacah [1 Kings 15:13; 2 Chron 15:16] and Jezebel [2 Kings 10:13]), but S. Ackerman also includes Athaliah (2 Kings 8:26; 11:1-3, where she is the ruler of Judah) (Ackerman 1993). Brenner argues that the title signifies that these three women had institutional power not granted to other queen mothers, the first two when their sons succeeded the throne while still too young to rule, and Jezebel after the second of her two king sons was killed. This interpretation would suggest that Nehushta had effectively reigned in Judah. Ackerman speculates that the queen mother did have official status, and her duties included "the cult of the goddess Asherah and representative of Asherah devotees" (Ackerman 1993, 401) along with influence in matters of succession. Z. Ben-Barak maintains that she had no official status, while N.-E. A. Andreasen argues that she "held a significant official position superseded only by the king himself" (Andreasen, 180), and Nehushta ruled as co-regent with her son.

Jeremiah warns Jehoiachin's successor, Zedekiah, that when Jerusalem falls to *Babylon, the king's wives and children will be taken captive (Jer 38:23). In Jeremiah 41:10 the daughters of the already captured King Zedekiah are taken captive by the rebel forces of Ishmael. The kings' wives are explicitly included in Jeremiah's list of those who have committed "crimes" against God (Jer 44:9).

Jerusalem's postexilic restoration and triumph is described with reference to foreign queens: "Kings shall be your caregivers, and their royal women your nursing women" (Is 49:23 [cf. Is 60:4]); that is, conquered kings will serve the exiles as childcare workers, and their queens or princesses will be wet nurses.

2. Prophetic Judgments Against Women.

Much of the prophetic material consists of judgments against unfaithfulness. Many of these are directed at the leadership of Israel and Judah. Prophets often addressed the male rulers (e.g., Is 1:10; Jer 1:18; 2:8; Mic 3:1-2, 9-11; Ezek 22:6; Hos 5:10), the priests (male) and the prophets (e.g., Is 28:7; Jer 6:13; 8:10; 14:18, 23:11; Mic 3:11; Zeph 3:4).

Many of the judgments proclaimed against the people of Israel and Judah would have applied to women as well as men. General accusations of infidelity by worship of the Baals or of disregard for the alien, the widow and the orphan would have found women guilty along with the men. Yet often a male audience can be assumed, since men were held more accountable by virtue of being heads of households and in positions of greater social authority and power. Many judgments are, however, gender specific, as in judgments in Jeremiah and Ezekiel of men who "defile" their neighbors' wives (e.g., Jer 5:8; Ezek 18:6). Prophetic judgments targeting women in particular will be reviewed here.

2.1. Eighth-Century BC Prophets.

2.1.1. Amos. Amos's sayings focus on the lack of *social justice in Israel. The poor are sold into debt slavery (Amos 2:6-8), the justice system ("the gate") is corrupted by bribery (Amos 5:12), and the profit motive leads to disdain for the Sabbath and corrupt business practices (Amos 8:5-6). Amos proclaims judgment against the wealthy who care only for themselves (Amos 6:4-6). The prophet explicitly addresses the women of Israel, calling them "you cows of Bashan . . . who oppress the poor, who crush the needy" (Amos 4:1 NRSV). "Cows" is not innately insulting but rather is a reference to their living off the fat of the land. These are the wives or concubines of wealthy men who ask their "lords" to provide for their wants. The women who benefit from the men's corrupt business practices are accountable. Like well-fed cows, they trample the pastureland—that is, those "beneath" them on the economic ladder. Amos predicts their exile from the land, led like cattle with ropes and hooks (see Kleven).

2.1.2. Isaiah of Jerusalem. Isaiah declares judgment against the people of Judah who neglect the widow and orphan (Is 1:23), “do evil” (Is 1:16) and abuse the poor (Is 3:15). The prophet specifically targets the “daughters of Zion” in Isaiah 3:16—4:1 (see Zion). They are described as haughty, vain and seductive, adorned with finery, jewelry and perfume. God will take away these emblems of their vanity and give them sackcloth and baldness. In the aftermath of war they will be left without husbands, a condition described as “disgrace” in a culture where a woman needed husband and children to ensure social status (see 3.2 below). But added to this judgment is a promise that the God will have washed away “the filth of the daughters of Zion” (Is 4:4 NRSV). Isaiah 32:9-14 proclaims a judgment against the wealthy, explicitly mentioning “women who are at ease” and “complacent.” They will see the desolation of the palace and the city of Jerusalem.

2.1.3. Hosea. Hosea refers to the sins of the men of Israel who are unfaithful to God. “Therefore your daughters play the whore, and your daughters-in-law commit adultery” (Hos 4:13 NRSV). However, God will not punish these. “I will not punish your daughters . . . nor your daughters-in-law . . . for the men themselves go aside with whores” (Hos 4:14 NRSV). God rejects a double standard, as the sins of the women pale in comparison to the sins of the men (see 4 below).

2.2. Seventh- and Sixth-Century BC Prophets.

2.2.1. Jeremiah. The prophet Jeremiah proclaims judgments against the people of Judah for many transgressions (e.g., Jer 7:9-10). Women are explicitly mentioned along with the men and children in connection with worship of the Queen of Heaven (Jer 7:18), a goddess, possibly Babylonian Ishtar, Phoenician Astarte or an Israelite synthesis (Ackerman 1989, 110). Archaeological inscriptional evidence from Kuntillet Ajrud indicates that Canaanite Asherah was worshiped in Israel along with the Israelite God, Yahweh (McCarter).

After the destruction of Jerusalem by Babylon in 586 BC, many Judeans fled to Egypt. Jeremiah proclaimed God’s *wrath toward these refugees for worshipping other gods in Egypt (Jer 44:8). Jeremiah 44:9 alludes to “the crimes of your ancestors, of the kings of Judah, of their wives, your own crimes and those of your wives” (NRSV) committed earlier in Judah. The men and women tell Jeremiah, “We will do everything that we have vowed, make offerings to the queen of heaven and pour out libations to her, just as we and our ancestors, our king, and our officials used to do” (Jer 44:17 NRSV) in Judah and Jerusalem. The women argued that as long as they worshiped the Queen of Heaven, things went well. S. Ackerman notes, “This devotion in the face of persecution indicates the worship of the Queen of Heaven was an important part of women’s religious expression in the sixth century” (Ackerman 1989, 110). Furthermore, their husbands condoned and participated in this worship (Jer 44:19). It is arguable that women in particular were attracted to the worship of the goddess because they were excluded from many religious functions in the institutional worship of Yahweh (Gruber 1992b).

2.2.2. Ezekiel. Ezekiel also proclaims judgment against the people of Judah for unfaithfulness. Ezekiel 8:14 depicts women at the Jerusalem temple “weeping for Tammuz.” Tammuz, or Dumuzi, was a Sumerian-Babylonian fertility god whose death was mourned when the heat of summer dried up the vegetation and whose resurrection from the underworld was celebrated when the winter rains produced the greenery of spring. Only women are mentioned here in relation to the Tammuz ritual, while men are worshipping the sun or the sun god (Ezek 8:16). S. Ackermann sees a connection between this mourning for Tammuz and the cult of the Queen of Heaven in Jeremiah insofar as Ishtar is the goddess who laments for her lover Tammuz (Ackermann 1989, 116; see also Darr 1992, 187).

Ezekiel accuses women false prophets who, like the men condemned a few verses earlier, “prophesy out of their own imagination” (Ezek 13:17 NRSV), accusing them of seeing false visions and practicing *divination (Ezek 13:17-23). They sew bands on wrists and make veils for people. The context suggests that these are magical practices, perhaps meant to ward off evil spirits. Ezekiel further declares God’s judgment that they are “putting to death persons who should not die and keeping alive persons who should not live, by your lies to my people.” This suggests that the false women prophets have used divination to determine guilt or innocence in criminal cases, resulting in grossly unjust verdicts. W. Gafney speculates whether the rituals of these women were related to pregnancy and childbirth (Gafney, 109).

3. The Tribulations of Women.

3.1. Social Strife. Micah 7 notes how injustice in society has led to strife in the community and the family: "The son treats the father with contempt, the daughter rises up against her mother, the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law" (Mic 7:6 NRSV). In a healthy and just society there will be harmony between mothers and daughters, and between mothers-in-law and daughters-in-law (living in the same household).

3.2. Widows and Orphans. The phrase "widows and orphans" appears throughout the OT. A better translation of "orphan" is "fatherless," since the term refers to children who may have a mother but have no male provider and protector (Ex 22:24; Lam 5:3). The phrase suggests single mothers and their children who struggle financially without a male provider and are subject to exploitation (Ex 22:22-23; Job 24:21; Ps 94:6). In the Prophets widows and orphans are mentioned with the alien as vulnerable to exploitation and abuse (Jer 7:6; 22:3; Ezek 22:7; Mic 2:9; Zech 7:10; Mal 3:5) and are listed with the poor and the needy (Is 10:2; Jer 5:28; Zech 7:10).

The Hebrew term translated as "widow" does not necessarily indicate a woman whose husband is dead, but may refer to a formerly married woman who has lost her male protector and provider (Cohen). The formerly married woman is in a position of social shame (Is 47:8-9; 54:4) because she is vulnerable and lacks access to the social position that a husband would provide. B. Malina observes that in an honor-and-shame society "women not under the tutelage of a male—notably widows and divorced women—are viewed as stripped of female honor . . . sexually predatory, aggressive, 'hot to trot,' hence dangerous. . . . Hence the precarious position of the widow and divorcee" (Malina, 44). A woman derives honor from her status as a wife and a mother. A formerly married woman was especially shamed in the eyes of society. M. Odell comments, "Shame is associated with the dissolution of social bonds [and] . . . can accompany the discovery that one cannot depend on a close social relationship" (Odell, 220) (see Honor and Shame).

The practice of social *justice and righteousness is exemplified by defense of the "widow" and "orphan" in Isaiah 1:17: "Rescue the oppressed, defend the orphan, plead for the widow" (NRSV). Those in power, especially the king, have a special obligation to "defend" and protect the widow and the orphan and are judged by their failure to do so (Is 1:23; 10:1-2; Jer 22:3). God will help the orphans and widows (Jer 49:11; cf. Ps 68:5; 146:9; Is 9:17 notes the exception).

3.3. Women and War. In times of war women are explicitly mentioned with men in fleeing the enemy (Jer 48:19), being taken into captivity (Jer 48:46), and seeing their sons and daughters die by sword, famine or disease (Jer 16:3-4). The particular hardships faced by Israelite women in times of war are also mentioned, as are, with a tone of unsavory satisfaction, the hardships of the women of enemy nations. In Jeremiah's judgment against Babylon women and girls, along with men and boys, will be "smashed" by God's judgment (Jer 51:22) (see Warfare and Divine Warfare).

In war women are made widows and mourn the loss of their children (Jer 15:8). Jeremiah's judgment against his adversaries in Judah includes "Let their wives become childless and widowed" (Jer 18:21 NRSV). Not only do war widows grieve for their husbands, but also they are left socially and economically vulnerable.

Rape is the particular burden of women in times of war. Isaiah's judgment against Babylon includes the murder of infants and the rape of women (Is 13:16). The wording highlights the distress and shame that this brings to the men who are powerless to protect their wives and children rather than the suffering of the women themselves (see Chapman, 40-44). Amos's judgment against the priest Amaziah focuses on what invasion will mean for Amaziah's wife: "Your wife shall become a prostitute in the city" (Amos 7:17 NRSV).

Pregnant women were vulnerable and perhaps targeted, as they were "ripped open" by enemy soldiers (Hos 13:16; Amos 1:13). Isaiah 37:3 describes the conditions of the siege of Jerusalem by Assyria in 701 BC and its effect on birthing women. Without food coming into the city, "children have come to birth, and there is no strength to bring them forth" (Is 37:3 NRSV). Such a scenario meant death for both mother and child.

Both men and women were subject to being taken captive in war. Nahum portrays how even the slave women of Nineveh taken captive will moan “like doves,” beating their breasts (Nah 2:7).

4. Women as the Occasion for Men’s Sins.

Numerous times the sinfulness of the men of Israel and Judah is exemplified in their engaging in sex with prostitutes and their “neighbors’ wives” (Jer 7:7-8; 29:23; Ezek 33:26; Hos 4:14). The guilt of the men is highlighted. The image of the adulteress or prostitute functions metaphorically in the prophets to signify the unfaithfulness of the people in general (see 6.1 below).

Hosea 4:14 says, “For the men themselves go aside with whores, and sacrifice with temple prostitutes” (NRSV). A number of translations refer to “temple prostitutes” here. The belief that cultic prostitution was characteristic of ancient Near Eastern religion was widespread among twentieth-century scholars (e.g., Mays; Wolff), but that assumption is widely questioned due to lack of clear evidence. M. Gruber comments on the assumption that ancient Near Eastern female cultic functionaries were primarily prostitutes: “Tragically, scholarship suffered from scholars being unable to imagine any cultic role for women in antiquity that did not involve sexual intercourse” (Gruber 1992a, 26). The Hebrew term is qēdēšōt (sg. qēdēšā), which literally means “consecrated women.” They are women who had specific functions in relation to a temple or sanctuary and who came to be forbidden after religious reforms. We do not know what they did or why their presence was condemned. Scholarly debate has been extensive. Presumably, their functions came to be associated with alien religious practices (such as divination). The translation “temple prostitutes” is unfortunate because the theory that their function was sexual is only one possibility. P. Bird argues that in Hosea 4:14 the qēdēšōt are women who had a cultic function that Hosea associates with Baal worship and are paired with prostitutes as a polemical judgment (Bird, 87). Gruber notes that while the Akkadian cognate qadistu “denotes a woman who has been dedicated to the service of a deity” as a cultic singer and a wet nurse (not a prostitute), the Hebrew equivalent in Genesis 38:21-22; Deuteronomy 23:18; Hosea 4:14 indicates a (noncultic) prostitute (Gruber 1992a, 19).

5. Specific Women Mentioned.

In the prophetic corpus individuals mentioned are most often the prophets themselves and the kings. The prophets’ other contemporaries are rarely named. However, the prophets sometimes hark back to earlier figures to advance their message. In Isaiah 51:2 Sarah “who bore you” is named as the mother of Israel with Abraham “your father.” Rachel, the foremother of the northern tribes of Ephraim, Manasseh and Benjamin, is evoked in Jeremiah 31:15 in a word of hope for the exiled northern tribes. “Rachel is weeping for her children; she refuses to be comforted for her children, because they are no more” (NRSV), but God promises that Rachel’s children will return from exile. Miriam is listed in Micah 6:4-5 with Moses, Aaron and Balaam, apparently a list of prophets from the wilderness period.

5.1. Gomer. In Hosea 1—2 Hosea’s “wife of whoredom” is both a person and a metaphor along with the “adulteress” of Hosea 3 (Hos 1—3 is discussed in 6.1.1 below).

5.2. The “Young Woman” of the Immanuel Prophecy. In Isaiah 7:7-17 the prophet says, “Look, the young woman is with child and shall bear a son, and shall name him Immanuel” (Is 7:14 NRSV). Judah (the southern kingdom) is under attack from the nations of Israel/Ephraim (the northern kingdom) and Aram/Syria. Isaiah proclaims a sign from God that a child yet to be born will receive the symbolic name “Immanuel” (“God is with us”). The name is a sign that God will deliver Judah from its attackers. Isaiah further adds that by the time the child “knows how to refuse the evil and choose the good” (Is 7:15 NRSV), Judah’s enemies will have fallen. Judah withstood the attack, and within twelve years the kingdoms of both Aram and Ephraim had been defeated by Assyria.

When Jewish translators rendered this passage into Greek they translated the term ‘almā (“a yet childless young woman”), lacking a precise Greek equivalent, as parthenos, meaning “virgin.” The Greek term for “virgin” appears in the Gospel of Matthew in connection with the birth of Jesus. Based on Matthew’s quotation (Mt 1:23), Christian tradition has identified the young woman in Isaiah 7 as the Virgin Mary (see Prophets in the New Testament). The identity of the young woman in Isaiah’s original context has been variously identified as Isa-iah's own wife (Isaiah's sons received symbolic names [Is 7:3; 8:3-4]) (Gottwald), the wife of King Ahaz (Scullion) or even a random young woman whom Isaiah can point to. O. Kaiser interprets it collectively: women will name their sons "Immanuel" in gratitude and praise for the nation's deliverance. The child himself does nothing expressly to deliver Judah from its enemies. Rather, the point is the time period by which the enemies will be defeated: by the time a yet unborn child reaches the age of discernment, the crisis will be over (the prophecy was fulfilled in twelve years).

6. Female Imagery for City or Nation.

In the Hebrew language cities are grammatically feminine, and when a city is personified, it is described as a woman. The female imagery often carries over to the nation. Amos laments over the death of "virgin Israel," who is fallen "with no one to raise her up" (Amos 5:2), signifying Israel's imminent demise if the nation does not repent. Zion or Jerusalem is called a "daughter" a number of times (e.g., Is 1:8; 52:2; Jer 4:31; Mic 1:13; 4:8; Zeph 3:1; Zech 2:7; 9:9). The phrase "virgin daughter" is also used (Is 37:22; Jer 14:17; 18:13; 31:3, 21). Other nations' cities are also referred to as "daughters." The terms often are accompanied by further personification as the daughter-city "despises, scorns, tosses her head" at her enemy (Is 37:21-22); is a captive (Is 52:2); gasps and cries out like a woman in labor (Jer 4:31); is a wounded person (Jer 14:17); is called upon to "return" (Jer 31:21-22); and is one who laments (Joel 1:8). Zephaniah and Zechariah bid Daughter Zion to sing and rejoice at her restoration (Zeph 3:14-20; Zech 2:10-12). Zechariah 9:9-13 calls Zion/Jerusalem "daughter" and calls her citizens her "sons" or "children." Jeremiah proclaims a word of hope that Zion's "incurable wound," guilt and punishment will see God's healing (Jer 30:12-17) and Zion will be rebuilt and dance with joy (Jer 31:4) (the entailments are not explicitly as a woman, but they are a personified "she").

6.1. God's Unfaithful Wife. The people Israel were understood to be in a covenant relationship with their *God. Their God, Yahweh, was a jealous God, with whom they were to have an exclusive relationship, excluding all other gods. The worship of another god thus was seen as infidelity to the covenant relationship. This understanding is reflected in the marriage metaphor that appears in Hosea, Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Whereas a man could have more than one wife, a wife must be faithful to only one husband. The prophets cast the people Israel in the role of a wife owing exclusive fidelity to God, her husband, who loves her, provides for her, and protects her. The OT speaks of idolatry as the people "prostituting themselves" or "playing the whore" with other gods (e.g., Ezek 43:7; Hos 5:3-4; 6:10; 9:1). This metaphor is used explicitly several times and may be implicit in texts such as Isaiah's claim that Jerusalem, the "faithful city," has "become a whore" (Is 1:21). In recent years scholarly interest in Yahweh's "wife" in Hosea, Jeremiah and Ezekiel has proliferated, but this cannot be fully reviewed here.

6.1.1. Hosea. Hosea's use of the marriage metaphor is the earliest. Hosea is instructed by God to "take a wife of whoredom and have children of whoredom, for the land commits great whoredom" (Hos 1:2 NRSV) (see Hosea, Book of). Hosea's symbolic marriage characterizes God's relationship with Israel. "Israel" is masculine, so a more nuanced interpretation identifies the "wife" as either the land (grammatically feminine) of Israel or the capital city (grammatically feminine) of Samaria (Schmitt 1989). Hosea's three children by Gomer receive symbolic names, including "Lo-ruhamah" ("no compassion") and "Lo-ammi" ("not my people"). The last reverses the covenant "I will be your God, and you will be my people." God now proclaims, "You are not my people, and I am not your God" (Hos 1:9). In Hosea 2 the identities of God and Hosea and of Israel and Gomer blur as the husband expresses outrage at the wife's infidelity, threatening to punish her for crediting the nature deities, the Baals, with providing her with the "grain, the wine, and the oil"—that is, all the good produce of the earth. The wronged "husband" will "strip her naked" and "kill her with thirst" (Hos 2:3). He will have no pity on "her" children (Hos 2:4), will "uncover her shame in the sight of her lovers" (Hos 2:10), and then turn and "allure her . . . speak tenderly to her" (Hos 2:14), bringing her out of the land of Canaan back into the wilderness, where she will experience her dependence on him alone as her provider. She will no longer call him "my ba'al" ("my master/husband"), but rather "my 'is" ("my man/husband,” the direct counterpart of the word for “wife,” ’iššā, perhaps highlighting mutuality rather than hierarchy). God will woo his estranged wife, and the children will receive names of compassion and fidelity.

Hosea 3 has Hosea purchasing a woman who is an adulteress as a symbol of Israel’s infidelity with other gods. The relationship of Hosea 3 to Hosea 1–2 and whether this also refers to Gomer is contested (see also Hos 8:9; 9:1).

Hosea’s depiction of Israel as an unfaithful wife would have conveyed to the men of Israel the level of God’s outrage, hurt and sense of betrayal by having them recognize how they themselves would react to an unfaithful wife.

There has been a wide range of interpretations of what is meant by a “woman of whoredom” who subsequently bears “children of whoredom.” Suggestions concerning Gomer’s identity have included a common prostitute and an ordinary young woman of Israel who is “of whoredom” by virtue of belonging to this unfaithful people. Many scholars have identified Gomer as a woman who participated in Canaanite fertility cults (Wolff, 14–15), but there is little evidence to support that such rites existed (see 4 above).

The first two or three chapters of Hosea traditionally have been interpreted as representing God’s love and mercy toward the sinner. However, in recent years critical questions have been raised about the pitfalls of characterizing God as a husband who takes retribution against his wayward wife with the use of violence and shame. D. Setel’s 1985 feminist analysis laid the foundation for subsequent critiques of this metaphor. Setel argues that the text objectifies the woman/women, reinforces cultural values of “female passivity and dependence,” and justifies spousal abuse (Setel, 92). Setel’s essay was a groundbreaking one, raising hermeneutical questions about how a text not only reflects its own historical social setting, but also continues to construct a worldview and view of women in its reading communities.

Setel’s concerns have been taken up by subsequent women scholars such as R. Weems and D. Jacobson, who writes, “The corollary question is what kind of sexuality and marriage are here commended. Are we to value the covenant of marriage above all else in the face of systematic abuse? . . . All right, she is guilty, but should the husband then strip and shame her? Can this metaphor ever really be used compellingly to speak of God’s forgiveness and grace? . . . The intent of an author can never itself prevent the real effect of a text in and on a community” (Jacobson 2008a, 195) (for the other side of the argument, see Jacobson 2008b).

There is now a greater appreciation for how metaphors not only illustrate an idea, but also are powerful tools in constructing reality. The critique of the story of Hosea and Gomer is that it constructs a reality in which a husband abusing his wife mirrors divine action. The story resembles the recurring pattern of an abusive marriage in which the husband isolates the wife, shames her, threatens her, and then declares his love (only to repeat the abuse). This is a troublesome and potentially dangerous text if it somehow normalizes (or even divinizes) domestic abuse.

6.1.2. Jeremiah. The image of God’s wife appears throughout Jeremiah 2. God says, “I remember the devotion of your youth, your love as a bride” (Jer 2:2 NRSV [see also Jer 2:32]). But, “On every high hill and under every green tree you sprawled and played the whore” (Jer 2:20 NRSV). Unfaithful Jerusalem is like a female animal in heat (Jer 2:23–24). She seeks lovers (Jer 2:25, 33) and, by her example, corrupts even wicked women (Jer 2:33).

In Jeremiah 3 the prophet depicts the two nations of Israel and Judah as the two wives of God. Decades after the fall of the northern kingdom of Israel Jeremiah describes how Israel “played the whore” and did not repent, so God “sent her away with a decree of divorce,” signifying the exile of the northern kingdom by Assyria (Jer 3:9). Now her sister, Judah, has also “played the whore,” committing adultery with idols (Jer 3:6–10). Jeremiah mixes the husband-wife metaphor and the parent-child metaphor (Jer 3:2–4, 13–14, 19–20), highlighting that both a husband and a father are to be honored. Infidelity and ingratitude dishonor God, who may be compelled to divorce his unfaithful wife and disown his “faithless” children (see also Jer 4:30–31; 10:19–20). Yet God still offers hope of return from exile for Israel. Jeremiah 13:20–27 is addressed to Zion, who will be raped for her sins (Jer 13:22), for her “abominations,” “adulteries” and “shameless prostitutions.”

A. Diamond and K. O’Connor note that Jeremiah intensifies Hosea’s metaphor insofar as “In Hos. 2:7 [MT] she is merely searching for security and fertility, but in Jeremiah raw animal lust drives her (Jer. 2:20-25)" (Diamond and O'Connor, 306-7). Furthermore, the marriage is not restored in Jeremiah. Diamond and O'Connor, with others, echo critiques of Hosea. "Despite the metaphor's sympathetic portrayal of the deity who suffers deeply and longs for his beloved, the metaphor undermines itself by reinforcing cultural images of a punishing unjust God, of punishing unjust husbands, and of wicked independent women" (Diamond and O'Connor, 310).

Jeremiah 31:31-34 uses the marriage metaphor without explicit sexual imagery. God had made a covenant with Israel when they came out of Egypt, "a covenant that they broke, though I had married them" (Jer 31:33 NRSV).

6.1.3. Ezekiel. Ezekiel, writing from exile in Babylon, also depicts Jerusalem as God's wife. Ezekiel 16; 23 convey the outrage and betrayal seen earlier in Hosea, but with the lewd language and violence ratcheted up to a level that some commentators have identified as being pornographic. Ezekiel 16 depicts Jerusalem's Canaanite origins, describing "her" as an abandoned infant girl. God rescued her and "entered into a covenant with you"—that is, married her and adorned her with fine clothing and jewelry. But she "played the whore" and "lavished your whorings on any passer-by" (Ezek 16:15 NRSV). The text goes on to blend descriptions of religious infidelity (making shrines, making idol images, sacrificing or dedicating her "children" to idols) with sexual language, repeatedly referring to her infidelity as acting like a "whore." Jerusalem's "playing the whore" with foreign nations signifies political alliances. Establishing political treaties may have been seen as showing a lack of trust in God to protect them, or, more seriously, it may have involved Judah's acceptance of the gods of their political overlords. Since Judah first was made a vassal of Egypt and shortly thereafter of Babylon (Chaldea), it seems like blaming the victim. To adopt Ezekiel's metaphor, is he calling a rape victim a whore? Perhaps the issue is not the conquest of Judah but rather the degree to which the Judeans embraced the religious rites of their overlords. As a vassal of these nations, Judah had to pay "tribute." "Yet you were not like a whore, because you scorned payment. . . . Gifts are given to all whores; but you have your gifts to your lovers, bribing them to come to you from all around for your whorings. So you were different from other women in your whorings" (Ezek 16:31-34 NRSV).

God will now gather Jerusalem's "lovers" (nations) and will "uncover your nakedness to them," and she will be judged for adultery. The sentence is death. She will be stripped naked, and a mob will stone her and cut her to pieces (Ezek 16:40). Then God's fury will be "satisfied," and he will be calm and no longer angry. With this final note, God seems to be depicted as a wronged husband whose rage and violence are completely out of control, and only when he had killed his wife will he calm down. L. Day describes Yahweh's behavior in Ezekiel 16 as the typical three-stage pattern repeating of a possessive and jealous batterer: tension building and escalation of irritation and accusations, violent attack, calmness and contrition (Day, 214).

Ezekiel 23 is likewise extreme in its imagery. Samaria (called "Oholah") and Jerusalem (called "Oholibah") are two sisters who "played the whore" in Egypt. F. van Dijk-Hemmes translates Ezekiel 23:3, "'There their breasts were squeezed; There the teats of their maidenhood were pressed' (or, literally: 'There they (masculine; see also v 8) pressed the teats of their maidenhood')" (van Dijk-Hemmes, 167). This early abuse leads to Oholibah's later abuse. "Her harlotry from since (her days in) Egypt she did not give up; For they lay upon/raped her in her youth; And then men pressed the teats of her maidenhood; And they poured out their harlotry upon her" (Ezek 23:8 [trans. van Dijk-Hemmes, 167]). If this is a reference to the exodus story's sojourn in Egypt, it seems, once again, to be blaming the victim. Samaria played the whore with Assyria and its idols until God delivered her into their hands and they killed her. Jerusalem was more corrupt "in her lusting and in her whorings" with Assyrians and with the idols of the Chaldeans (Babylon). The lewdness of this chapter includes descriptions of the huge genitals of her lovers (Ezek 23:20). God will send her lovers against her. They will cut off her nose and ears (Ezek 23:25). Her children will be "devoured by fire" (Ezek 23:25). She will be left naked and be destroyed like Samaria. Further charges are made that Samaria and Jerusalem have offered up their children to idols and defiled the temple. Finally, an assembly will stone them, cut them down, kill their children, and burn their houses (Ezek 23:47). "Thus will I put an end to lewdness in the land, so that all women may take warning and not commit lewdness as you have done," and "you shall know that I am the Lord God" (Ezek 23:48-49 NRSV).

Elsewhere Ezekiel refers to Jerusalem as a city of "filthiness" (Ezek 22:15), "the bloody city" (Ezek 24:7) and a city of "filthy lewdness" that "shall not again be cleansed until I have satisfied my fury upon you" (Ezek 24:13 NRSV). The Israelites' sin is "like the uncleanness of a woman in her menstrual period" (Ezek 36:17 NRSV).

Much speculation has been made about Ezekiel's state of mind in depicting God's judgment with such intense language. The tone says much about the messenger—a temple priest who was torn away from the temple that he loved, marched hundreds of miles into exile, witnessed the death of his wife, and suppressed all mourning (Ezek 24:15-27). Rather than blaming Babylon for his profound losses and displacement, his focus is on those in Jerusalem who, he believes, brought about God's wrath by embracing foreign alliances and religion.

The thorough treatment of these passages by J. Galambush emphasizes the connection between "uncleanness" and the female imagery. For Ezekiel, a temple priest, ritual purity was of utmost concern. Ritual uncleanness was not a condition of sin, but in Ezekiel the sins of the people have rendered the temple unclean (Ezek 8:6). Uncleanness becomes a metaphor for *sin.

F. van Dijk-Hemmes writes, "The androcentric-pornographic character of this metaphorical language must indeed be experienced as extremely humiliating by the male audience forced to imagine itself as being exposed to violating enemies" (van Dijk-Hemmes, 169).

While Ezekiel subsequently writes of God cleansing the people (Ezek 36:25), enlivening the dry bones of Israel (Ezek 37:1-14), and restoring the temple (Ezek 40—47), the female imagery is dropped. Woman/wife Zion is not restored (Galambush).

Feminist critiques of Ezekiel 16; 23 echo those of Hosea and Jeremiah (for a response, see Patton).

6.2. God's Restored Wife. Second Isaiah and Third Isaiah image the restoration of woman *Zion's relationship with God, her husband, and the restoration of children to her. Following the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 BC, Isaiah 40—66 proclaims comfort, hope and restoration to Zion/Jerusalem. Second Isaiah begins with words of "comfort" to Jerusalem because "she has served her term . . . her penalty is paid" (Is 40:1 NRSV). Zion is a "herald [fem.] of good tidings" who is to proclaim to the cities of Judah, "Here is your God!" (Is 40:9). Zion says in Isaiah 49:14, "The LORD has forsaken me, my Lord has forgotten me" (cf. Lam 5:20). Then either God responds or Zion continues, asking and answering a rhetorical question: "Can a woman forget her nursing child, or show no compassion for the child of her womb? Even these may forget, yet I will not forget you." While God is a mother who will not forget her children (see 7 below), Zion is also depicted as a mother who is bereft of her children. But she has forgotten her children because when they return to her (the exiles), she does not recognize them (Is 49:19-21). A restored Zion will be "like a bride" (Is 49:18), and her "children" like her bridal ornaments (see Dille 2004, 138-44).

In Isaiah 50:1 God asks, "Where is your mother's bill of divorce with which I put her away?" (NRSV). The implication is that Zion was sent away by her husband, but that there was not a final bill of divorce, leaving open the possibility of reconciliation (Dille 2004, 162-68). In Isaiah 51:17 God calls Zion, "Rouse yourself!" She has lost her "children," but the message now is to arise. "You [fem.] shall drink no more from the bowl of my wrath" (Is 51:22 NRSV). God calls her again to "Awake, awake." Zion is to put on beautiful garments and be freed from captivity (Is 52:1-2).

Perhaps Second Isaiah's most creative description of God's wife, Zion, is in Isaiah 54. In a reversal of Jeremiah 10:19-20, Zion is described as a barren and widowed woman who is promised so many children that she will have to enlarge her "tent" and see abandoned towns inhabited. "You will forget the shame of your youth, and the disgrace of your widowhood you will remember no more" (Is 54:4 NRSV). The Hebrew word for "youth" here describes a young woman who has not yet borne any children (see also Joel 1:8). Childlessness was regarded as shameful because it was believed to be a sign of God's disfavor. Widowhood is called a "disgrace" (see 3.2 above). If a married man dies childless, his widow is to provide him with a posthumous son through his brother (Deut 25:5-10). This brother-in-law is called a “redeemer” (gōʿēl). Here in Isaiah 54 God will become the husband and “redeemer” (gōʿēl) of the childless widow (Is 54:5). The metaphor is not a perfect fit because the redeemer husband turns out to be the husband who had abandoned her earlier (Is 54:7). But this abandonment was “for a brief moment” (the exile), not permanent. God will now have compassion on Zion and provide her with many children (Dille 2003, 246-47).

With the return of some exiles, the prophet of Third Isaiah speaks of Zion as a mother whose sons and daughters are returning to her (Is 60:1-4). Isaiah 62 is dedicated to God’s wife, Zion, who, with exile over, will be vindicated. She is described with both bridal and royal imagery. Rather than being “forsaken” and “desolate,” “you shall be called My Delight Is in Her, and your land Married, for the LORD delights in you, and your land shall be married” (Is 62:4 NRSV). In the closing chapter of Isaiah Zion is not explicitly described as God’s wife, but rather as a mother delivering her children. Here Zion’s children will be nursed “from her consoling breast.”

6.3. Personified Zion in Micah. The book of Micah describes “daughter Zion” as a warrior (Mic 4:8—5:1). She is to “writhe and groan . . . like a woman in labor,” an expression typically used to describe siege or battle (see 6.4 below). But she will go forth to defeat her enemies. Micah 5:3 may describe either Zion or Bethlehem as “she who is in labor” who will have “brought forth.” This birth may represent the coming of a new Davidic ruler (Mic 5:2 [so interpreted in Mt 2:6]) or the city’s deliverance from the Assyrian siege.

6.4. Female Imagery for Foreign Cities. Foreign cities and *nations are not depicted in the Bible as the wife of a god, but often they are referred to as “daughters” (Jer 46:11, 24; 48:18; 49:4; 50:42; 51:33; Ezek 32:18; Zech 2:7).

Jeremiah proclaims the fall of Chaldea/Babylon “your mother” and “she who bore you.” She will be put to shame. Her walls will be thrown down, and the city will become a wilderness (Jer 50:10-15; see also Jer 51:8-9). In Isaiah 47 Babylon is called “virgin daughter Babylon” and “daughter Chaldea.” In this text, written from exile in Babylon, Babylon is portrayed as an aristocratic or royal woman (“noblewoman of kingdoms” [Is 47:5]). She is a woman who engages in the Babylonian “en-chantments,” “sorceries” and “consultations” with astrologers (Is 47:12-13). Though confident of her position of power and privilege, she will experience humiliation as she is stripped and forced to work as a slave (Is 47:2-3). She will experience the shame of widowhood and the loss of children (in contrast to Zion in Is 54).

“Virgin daughter Egypt” cannot find healing (Jer 46:11-12). She will have to “pack [her] bags for exile” (Jer 46:19-25). Nineveh (Assyria) is personified as “drunken” (Nah 3:11). Tyre is prostituting herself with “all the kingdoms of the world” (Is 23:14-18). Sidon is a childless woman—a shameful state (Is 23:4).

A city or nation under threat, or even warrior or king, is described as being “like a woman in labor” (or a similar phrase). The phrase describes a physical reaction to great distress associated with words such as “feeble, panic, pain, anguish, sorrows, writhing, limp hands” (Is 13:8; 21:3; 26:17-18; Jer 4:31; 6:24; 22:23; 30:6; 48:41; 49:24; 50:43; Mic 4:9). The context often is that of a city undergoing a current or impending siege from which one must ultimately come forth (or bring forth) or die (see Dille 2004, 52-66).

7. Female Imagery for God.

The God of Israel transcended gender in a way uncharacteristic of the gods and goddesses of the ancient Near East. Orthodox Yahwism did not permit the god to have a feminine consort, eliminating the notion of God as a sexual male. Yet the most common metaphor for God was masculine: God as a king. Nevertheless, the rich poetry of prophetic speech provides a plethora of images for the God of Israel, including female imagery.

The prophets’ metaphors and similes ranged from highly conventional (king [Is 6:1]; judge [Mic 6:2]) to unique and even strange (maggots [Hos 5:12]; dew [Hos 14:5]). In between the highly conventional and the anomalous are images such as God as a husband (see above), a potter (Is 64:8), a father (not yet conventional [Is 63:16; 64:8]) and a mother.

7.1. God as a Mother. Second Isaiah (Is 40—55) portrays God as a mother three times. In Isaiah 42:13-14 God cries out like a “man of war” and then cries out “like a woman in labor.” God is like both the warrior and the laboring woman in their crying out and who courageously face imminent danger for the sake of the life of another. God's silence seems to compare the exile to the time of gestation. God's people move from darkness into light as a sort of birth into liberation from exile (Is 42:16) (like coming forth from a city after when a siege has ended?) (Dille 2004, chap. 3).

In Isaiah 45:9-10 God is compared to a potter and to a father and a birthing woman. Juxtaposing the potter with the birth parent highlights the role of God as creator, who brings into being the pottery work or the child (Dille 2004, chap. 5).

God is compared to the mother of an infant in Isaiah 49:14-15. Zion is a woman bereft of her children who accuses God of having abandoned and forgotten her. A rhetorical question follows, spoken either by Zion or by God: "Can a woman forget her nursing child, or show no compassion for the child of her womb?" Then it is clearly God who answers, "Even these may forget, yet I will not forget you." God is not only like a mother. In an odd rhetorical twist, the limitations of the metaphor of mother love is acknowledged: "even these may forget." Even mothers have been known to abandon their children, but God will never forget Zion. Isaiah 46:3 has been interpreted as mother imagery, but less persuasively (Loland 2008, chap. 7). God has carried Israel since birth. In Isaiah 66 God is like a mother to Zion and her children, saying, "As a mother comforts her child, so I will comfort you; you shall be comforted in Jerusalem" (Is 66:13 NRSV).

Hosea 11:1-4 appears also to portray God as a mother, but less clearly, since the Hebrew is ambiguous. God speaks of Israel as "my son." Then God either teaches Ephraim to walk, leads Ephraim, or nurses Ephraim. Furthermore, depending on whether one translates ʿol as "yoke" or "infant" God says, "I was . . . like those who lift infants to their cheeks" or "I was like those who ease the yoke on their jaws," continuing, "I bent down to them and fed them" (Hos 11:4). H. Schüngel-Straumann renders it, "I was for them like those who take a nursling to the breast. I bowed down to him in order to give him suck" (Schüngel-Straumann, 195-96). God is either leading Israel, a yoked animal, lifting off its yoke (a metaphor for foreign oppression), and feeding it, or God is caring for a toddler, teaching it to walk, lifting it up and feeding it. The latter reflects the society's expectations of a mother rather than a father. God adds, "I am

God and not a man [ʾîš]" (Hos 11:9), likely contrasting divine compassion with human, but arguably contrasting motherly compassion with that of a man (Schüngel-Straumann).

Other texts portray God as a parent without being explicitly father or mother, such as Isaiah 1:2: "I reared children and brought them up."

7.2. Other Female Imagery for God. Female imagery for God might also include animal imagery. Hosea 13:8 describes God's wrath toward the unfaithful as like that of a mother bear robbed of her cubs. V. Mollenkott, A. Zannoni and J. van Wijk-Bos each provide overviews of female imagery in the Bible, including *animal imagery, with brief discussion. P. Tribble includes references to God's "compassion" as female imagery, noting that the Hebrew words for "compassion" (ruḥāmā) and "merciful" (raḥûm) are related to the Hebrew word for "womb" (reḥem). Tribble includes texts such as Hosea 2:21; Isaiah 49:15; 63:15-16; Jeremiah 31:20, the last of which she translates, "Is Ephraim my dear son my darling child? For the more I speak of him, the more I do remember him. Therefore, my womb trembles for him; I will truly show motherly-compassion upon him. Oracle of Yahweh" (Tribble, 45).

8. The Woman in an Ephah Basket.

Zechariah 5:5-11 describes one of the prophet's visions of seeing "a woman in an ephah basket." She is "wickedness." Winged women will transport her in the basket to Shinar (Babylon), where they will build a house (temple) for it/her. Many scholars identify the woman as a goddess (Asherah, Anat, Astarte, Ishtar) whose worship is purged from the land (for a list of scholarly sources and proposals, see Edelman, 336-37). Other suggestions are Eve, the unclean land of Judah, the prophets' figurative prostitute, foreign women, and the Samaritans (the last proposed by E. Assis).

WORD OF GOD

While all Scripture is the word of God, the Prophetic Books perhaps more than any other biblical genre are God's words in that they contain the highest percentage of speech directly attributed to God himself. After discussing relevant terminology, this article examines the method of communication, the context, the mediators, the recipients and the nature of the word as both human and divine.

1. Terminology
2. Method of Communication
3. Context
4. Mediators
5. Recipients
6. Divine Word, Human Word

1. Terminology.

1.1. Words. God speaks to his people frequently, and the text typically uses specific words and phrases to distinguish his speech. A variety of Hebrew words are used in association with divine speech in the Prophetic Books (all occurrences below refer to the Prophetic Books exclusively). Two of the primary words used are the verb dābar, "to speak" (almost always in the Piel, dibbēr), which appears 289 times (e.g., Is 1:2; Jer 1:16; Ezek 2:1; Dan 9:6; Hos 1:2; Joel 3:8; Amos 3:1; Obad 18; Jon 3:2; Mic 4:4; Hab 2:1; Zech 1:9), and the related noun dābār, "word," which appears 448 times (e.g., Is 1:10; Jer 1:2; Ezek 1:3; Dan 9:2; Hos 1:1; Joel 1:1; Amos 3:1; Jon 1:1; Mic 1:1; Hab 1:1; Zeph 1:1; Zech 1:1; Mal 1:1). The majority of these references occur in the context of divine speech, as will be seen from the discussion below of phrases.

The verb ʾāmar, "to say," is ubiquitous in the Prophetic Books, with 1,411 occurrences. While ʾāmar is also used for human speech (e.g., Is 2:3; Jer 1:6; Ezek 2:4), God is the primary subject of the verb, and it appears in contexts of divine speech in all sixteen of the Prophetic Books (Is 1:11; Jer 1:4; Ezek 2:1; Dan 8:13; Hos 1:2; Joel 2:19; Amos 1:2; Obad 1; Jon 1:1; Mic 2:3; Nah 1:12; Hab 2:2; Zeph 3:7; Hag 1:1; Zech 1:1; Mal 1:2). The two noun forms associated with this verb only appear a few times. The noun ʾēmer, "speech, word," appears only once to clearly indicate divine speech (Is 41:26; Hab 3:9 is unclear). The noun ʾimrâ, "speech" or "word," appears three times when God speaks (Is 5:24; 28:23; 32:9) and once when Jerusalem speaks (Is 29:4).

The noun nēʾūm, "utterance, declaration," appears frequently in the Prophetic Books, a total of 355 times (e.g., Is 1:24; Jer 1:8; Ezek 5:11; Hos 2:15; Joel 2:12; Amos 2:11; Obad 4; Mic 4:6; Nah 2:13 [2:14 MT]; Zeph 1:2; Hag 1:9; Zech 1:3; Mal 1:2), with only an additional twenty references elsewhere in the OT. The related verbal root, nāʾam, "to utter a prophecy," appears only once (Jer 23:31).

The noun maššāʾ, "oracle," appears twenty-six times, usually to introduce a divine message (e.g., Ezek 12:10; Nah 1:1; Hab 1:1; Zech 9:1; 12:1; Mal 1:1), particularly in the book of Isaiah (e.g., Is 13:1; 14:28; 15:1; 17:1; 19:1; 21:1). Since maššāʾ can also mean "burden," it is used in Jeremiah 23:33-38 (8x) in an apparent play on words, and English translations are divided, rendering maššāʾ as either the "burden" (ESV, NRSV) or the "oracle" (NIV, NASB) of Yahweh.

Other words are used less frequently to introduce divine communication in the form of visions or dreams: hāzôn, "vision" (Is 1:1; Dan 8:1; Hos 12:10; Obad 1; Nah 1:1; Hab 2:2, 2 [although hāzôn is used also of false visions, as in Jer 14:14; 23:16; Ezek 12:24]); hāzût, "revelation" (Is 21:2; 29:11); marʾâ, "vision, appearance" (e.g., Ezek 1:1; 11:24; Dan 8:16; 9:23; 10:1); hālôm, "dream" (Joel 2:28 [although hālôm is used also of false dreams, as in Jer 23:32; 27:9; Zech 10:2]); and helem, "dream" (e.g., Dan 2:28; 4:19; 7:1).

1.2. Phrases. Biblical Hebrew has no direct equivalent of quotation marks, so divine speech often is demarcated by a short phrase. Scholars refer to these expressions as “prophetic messenger formulas” (see Greene, 183-90; Schniedewind, 54-57, 60-62). Occasionally, these phrases are spoken explicitly by a prophet in narrative contexts (e.g., Is 37:6, 21; Jer 21:4; Amos 7:17), but in most instances the phrase is simply included in the text without reference to a prophetic mediator (e.g., Is 10:24; 22:15; Jer 2:5; 4:3; Ezek 5:5). After the phrase, the speech itself will then typically use first-person singular pronouns for God (“I,” “me,” “my”). These phrases take various forms.

The actual Hebrew phrase dēbār ʾēlōhīm, “word of God,” appears infrequently in the OT (e.g., Judg 3:20; 1 Sam 9:27; 1 Chron 17:3; Ps 62:12) and never in the Prophetic Books. However, the closest equivalent to “word of God” is perhaps dēbār yhw̄h, often translated as “word of the LORD,” but more literally as “word of Yahweh.” This phrase appears a total of 270 times in the OT, but the majority of these (160) occur in the Prophetic Books (e.g., Is 1:10; Jer 1:2; Ezek 1:3; Dan 9:2; Hos 1:1; Joel 1:1; Amos 3:1; Jon 1:1; Mic 1:1; Zeph 1:1; Hag 1:1; Zech 1:1; Mal 1:1). The phrase appears at the beginning of most of the Prophetic Books, and it is absent from only three books (Obadiah, Nahum, Habakkuk). Variations of these phrases include “the word of the Lord Yahweh” (dēbār ʾadōnāy yhw̄h [Ezek 6:3; 25:3; 36:4]), “the word of our God” (dēbār ʾēlōhēnū [Is 40:8]) and “the words of the living God” (dibrē ʾēlōhīm ḥayyīm [Jer 23:36]).

The phrase used most frequently in the Prophetic Books to introduce the speech of God is “thus says Yahweh” (koh ʾamar yhw̄h), which appears 227 times (e.g., Is 8:11; Jer 2:2; Ezek 11:5; Amos 1:3; Mic 2:3; Nah 1:12; Hag 1:5; Zech 1:3; Mal 1:4). The phrase “thus says Lord Yahweh” (koh ʾamar ʾadōnāy yhw̄h) appears 134 times (e.g., Is 7:7; Jer 7:20; Ezek 2:4; Amos 3:11; Obad 1), the vast majority of them in Ezekiel (122x). The phrase “the word of Yahweh came to” (wayēhî/ḥayâ dēbār yhw̄h ʾel) appears in various forms over seventy times (e.g., Is 38:4; Jer 1:2; Ezek 3:16; Dan 9:2; Jon 1:1; Hag 1:1; Zech 1:1). The phrase “Yahweh spoke” (yhw̄h dibber/dabbēr) appears fifteen times (Is 1:2, 20; 7:10; 8:5; 22:25; 24:3; 25:8; 40:5; 45:19; 58:14; Jer 13:15; Joel 3:8; Amos 3:7, 8; Obad 18).

The phrase “declares the LORD” (nēʾūm yhw̄h) appears 257 times in the Prophetic Books. The aforementioned prophetic messenger formulas typically introduce a divine oracle, almost like an opening quotation mark. However, the phrase “declares the LORD” often interrupts (e.g., Is 14:22; Jer 1:15; Ezek 13:7) or concludes an oracle (Is 14:23; Jer 1:8; Amos 1:5; 2:16; Hag 2:9; Zech 8:17), more like a closing quotation mark.

Other words or phrases may be used less frequently to indicate divine speech; however, in many instances Yahweh is clearly speaking even though there are no markers in text to make this explicit. For example, in the book of Habakkuk, after the prophet’s original complaint (Hab 1:2-4), Yahweh responds (Hab 1:5-11) without any explicit prophetic messenger formula to either open or close the speech. Textual clues make it clear that the perspective has switched from human to divine. The listener is going to be shocked by the speaker’s actions (Hab 1:5), and one of those actions involves the speaker rousing the Chaldeans (Hab 1:6). The prophet’s voice reemerges at the end of Yahweh’s words: “Are you not of old, Yahweh my God?” (Hab 1:12). Thus, sometimes when explicit divine speech markers are absent, readers must determine from the language and the context when divine speech is being implied by the text.

2. Method of Communication.

2.1. Words. As the preceding discussion has shown, in the Prophetic Books divine communication primarily occurs through words. Yahweh speaks (dibbēr), he says (ʾamar) things, he makes a declaration (nēʾūm) or pronounces an oracle (maššāʾ); he expresses himself thorough the word (dābār).

Although one might expect that the prophetic mediator would experience the divine word primarily by hearing, this is not the primary method of communication that the text records. The prophet will command the eventual audience to hear the word of God, but in most prophetic books, often at the very beginning the divine word “came” (ḥayâ) to the prophet (e.g., Is 38:4; Jer 1:2; Ezek 1:3; Dan 9:2; Hos 1:1; Joel 1:1; Mic 1:1; Zeph 1:1; Hag 1:1; Zech 1:1). The phrase “the word of Yahweh came” (wayēhî dēbār yhw̄h) appears seventy-three times in the Prophetic Books, concentrated in Jeremiah (21x) and Ezekiel (41x). The verb used, hāyâ, often translated as “came,” literally means “was” or “became.” Since the word appears to be present in some fashion to the prophet, some scholars theorize that these expressions suggest a hypostasis of the word of God as a separate being (see Eichrodt, 2:77; Arnold and Cook, 1000). While it is difficult to argue conclusively for a hypostatization, the divine word appears to tangibly encounter the prophet in such a dramatic manner that it affects not only speech but also behavior.

2.2. Visions. Thus, the word of God comes to the prophet and will eventually be heard by the people, but the prophet also experiences divine communication visually. At the beginning of a divine message Isaiah, Amos and Micah each “saw” (hāzā) the word (Is 2:1; Amos 1:1; Mic 1:1). Prophets not only see words from God; they also “see” (both hāzā and rā’â) oracles (Is 13:1; Hab 1:1), visions (Is 1:1; Ezek 1:1; 8:4; 43:3; Dan 7:1; 8:2; 10:7, 8) and dreams (Dan 4:5, 9, 18; 7:1). Thus, God communicates his message with multiple senses, not only audibly but also visually (Yahweh also touched the mouths of Isaiah and Jeremiah [Is 6:7; Jer 1:9]; for a Babylonian parallel, see Weinfeld, 180-81). God was not content simply to speak to his prophets; he also wanted to show them the message.

Apart from the vision of the divine throne shown to Isaiah during his call (Is 6:1), most divine visions are clustered in the books of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Amos and Zechariah. Yahweh showed Jeremiah visions of an almond branch and a boiling pot (Jer 1:11-19) and a fig basket (Jer 24:1-2). Yahweh showed Ezekiel visions of a chariot (Ezek 1:4-28), temple abominations (Ezek 8:1—11:25), the valley of dry bones (Ezek 37:1-14) and the restored temple (Ezek 40:1—48:35). Yahweh showed Daniel visions of four beasts (Dan 7:1-14) and a ram and a goat (Dan 8:1-14). Yahweh showed Amos visions of locusts, fire and a plumb line (Amos 7:1-9), summer fruit (Amos 8:1-2) and Yahweh at the altar (Amos 9:1-6). Yahweh showed Zechariah eight visions, involving (1) horsemen (Zech 1:7-11), (2) horns (Zech 1:18-21), (3) a man with measuring line (Zech 2:1-4), (4) Joshua and Satan (Zech 3:1-10), (5) a lampstand and olive trees (Zech 4:1-6), (6) a flying scroll (Zech 5:1-3), (7) a woman in a basket (Zech 5:5-11) and (8) four chariots (Zech 6:1-8). The amazing creativity of Yahweh is revealed by the wide variety of people, animals and things involved in the visions that he uses to communicate to his people.

The experience of the prophet interacts with the divine *vision, sometimes in surprising ways, to shape the eventual message from God. Amos records in first-person narrative his interaction with Yahweh concerning two visions of judgment, locusts and fire (Amos 7:1-6). With each vision, a strikingly similar process occurs. Yahweh reveals the vision, which has a dramatic effect upon Amos due to the severity of the punishment. And while elsewhere in the book Amos has no qualms about speaking in harsh terms toward the people (e.g., Amos 2:6-7; 3:12-13; 4:1), here in response to the vision he literally begs for mercy because of their weak and helpless condition. Yahweh then relents and declares that the threatened judgment will not happen.

2.3. Dreams. Visions and dreams (hālôm) often are mentioned together in the OT as a way that God speaks to his people (for a discussion of dreams and visions in prophetic texts from Mari, see Weinfeld, 185-87). However, in some texts dreams are viewed negatively because they can mislead or deceive people. In Genesis dreams are legitimate methods of divine communication, as God speaks through them to Abimelech (Gen 20:3), to Laban (Gen 31:24), to Joseph twice (Gen 37:5, 9) and to Pharaoh, his cupbearer and his baker (Gen 40:5; 41:1). Yahweh declares that he speaks to prophets through both visions and dreams, but these phenomena are contrasted to direct speech, which is what God used to communicate with Moses (Num 12:6-8). Yahweh also states that his people need to be careful to not be led astray by false prophets who perform signs or dream dreams (Deut 13:1-5).

This mixed portrayal of dreams is also seen in prophetic literature. Prophets who dream dreams are contrasted with those who faithfully speak God’s word (Jer 23:27-28). God warns his people not to listen to the false prophets and their lying dreams (Jer 23:32; 27:9; 29:8; Zech 10:2). In contrast to these negative perspectives on dreams, Joel describes how God through his spirit will speak prophetically to old men through dreams and to young men through visions (Joel 2:28; cf. Acts 2:17). The most positive portrayal of divine communication by dreams in prophetic literature is seen in the book of Daniel, as Daniel, like Joseph before him (Gen 41:25-32), interprets dreams for a foreign ruler (Dan 2:27-45; 4:1-37).

When God spoke in dreams, the actual message often was obscured, so human interpreters were necessary to clarify and interpret it. In response to Nebuchadnezzar's announcement that all his wise men were to be executed when they could not recall and interpret his dream, Daniel and his three friends prayed for a divine revelation to save their lives (Dan 2:1-18). The mystery of the king's dream (a great statue signifying future empires) was then given to Daniel in a vision from God so that he could relay the hidden meaning to Nebuchadnezzar, who then promoted Daniel (Dan 2:19-48). Thus, the eventual message to the king came via a complicated interaction between God and Daniel involving a forgotten dream, a desperate prayer, a divine vision and a clarifying report.

2.4. Dialogue. While divine messages often involve long speeches, particularly in the midst of visions, there is interaction between the prophet and Yahweh (see discussion of dialogue in Jeremiah in Fretheim 2002, 6). Visions communicate part of God's message to the prophet, but Yahweh often engages in dialogue with the prophet as he reveals the vision, taking and asking questions as part of the process. The vision is thus being used by God to provoke a response or a question. After the throne vision, Yahweh asks Isaiah, "Whom shall I send?" (Is 6:8). Yahweh often interacts with the prophet to be sure that the prophet is seeing accurately. Yahweh (or his messenger) asks an identical question to Jeremiah, Amos and Zechariah: "What do you see?" (Jer 1:11, 13; 24:3; Amos 7:8; 8:2; Zech 4:2; 5:2). After the prophet's brief answer, Yahweh proceeds to explain the vision. After each of the first two visions of judgment shown to Amos, the prophet requests mercy, and Yahweh twice responds that he will relent from the threatened punishment (Amos 7:3, 6). While being shown a series of eight visions, Zechariah discusses their meaning with the divine messenger with whom he is interacting (Zech 1:9, 13; 2:3; 4:1; 5:5; 6:4-5).

The message of the book of Habakkuk centers on a divine-prophetic interaction that reveals a profoundly honest relationship between the prophet and his God. The dialogue between Habakkuk and Yahweh lacks clear speech markers, but it does not lack drama and emotion. While the book begins with the prophet seeing the vision (Hab 1:1), his initial words are complaints and questions about the violence that God made him see (Hab 1:2-4). Yahweh replies that Habakkuk will need to continue to look at violence in the form of the Chaldean army (Hab 1:5-11), which elicits more questions from the prophet about how God's righteous character is not consistent with the wickedness that he is witnessing (Hab 1:12, 13, 17). Habakkuk declares that he will watch and wait (Hab 2:1), and Yahweh answers with another vision calling for more waiting and faithfulness (Hab 2:2-5). The book concludes with the prophet's *prayer of trust and praise, responding to the divine visions and unexpected answers to his questions (Hab 3:1-19).

God's word is therefore not merely monological; it also is dialogical, interrogative and interactive. As God speaks, he questions, listens, responds and engages in dialogue.

3. Context.

When God speaks, his words usually are set within a specific historical context. Some prophetic books are undated, but most situate their message in a specific setting. Typically, the dating of the divine word's arrival was during the reign of one or more rulers, and some of the later prophets mention a specific year, month or day. This historical context usually is mentioned in the first verse or two of the book alongside a claim that the book contains a word, vision or oracle from Yahweh.

Six prophetic books begin with the formula "in the days of King(s) X" (Is 1:1; Jer 1:2; Hos 1:1; Amos 1:1; Mic 1:1; Zeph 1:1). Five books begin by mentioning a specific year (Jer 1:2-3; Ezek 1:1; Dan 1:1; Hag 1:1; Zech 1:1). Six books lack a historical marker in their introduction (Joel, Obadiah, Jonah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Malachi). Divine oracles are also dated to other specific events: the death of Uzziah (Is 6:1), the death of Ahaz (Is 14:28) or two years before the earthquake (Amos 1:1).

Only a couple of northern kings are mentioned by name (e.g., Jeroboam II [Hos 1:1; Amos 1:1], Pekah [Is 7:1]), but far more southern kings are mentioned (e.g., Uzziah [Is 1:1], Jotham [Hos 1:1], Ahaz [Mic 1:1], Hezekiah [Is 1:1], Manasseh [Jer 15:4], Josiah [Jer 1:2], Jehoiakim [Dan 1:1], Zedekiah [Jer 1:3], Jehoiachin [Ezek 1:2]). Several significant foreign rulers are also mentioned in the contexts of divine oracles: Sennacherib of Assyria (Is 37:21-29), Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon (Jer 22:25; 25:9) and Cyrus of Persia (Is 44:28; 45:1). In the Prophetic Books the word of God is a historically grounded, contextualized message.

4. Mediators.

4.1. Prophetic Involvement. The Prophetic Books are distinct from other OT books in that they consistently mention a specific individual by name in their initial verses and somehow attribute the words contained in the book both to him and to Yahweh (Daniel's attribution appears in the middle [Dan 7:1]). Only four of the twenty-three nonprophetic books of the OT begin with a similar authorial attribution (Nehemiah, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs). Less than half of the Prophetic Books actually call the eponymous individual a *nābi*² ("prophet" [Is 37:2; Jer 1:5; Ezek 2:5; Hab 1:1; Hag 1:1; Zech 1:1]), but the prophetic designation certainly is warranted because all of them somehow are involved in the communication process. Although Yahweh clearly is the primary partner in the arrangement, the prophet plays a significant role in delivering, shaping and, in some cases, enacting the divine message (see 4.2 below).

Many of the shorter Prophetic Books include no narrative or almost no background about the prophet (Joel, Obadiah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Malachi), and thus the prophetic involvement in the process of communicating God's word is deemphasized. However, the majority of the Prophetic Books, all of the longer books and several of the shorter ones, include at least some narrative material (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Hosea, Amos, Jonah, Haggai, Zechariah). The narratives reveal that several of the prophets were resistant to becoming divine messengers. Isaiah and Jeremiah perceive themselves as unworthy initially (Is 6:5; Jer 1:6). Amos declares that he was not a prophet when he was called to prophesy (Amos 7:15). Jonah initially refused to go to the intended audience in Nineveh (Jon 1:3; cf. Jon 4:2). But each of them eventually succeeded on some level in mediating the message despite having to endure hardship and persecution (Jer 1:19; 20:2; Ezek 2:6; Amos 7:10-13).

The prophet who had to endure the most persecution perhaps was Jeremiah, who suffered primarily because of his role as messenger of the word of God. His message involved a word of destruction and judgment against Judah (Jer 1:10, 16), and his ministry embodied this message (see Fretheim 2002, 4-39, 187-202). He was prevented from having a wife and children (Jer 16:1-4), he was imprisoned (Jer 20:2), he was thrown into a cistern (Jer 38:6), and he performed costly acts to symbolize the message (see 4.2 below). Just as the people had rejected Yahweh, they also rejected Jeremiah as mediator of God's word. During Jeremiah's prophetic call Yahweh warned him that the people would fight against him (Jer 1:19), but when the people reject his message and try to kill him, he laments to Yahweh, complaining, questioning and calling down curses upon his enemies (Jer 11:18-20; 12:1-4). Unlike laments in the psalms, which lack a narrative context, Jeremiah's two *laments receive two divine responses (Jer 11:21-23; 12:5-17), giving these so-called confessions a dialogical tone.

4.2. Symbolic Acts. Perhaps the most significant discomfort of being a messenger involved performing the message in symbolic acts commanded by Yahweh (see Sign Acts). The medium literally was the message. Yahweh told the prophet to do something strange and provocative. Either before or after the act was performed, an interpretation of the act was given to explain its significance. Isaiah named his son "The-spoil-speeds-the-prey-hastens" (mahēr šālāl hās baz [Is 8:3]) and walked around naked for three years to signify the exile for Egypt and Cush (Is 20:1-6). Hosea married a prostitute to symbolize unfaithful Israel's relationship to Yahweh (Hos 1:2-3) and named his children "No-mercy" (lō' ruḥāmā) and "Not-my-people" (lō' 'ammī) (Hos 1:6-9). Both Jeremiah and Ezekiel experienced a series of uncomfortable symbolic acts. The acts of Jeremiah involved a loincloth (Jer 13:1-11), a potter and clay (Jer 18:1-11), a broken pot (Jer 19:1-15), an iron yoke (Jer 27:1-22), a purchased field (Jer 32:6-44) and a stone pile (Jer 43:8-13). Ezekiel portrayed Jerusalem on a brick (Ezek 4:1-3), laid on his side for both 390 and forty days (Ezek 4:4-8), ate exilic rations (Ezek 4:9-17), shaved his head with a sword (Ezek 5:1-12), packed exilic baggage (Ezek 12:1-12), and constructed a map for the invading Babylonians (Ezek 21:18-23).

Although Yahweh's method of communicating primarily involved words, frequently it was not purely verbal, but also visual and dramatic. All of these acts were powerful visual aids signi-fyng, through the costly behavior of the prophetic mediator, God's intended message.

5. Recipients.

In any discussion of who heard the word of God, it first must be acknowledged that except for the prophetic mediators, the text usually does not record whether the intended recipients of the divine message actually received it. With a few exceptions where a response is narrated in the text (e.g., Ahaz [Is 7:10-12], Jehoia-kim [Jer 36:1-26], Amaziah the priest [Amos 7:10-11], the people of Nineveh [Jon 3:5]), the divine word comes to the prophet without the text stating that it reached its audience. Obviously, the books were deemed significant enough to record, but it is difficult to discern whether their messages were actually heard or read during the lifetime of the prophet. A variety of intended recipients for the word of God are included in the Prophetic Books, including specific individuals and groups, and more generally the people of God and foreign nations.

5.1. Individuals. The initial recipient of the word of God is, of course, the prophet, but in much of the prophetic literature the focus is not on the prophet but rather on the message. The prophet is in the background, almost absent. However, in a few instances the prophet as an individual becomes a more prominent aspect of the narrative. The book of Jonah is mainly narrative, and although Jonah's message to the people of Nineveh is the backdrop of the story, the focus of the book is the relationship between the prophet and his God, as is seen clearly in their unresolved interaction in the final chapter. Similarly, in the prophetic call narratives of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Amos (Is 6:1-13; Jer 1:4-19; Ezek 2:1-3:11; Amos 7:14-15 [on call narratives, see Habel, 305-23]), Yahweh is not merely using the prophet as a mouthpiece, since he is saying something specific to the prophet himself in the communication process. For Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Amos, Yahweh wants them to know that he has specifically chosen them, but for Isaiah, Yahweh wants the prophet to volunteer for the task.

Besides prophets, the word of God often is addressed to rulers, both of Judah (e.g., Ahaz [Is 7:3-17], Hezekiah [Is 37:21], Zedekiah [Jer 21:4; 34:2], the sons of Josiah [Jer 22:11-30]) and of foreign empires (e.g., Cyrus of Persia [Is 45:1], Pharaoh [Ezek 30:22], Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon via dreams [Dan 2; 4]). Other individuals mentioned as recipients of divine messages include Shebna, the steward (Is 22:15); Pashhur, the priest who persecuted Jeremiah (Jer 20:3-4); Shemaiah, the priest and false prophet (Jer 29:24-32); and Baruch, Jeremiah's faithful scribe (Jer 45:1-5). Occasionally, in a word to the people generally, specific individuals are mentioned (e.g., Zerubbabel and Joshua [Hag 2:21]).

5.2. The People of God. The most frequent recipients of God's messages are God's people. Often after the word of God came, the prophetic mediator was told to immediately pass it on to its intended audience: the people of Israel or Judah. Several books mention the primary audience in the initial verse: "Judah" (Is 1:1), "Israel" (Amos 1:1; Mal 1:1), the capital cities "Jerusalem" (Is 1:1; Mic 1:1) and "Samaria" (Mic 1:1). Vocative formulations for these and other locations reappear frequently throughout the Prophetic Books: "O Judah" (Jer 2:28; Hos 6:4), "O Israel" (e.g., Is 40:27; Jer 4:1; Ezek 13:4; Hos 4:15; Amos 4:12; Zeph 3:14), "O Jerusalem" (e.g., Is 40:9; 51:17; Jer 4:14; 6:8), "O Samaria" (Hos 8:5), "O Jacob" (Is 40:27; 43:1; Jer 30:10; Mic 2:12); also the slightly longer dynastic versions: "O house of Israel" (e.g., Jer 3:20; 10:1; Ezek 3:1; Hos 5:1; Amos 5:1, 4), "O house of Judah" (e.g., Zech 8:13), "O house of Jacob" (e.g., Is 2:5; 46:3; 48:1; Jer 2:4; Mic 2:7). Yahweh also speaks to his audience in language reminiscent of the covenant, often calling them "my people" (Is 3:12; 10:24; 26:20; Ezek 37:12, 13; Hos 2:1, 23; Mic 6:3, 5; cf. Ex 6:7).

As the people are being addressed, they often are called to "hear" (šāma^c in the imperative) the word of God (Is 1:2; Jer 2:4; Ezek 18:25; Hos 4:1; Joel 1:2; Amos 3:1; Mic 1:2; Hag 1:12), although sometimes they refuse to hear it (Is 28:12; Jer 5:21; Ezek 12:2; Zech 1:14; 7:11; Mal 2:2). In Hebrew, hearing someone's voice implies responding to what the speaker is saying, usually involving obedience to the speaker's commands (Jer 7:23; 11:7; Dan 9:11; Zech 6:15).

5.3. Groups. Although God's people generally are the primary audience, subsets of *Israel or Judah are specifically focused upon to receive a message. God speaks to the exiles in Babylon (Jer 29:20; Ezek 3:11) or Judeans residing in Egypt (Jer 44:26). The Rechabites are commanded to break their vows by drinking wine (Jer 35:2). Groups of leaders frequently are targeted in prophetic oracles of judgment: priests (Hos 5:1; Joel 1:13; Mal 1:6; 2:1), elders (Ezek 14:1-5; 20:1, 3; Joel 1:2), the shepherds of Israel (Jer 23:2; Ezek 34:7, 9), false prophets (Ezek 13:1-23; Mic 3:5-8). Occasionally, oracles of hope are directed to groups: the fearful-hearted (Is 35:4), faithful eunuchs (Is 56:4), the poor and those who mourn (Is 61:1-2).

5.4. The Nations. Perhaps more so than in any other OT genre, prophetic literature is concerned with *nations other than Israel and Judah. Yahweh is the God not just of Israel and Judah, but ultimately all peoples and nations. One way that this is emphasized in the Prophetic Books is the inclusion of many oracles against the nations.

Foreign powers are the exclusive focus of two short books, both of which are essentially judgment oracles. The book of Obadiah targets Judah's neighbor Edom (Obad 1), and the book of Nahum targets Nineveh, the capital of Assyria (Nah 1:1). Long sections of other prophetic books contain numerous oracles against the nations, including empires: Babylon (Is 13:1—14:23; Jer 50:1—51:64), Egypt (Is 19:1-25; Jer 46:1-28; Ezek 29:1—32:32), Nineveh (Is 14:24-27; Jon 3:4; Nah 1:1—3:19; Zeph 2:13-15.); and neighbors of Israel and Judah: Ammon (Jer 49:1-6; Ezek 25:1-7; Amos 1:13-15; Zeph 2:8-11), Arabia (Is 21:13-17; Jer 49:28-33), Cush (Is 18:1-7; Zeph 2:12), Damascus (Is 17:1-14; Jer 49:23-27; Amos 1:3-5), Elam (Jer 49:34-39), Edom (Is 21:11-12; Jer 49:7-22; Ezek 25:12-14; Amos 1:11-12), Gaza (Is 14:28-32; Jer 47:1-6; Ezek 25:15-17; Amos 1:6-8; Zeph 2:4-7), Moab (Is 15:1—16:14; Jer 48:1-47; Ezek 25:8-11; Amos 2:1-3; Zeph 2:8-11), Sidon (Ezek 28:20-26), Tyre (Is 23:1-18; Ezek 26:1—28:19; Amos 1:9-10). Although most of these oracles involve judgment on these nations and cities, in Isaiah 19 Yahweh calls Egypt "my people" and Assyria "the work of my hands" (Is 19:25). With the exception of Jonah (Jon 3:4), the texts do not record the delivery of any of these oracles to their intended audience.

In addition to references to specific countries or cities, Yahweh addresses nations more generally. The plural noun "nations" (gôyim) appears 104 times in the Prophetic Books, often in contexts where they are being spoke about (e.g., Is 2:2; Jer 1:10; Ezek 5:5; Joel 3:2; Amos 9:12; Obad 15; Mic 5:15; Zeph 2:11; Hag 2:7; Zech 1:15; Mal 3:12), but also in vocative formulations, "O nations" (Is 34:1; Jer 31:10; Joel 3:9).

Thus, the audience of God's word is ultimately God's world, which should be expected because Yahweh's role as creator of the earth is also frequently emphasized by the prophets.

5.5. Creation. In Genesis 1 God creates with his word, so it is not surprising to see creation themes appear as God speaks in the Prophetic Books. To get the attention of his people, God speaks zoomorphically, roaring like a lion (Jer 25:30; Hos 11:10; Amos 1:2; 3:8; Joel 3:16). God's word also impacts nature. When he roars, pastures mourn and mountains wither (Amos 1:2), and the heavens and earth shake (Joel 3:16). When the mouth of Yahweh speaks, valleys are lifted and mountains brought low (Is 40:4-5).

The primary way, however, that God engages nature in the Prophetic Books is by speaking to it directly. The book of Isaiah begins dramatically with Yahweh addressing the heavens and the earth with a call to listen to the indictment against Israel (Is 1:2). Elsewhere God speaks both to the heavens (e.g., Is 44:23; 45:8; 49:13; Jer 2:12) and to the earth (e.g., Is 49:13; Jer 6:19; Mic 1:2). God speaks to the weather, to hailstones (Ezek 13:11) and to the wind (Ezek 37:9). God speaks to geographic features, to mountains generally (Is 44:23; 49:13; Ezek 6:3; 36:1, 4, 8), as well as to mountains specifically, "O destroying mountain" (Jer 51:25), "O great mountain" (Zech 4:7); and he tells the Philistine seacoast that it will become pastureland (Zeph 2:6). God speaks to animals and plants, to cows (Amos 4:1), to horses (Jer 46:9), to cypress and oaks (Zech 11:2), and to the forest of the Negeb (Ezek 20:47). God speaks through Ezekiel even to dry bones, giving them sinew, flesh, skin and breath (Ezek 37:1-14).

Why does God speak to creation? Sometimes there is an obvious connection between the natural feature and the intended human audience. The "cows" of Bashan represent the wealthy women of Samaria (Amos 4:1), and the Philistine seacoast represents the nation of Philistia (Zeph 2:6). In other instances God speaks to heaven and earth as witnesses, since his own people are not listening or obeying (e.g., Is 1:2-4). In all of the language of creation a connection is seen between the natural world and the spiritual world. When God's people have reason to hope, heaven and earth are called in to celebrate alongside them (Is 44:23; 49:13). However, when judgment is coming, nature is affected. Heaven is meant to be appalled by Israel's *idolatry (Jer 2:11-12), and it will tremble at the fierce anger of Yahweh (Is 13:13).

6. Divine Word, Human Word.

The revelation of the word of God in the Prophetic Books is not simply a process in which Yahweh dictates the message to a prophet who then repeats it verbatim to his audience. Yahweh calls his prophets into a human-divine communication partnership that involves not merely preaching the word, but also, among other things, traveling to foreign lands (Jonah), rebuilding the temple (Haggai), confronting rulers (Isaiah, Jeremiah), interpreting visions and dreams (Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Amos, Zechariah), and engaging in symbolic acts (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hosea).

Yahweh also allows the personalities of the prophet to shape the final message, so that the character and actions of the prophets affect the communication process. While Isaiah is a willing volunteer (Is 6:8), Jonah is rebellious (Jon 1:3; 4:2). When visions of judgment are revealed, Jeremiah apparently submits to the inevitable (Jer 1:11-19), but Amos twice convinces Yahweh to change his mind (Amos 7:1-6). Prophets frequently dialogue with Yahweh and question him about his word and his works (Is 6:11; Jer 12:1, 4; Joel 2:17; Jon 4:2; Mic 6:6-7; Hab 1:2-3, 12). Perhaps most surprisingly, these questions, divine changes and prophet rebellions are recorded and thus are part of the message of these books. The word originates with Yahweh, but he chooses to involve the prophet in the entire communication process, making it a word both divine and human.

WORSHIP

True worship involves reverential acts of submission before the divine Sovereign in response to his gracious revelation of himself and in accordance with his will. Many today perceive OT worship as involving primarily external liturgical acts, in contrast to NT worship, which is perceived as internal and spiritual (cf. Rom 12:1). As we will see, in ancient Israel many did indeed treat worship as cultic acts by which divine favor was won/guaranteed, irrespective of the internal condition of the heart or the conduct of one's life. However, this was precisely the kind of notion the prophets sought to combat. Based on the Torah, particularly the full-bodied worship for which Moses appealed in his valedictory addresses in Deuteronomy, the prophets sought to restore the worship "in spirit and in truth" by reminding the people of Yahweh's grace in rescuing them from the bondage of Egypt and calling them back to the *covenant that Yahweh had established with them. This article tries to recapture the prophetic vision of worship.

1. The Dimensions of True Worship
2. The Nature of True Worship

1. The Dimensions of True Worship.

The multifaceted nature of true Israelite worship is reflected in the rich prophetic vocabulary of worship. Words referring to the notion may be grouped into three broad categories: dispositional, gestural and cultic expressions.

1.1. Dispositional Expressions of Worship.

The fundamental importance of “fear” as a part of acceptable worship is reflected in Deuteronomy 10:12-13: “And now, O Israel, what does Yahweh your God ask of you? Simply this: to fear Yahweh your God; to walk in all his ways; to love him, to serve Yahweh your God with all your heart and with all your being, and to keep the commands and ordinances of Yahweh that I am commanding you today for your own good.”

The primary word for “to fear” in the OT is *yārē*⁷. This word is used in two senses, depending on the nature of the relationship between the parties. In many contexts it speaks of terror or fright in the face of the unknown, whether enemy armies, animals, death and even Yahweh (Jer 5:22; Mic 7:17). The frequent association of this word with others in this semantic field reflects the fearful realities of life in the ancient Near East: *šata*⁸, “to be dismayed” (Is 41:10, 23); ḥtt, Piel, “to be dismayed” (Jer 23:4; 30:10; Ezek 2:6; 3:9); ḥarad, “to tremble” (Is 41:5); āraš, “to tremble” (Is 2:19, 21; 8:12; 47:12); ḥūl/ḥīl, “to writhe in anguish/pain” (Jer 5:22; Zech 9:5); pāḥad, “to tremble” (Mic 7:17). The common formula, ’al/lō’ tīrā’ (“fear not”) spoken by humans or God was intended to reassure frightened persons (e.g., Is 37:6; 40:9). However, where the relationship between the parties was positive, the word *yārē*⁷ also expressed a socially inferior person’s reverence, respect and honor toward a superior. Those in covenant relationship to Yahweh need not be frightened in his presence, but this is not a license to be casual. The word *yārē*⁷ expresses appropriate awe of a human subject before the radiance of the divine majesty. Indeed, in a book such as Deuteronomy, where words for “faith” and “believe” are rare (cf. he’ēmīn in Deut 1:32), *yārē*⁷ may be defined as “awed trust” or “trusting/confident awe.”

However, reverent awe is not the only disposition associated with worship. Deuteronomy places a great deal of emphasis on love (’āhab) for Yahweh as a fundamental attitude (e.g., Deut 6:5; 10:12). Fundamentally, the word expresses covenant commitment demonstrated in actions in the covenant partner’s interest. Remarkably, the notion of devotees “loving” their gods surfaces only twice in the prophets, and both in ironically reversed roles. Isaiah 56:6 speaks of foreigners attaching (niḥwā) themselves to Yahweh, ministering (šērēt) to him, loving (’āhab) his name, accepting their status as his servants (’ābādīm), observing the Sabbath, and hanging on tightly (heḥēzīq) to the covenant. Conversely, in Jeremiah 8:2 the prophet accuses Yahweh’s own people of demonstrating their love (’āhab) for the sun, the moon and all the hosts of heaven by serving (’ābad), following after (ḥālak’ahārē), inquiring of (dārās) and prostrating (ḥištahāwā) themselves before them.

If true worship is a response to Yahweh’s revelation of himself, then, in addition to “fear” and “love,” it requires a disposition of trust and belief in him. This is expressed primarily in two words. The word group based on the root ’mn speaks fundamentally of “confidence, belief,” not only in the reality and faithful character of Yahweh, but also in his revelation of himself and his covenantal fidelity to his people (Is 43:10; 49:7; 53:1[?]; Hos 2:20), in contrast to the perfidy of people (Jer 12:6; Mic 7:5). Such confidence to worship is demonstrated dramatically in Jonah 3:5: when the Ninevites heard the divine word that the city would be destroyed in forty days, they believed (he’ēmīn) God, proclaimed a fast and donned sackcloth, to which Yahweh responded by withdrawing his threat (Jon 3:10). The second expression, bāṭaḥ (“to have confidence, to be secure”) is often used of trust in fortifications, armies or alliances (Is 31:1; 36:4-9; Jer 5:17; 46:25), or of living in secure and peaceful circumstances (lābetāḥ). This may be the result of divine action (Jer 23:6; Ezek 28:26; 34:25-28; Hos 2:18; cf. Is 33:6) or be the reward for righteousness (Is 32:17), but it may also simply express smugness in one’s circumstances (Is 32:9-11; 47:8; Jer 49:31; Amos 6:1; Zeph 2:15). Not surprisingly, the word is also used of trusting in Yahweh for one’s security in the face of external threats (Is 12:2; 36:15; 37:10; Jer 39:18; as a synonym of šā’an, Niphal, Is 50:10; cf. 10:20; Mic 3:11). However, like ʾmn, it is also used of trusting in people's words (Is 59:4; Jer 7:4; 9:4; 13:25; 28:15; 29:31; Mic 7:5), which seals its relevance for the present discussion. False worship involves turning away from Yahweh and trusting in oneself or other people (Jer 17:5-8; Ezek 16:15; 33:13) or idols, which are one's own creation (Is 42:17; Hab 2:18), or even the temple as a symbol of divine presence instead of the divine resident himself (Jer 7:4, 14). Elsewhere, trusting (bāṭaḥ) in the name of Yahweh and relying on God are associated with fearing (yārēʾ) Yahweh and listening to his voice (Is 50:10), as well as drawing near to God (Zeph 3:2).

1.2. Gestural Expressions of Worship. Any discussion of the gestures of worship in Scripture must begin with the Hebrew word hīṣtaḥāwā (usually rendered in Greek as proskyneō). Though traditionally explained as a Hithpaal form of šāḥā ("to bow down, to prostrate oneself" [BDB 1005] or šūaḥ ("to sink down" [BDB 1001]), in the light of fourteenth/thirteenth-century BC evidence from Ras Shamra/Ugarit, it has been convincingly argued that the word involves a rare Hishtaphel form from a root, hyh/hwh, which links it with the verb "to live." Apparently, the expression refers fundamentally to a gesture (prostration to the ground) by subjects toward superiors by which they declare nonverbally something like "Long live the king" (see Kreuzer; Fretheim). The gesture is also expressed as "falling on one's face" (nāpal ʿal pānīm [Ezek 1:28; 3:23; 9:8; 11:13; 43:3], "bowing" (kāpap [Is 58:5; Mic 6:6]) or "bending" (kāraʾ) the knee (Is 45:23; cf. Ps 95:6), or "prostrating oneself before" an image (sāgad [Is 44:15, 17, 19; 46:6]; elsewhere only in the Aramaic portions of Daniel [Dan 2:26; 11x in Dan 3]). Isaiah 49:23 illustrates the nature of the gesture dramatically: "With their faces to the ground they shall bow down (hīṣtaḥāwā) to you, and lick the dust of your feet."

Although hīṣtaḥāwā is usually translated as "to worship," this may be misleading, especially if we assume that "worship" always involves recognition of the superior as deity. In ancient Israel it was customary for people in a relatively lower class to prostrate themselves before other human beings as a gesture of honor and recognition of the latter's higher social standing—for example, Abraham before the people of the land (Gen 23:7, 12), Joseph's brothers before Joseph (Gen 42:6; 43:26, 28), Ruth before Boaz (Ruth 2:10), David before Jonathan (1 Sam 20:41). Such physical gestures of homage were especially important in royal courts (2 Sam 14:4, 22, 33; 15:5; 16:4). However, our primary concern is sacred/religious prostration. The verb hīṣtaḥāwā often occurs with ʿabad ("to serve") in denunciations of apostate and heterodox gestures of homage (Jer 1:16; 8:2; 13:10; 16:11; 22:9), though often it does refer to the proper worship of Yahweh as well (Is 27:13; 66:23; Ezek 46:2-3, 9; Zech 14:16-17).

Of course, prostration is not the only gesture by which people express homage to God. Worship often involves physical postures (lying, sitting, standing) as well as actions performed with the hands (clapping, raising of hands) or the feet (marching in procession, dancing, jumping [for joy]), and so forth. However, these generally are linked to specific kinds of worship (prayer, praise, lament, etc.).

1.3. Ethical Expressions of Worship. As noted above, the verb hīṣtaḥāwā often occurs with ʿabad ("to serve"), especially in denunciations of apostate and heterodox gestures of homage. Hebrew ʿabad may function as the most general expression for cultic service—Isaiah 19:21 speaks of serving with *sacrifices, offerings and vows (cf. Is 43:23)—but it should not be restricted to actions that in pagan contexts involved the care and feeding of gods to "smooth their faces" (hillā pānīm [cf. Jer 26:19; Zech 7:2; 8:21-22; Mal 1:9]) or secure their favor. Fundamentally, ʿabad means to work for the agenda and interests of another, usually a superior. With respect to deity, this could involve cultic service, fulfilling a special mission assigned by the divine superior, or simply living in a way that is pleasing to and in accordance with his will. At Sinai, Yahweh formalized the status of those who formerly were slaves (ʿabādīm) to the Egyptians as his vassal (ʿebed), and he officially inducted the covenant people into his divine service. In accordance with this role and mission, all citizens were to demonstrate their covenant commitment ("love"), "fear" and subjection to Yahweh by serving him, walking in his ways, and obeying all his commandments (Deut 10:12—11:1). Isaiah 56:6 speaks of foreigners among the ranks of "his servants": they join themselves to Yahweh and minister (šerēt) to him, love his name, keep the Sabbath, and hold fast to his covenant. True worship involves all of life dedicated to the service of Yahweh. As we will see, this demands a full-bodied ethical commitment, not only to serving Yahweh, but also to securing the well-being of others, especially the marginalized through righteous conduct as specified in the covenant. This would involve walking in Yahweh's Torah and his ordinances (Jer 44:10) (see Law), in his paths (Is 2:3; Jer 6:16) and in his way (Is 30:21; 35:8; Jer 6:16; 7:23); swearing "in truth, justice and righteousness" (Jer 4:2); in general obeying Yahweh's voice (Jer 7:3; Hag 1:12); and heeding his commands (Is 48:18). This is worship at its most fundamental and practical level.

Many in the OT bore the title "servant of Yahweh"* ('ebed yhwh). This epithet does not express a menial role; rather, it declares the subjects' privileged and elevated status. Like officials in the courts of kings ('ebed hammelek), servants of Yahweh are called to mission, and their fulfillment of that mission represents their service of worship. Although Israel as a people are portrayed as Yahweh's servants (Is 41:8-9; 44:1-2, 21; 45:4; Jer 30:10; 46:27-28), commissioned to be his light to the nations (Is 42:6; 49:6), this role was also assigned to special classes: prophets (Jer 7:25; 25:4; 26:5; 29:19; 35:15; 44:4; Ezek 38:17; Amos 3:7; Zech 1:6; cf. Dan 9:6, 10), Davidic kings (Is 37:35; Jer 33:21-22; 33:26; Ezek 34:23-24; 37:24-25), the individual servant in Isaiah's "Servant Songs" (whom I take to be a Davidic figure [Is 42:1-4; 49:1-7; 50:4-9; 52:13—53:12]) and even the foreign king Nebuchadnezzar (Jer 25:9; 27:6; 43:10). For Yahweh's servants, worshipful responsibility involved discharging faithfully the duties that he assigned them.

1.4. Liturgical Expressions of Worship. The most important Hebrew expression for liturgical performance is šerēt ("to minister, to serve"), whose significance is captured in the LXX preferred rendering, leitourgeō, from which we get "liturgy." Like 'abad ("to serve"), fundamentally the verb has to do with service rendered to a superior by a person of lower rank, often as a personal attendant, and may apply directly to "ministry to God." Isaiah 56:6; 61:6 anticipate something like the priesthood of all believers, looking forward to a day when foreigners and lay people will be "priests of Yahweh" (kōhănē yhwh) and "ministers of our God" (mēšārētē 'ēlohênū). However, of the ninety-seven occurrences of the verb (always in Piel stem), in more than half it functions as a technical term for cultic service involving particularly the sanctuary (Ezek 42:14; 44:11-19, 27; 45:4-5), the altar (Ezek 44:11, 16; Joel 1:9, 13) and cultic instruments and furniture (Jer 52:18), as well as service as temple guards (Ezek 44:11). From elsewhere we learn that this service also involved music (1 Chron 6:17), the handling of the ark of the covenant (1 Chron 16:4, 37), making petitions, giving thanks, and praising Yahweh (1 Chron 16:4; cf. 2 Chron 5:13-14).

While the noun kōhēn ("priest") occurs dozens of times in the prophets, the verb kihēn ("to serve, act as priest") occurs only twice. Fundamentally, the root involves mediation between the divine and mundane spheres, but the usage of the verb is more restricted than 'abad and šerēt; most references are associated with the office and service of the priest, including his ordination to priestly service (Davies, 86-100). Ezekiel 44:13 uses the expression in the narrow sense of official performance of cultic rituals, in this instance reserved for the sons of Zadok and excluding the Levitical priests. Hosea 4:6 alludes to the priestly task of teaching the Torah of God, a function that is treated in greater detail in Malachi 2:1-9.

Several additional expressions have liturgical implications. Variations of the phrase "to stand before Yahweh" ('amad lipnē yhwh) or "to stand in the council of Yahweh" are used of prophets (Jer 15:1; 23:18, 22; cf. Jer 18:20) and Rechabites (Jer 35:19) and in legal contexts (Jer 7:10), although it is also applied to priests and Levites (Zech 3:1; cf. Deut 10:8; 18:7; 1 Kings 8:11; Ps 134:1; 135:2). This idiom derives from the royal court. A person who "stands before the king" is one who has been specially authorized by the king to enter his presence and serve as his courtier (Dan 1:4). To be privy to decisions made in the divine council and to be engaged in this kind of service represent the highest honors imaginable. The expression "to walk before Yahweh" (hithallēk/hālak lipnē), also speaks of access to the divine court and being commissioned for official service on Yahweh's behalf. In the prophets this idiom is used only of King Hezekiah (Is 38:3), though elsewhere it is used of other kings (David [1 Kings 3:6; 8:25; 9:4]; Solomon [1 Kings 9:4]) and of Abraham (Gen 17:1; 24:40; 48:15), as well as priests (1 Sam 2:30). The meaning of this expression differs significantly from "to walk with Yahweh"

(hithallēk ^{et}), which expresses general piety (Mic 6:8; Mal 2:6). Finally, we note the idiom “to follow/walk after [a god]” (hālak ^{ahārē}), which in the prophets usually bears a negative sense of following illegitimate deities, as illustrated by Jeremiah 8:2: “And they will spread them [the bones of the people of Jerusalem] out to the sun, the moon, and to all the host of heaven, which they have loved, and which they have served, and which they have gone after [hālēkū ^{ahārēhem}], and which they have sought, and to which they have prostrated themselves.”

In pagan contexts the idiom might have been interpreted literally, reflecting the practice of following images/statues of deities in religious procession. However, in the Hebrew Scriptures the idiom has a pronounced ethical flavor. Texts that speak of “walking after Yahweh” are absent in the prophets, but the correlative expressions in Deuteronomy 13:3-4 flesh out its meaning: “For Yahweh your God is testing you, to know whether you love Yahweh your God with all your heart and with all your being. You shall walk after Yahweh your God and fear him and keep his commandments and listen to his voice, and you shall serve him and hold fast to him.”

Beyond these general expressions, the prophets speak of the full range of specific liturgical elements of worship, both private and corporate: prayer (noun tepillā [Is 1:15; 37:4; 56:7; Jon 2:8; Hab 3:1]; verb hitpallēl [Is 16:12; Jer 29:7]), singing (zimmēr [Is 12:5]; šir [Is 26:1; 30:29; 42:10; Jer 20:13; Amos 5:23; 8:10]), lamentation (qinā [Jer 9:20; Ezek 32:16; Amos 8:10]; šum [Is 58:3-5; Jer 14:12; 36:6, 9; Joel 1:14; 2:12, 15; Jon 3:5; Zech 7:5; 8:19]), sacrifices and offerings of all sorts (Is 1:11; 19:21), vows (neder [Is 19:21; Jon 1:16; Mal 1:14]), festivals (môʿādīm [Is 33:20; Ezek 36:38; Hos 2:11; Zech 8:19]), pilgrimages (hag [Is 30:29; Ezek 45:17; 46:11; Hos 2:11; 9:5; Amos 5:21; Nah 1:15; Zech 14:16-19]), reading the word of Yahweh (Jer 36:6, 13-16) and teaching Torah (Mal 2:6-8).

2. The Nature of True Worship.

Considering the vocabulary used by prophets in connection with worship sets the stage for a closer examination of their disposition toward worship as it was practiced in Israel and as it should have been practiced.

2.1. The Prophetic Disposition Toward Contemporary Worship. As the histories of the northern kingdom of Israel and the southern kingdom of Judah approached their ends in 722 BC and 586 BC, respectively, Yahweh sent his servants the prophets to warn the people of the coming judgment, to denounce them for their rebellious ways, and to call them back to covenant relationship with himself. Based on the evidence of the Prophetic Books, an underlying cause of both nations' demise was the false worship in which the people were engaged. Their worship demanded judgment for two reasons: their spiritual loyalties were divided, and their worship was hypocritical (Ross, 329-39). The biblical records suggest that the former problem was resolved by the exile, but the latter persisted even in the new commonwealth of returned exiles in the sixth-fifth centuries BC.

2.1.1. Worship Directed to the Wrong Deities. The magnitude of this problem in Israel and Judah's waning years is reflected in the broad distribution of rebukes in the Prophetic Books. The number and variety of largely pejorative expressions for these foolish objects of worship reflects the prophets' disposition toward idolatry. *Idols are “the work of human hands” (maʿāšēh yēdē ʾādām [Is 2:8; 37:19; Jer 1:16; 10:3, 9; 25:6-7; 44:8; Hos 14:4; Mic 5:12]), “image” (selem [Ezek 7:20; Amos 5:26]), “sculpture” (pesel [Is 40:19-20; 42:17; 44:9-17; 45:20; 48:5; Jer 10:14; 51:17; Hab 2:18]; semel [Ezek 8:3, 5]; mašḵūt [Ezek 8:12]), “construction, replica” (tabnūt [Is 44:13; Ezek 8:10]), “molten image” (neseḳ [Is 40:19; 41:29; 44:10; 48:5; Jer 10:14; 51:17]; māsekā [Is 25:7; 30:22; 42:17; Hos 13:2; Nah 1:14; Hab 2:18]), “effigies” (ʾāšābbīm [Is 10:11; 46:1; 48:5; Jer 44:19; 50:2; Hos 4:17; 8:4; 13:2; 14:9; Mic 1:7; Zech 13:2]), “teraphim” (tērāpīm Ezek 21:21; Hos 3:4; Zech 10:2), “nonentities, nothingness” (ʿēlīlīm [Is 2:8, 18, 20; 10:10, 11; 19:1, 3; 31:7; Hab 2:18]), “nothingness, illusions” (ʿāwen [Is 41:29; 66:3; Hos 10:8]), “empty trivialities” (habēlē šāwʾ [Jon 2:9; cf. Jer 18:15]), “vanity” (hebel [Jer 2:5; 8:19; 10:8, 15; 14:22; 51:18; Jon 2:9]), “lies” (kēzābīm [Amos 2:4]), “illusions, tricks, lies” (šeḡer [Is 44:20; Jer 10:14; 16:19; 51:17]), “frightful images” (ʿēmā [Jer 50:38]), “dung pellets” (gillūlīm [Jer 50:2; 36x in Ezek 6:4—44:12]), “abhorrent objects” (šiqqušīm [Is 66:3; Jer 4:1; 7:30; 13:27; 16:18; 32:34; Ezek 5:11; 7:20; 11:18, 21; 20:7-8, 30; 37:23]), “abomination” (tōʿēbā [Is 44:19; cf. the worship of foreign gods in Deut 13:14; 17:4]). Jeremiah in particular expresses the heterodox nature of such worship by referring to these objects as “other gods” (ʿēlōhīm ʾāḥērīm [Jer 1:16; 7:18; 19:4, 13; 22:9; 32:29; 44:3, 5, 8, 15]). The worship of other gods was not a problem among other peoples, where gods were perceived to be tolerant of their devotees worshipping other gods (Block 2004). However, with Israel’s Yahwistic monotheism (Is 45:5-6, 14, 18, 21-22; 46:9), far from serving the interest of the worshiper, Israelites who worshiped other gods only provoked Yahweh to anger (Jer 7:18; 25:6-7; 32:29-30, 32; 44:8; Ezek 8:17; 16:26), resulting in their own in harm (raʿ [Jer 7:6; 25:5-6]).

Hosea paints a picture of pervasive and persistent idolatry in the northern kingdom in the eighth century BC. Israel’s going after other gods, specifically using the gifts Yahweh had given her to win the favor of Baal, is portrayed as harlotry. She has abandoned Yahweh her husband in favor of another lover (Hos 2:1-13; 3:3; 4:7-19; 5:3-4; 6:10; 9:1). Isaiah describes a similar situation in Judah at the end of the eighth century BC. With keen insight into the manufacture of idols (see Walker and Dick) and with scathing irony he exposes the folly of pagan worship (Is 44:9-20; 45:16). Despite Josiah’s efforts at reform, a century later idolatry persisted; according to Jeremiah, the people had abandoned Yahweh, the fountain of living waters, for cracked cisterns that hold no water (Jer 2:13; 17:13). Picking up Hosea’s metaphor of spiritual whoredom, Jeremiah denounces Judah’s shameless pursuit of idols (Jer 2:20-25; 3:1-25). Her determination and passion are reflected in the summary statement of Jeremiah 8:2: they “love” (ʾāḥab), “serve” (ʾābad), “follow after” (ḥālak ʾaḥārē), “seek out” (dāraš) and “bow down” (ḥišṭāḥwā) in submission and homage before them. Although Micah (Mic 6:7) alludes to child sacrifices, Jeremiah and his contemporary Ezekiel are the first writing prophets to deal with the issue explicitly (Jer 7:31; 19:5; 32:35; Ezek 16:20-21; 20:26; 23:37-39). Whereas in pagan thinking the offering of one’s child as a sacrifice to deity was the ultimate expression of piety, in Yahwism this act was the supreme abomination, guaranteed to provoke Yahweh’s ire.

Although Ezekiel offers his most forceful denunciation of Judean spiritual infidelity in Ezekiel 16, in Ezekiel 8 he provides the most graphic picture of idolatry as it was practiced in Jerusalem at the beginning of the sixth century BC. Although the visionary nature of his prophetic experience raises questions whether or not we should interpret what he portrays here literally, its rhetorical force depends upon some correspondence with reality. Shockingly, the abominations described are perpetrated by the leaders of the community within the compound of Yahweh’s temple. In his visionary tour of the temple Ezekiel recounts four scenes. The first (Ezek 8:3b-6) involves an “idol of passion.” The expression “sculpture of the passion” (sēmel haqqinʾā [Ezek 8:5]) reflects Yahweh’s disposition toward Israel’s worship of other deities. As Israel’s husband and covenant lord, his passion is ignited by interference from any gods that might compete for his place in Israel’s life. The second (Ezek 8:7-12) involves seventy elders inside a dark room within the sacred temple compound, burning incense to seventy different gods, depicted in creaturely form. They rationalize/justify their worship by complaining of Yahweh’s absence and ignorance of their lot/actions. The third (Ezek 8:14) involves women at the north gate of the temple weeping “the Tammuz,” perhaps lamenting the death of Yahweh (Block 1997, 295). The fourth (Ezek 8:16-17) involves twenty-five men at the doorway of the temple, with their backs to the divine presence and prostrating themselves in submission and homage to the sun. Of course, these actions have no effect on the deities that they are worshipping—after all, they are mere wood and stone, the work of human hands—but they do affect Yahweh, whom they imagine to be absent and blind to their perverse worship (Ezek 8:12). Habakkuk 2:18-19 summarizes well the folly and futility of worship directed to the wrong deities: “What is the use of an idol once its maker has carved it, or a metal image, a teacher of lies? For its maker trusts in his own creation when he makes idols that cannot speak! Woe to him who says to an object of wood, ‘Wake up!’ Or to a dumb stone, ‘Get up!’ And this is a teacher? Look! It is plated with gold and silver, and there is no breath at all inside it” (my translation).

2.1.2. Worship of Yahweh Wrongfully Practiced. For all the attention the prophets devote to Israel and Judah’s worship of other gods, they actually spend more time denouncing them for the ways in which they worship their own God, Yahweh. The problem seems not to have been the manner in which they performed their rituals, but rather the contradiction between their liturgical practice and their personal lives. They apparently forgot that true worship involves all of life, and that one's everyday ethical conduct determines whether or not one's cultic worship is acceptable to Yahweh. Speaking for Yahweh, Amos gives classic expression to the problem in the northern kingdom in the eighth century bc: "I hate, I reject your festivals, and I take no delight in your solemn assemblies. Even though you offer me your burnt offerings and grain offerings, I will not accept them; and the offerings of well-being of your fatted animals I will not look upon. Remove from me the noise of your songs; I will not listen to the music of your harps. But let justice roll down like waters, and righteousness like an ever-flowing stream" (Amos 5:21-24 [my translation]). This accords with Hosea's assessment regarding both Ephraim and Judah: "Your loyalty [hesed] is like morning fog, and like dew it quickly disappears. . . . I desire loyalty [hesed], not sacrifice; the knowledge of God, rather than burnt offerings" (Hos 6:4, 6).

Earlier, Yahweh had summarized his case against Israel: fidelity ('emet), loyalty (hesed) and the knowledge of God have been replaced by false swearing, dishonesty, murder, theft and adultery; indeed, crime follows upon crime (Hos 4:1b-2). According to Hosea 6:7-11, even the priests were involved in criminal plots. Because of their infidelity, in 722 bc the northern kingdom was destroyed by the Assyrians.

However, hypocritical worship continued in Judah. Isaiah summarizes the problem: "This people draw near with their mouth and they honor me with their lips, but their worship of me is a human commandment learned by rote" (Is 29:13). How this was done is reflected in the scathing indictment that opens the book. Judah is weighed down with sin (h't), perversion ('awōn), evil (ra') and corruption (māšhūt); they have rebelled (pāša') against Yahweh their gracious divine, abandoned ('āzab) him, treated the Holy One of Israel with contempt (nī'ēs) and turned (nāzōr) from him (Is 1:2-4). Since the nation is rotten to the core—like Sodom and Gomorrah (Is 1:5-9)—it is no wonder that Yahweh rejected their cultic charades: "What use is the multitude of your sacrifices to me?" says Yahweh. "I have had enough of burnt offerings of rams and the fat of well-fed beasts; I find no pleasure in the blood of bulls, or lambs, or goats. When you come to appear before me, who asked this of you, this trampling of my courts? Stop bringing futile offerings; incense is an abomination to me. New moon and Sabbath and the calling of assemblies—I cannot stand solemn assemblies with iniquity. Your new moons and your appointed festivals I hate deeply; they have become a burden to me, I can tolerate them no more. When you stretch out your hands, I will hide my eyes from you; even though you multiply your prayers, I will not listen; your hands are full of blood" (Is 1:11-15 [my translation]). Reminiscent of Psalms 15; 24, Isaiah goes on to describe the prerequisites to acceptable cultic worship: "Wash yourselves; make yourselves clean; remove the evil of your actions from before my eyes; cease to do evil, learn to do good; seek justice, rescue the oppressed, defend the orphan, plead for the widow" (Is 1:16-17).

True and acceptable worship presupposes undivided covenant commitment to Yahweh, as well as covenant commitment to fellow human beings, demonstrated in actions that seek their welfare. When cultic performance is matched by ethical righteousness, Yahweh promises *forgiveness and well-being, but if it is not, the prospect is rejection and judgment by Yahweh (Is 1:18-20).

Isaiah's rural compatriot Micah advocated precisely the same approach: "With what shall I come before Yahweh, and bow myself before God on high? Shall I come before him with burnt offerings, with yearling calves? Will Yahweh take pleasure in thousands of rams, with ten thousands of rivers of oil? Shall I offer my firstborn for my rebellion, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul? He has declared to you, O human, what is good, and what Yahweh requires of you: doing justice, and loving kindness, and walking humbly with your God" (Mic 6:6-8 [my translation]).

Although Judah survived another century after Isaiah and Micah, the religious situation in Jerusalem remained largely unchanged; if anything, the hypocrisy intensified. In his renowned Temple Sermon (Jer 7:1—8:3), Jeremiah concentrated on the issue of false worship of Yahweh. Taking a position at the gate of the temple, the place of worship par excellence, the prophet reflected deep immersion in the fundamental theology of worship deriving from Israel's knowledge of God, their privilege of *covenant relationship, and the Mosaic exposition of the same in the Torah of Deuteronomy. Mincing no words, he addressed the people's hypocrisy with three critical interrelated points. First, responding to the people's trust in the presence of the temple itself as a guarantee of their security, Jeremiah declared that the physical symbol of divine presence is no substitute for ethical conduct that serves the interest of others and reflects undivided devotion to Yahweh (Jer 7:3-7). Second, with their criminal conduct and their spiritual infidelity, the presence of these worshipers in the temple transforms the building from a sacred residence of Yahweh into a den of robbers (Jer 7:8-11). Third, the ceremonial performance of rituals is no substitute for a life of worship, everyday acts of submission and homage to the divine Sovereign in response to his revelation of himself and in accordance with his will (Jer 7:21-26).

On the surface, Jeremiah's statement concerning sacrifices is shocking: "Thus says the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel: Add your burnt offerings to your sacrifices, and eat the flesh. For in the day that I brought your ancestors out of the land of Egypt, I did not speak to them or command them concerning burnt offerings and sacrifices. But this command I gave them, 'Obey my voice, and I will be your God, and you shall be my people; and walk only in the way that I command you, so that it may be well with you'" (Jer 7:21-23 NRSV). Following J. Wellhausen (see Wellhausen 122-32, 166-76), for a century many have used statements like this to drive a wedge between the perspective of Exodus and Leviticus and that of the prophets. Supposedly, the prophetic emphasis on religion expressed in ethical conduct represents a higher view of religion than cultic expressions. However, it is generally recognized now that this is a false dichotomy. On the one hand, the prophetic statements should be interpreted as hyperbolic rhetoric, attempting to restore balance to the people's views on worship, rather than categorical rejections of cultic worship. On the other hand, the prescriptive pentateuchal texts such as the Book of the Covenant (Ex 20:22—23:19) and the Holiness Code (Lev 17—26) integrate appeals for cultic service with ethical obedience. If anything, Moses' vision of worship in Deuteronomy highlights the ethical dimensions of worship but then frames these exhortations with appeals for proper worship (Deut 12:1-14; 26:1-15). True worship in response to Yahweh's revelation of himself and in accordance with his will involves both viewing all of life as worship and setting aside special places, times and rituals for the expression of devotion to Yahweh.

The *exile of Israel and Judah represented punishment for their infidelity—their worship of other gods and their failure to match life with cultic performance. The biblical evidence suggests that the first problem was largely resolved by the experience. In postexilic texts references to pagan deities are rare, occurring only in Zechariah 10:2 (tērāpîm, "teraphim"); 13:2 (ʿāšabbîm, "effigies"). However, problems in the worship of Yahweh resurface. In Haggai, situated within decades of the Judeans' return to Jerusalem, futility in everyday work (Hag 1:5-11) is presented as the consequence of a lack of enthusiasm for worship, particularly the reconstruction of the temple (Hag 1:12-15). But when the project was completed, many remained despondent because the new temple did not match the original in glory, and in any case the glory of Yahweh failed to return to the temple. Haggai sought to inspire the people by pointing them to a future when the glory will return with unprecedented brilliance, and with it will attract the worship of all nations (Hag 2:1-9). In the meantime, the people were to carry on, with the priests assuming their leadership roles (Hag 2:10-19).

Along with Haggai, Zechariah encouraged the people to resume the construction of the temple (cf. Ezra 5:1). As a result, in short order the project was completed and the temple was dedicated (Ezra 6:15-22). While Zechariah 1—6 speaks to the rebuilding of the temple and the reestablishment of the cult, in Zechariah 8 the prophet reminds the people that these cultic achievements may not be divorced from life. In Zechariah 8:16-17 he appeals for truthful speech, righteous judgments in the courts, positive dispositions toward one another, and the repudiation of perjury. The community of faith may have been renewed, but Yahweh's disposition toward ethical fidelity remains the same.

When the last prophet, Malachi, appeared some decades later, problems with worship had intensified. The book that bears his name makes the fundamental issue clear: the people lacked the proper respect/fear for God. The effects of this lack were evident in every aspect of life: the people as a whole were cynical about Yahweh's covenant commitment to them (Mal 1:2-5) and his justice (Mal 2:17), and their cultic worship had degenerated (they treated the altar and their sacrifices with contempt, presenting defiled and unacceptable offerings [Mal 1:6-9, 12-13]; the Levitical priests have despised and abused their office [Mal 2:1-9]; they were bored by the cult [Mal 1:13a]; they were treacherous in the way they fulfilled vows [Mal 1:14]; they were compromising and faithless in their marriages [Mal 2:10-16]; their ethical conduct, especially their disposition toward the marginalized, had degenerated [Mal 3:5]; they were stingy in their contributions to the temple [Mal 3:7-12]; they were perverse in their understanding of covenant relationship [Mal 3:13-15]). Upon those who had no fear of him, Yahweh threatened to come like a refiner's fire to purge out the dross, yielding a community that would bring righteous offerings (Mal 3:1-4). However, Malachi recognized those who feared (yārē') Yahweh; their future would be secure, as Yahweh writes their names in the book of remembrance and treats them as his own special treasure (sēgullā) and his son (Mal 3:16-18). Not only would these survive the judgment, but also they would triumph over the wicked (Mal 4:1-3). The solution for this lack of fear is remarkable: a return to the Torah of Moses (Mal 4:4), which accords precisely with Moses' call for the regular reading of the Torah every seven years at the Festival of Booths in order to instill fear of Yahweh that yields obedience and results in life (see Deut 31:9-13). In reading the Torah, people encountered God, were reminded of his past grace, and learned the appropriate response to his grace. Like that of his predecessors, Malachi's view is that God requires full-bodied worship; the fear of Yahweh is expressed not only or even primarily in formal cultic service, but rather in everyday life.

2.3. The Prophetic Vision of Future Worship.

It is striking that the prophetic corpus as presently arranged is framed by references to worship: Isaiah 1 reflects the critical situation in the eighth century bc, when the flame of Israel's history and service to Yahweh was about to be extinguished, at least for a while; Malachi reflects the situation when the nation had been revived, at least a portion of it. Obviously, not all the problems were resolved by the mid-fifth century bc. Apparently, this would not have caught the prophets by surprise, for frequently they provide glimpses into the distant future, when true worship will actually happen in accordance with the will of Yahweh. The clearest pictures of future worship are found in Isaiah and Ezekiel, though Jeremiah, Haggai and Zechariah too offer glimpses into that new world.

What is most remarkable about the vision of future worship in Isaiah is its universality. Hints of this appear early. Echoing Micah 4:1-3, Isaiah 2:2-4 anticipates the day when all nations will stream to *Zion, the mountain of Yahweh, and to the house of the God of Jacob. However, here the focus is not on sacrifices or other cultic rituals; rather, reminiscent of Deuteronomy 4:6-8, the attraction will be the Torah of Yahweh, which they will come to hear that they might walk in his ways. This vision of the nations worshipping with Israel is concretized in Isaiah 19:16-25, which speaks of a world, anchored by Egypt, Assyria and Israel, united in the worship of Yahweh. However, this text makes no reference to Zion. Instead, it speaks of an altar to Yahweh in the heartland of Egypt. Indeed, Isaiah speaks of a reversal of roles: Judah will oppress Egypt, causing them to cry out (šā'aq) to Yahweh (Is 19:20; cf. Ex 2:23), and Yahweh will send them a savior/champion to rescue them. Through his acts of salvation the Egyptians will know Yahweh and will respond to his revelation of himself with the service ('abad) of sacrifices (zebah) and tribute offerings (minhā) and vows (nēder), which they will faithfully keep (Is 19:21). Though it is unstated, the references to a highway linking Egypt, Assyria and Israel that follow may suggest similar worship in Assyria. Remarkably, the oppressors of Israel are transformed and fully integrated into the community of nations worshipping Yahweh.

Isaiah 56 presents a most remarkable image of worship. After an opening salvo on the ethical dimensions of worship (Is 56:1-2), the prophet reassures foreigners and eunuchs who previously had been barred from admission to the assembly (cf. Deut 23:1-6) but who now keep Yahweh's Sabbaths, choose what pleases him, and hold fast to the covenant, that they will be given a permanent place within the temple (Is 56:3-5). Indeed, Yahweh's house will be known as a house of prayer for all peoples; foreigners who join themselves to him will be fully engaged in the cult, ministering (šerēt) to him, being covenantally committed (ʾāhab, “to love”) to the name of Yahweh, functioning as his servants (ʾābādīm), maintaining the sanctity of the Sabbath, holding fast to his covenant, celebrating in Yahweh’s house of prayer, and offering acceptable burnt offerings and sacrifices on Yahweh’s altar. Indeed, the same God who regathers the dispersed of Israel will gather these worshipers to the temple (Is 56:6-8). The book closes with a scene in the context of the new heavens and the new earth, when Yahweh sends survivors of Israel throughout the world to gather peoples from every tongue and nation and to bring them to the holy mountain Jerusalem that they might see the glory of Yahweh. And they will return with all their vehicles of transport filled with “their brothers” from all the nations as if they were offerings in clean vessels presented to Yahweh. Indeed, he will ordain some of them to serve as priests and Levites.

Whereas Isaiah’s images of future worship are scattered throughout the book, Ezekiel’s are concentrated in the last nine chapters (Block 1998, 494-746). If Isaiah’s vision is remarkable for its universality, then Ezekiel’s vision is striking for its parochial nature. Whereas earlier the nations had at least been spectators to what Yahweh was doing (Ezek 30:26; 36:23; 37:28; 38:23), references to the nations (gōyim) and the peoples (ʾammūm) are missing in Ezekiel 40–48. The closest that Ezekiel comes to this is when he mentions that the new world of worship will include sojourners (gērīm [Ezek 47:23]), but they will be considered members of the tribes that occupy the area where they live. In the closing chapters of his book Ezekiel offers a remarkable picture of worship (Joyce), which includes a detailed description of sacred space (Ezek 40:1–42:20), instructions for the altar and its consecration (Ezek 43:13-27), a summary of the roles of the sacred personnel, the priests and Levites (Ezek 44:15-31), the plans for a sacred reserve for priestly personnel and the prince (Ezek 45:1-8; 48:8-22), an appeal for righteous exercise of civil leadership (Ezek 45:9-12), instructions on festivals and offerings (Ezek 45:13-24), a picture of the sanctuary within its environment, with the water flowing out from the temple and transforming the landscape (Ezek 47:1-12), a plan of the tribal territorial allotments (Ezek 47:15–48:7; 48:23-

29) and a schematic plan for an auxiliary city (Ezek 48:30-35). Perhaps most striking of all is Ezekiel’s vision of the return of the glory of Yahweh, authenticating this as a replacement for the original temple built by Solomon (Ezek 43:1-9; 44:1-4).

But the question concerning the intention of Ezekiel’s worship program remains. Was this a manifesto for worship in a newly constituted nation? If it was, the picture that he paints has many puzzling elements in geography, ritual and personnel: (1) The design of the temple: the text offers many horizontal details, but apart from the series of steps, vertical dimensions are largely lacking, and many details are puzzling. (2) The location of the temple: it is on a high mountain, but which mountain? (3) The territorial allotments: they consist of parallel strips of land running west to east, totally disregarding geography and largely disregarding Israel’s history. (4) The river that runs from the temple and fructifies the land: how does this work? (5) The auxiliary city with twelve gates named “YHWH-shammah”: what is its function? (6) The sacred reserve: what is its function? (7) The respective roles of the Zadokites and the Levites: what is their relation to the past? (8) The function of sacrifices: were they atoning or merely memorial? (9) The prince (nāšīʿ): is he a Davidic figure, and what is his function in the cult? (10) There is an apparent absence of critical features, such as the ark of the covenant. (11) There are contradictions with Mosaic paradigms.

Although the massive Temple Scroll composed by the Dead Sea covenanters shortly before the time of Christ displays numerous connections with Ezekiel’s plan, and Ezekiel’s vision had a profound influence on the imagery of the NT book of Revelation, the description of the temple is not intended as a blueprint for some future building to be constructed with human hands. Nowhere is anyone commanded to build it. The man with the measuring line takes Ezekiel on a tour of an existing structure already made. Indeed, were it not for the present literary location of Ezekiel’s Temple Vision, it is doubtful that the eschatological interpretation held by some would ever have arisen.

Ezekiel’s salvation oracles have looked forward to the day when (1) the twelve tribes of *Israel would be regathered and returned to their hereditary homeland; (2) the Davidic dynasty would be restored; (3) Yahweh's covenant of peace with Israel would be renewed; (4) Yahweh would establish his permanent residence in their midst. It would have been inconceivable for Ezekiel to envision a full restoration of his people without a literal fulfillment of each of these elements. Nevertheless, in view of the considerations cited above, it seems best to interpret Ezekiel 40–48 ideationally and theologically. The issue for the prophet is not physical geography or cultic ritual, but rather spiritual realities. As in his earlier visions, historical events are described from a theological plane, and the interpreter's focus must remain on the theologically conceptual value of that which is envisioned. At the time of Ezekiel's prophetic inauguration, the sight of Yahweh enthroned above the cherubim had reassured him of his presence even in Babylon among the exiles (Ezek 1:1-28a). His visionary ingestion of the scroll spoke of the importance of accepting the divine message and its incorporation into his own experience (Ezek 1:28b–3:15). The observation of the abominations in the temple and the consequent departure of the divine kābôd ("glory") provide theological justification and rationalization for Nebuchadnezzar's razing of Jerusalem (Ezek 8:1–11:25). The vision of the revived dry bones is not a prophecy of literal individual resurrection but rather a declaration of the certainty of the eventual resuscitation of Israel by a new infusion of breath from Yahweh.

Though more complex and extensive than any of these visions, Ezekiel 40–48 should be interpreted along similar lines. The prophet hereby introduced the theological realities awaiting his own people. Whereas Ezekiel 37:26-27 had spoken of the establishment of Yahweh's permanent residence among his people, following their homecoming, the present vision picks up the theological theme and describes the spiritual reality in concrete terms, employing the familiar cultural idioms of temple, altar, sacrifices, nā'sî, and land. In presenting this theological constitution for the new Israel, Yahweh announces the righting of all the old wrongs and the establishment of permanent healthy deity-nation-land relationships. Ezekiel's final vision presents a lofty spiritual ideal: Where God is, there is Zion. Where God is, there is order and the fulfillment of all of his promises. Furthermore, where the presence of God is recognized, there is purity and holiness.

WRATH

Wrath is a strong negative response by *God to human *sin, often leading to expressions of judgment. Although sometimes in the prophetic texts humans display anger, the focus in this article is primarily on divine wrath because the vast majority of prophetic references to anger involve Yahweh. After an overview of scholarship on wrath, this article discusses the terms and metaphors used for wrath in the Prophetic Books. Next, the source and objects of wrath are examined, followed by an investigation of the causes and effects of wrath. Fortunately for *Israel, divine wrath sometimes can be either delayed or avoided, and this is the focus of the final section.

1. Scholarship on Wrath.

No scholarly publication that I have encountered has an exclusive focus on wrath in the prophetic corpus. Scholars examine divine wrath in Scripture generally (e.g., Tasker; Hanson; Ashmon), the OT (e.g., Erlandsson; Baloian; Herion; Fretheim 2002) or Isaiah specifically (e.g., Locke). T. E. Fretheim also looks at violence in the Prophetic Books (Fretheim 2004). The closest to an exclusive focus on wrath in prophetic literature is perhaps A. J. Heschel's chapter on the subject of divine wrath in his monograph on the prophets.

B. E. Baloian summarizes his extensive research on divine references in the entire OT in a very useful chart (Baloian, 191-210, chart 2). This article uses the section of Baloian's chart relevant to the prophets in the discussions of objects, causes and effects of divine wrath. But it is necessary to acknowledge beforehand the subjective nature of these categorizations. It often is difficult to determine precisely objects, causes and effects of divine wrath, and a combination of factors frequently is involved. The Prophetic Books include a great deal of poetry, and the nonlinear nature of the poetic genre means that its message does not translate into a summary chart seamlessly. Despite these concerns, the chart does provide a great deal of helpful information about divine wrath.

2. Wrath Terminology.

2.1. Numerous Terms. Ancient Hebrew included a wide range of nouns and verbs to connote wrath. In the prophets, sixteen words (six verbs and ten nouns) are used for "wrath." These terms primarily appear in contexts of divine, not human, anger. Yahweh often becomes angry in the Prophetic Books. According to Baloian's chart, there are 387 OT texts that mention divine wrath, almost half (176 of 387 = 46%) of which of these appear in the Prophetic Books. (All occurrences listed below refer exclusively to the Prophetic Books.)

2.2. Six Verb-Noun Pairs. Six pairs of verbal roots and their associated nouns are used to connote anger. The verb 'anap ("to be angry") appears only once (Is 12:1), but the associated noun 'ap ("anger") appears often (123 times), far more than any other of the other wrath words, occurring in all of the Prophetic Books except for Obadiah, Haggai and Malachi. The word 'ap rarely also means "nose" or "nostril" (e.g., Is 2:22; 3:21); in most instances it connotes anger, only occasionally human anger (Is 7:4) and far more frequently divine anger (e.g., Is 5:25 [2x]; 7:4; 9:11, 16, 21; 10:4, 5, 25).

The verb kā'as ("to vex, to provoke to anger") appears nineteen times and is used almost exclusively with God as the one being provoked (Is 65:3; Jer 7:18, 19; 8:19; 11:17; 25:6, 7 [2x]; 32:29, 30, 32; 44:3, 8; Ezek 8:17; 16:26, 42; 20:28; 32:9; Hos 12:14). The noun ka'as ("vexation, provocation") is used only once (Ezek 20:28).

The verb hārâ ("to burn, to be angry") appears ten times (Is 5:25; 41:11; 45:24; Jer 12:5; 22:15; Hos 8:5; Jon 4:1, 4, 9 [2x]; Hab 3:8; Zech 10:3), but unlike the other verbs discussed in this section, only four repetitions describe the anger of Yahweh (Is 5:25; Hos 8:5; Hab 3:8; Zech 10:3), while five describe humans (primarily Jonah) becoming angry at Yahweh (Is 45:24; Jon 4:1, 4, 9 [2x]). In contrast, all eighteen occurrences of the related noun hārôn ("burning anger, fury") refer to divine wrath (Is 13:9, 13; Jer 4:8, 26; 12:13; 25:37, 38 [2x]; 30:24; 49:37; 51:45; Ezek 7:12, 14; Hos 11:9; Jon 3:9; Nah 1:6; Zeph 2:2; 3:8).

The verb qāṣap (“to be angry”) appears thirteen times (Is 8:21; 47:6; 54:9; 57:16, 17 [2x]; 64:5, 9; Jer 37:15; Zech 1:2, 15 [2x]; 8:14), and the noun qesep (“wrath, anger”) appears eleven times (Is 34:2; 54:8; 60:10; Jer 10:10; 21:5; 32:37; 50:13; Hos 10:7; Zech 1:2, 15; 7:12). Among these twenty-four combined references, only two refer to human anger (Is 8:21; Jer 37:15).

The verb zā’am (“to be indignant”) appears five times (Is 66:14; Dan 11:30; Mic 6:10; Zech 1:12; Mal 1:4). The noun za’am (“indignation”) appears seventeen times (Is 10:5, 25; 13:5; 26:20; 30:27; Jer 10:10; 15:17; 50:25; Ezek 21:31; 22:24, 31; Dan 8:19; 11:36; Hos 7:16; Nah 1:6; Hab 3:12; Zeph 3:8). Among these combined twenty-two references, only four refer to human anger (Jer 15:17; Dan 11:30, 36; Hos 7:16).

The verb rāgaz (“to tremble, to enrage”) is typically included in lists of wrath words by scholars (e.g., Baloian; Ashmon), but in the prophets this root usually just means “to tremble” (e.g., Is 13:13; 14:16; 64:1; Joel 2:1; Hab 3:7) or “to shake” (Is 23:11). In only a few instances does it suggest anger or wrath (e.g., Is 37:28, 28; Ezek 16:43). Related noun forms appear once in Hebrew (rōgez, “raging” [Hab 3:2]) and once in Aramaic (rēgaz, “rage” [Dan 3:13]) in anger contexts.

2.3. Three Nouns. Three wrath words appear only as nouns and not with their verbal root in the Prophetic Books. The noun hēmā (“wrath, rage, heat”) appears seventy-five times (e.g., Is 27:4; 34:2; 42:25; Jer 4:4; 6:11; 7:20; Ezek 5:13; 6:12; 7:8; Dan 8:6; Mic 5:15; Nah 1:2; Hab 2:15; Zech 8:2), almost exclusively in contexts describing divine wrath. The related verb yāham (“to be hot”) does not appear in the Prophetic Books.

The noun ‘ebrā (“wrath”) appears nineteen times (Is 9:19; 10:6; 13:9, 13; 14:6; 16:6; Jer 7:29; 48:30; Ezek 7:19; 21:31; 22:21, 31; 38:19; Hos 5:10; 13:11; Amos 1:11; Hab 3:8; Zeph 1:15, 18). Three of these references refer to wrath of Israel’s neighboring nations (Is 16:6 [Moab]; Jer 48:30 [Moab]; Amos 1:11 [Edom]), and the rest refer to divine wrath. The associated verb ‘ābar (“to infuriate oneself”) does not appear in the Prophetic Books.

The noun za’ap (“rage, raging”) appears twice in anger contexts (Is 30:30; Mic 7:9), both times describing divine wrath. The related verb za’ap (“vexed”) only appears once in the Prophetic Books, but not connoting anger (Dan 1:10).

2.4. Combinations. Often these words are combined, frequently in parallel constructions, to emphasize the severity of Yahweh’s wrath (e.g., Is 13:9; Jer 32:31; Ezek 7:8; Hos 11:9) (see also Baloian’s chart). For example, we find a verb-noun pattern: “O LORD, for though you were angry [ānap] with me, your anger [’ap] turned away” (Is 12:1 NRSV); a noun-noun pattern: “Ah, Assyria, the rod of my anger [’ap]—the club in their hands is my fury [zā’am]!” (Is 10:5 NRSV); or a noun-noun-noun pattern: “I myself will fight against you . . . in anger [’ap], in fury [hēmā], and in great wrath [qesep]” (Jer 21:5 NRSV). Other prophetic texts contain three of these wrath words (e.g., Is 5:25; Jer 32:37; Ezek 5:15), and two texts repeat them four times (Ezek 5:13; Zech 8:2).

Thus, divine anger is a major theme in the Prophetic Books, as seen in the literally hundreds of repetitions of the numerous synonyms for “wrath.”

3. Wrath Metaphors.

3.1. Day Metaphors. A variety of images and metaphors are used in prophetic descriptions of divine wrath. The prophets Joel and Amos speak of a future “day of Yahweh” (Joel 1:15; 2:1, 11; 3:4; Amos 5:18, 20), which seems to connote judgment and perhaps wrath (see Day of the Lord). However, other prophets make an explicit connection between a certain day or a “day of Yahweh” with wrath (Is 13:6, 9; Ezek 7:12; 38:18, 19; Zeph 1:14; 3:8), even specifically a “day of wrath” (Ezek 7:19; Zeph 1:15, 18) or a “day of the anger of Yahweh” (Zeph 2:2-3).

3.2. Nature Metaphors. Images from the realm of nature feature prominently in descriptions of divine wrath. The most common image used for divine wrath is that of fire (Is 5:24-25; 9:19; 30:27, 30; 42:25; 66:15; Jer 4:4; 15:14; 17:4; 21:12; Ezek 21:31; 22:20-21, 31; Nah 1:6; Zeph 1:18; 3:8), which is not surprising, since several of the wrath words imply heat (hēmā) or burning (hārā, hārôn). In some texts, divine fire has already gone out in judgment (e.g., Is 5:24-25; Ezek 22:31); in others, the threat of fiery wrath is used to warn people to repent (e.g., Jer 4:4). In at least one of these instances of divine wrath, where there is fire, there is also smoke (Is 30:27). An image that may seem strange to associate with a burning emotion like wrath is that of water, but Hosea uses it to describe how Yahweh’s wrath is poured out (Hos 5:10). Less surprising (almost Zeus-like) is the image of a storm to describe divine wrath, which appears in five prophetic texts (Is 30:30; Jer 23:19; 30:23; Ezek 13:11-13; Nah 1:3). Alongside several of these storms of divine wrath, hailstones (reminiscent of the Egyptian plague [Ex 9:22-26]) add to the fury of the tempest (Is 30:30; Ezek 13:11, 13; 38:22). In other texts, earthquakes or trembling mountains contribute to the description of an angry God (Is 5:25; 13:13; Jer 10:10 Nah 1:5).

3.3. Human-implement Metaphors. Four human implements are used in the Prophetic Books to describe divine wrath. Yahweh calls Assyria the “rod” of his wrath (Is 10:5). Yahweh speaks of a “winepress” where he trod peoples in his anger (Is 63:3). In a judgment against Elam, Yahweh declares that he will bring his fierce anger and will send the “sword” after them (Jer. 49:37).

3.4. The Cup of Wrath. The fourth implement, the “cup of wrath,” requires a longer discussion because of its prominence both in prophetic literature and in the NT. A. T. Hanson, in his extended discussion of the cup of wrath (Hanson, 27-36), examines parallels from Ugaritic literature where the cup is used as an image of evil destiny, but not necessarily of divine wrath. In the prophets, the “cup” (kôš) is strongly associated with divine judgment and divine anger. This image appears in three primary texts where the cup is referred to multiple times in a similar manner (Is 51:17-23; Jer 25:15-29; Ezek 23:31-34) and in several other scattered texts (Jer 49:12; 51:7; Hab 2:16; Zech 12:2). The cup contains the wrath of Yahweh (or the “wine of wrath” [Jer 25:15]) and is held in his hand (Is 51:17, 22, 23; Jer 25:15, 17; 51:7) or specifically his right hand (Hab 2:16). The cup is associated not only with wrath, but also with the effects of judgment that result from his wrath: drunkenness (Is 51:21; Jer 51:7; Ezek 23:33), staggering (Is 51:22), reeling (Zech 12:2), shame (Hab 2:16) and horror and desolation (Ezek 23:33). Jerusalem is often the intended drinker of the cup (Is 51:17; Jer 25:18; Ezek 23:4 [Jerusalem = Oholibah]), but the nations too are supposed to drink from it (Jer 25:15, 17; 51:7). Understandably, the recipients of the cup resist, so they are commanded to drink (Jer 25:28; Ezek 23:32; Hab 2:16). When Yahweh has compassion, he removes the cup (Is 51:22).

The “cup of wrath” image from the Prophetic Books is picked up in several important NT contexts. Although the relevant Gospel texts do not make the connection to divine wrath explicit, the cup that Jesus asks his Father to remove in the garden of Gethsemane would be consistent with the prophetic cup of God’s wrath (Mt 26:39; Mk 14:36; Lk 22:42; cf. Jn 18:11). Texts from Revelation, however, make the connection clear, as both the worshipers of the beast and the city of Babylon are given the cup of God’s wrath to drink (Rev. 14:10; 16:19).

4. The Source and Objects of Wrath.

4.1. The Source. When anger is expressed in prophetic literature, God usually is the source, and his people usually are the objects. Yahweh expresses his wrath in the context of various divine roles: king (Jer 8:19; 10:10; Ezek 20:33), judge (Ezek 7:3, 8; 16:38) and warrior (Is 42:25; Jer 21:5; 49:37; Ezek 6:12; Hab 3:8). However, with so many of the images used for divine wrath associated with the realm of nature (fire, water, storms, hail, earthquakes), perhaps the primary role that should be attributed to Yahweh in these contexts is that of creator. In this role, the expression of his wrath understandably affects his creation (for discussion of divine roles in OT wrath contexts, see Fretheim 2002, 8-9).

Before a discussion of the objects of divine wrath, a few comments are in order about the nature of divine wrath. Elsewhere in Scripture, wrath can have negative connotations. Fierce anger is cursed (Gen. 49:7), burning anger is repented of (Ex 32:12, 14) and quick anger is foolish (Eccl 7:9). Also, part of the judgment against Edom is that “his anger tore perpetually, and he kept his anger forever” (Amos 1:11). To address this problematic aspect of biblical anger, several scholars describe divine wrath as pathos, not passion (e.g., Heschel, 61-64; Herion, 991, 993; Fretheim 2002, 17). In their understanding, Yahweh’s anger is not a spontaneous loss of self-control (passion) but rather a rational, predictable response to sin (pathos). Whereas capricious anger can be condemned, the pathos anger of Yahweh is therefore righteous and legitimate.

4.2. The Objects. God’s wrath usually targets his people. According to Balloian’s chart, approximately two-thirds (115 of 176 = 65%) of all references to divine anger in the Prophetic

Books have Israel or Judah as the object (on the objects of God's wrath in Scripture generally, see Ashmon, 353; in Isaiah specifically, see Locke, 228-29). One-fourth (44 of 176 = 25%) of these wrath references target "foreign enemies," and the remaining references focus on either an individual (5 of 176 = 3%) or on all people (11 of 176 = 6%). (One of the objects is left blank.)

The prophetic texts mentioning divine wrath refer to the people of Yahweh in a variety of ways, primarily using the national names based on their patriarchal ancestors: Israel (Jer 11:17; Ezek 38:18), Jacob (Is 9:12) and Judah (Jer 4:4; 52:3). Wrath also is directed at "the cities" of Judah generally (Jer 44:6) or specifically the two capital cities, Jerusalem (Jer 32:32; 42:18; 52:3; Dan 9:16) and Samaria (Hos 8:5). Other objects of divine wrath involve familial terminology: "the children" of Israel and/or Judah (Jer 32:30, 32) and "the house" of Israel and/or Judah (Jer 11:17; Ezek 8:17; Zech 10:3). Ironically, Yahweh refers to the objects of his anger as "my people" (Is 47:6; Jer 8:19; 51:45). Similarly, they request an end to his anger based on the fact that they are his people (Is 64:9).

Divine wrath also targets "the nations" generally (Is 34:2; Jer 10:10, 25; 25:15; Mic 5:15; Zeph 3:8; Zech 1:15) or, in the context of a judgment oracle, certain nations specifically: Assyria (Is 10:24-25), Babylon (Is 13:3; Jer 50:13), Elam (Jer 49:37), Edom (Ezek 25:14) and Philistia (Ezek 25:17).

5. The Causes of Wrath.

5.1. Divine Anger Is Provoked. Several scholars (e.g., Eichrodt, 262; Heschel, 69-71; Fretheim 2002, 17) have observed that in the OT wrath is not a permanent aspect of God's character. It does not characterize him in the same way that love, mercy or compassion do, since it is always caused by the sin of humans. In short, anger is provoked (see Ashmon, 350-51). This pattern holds true in the prophets.

5.2. Idolatry and Injustice. The two primary provocations for the wrath of Yahweh in prophetic literature are *idolatry and injustice (see Justice, Righteousness). Baloian's chart lists the causes or "motivations" for divine wrath in the OT. He focuses on two motivations: "rebellion," which he says often involves idolatry, and "oppression," which he defines as excessive human cruelty. In the prophets, approximately one-fifth of the texts on divine wrath refer only to rebellion as a cause (35 of 176 = 20%), one-fifth refer only to oppression (36 of 176 = 21%), and three-fifths of these references mention both rebellion and oppression (103 of 176 = 59%). (One motivation is left blank, and the other listed is "zeal"). In the prophets therefore, the sins of idolatry and oppression almost exclusively are what make God angry. It is difficult to determine which of these two motivations for divine wrath is primary, since they are mentioned with roughly the same frequency, and in the majority of references the two together provoke divine wrath.

The idolatry of Israel and Judah that prompted Yahweh's wrath took a variety of specific forms, including libation offerings to other gods (Jer 7:18), worshiping foreign idols (Jer 8:19), making offerings to Baal (Jer 11:17) and building high places to Baal (Jer 32:32-35). The types of oppression and injustice that provoked God's anger were also diverse, involving, for example, wicked covetousness (Is 57:17), conquering foreign land (Ezek 36:5), shedding the blood of the innocent poor (Jer 2:34-35) and robbing the poor and taking advantage of widows and orphans (Is 10:2-4).

5.3. Relational Anger and Righteous Anger. Thus, the two primary causes of divine wrath in the Prophetic Books could be categorized as relational anger and righteous anger. Relational anger focuses on the "vertical," divine-human relationship. Yahweh is enraged because Israel and Judah are constructing idols and worshiping other gods. His is a jealous wrath because his people who committed to worship him exclusively have given themselves to other lovers. The image of God's people as unfaithful lovers is prominent in the prophets (e.g., Jer 3; Ezek 16, 23; Hos 1—3).

Righteous anger focuses on "horizontal," human-human relationships. Yahweh is angry because humans are mistreating other humans. Just as he had compassion on Israel while they were oppressed in Egypt, so they should have compassion on the weak in their society. Their oppression of their neighbors prompts divine wrath. While Yahweh's relational anger involves the first four of the Ten Commandments, his righteous anger involves the last six commandments (Ex 20:2-17; see also Jer 7:5-9, 18-20).

6. The Effects of Wrath.

6.1. Punishment. The sins that caused Yahweh's wrath resulted in various forms of punishment. Yahweh does not simply simmer with anger; he expresses it in judgment. In the Prophetic Books, wrath can be depicted as synonymous with judgment (e.g., Jer 49:37; Ezek 20:34; Hos 11:9; cf. Mt 3:7; Rom 2:5). Fretheim discusses this wrath-judgment metonymy, noting that wrath usually leads to judgment, but he also values Heschel's perspective that wrath should not be reduced to a synonym for judgment (Fretheim 2002, 11-12; cf. Heschel, 59-60).

While the number of objects and causes of wrath were relatively limited, a much wider variety of possible effects of wrath are mentioned in the prophets. This diversity of effects can be seen in the seventh column of Baloiian's chart. The percentages below are only for the 176 references to divine wrath in the Prophetic Books (a few of the categories listed below Baloiian does not include).

6.2. Violence and Warfare. The most common types of effects in the prophets involve violence and *warfare: military defeat (76 of 176 = 44% [e.g., Is 5:25; Jer 4:26; Ezek 6:12; Nah 1:6-8]), *death (44 of 176 = 25% [e.g., Is 10:4; Jer 42:18-22; Ezek 6:12]), *destruction (30 of 176 = 17% [e.g., Is 10:25; Jer 10:22-24; Zeph 1:18]), captivity (12 of 176 = 7% [e.g., Is 10:4; Jer 15:14; 17:4]). While Hanson calls the *exile "the great example of the wrath of God" (Hanson, 39), captivity is not mentioned explicitly as often as some of the other military effects. Several texts, however, speak of how God used the two primary exiling empires as instruments of his wrath: Assyria (Is 10:5) and *Babylon (Is 47:5; Jer 25:6-11; 32:29). However, Babylon exceeded its mandate and therefore was also judged (see Fretheim 2002, 24-25).

6.3. Creation. When Yahweh becomes angry, it often affects his creation, so many types of effects involve the natural world: the land made desolate (18 of 176 = 10% [e.g., Is 9:19; Jer 4:26; 12:11-13; Ezek 14:19]), famine (16 of 176 = 9% [e.g., Jer 18:21-23; 21:5-7; 32:36-37; Ezek 5:15-17; 6:12]), plague (9 of 176 = 5% [e.g., Jer 21:5-6; 42:18-22; Ezek 6:12]), earthquakes (3 of 176 = 2% [Is 13:13; Jer 10:10; Ezek 38:19]). As is often the case, many of these natural effects are combined with one another (e.g., Jer 42:18-22) or with some of the military effects (e.g., Jer 32:36-37).

6.4. Divine Abandonment. Although divine abandonment resulting from wrath appears less frequently than military or natural effects, it is perhaps more tragic because it suggests a loss of relationship. God's face is hidden from his people (Is 54:8; Jer 33:5), although the Isaiah 54 text speaks of this separation as temporary and in the past. In the midst of his anger Yahweh informs Ezekiel that he will not be compassionate and will not hear the prayer of his people (Ezek 8:18). Yahweh's wrath leads him to reject and forsake his people, so they are to respond in lamentation (Jer 7:29).

7. Delaying and Avoiding Wrath.

7.1. Delaying Wrath. Most instances of divine wrath in the Prophetic Books result in judgment, but God's expression of wrath can be delayed or even avoided completely. In Yahweh's name revelation to Moses after the incident of the golden calf (Ex 34:6), he describes himself not only as merciful, gracious and abounding in steadfast love, but also as "slow to anger" ('erek 'appayim). This important formulaic description of God's character is repeated elsewhere in the OT (Num 14:18; Neh 9:1; Ps 86:15; 103:8; 145:8), including several times in the Prophetic Books. The book of Joel uses the description of Yahweh as being slow to anger as one incentive for people to repent (Joel 2:13). God's slowness to anger is part of what frustrates Jonah, as he desired destruction for the city of Nineveh (Jon 4:2). While Nahum's oracle does not include the full formula from Exodus, Yahweh is described as "slow to anger" in the context of a description of his wrathful judgment (Nah 1:3).

7.2. Avoiding Wrath. In the prophets, four reasons are given for possibly avoiding the effects of divine wrath: innocence, *prayer, *repentance and compassion (see Fretheim 2002, 18-19; Ashmon, 355.) God's people claim to be innocent, assuming that this condition would lead Yahweh to turn his anger from them, but Yahweh judges them for this false claim (Jer 2:35). Although their assumption may have been warranted, their own guilt prevented God from turning his wrath away from them.

Twice prophets pray that divine wrath be turned away so that others are spared. Jeremiah reminds Yahweh how he interceded for the people to turn away God's wrath, and now they have returned his good with evil by plotting against him (Jer 18:20). Daniel prays that God will turn his wrath away from Jerusalem and forgive its people (Dan 9:16-19).

In several key prophetic texts, if the people repent, Yahweh too will "repent" and turn from his anger. Yahweh commands his people Israel to repent and return to him; otherwise, his wrath will go forth and consume them (Jer 4:1-4). A similar message is given to the people in Joel: if they repent, because Yahweh is slow to anger, he may relent from punishing them (Joel 2:13). In response to Jonah's terse message of destruction, the Ninevites repent, hoping that God will turn from his "fierce anger" (both hārōn and ʿap are used), and God changed his mind about the threatened judgment (Jon 3:3-10).

Ultimately, however, what overcomes divine wrath is divine compassion. Even though Yahweh was angry at Israel, his anger was replaced by a desire to comfort them instead (Is 12:1). Yahweh declares that his anger was temporary, but his love and compassion will be everlasting (Is 54:8). Because Yahweh's compassion grows warm and tender, he will no longer execute his fierce anger, not come in wrath (Hos 11:8-9). Finally, God does not retain his anger forever because he delights in steadfast love and compassion (Mic 7:18-19).

WRITING AND PROPHECY

Ancient prophecies survive, obviously, only because they were put into writing. Who did this and when and why are long-debated topics in OT study. Most research has been done within the Hebrew books in attempts to uncover a prophet's original words, additions from later generations and editorial activities. Until texts became available from the ancient Near East, there were no points of comparison for such inquiries. With the recovery of "prophecies" written in Mesopotamia, Egypt and the Levant, it is possible to consider the processes of recording Hebrew prophecy in that wider context.

1. Survey of Prophetic Texts from the Ancient Near East.

1.1. Mesopotamia. Written documents from ancient sites survive haphazardly; they often are damaged, and sometimes their provenance is unknown. Although there are numerous texts to show that divination was practiced from the third millennium BC onward, prophecies are rarer, and reports of messages from a god or goddess often do not explain whether they were received through omen taking or by a prophecy—that is, whether advice was sought from a deity and a response given, or a seer spoke unprovoked. Although one word "prophet" (Akk maḥḥû) occurs from about 2300 BC onward, prophetic activities are attested only at two periods and from two places: Old Babylonian Mari and Neo-Assyrian Nineveh (see Ancient Near Eastern Prophecy).

1.1.1. Old Babylonian Mari. This is the earliest period that has yielded a great variety of written texts in Babylonian, including hundreds of letters, most coming from the last 150 years of the era, about 1750-1600 BC.

About fifty cuneiform tablets found in the palace of Mari on the Mid-Euphrates, destroyed by Hammurabi of Babylon around 1760 BC, refer to prophets (usually under the term āpilum) or contain their words (Nissinen 2003, 13-77). The majority are letters sent to Zimri-Lim, last king of Mari, by officials in the capital or in other towns; a few were sent to his predecessor. They often are brief, broken and obscure; the longest have fifty or sixty lines. Where they are intelligible, the messages cover a wide range of subjects. Their senders reported them because the prophetic words were addressed to the king or concerned him directly, advising or warning him, encouraging him, or requesting action on behalf of the deity. The reports quote the prophets' words "only to the extent the writers of the letters have considered them worth quoting and bringing to the addressee's knowledge" (Nissinen 2003, 13). In one case, an official wrote a letter to accompany one from a prophet who had asked him to provide a "discreet" scribe to write down the god's message to the king (Nissinen 2003, no. 48; cf. no. 4). The tablets were stored in the palace with hundreds of other letters to the king that survive only because they belonged to the last decades of its life. Had life at Mari continued, they probably would have been jettisoned in a later reign as obsolete; it is unlikely that an archivist would have kept the prediction of the downfall of Hammurabi of Babylon, when it proved to be false (Nissinen 2003, no. 22).

Here we should also note one tablet and a fragment of another written at Eshnunna in northeast Babylonia and contemporary with the Mari archive. These bear messages from the local goddess to a king of Eshnunna assuring him of her support and of success in his reign. Although no prophet is mentioned, the texts are similar to some at Mari and presumably were delivered through prophets (Nissinen 2003, 93-95).

1.1.2. Neo-Assyrian Nineveh. The library of King Ashurbanipal, which lay in the ruins of the palaces at Nineveh destroyed in 612 BC, included eleven tablets bearing prophecies. They are addressed to King Esarhaddon and to his mother, to Ashurbanipal and to the people of Assyria and were associated with Arbela, where the goddess Ishtar had a major temple (Nissinen 2003, 97-132). Seven carry individual messages, some with the names of those who spoke them. One begins, "Word of Ishtar," and another, "Thus says Ishtar," while a third has the name of a "prophetess" (Akk raggintu, fem. form of raggimu) followed by "This is the word of (the goddess)," and a fourth commences, "Words [concerning the Elam]ites" (Nissinen 2003, nos. 91-93). Different are three other tablets and a piece of a fourth. They display a further stage in recording prophecy, for each holds the texts of several reports, at least nine on the best-preserved examples. Each oracle is separated from the next, and the name and the place of origin of each speaker are given for the messages on two of the tablets: "from the mouth of X from the place Y." On the third tablet a ruled line divides each oracle from the next; only after the final one is the speaker's name given; possibly the speaker was responsible for all the oracles on that tablet. Some of the oracles occupy fifty lines or more, others fewer, and one has only two. These three tablets take their place beside other tablets of similar format, but different content, as archival records, whereas six of the other "prophecy" tablets appear to be reports of oracles either as received in Nineveh or as written there, while the format of one may indicate that it is an archive copy.

In addition to those oracle texts, royal inscriptions boast of communications from the gods, and letters from experts to the kings refer to others, probably obtained by the usual medium of divination, and claims to the gods' support without further detail should be understood in that way. However, a few episodes are more explicit, sometimes quoting a deity's words. In one, Ishtar responded to Ashurbanipal's prayer with an oracle beginning "Fear not," although its mode of delivery is unspecified, and followed it with a dream given to a dream interpreter (Nissinen 2003, no. 101). Study of the oracles reveals a few themes that recur in different combinations and a high literary style (Parpola, LXIV-LXVII).

A different sort of "prophecy text" had become part of the scribal tradition, better denoted as "literary predictive texts" (de Jong Ellis, 156-57). The predictions are not addressed to named rulers but rather take an impersonal form common to omen texts and so could be applied whenever the situation described seemed to fit (COS 1.480-83). They forecast reigns of certain lengths in which favorable or unfavorable events would occur, and they name places that would face destruction or elevation. Overall, they are similar to omen texts and, like them, could be open to reinterpretation as circumstances, such as place names, changed.

1.2. Egypt. Ancient Egyptians were aware of prophecy and recorded prophetic words. Alas, none of those survive; there are only references to them in other texts, but they suffice to show that the oracles were written (Kitchen, 386-88). The existence of the "Prophecy of Neferti," a forecast of a successful reign after a period of calamity and social decline, although composed after the events that it describes, exemplifies the concept of written reports of prophetic words (COS 1.106-10; see Redford, 163-70).

1.3. The Levant. There are few written records in "alphabetic" script from the Levant that relate to prophecy, yet some are significant for this study.

1.3.1. Zakkur. King Zakkur of Hamath erected a stela in Aramaic about 800 BC to celebrate his triumph over hostile neighbouring kings. In it, he relates how his god Baalshamayn spoke to him "through seers and diviners" (hzyn, ddyn) assuring him that he would support him and give him success (COS 2.155).

1.3.2. Tell Deir 'Alla. In 1967 fragments of plaster bearing writing in Aramaic script and a local dialect were unearthed, fallen from the wall of a building of uncertain use at this site, east of the Jordan. After the opening title, "The book of Balaam son of Beor, the man who saw the gods," the text that they carry relates a message of imminent disaster that Balaam had received from the gods, but its fragmentary nature prevents any certain interpretation of many lines (COS 2.140-45).

1.3.3. Lachish. Among the Hebrew ostraca found at Lachish and dated to the last days of Judah, letter number 3 is to be noted for its mention at the end of a letter with a prophet's warning "Beware!" (Dobbs-Allsopp et al., 308-14; Ahituv, 62-69).

1.3.4. Horvat 'Uza. An ostrakon excavated at the site of a seventh-century BC fortress east of Arad has thirteen lines of partially legible literary Hebrew that refer to future events and may be part of an oracle (Cross 135-37; Dobbs-Allsopp et al., 521-27; Ahituv, 173-77).

2. Writing Prophecies.

2.1. When Were Prophecies Recorded? The evidence from Mari and from Nineveh suggests that the messages were written very soon after the oracles were uttered, or they were reported to someone in authority. The Mari letters often convey a sense of urgency. One letter quotes an oracle given three days before, while other reports were sent on the days the prophets spoke (Nissinen 2003, nos. 23, 30-32). It is impossible to tell how soon after the words originally had been spoken that the oracles on the Nineveh tablets were initially recorded or later collected in groups. In the "Egyptian Prophecy of Neferti" the narrative introduction portrays the king taking a papyrus roll and writing what Neferti said, making an immediate record of what he was told should happen (COS 1.107).

2.2. Why Were Prophecies Recorded? At Mari the reason for writing is clear: the tablets were sent by officials who believed that their sovereign should be informed of particular oracles. In the palace the tablets were stored with hundreds of other letters from officials in the archives of the last rulers. Similarly, at Nineveh the tablets containing single oracles may have been stored as messages, like the numerous letters and diviners' reports. The larger tablets containing several oracles are different; for some reason, it was considered necessary to preserve groups of prophecies on each of them. They are unique; no other tablets are known that combine messages in this way at Nineveh, such as letters from one writer or a group of scholars to the king. Nothing implies that these texts might become part of the traditional literature that scribes copied from generation to generation as was the case with the "literary predictive prophecies." When the account of Ishtar's oracle is presented in Ashurbanipal's "annals," it is because its words were realized, as were the words of Baalshamayn Zakkur quoted in his stela. The possibility exists, therefore, that reports of some oracles were preserved in order to discover if their forecasts were correct, for that would give weight to later oracles from the same sources, but that was something that might not become known in the near future. For example, in one oracle, Ishtar promised to Esarhaddon that she would bring King Mugallu of Tabal in Anatolia under control. Although Esarhaddon attacked Mugallu, he was only subjugated several years later, in the reign of Esarhaddon's son Ashurbanipal (Fuchs). Thus, records of prophecies could serve as a means of control on their veracity, and those bearing the names of their speakers would be a means of distinguishing the true prophets from the false, allowing the latter to be disqualified. Writing was the principal means of ensuring that information of any sort was accurately preserved across generations, as the numerous legal deeds attest. In the same way, the written reports could continue to serve as witnesses to the prophets' declarations after they and their audiences were dead (see Nissinen 2000, 248-54).

3. Implications for the History of Hebrew Prophecy.

The evidence from the ancient Near East is unequivocal: prophecies could be written down, and this could occur very soon after they were spoken. Already the practice in the eighteenth century BC at Mari and Eshnunna, it was true in Assyria in the seventh century BC, and it was true in Egypt. Since the cuneiform script and scribal traditions were foreign to preexilic Israel and Judah, comparisons may be considered misleading, although there are several points of similarity. Egyptian scribal practices had influence on Hebrew scribes, as their adoption of the hieratic numerals demonstrates, and the Levantine texts, few though they may be, cannot be separated. Zakkur, who received an oracle of support from Baalshamayn, patently erected his stela in the shrine that he built soon after his neighbors lifted their siege (COS 2.155). At what date the vision and forecasts of Balaam commemorated at Deir 'Alla were put into writing is unknown; the exemplar from which the text as copied on to the wall there, with its Egyptian style rubrics, may not have been the first copy, so the date of composition may be placed in the ninth century BC or even earlier (Lemaire, 48).

There has been a widespread attitude of OT scholarship that prophets spoke and their words were remembered in oral tradition for decades or generations before they were committed to writing. This view has to be reconsidered (for discussions of many aspects and various opinions, see the essays in Ben Zvi and Floyd). In its most extreme form, proponents of "oral tradition" suppose a looming crisis, either increasing syncretism or political change, as at the fall of Jerusalem, precipitated the writing of oracles and other texts from fear that the memories might be lost. Nowhere in the ancient Near East can it be shown that such a crisis caused a surge in committing texts to writing. The fact that texts survive from destruction levels, as did the Lachish letters, is an archaeological accident; in peaceful periods people discarded old documents. Since writing was a specialized craft, the creation of books was a scribal activity, and so, it is assumed, scribes were responsible for creating collections of prophetic sayings, the prophets themselves writing on rare occasions when they could not reach an audience orally; they did not write to preserve their words for the future (van der Toorn, 178-82). Furthermore, scribes were primarily active in palaces and temples, mainly in administrative roles in the former, with some working on diplomatic affairs and royal propaganda, so the latter was the place that provided opportunity for composing books of the words that prophets spoke at the shrines (e.g., Jer 7:1-12; 19:14). Those books would then be deposited in the temple archives (van der Toorn, 86-89).

References to biblical prophets writing their oracles, or having them written, are rare: Isaiah, Jeremiah and Habakkuk are portrayed as writing (Is 8:1; 30:8; Jer 29; 30:2; 36; 51:60-64; Hab 2:2), but this does not imply that it was unusual for them to do so. The production of Jeremiah's scroll, written by Baruch at the prophet's dictation, read, then cut up and burned column by column by Jehoiakim, only to be replaced by a more extensive composition, should not be judged a novelty. Rather, the prophet's dictation to his secretary may reflect a custom reaching back to the first of the "writing prophets," Amos and Hosea, and even earlier to the reigns of David and Solomon, if credit can be given to the notice in 2 Chronicles 9: 29. If scribes wrote down the prophets' words, they could have put them into a recognized literary style and, many scholars would suppose, edited or altered them. Now the way scribes of cuneiform and Egyptian were trained both to copy accurately—something essential for commercial, legal and court matters—and to take letters from dictation might point in the other direction, to ensuring that it was the words spoken that they recorded. The same intent appears in the Mari letter cited above in which a prophet who asked an official for a "discreet" scribe to write down the god's message to the king. Examples of scribal corrections in the Deir 'Alla Balaam text and an Aramaic treaty stela from Sefire illustrate the concern for accuracy (Millard 1982, 148-49).

The epigraphic remains from Israel are extensive (see Dobbs-Allsopp et al.; Ahituv), but their nature precludes the preservation of lengthy compositions such as the books of the biblical prophets. This does not mean that there were no long compositions, that prophets could only utter a few words at a time, or only short sayings of two or three lines (see Gunkel, 62-67); the Deir 'Alla Balaam text testifies to longer creations, for it already existed before the days of Amos and Hosea within, or on the edge of, Israelite territory. The longer texts of all sorts, written on wax-covered writing boards (luḥōt), papyrus or leather scrolls, have perished. Whether or not Amos himself could write, the distribution and the variety of the epigraphic remains imply that he would have had little difficulty finding a scribe wherever he was speaking. When he was in Bethel, the priest reported his words to King Jeroboam, quite possibly in writing, and so the prophet could have used a writer there (Amos 7:10-13). This assumes, however, that only scribes could write, or that those trained as scribes never engaged in other activities. Yet that is unnecessary, for the training, demanding as it may have been, did not preclude other occupations. Any priest, for example, might need to be able to read and perhaps to write in order to perform his duties, although he would not spend all his time doing so. Indeed, if there were rotas for priests, as biblical texts prescribe (1 Chron 24), and those priests not in course were living in and beyond Jerusalem, they could well have turned to other occupations, acting as scribes if required. Jeremiah was a priest who wrote.

In towns where cuneiform was current, archives in private houses contained literary as well as legal and administrative documents and letters. In the seventh century BC in Assyria, at Ashur, priests had houses amid those of other citizens, where they lived and kept all sorts of texts (Millard 2008, 260-61). The recovery of Hebrew ostraca from forts in the south of the country (e.g., Tel Masos, Tel 'Ira, Kadesh-Barnea [see Dobbs-Allsopp et al.; Ahituv]) indicates the presence in small garrisons of at least one man who could read. Professional scribes probably were attached to the administration in major centers where they could serve local needs too and so might write the words of a prophet just as well as the letters of a military officer. The fact that prophets who are told to write or are described as "writing" (see above) are not titled "scribe" does not imply that they could not write or had to employ a secretary (Millard 2010, 112).

The large Nineveh tablets show interest in making collections of oracles, whether spoken by one or more "prophets." In ancient Israel the same practice may be assumed. There, initial records might be kept on ostraca or on writing tablets before being transferred to scrolls that could hold lengthy compositions. The greater length of the books of the Hebrew prophets compared with most of the Assyrian oracles is no objection, since standard scrolls, as known from Egypt, averaging nine to twelve feet in length, could accommodate most of their works (Millard 2010, 112-13).

If it is accepted that Hebrew prophecies may have been written soon after their delivery, the question of access arises. Depositing the only copy in the, or a, temple would restrict readership to temple staff. If, as proposed above, priests might keep books in their houses, then prophets might do so too and be able to read them, or have them read, to their fellow citizens. Once one copy was made, others could be taken from it at the cost of the copyist's time and the materials. The dispatch of messages from individuals in one town in Judah to correspondents in another, as several ostraca witness, allows for the transport of scrolls from one town to another, as Jeremiah is portrayed sending a letter and a scroll of prophecies over a larger distance, from Judah to Babylon (Jer 29; 51:59-64).

Ancient written texts usually presuppose an oral context; they were written in order to be read, sooner or later, and reading was done aloud. Undoubtedly, prophetic words could be remembered by prophets and hearers and repeated to the majority, who could not read. The oral and the written existed side by side. Nevertheless, as colophons on cuneiform tablets may carefully note the origins of their exemplars, or scholars cite established omen collections, while Egyptian scribes refer to old books of prophecy (see above), it is clear that the written form carried authority in Mesopotamia and in Egypt, and so, it may be deduced, it did in Israel and Judah. A prophet might revise and reorganize his oracles, but whether or not his disciples or later followers could alter them or bring them up to date, as often is alleged, remains hypothetical in the absence of early manuscripts. It is noteworthy that Assyrian scholars who found ancient omens relevant to their own times did not rephrase them but rather cited them in their original form and then gave their explanations in the form "place X in the text is now place Y" (Millard 1978, 246-49).

Although the majority of people were illiterate, in most places in Israel and Judah someone who was able to read and write could be found if needed, and such a person would not necessarily be a professional scribe. References to Hebrew prophets writing are few; however, this should not be interpreted to mean that they did not normally write, but simply that the activity only deserved notice when it had special significance. The possibility that their oracles were written soon after they had uttered them deserves more attention than it has received in many commentaries.

ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF

Zechariah is the penultimate and longest of the twelve books of the Minor Prophets (see Twelve, Book of the). It is ascribed to the sixth-century BC prophet Zechariah, son of Berechiah, and contains prophecies addressed to the postexilic Jewish community in Judea. In length it is fractionally shorter than the book of the prophet Daniel of the Major Prophets.

9. History of Interpretation

1. Historical Background.

The prophetic ministry of Zechariah overlaps with that of *Haggai, and both prophets are concerned with the rebuilding of the *temple in Jerusalem after the Babylonian *exile (see Ezra 5:1-2). After the decree of the Persian king Cyrus had given the Jews permission to return to their homeland in 538 BC (see 2 Chron 36:22-23; Ezra 1:2-4), an initial contingent of Jews led by Sheshbazzar had undertaken the long trek back to Jerusalem and had begun to reestablish themselves in what was now the Persian province of Yehud (Ezra 1:5-11). They began rebuilding the temple shortly after their return, in 536 BC, but were prevented by local opposition from continuing (Ezra 3—4) (see Israelite History). It was sixteen years later, in 520 BC, that Haggai arose to urge the people to take up this task again (Hag 1:12-15). In that same year, while Haggai was still active as a prophet, he was joined in his ministry by his younger contemporary Zechariah. Little is known about Zechariah, beyond the fact that he belonged to a priestly family and seems to have been raised by his grandfather Iddo (compare Zech 1:1, 7 with Ezra 5:1; 6:14).

Other major actors in the postexilic community of Zechariah's day were Joshua the high priest and Zerubbabel the prince, both of whom are mentioned by name in the book of Zechariah. The former was the grandson of Seraiah, the last high priest before the exile, and the latter was the grandson of Jehoiachin, the last king of Judah before the exile, and therefore a direct descendant of David. No doubt for that reason he had been appointed governor of Yehud by his Persian overlords. As the cultic and civic leaders, respectively, of the postexilic community, Joshua and Zerubbabel represented in their persons the institutional continuity with preexilic Israel.

Zechariah's ministry began at a time of great turmoil in the Persian Empire. Cyrus the Great had died in 530 BC, and his son and successor, Cambyses, died unexpectedly in 522 BC. The throne was then seized by Darius, who spent the first two years of his reign putting down a series of rebellions throughout the empire. These rebellions and their suppression are recorded in the famous Behistun inscription, which is almost exactly contemporaneous with Zechariah's night visions, and which initially seems hard to reconcile with the horsemen's report that "the whole earth lies quiet and peaceful" (Zech 1:11). Darius successfully put down all the rebellions, and he reigned until his death in 486 BC, shortly after his defeat at the hands of the Greeks at Marathon. Since Zechariah, like Darius, probably was a young man in 520 BC, he may also have lived to hear of this battle and, in general, to be aware of the epic conflict between the Greeks and Persians.

2. Main Divisions.

The book of Zechariah is best thought of as threefold, consisting of the following sections: part A (Zech 1–6), comprising mainly eight visions seen by the prophet in one night; part B (Zech 7–8), consisting largely of exhortations and warnings occasioned by a question about fasting; part C (Zech 9–14), dealing chiefly with the future that God has in store for Jerusalem and his people. Parts A and B are dated (520/519 BC and 516 BC, respectively), but part C is undated. Although since the nineteenth century parts A and B have commonly been grouped together as “Proto-Zechariah,” in contrast to part C as “Deutero-Zechariah,” there is insufficient warrant for this. Part B stands out as quite distinct in subject and genre from part A, which has led a significant minority of exegetes to group it with part C instead (e.g., Kline; Conrad; Sweeney; Webb). However, since part B is also quite different from part C, it is preferable to reject the binary division of the book altogether and to accept the threefold analysis that has been defended by others (e.g., Feinberg 1976; Bauer; Tidiman).

3. The Obscurity of the Book.

The book of Zechariah is notorious for its obscurity. Although part B consists mainly of relatively straightforward exhortations and admonitions, parts A and C have been the despair of exegetes throughout the history of interpretation. Part A is obscure because it consists largely of dreamlike visions interspersed with apparently unrelated nonvisionary material. Even when the visions are accompanied by an explanation, the explanation itself may be enigmatic (as in Zech 4:14). Part C is difficult to understand because it is composed almost entirely of a kaleidoscope of divine threats and promises regarding the indefinite future of Jerusalem, Israel and the nations, but often having no clearly identifiable referents in actual history. Commentators diverge widely on the question as to when (or whether) these predictions have been or will be fulfilled, or what historical circumstances they reflect. It is not without reason that the church father Jerome called Zechariah obscurissimus liber (“a most obscure book”), and that the medieval Jewish commentator Rashi declared that the book of Zechariah would not be understood until the Messiah came. Despite the book’s obscurity, however, it contains many messianic predictions that in the light of the NT clearly find their fulfillment in Jesus Christ.

4. The Text.

With the exception of the LXX, the ancient versions generally reflect a proto-Masoretic parent text—a consonantal text that is essentially the same as the MT. In the case of the Peshitta, it needs to be pointed out that its proto-Masoretic character applies primarily to the earliest attested form of the Syriac text, which is not the same as that printed in the Leiden Peshitta. The latter is generally based on later manuscripts, which have incorporated a number of inner-Syriac changes away from the traditional Hebrew text. In the case of the LXX, the Greek of Zechariah (as of the other Minor Prophets) appears to be based on an unreliable Hebrew text (perhaps a single faulty manuscript). Although the LXX occasionally gives a clue to a reading that is superior to the MT (e.g., Zech 1:21 [MT 2:4]; 5:6), this is the exception rather than the rule. In most cases where the LXX reflects a parent Hebrew text that is different from the MT, the latter is to be preferred. Nevertheless, although the MT generally preserves the best recoverable Hebrew text, it is far from perfect. There are a number of places where the MT appears to be garbled (e.g., Zech 2:8 [MT 2:12]; 6:3, 6-7). Although a better Hebrew text sometimes can be restored with some degree of plausibility, it generally is safer to deal with the MT as it has been transmitted and to admit that the text has suffered in transmission. Needless to say, these textual difficulties also contribute to the overall obscurity of the book.

5. Zechariah A (Zech 1–6). This part of Zechariah has three subsections.

5.1. Call to Repentance. The first subsection of Zechariah A (Zech 1:1-6) is a brief opening call to repentance to the postexilic community, reminding them of the terrible consequences of Israel’s disobedience in the past. It is not so much an introduction to the book as a whole as the chronologically earliest message that the prophet received (in November-December 520 BC).

5.2. Night Visions and Episodes. The second and largest subsection of Zechariah A (Zech

1:7—6:8) consists of a series of eight night *visions interspersed with a number of nonvisionary passages, which may be called “episodes,” and whose connection with the visions themselves is unclear. Although not as tightly structured as has sometimes been suggested, the eight visions form a loosely structured cycle, with the first and last clearly balancing each other, and the middle two focusing on the central concern of restoring the cult (priesthood and temple) in Jerusalem.

5.2.1. First Vision: Riders (Zech 1:7-17). The account of the first vision can be divided into four sections: the vision itself (Zech 1:8), the dialogue that follows (Zech 1:9-10), the expansion of the vision (Zech 1:11-13) and the Lord’s assurance (Zech 1:14-17). In the vision itself the prophet sees a man seated on a chestnut horse coming to a halt among myrtle bushes in a shaded garden (not a glen). It is a depiction of God’s throne room in heaven that seems to be modeled on its contemporary counterpart on earth in the Persian Empire, the “paradise” or garden palace in the imperial capital of Pasargadae. Behind this rider are other horses of various colors, which turn out to have been on a divinely authorized reconnaissance mission, led by the messenger (or “angel”) of the Lord. The horsemen were couriers, heavenly counterparts of the mounted Persian couriers who were a familiar sight near Jerusalem in Zechariah’s day, who had been sent out by the Lord to report back to their divine commander on the conditions that prevailed on earth. They report that “the whole earth lies quiet and peaceful,” probably an allusion to the prophecy of Isaiah 14:7, which predicts the fall of the king of *Babylon, and which was in the process of being finally fulfilled at the time of the vision (see Wolters 2008). The vision account concludes with the Lord’s assurance that he is returning to Jerusalem to reestablish his residence there.

5.2.2. Second Vision: Horns and Craftsmen (Zech 1:18-21 [MT 2:1-4]). Zechariah sees four horns, representing the powers that had scattered God’s people to the four winds, and four craftsmen, who as agents of God’s judgment destroy the horns in their turn. In Zechariah 1:21 what the craftsmen come to do is best understood as referring to the dehorning of cattle, with the MT slightly emended in light of the LXX to read “to sharpen their blade, in order to gouge out the horns of the nations.”

5.2.3. Third Vision: The Surveyor (Zech 2:1-5 [MT 2:5-9]). Zechariah sees a surveyor, measuring line in hand, who is prevented from measuring the dimensions of Jerusalem, apparently because such measuring would needlessly restrict the size of the city. Instead, the Lord declares that he himself, as a dynamic “wall of fire,” will define the limits, making room for a multitude of people and animals to live there.

5.2.4. Episode I (Zech 2:6-13 [MT 2:10-17]). This is the first of three interruptions of the vision sequence, sometimes called “oracles” or “epexegetes,” which may more appropriately be called “episodes” (compare the episodes of Greek drama). Episode I consists of an appeal to the Jews who remain in exile to return to Jerusalem. This appeal is likely connected to the turbulent situation in Babylon at the time (519 BC), when a leader claiming to be Nebuchadnezzar was leading a revolt against the Persian hegemony. Tellingly, the Jewish exiles are addressed as “*Zion” (Zech 2:10), tacitly equating God’s people, whatever their geographical location, with Jerusalem. Here God’s people are also called “the apple of his eye,” and anyone who touches them is threatened with judgment (Zech 2:8-9). This exhortation to return is followed by a call to rejoice because the Lord promises once again to take up residence among his people (Zech 2:10). Beyond that, he also declares that in future many nations (goyim) will attach themselves to him and be “my people” (Zech 2:11). The Lord will make a fresh start with his people back in Jerusalem and the “holy land” (Zech 2:12). When all of these things come to pass, Zechariah’s status as a true prophet of the Lord will be vindicated (Zech 2:9, 11).

5.2.5. Fourth Vision: The High Priest Reclothed (Zech 3:1-7). Zechariah sees the high priest Joshua, who is stripped of his filthy (Heb šô’îm; lit., “excrement-smeared”) clothes and dressed in clean garments instead, no doubt representing the acquittal of the high priest as representative of his people, and his reinvestiture in office after the exile. In this dramatic scene, which is unlike the other visions in a number of formal respects, both the Accuser (šāṭān) and the “messenger [‘angel’] of the LORD” play a role, the one to accuse the obviously guilty Joshua in the court of heaven (Zech 3:1), and the other to stand by (Zech 3:1, 5) and to lay a solemn charge on him to be faithful in his priestly duties (Zech 3:6-7). This charge ends with an enigmatic promise, literally, “then I will give you walkers [mahlēkīm] among these standers” (Zech 3:7b), which leaves unclear (despite the dictionary definition of mahlēkīm as “access”) what or who these mysterious “walkers” are. Another active participant is the prophet himself, who interrupts the proceedings to ensure that Joshua also receives the high priest’s turban (Zech 3:5). Nevertheless, the central actor is God himself, who silences the Accuser and pronounces the acquittal: “Look, I am absolving you of your guilt, and I am clothing you in spotless robes” (Zech 3:4).

5.2.6. Episode II (Zech 3:8-10). Attached to the fourth vision, but connected to it only by its reference to Joshua, is a further prophecy consisting of three distinct promises: the coming of the messianic servant named “Semah” (Zech 3:8), the removal of the guilt of the land in a single day (Zech 3:9), and the future return, “on that day,” of prosperity and peace (Zech 3:10). The Semah of the first promise, foreshadowed by the Israelite priesthood represented by Joshua and his colleagues (which is why they are called “the men of omen”), is reminiscent of the messianic prophecy concerning a coming Semah (ṣemah, which means “Shoot,” not “Branch”) in Jeremiah 23:5; 33:15. The second promise is engraved by the Lord himself on a stone that he places “in front of” Joshua, where the prepositional phrase perhaps is to be understood as much in a chronological or typological sense as in a spatial one. The third promise finally gives an idyllic picture, in traditional terms, of prosperity in an agricultural society.

5.2.7. Fifth Vision: The Menorah and Olive Trees (Incorporating Episode III) (Zech 4:1-14). As though wakened from sleep, Zechariah sees a golden menorah with seven lamps flanked by two olive trees that supply the oil for the lamps (Zech 4:1-3). When the prophet asks what these things represent (Zech 4:4), the answer given by the interpreting messenger (Zech 4:5-6a) is twofold. The first part of the answer turns out to be episode III, full of encouraging words addressed to Zerubbabel (Zech 4:6b-10a). The second part explains that “these seven,” apparently referring to the seven lamps of the menorah, are the eyes of the Lord as they scan the world (Zech 4:10b). In a second dialogue with the messenger the prophet now learns that the two olive trees—more precisely, the two olive-laden “spikes” or branch ends that supply the lamps with oil—are the two “sons of oil” (bēnē-hayyiṣhār), which are said to stand before the Lord of the earth (Zech 4:14).

Although this enigmatic vision is puzzling in many ways, a number of things stand out. The almost violent insertion of episode III, although it does not explicitly refer to the details of the vision and seems to leave the second part of the messenger’s explanation hanging in the air, emphatically makes the point that this vision must be understood as a message for Zerubbabel, meant to reassure him that the Spirit of God would enable him to overcome all obstacles to the temple-building project. It is therefore also clear that the mēnôrâ (a word that everywhere else in the OT occurs only in connection with the tabernacle and temple) is a symbol of the temple itself, the holy place where the Lord will again take up residence after the exile. As for the tantalizing phrase “sons of oil” in Zechariah 4:14, this refers in the first instance not to persons but idiomatically to the oil-rich branch ends of the olive trees themselves. There may be a second level of meaning as well, but it is unclear whether on that level it refers to heavenly figures, the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, the contemporary leaders Joshua and Zerubbabel, or some other pair.

5.2.8. Sixth Vision: The Scroll (Zech 5:1-4). Zechariah sees a billboard-sized flying scroll that is identified as “the curse,” directed against thieves and perjurers, whose homes it will enter and destroy. The enigmatic Hebrew clause in Zechariah 5:3b is perhaps best rendered, “For everyone who steals has escaped punishment for this—just like that! And everyone who swears (falsely) has escaped punishment for this—just like that!”

5.2.9. Seventh Vision: The Ephah (Zech 5:5-11). Zechariah sees a bushel-sized container (‘ēpā) containing a female figure, explicitly identified as “Guilt” and “Wickedness,” which is picked up by two winged women and flown to a specially prepared shrine in Shinar (i.e., Babylonia). In Zechariah 5:6 the puzzling form ‘ēnām (‘ynm) of the MT, literally “their eye,” should be read as ‘āwōnām (‘wn-m), meaning “guilt,” taking the final letter as an enclitic mēm.

5.2.10. Eighth Vision: The Chariots (Zech 6:1-8). Zechariah sees four chariots, drawn by horses of different colors, go out from between two “mountains of bronze” (apparently the gateway of heaven) to different points of the compass on earth. The chariots are identified as “the four winds [rûhôt] of heaven” (Zech 6:5), evoking the image of God riding on the winds like a charioteer. At the same time, the description of this vision also exploits the ambiguity of the word rûhôt (sg. rûah), since it can also designate the four points of the compass, as well as the personal “spirits” that are sent out from God’s throne room. Furthermore, in the climax of the vision in Zechariah 6:8 there is a further play on the meanings of rûah when the Lord states that the northbound horses “cause my rûah to rest in the land of the north.” Here the reference probably is to the wrath of God being vented on pagan Babylonia. Nevertheless, in the tantalizing ambiguity that so often characterizes the night visions, it is also possible that this phrase has the positive sense “cause my Spirit to rest in the land of the north,” which gives the vision an entirely different message. Another puzzling feature of this last vision, at least as preserved in the MT, is that two of the four chariots are said to go north, and one south, but no destination is mentioned for the fourth, giving rise to the suspicion that the text may be in some disarray. In any case, it is clear that this final vision, with its heaven-sent and variously colored horses, is meant as a counterpart to the first vision, ending the vision cycle with a kind of inclusio.

5.3. The Crowning of Joshua and the Coming of Semah (Zech 6:9-15). The third subsection of Zechariah A describes a remarkable coronation scene, accompanied by an enigmatic messianic prophecy (see Messiah). Zechariah places a crown, fashioned from gold and silver contributed by a deputation of the Jews still in Babylon, on the head of Joshua the high priest, and simultaneously announces the coming of a royal figure, again called “Semah” (“Shoot”), who will build the temple. This unidentified Semah is not the high priest himself, but rather is someone else who will rule either as or with a priestly figure. In the light of the NT this Shoot can be identified as the king-priest Jesus Christ. The crown placed on Joshua’s head is to be preserved in the temple as a reminder of this promise. This section ends, abruptly and suggestively, in a notable example of the literary figure of aposiopesis: “If you really obey the LORD your God, . . .” an echo of the beginning of Deuteronomy 28:1. The reader is expected to mentally supply the unexpressed conclusion of this familiar text, which consists of an extraordinary promise of *blessing. This understood promise also functions as an adumbration of the two remaining parts of the book that now follow.

6. Zechariah B (Zech 7—8).

These chapters, which form a distinct literary unit on their own, stand apart from the rest of Zechariah in that they consist mainly of straightforward ethical exhortations about life in the *covenant, together with the warnings and promises that go with them. These prophetic appeals are framed by the question about fasting that is posed near the beginning of Zechariah 7 (Zech 7:3) and not answered until near the end of Zechariah 8 (Zech 8:18). The question is posed by a delegation from Babylonia, on behalf of Bethel-Sarezzer, who inquires of the priests and prophets in Jerusalem whether annual fasts should be continued now that the seventy years of exile were coming to an end. The answer that Zechariah finally gives is that these fasts will be transformed into feasts.

In the intervening material we find urgent appeals to do *justice (Zech 7:9, 8:16), to show kindness and compassion (Zech 7:9), to avoid harshness toward the marginalized or ill-intentioned schemes against others (Zech 7:10), and to speak the truth to one another (Zech 8:16). It is Israel’s failure to do these things in the past that has led to the exile. Now, however, especially after the laying of the foundation of the temple, a new era of blessing is dawning (Zech 8:1-15).

Although it is true that the question about fasting near the beginning is balanced by the prophet’s answer near the end, there is no clear chiasmic pattern that structures these two chapters throughout. The differing claims to the contrary by some scholars (e.g., Baldwin; Butterworth; Tidiman) tend to cancel each other out. What is true, however, is the observation that there are a number of striking verbal parallels between Zechariah 7—8 and the book of Haggai (especially concentrated in Zech 8:9-13). Whether this constitutes evidence for some kind of secondary redactional shaping remains controversial, however.

These chapters conclude with two verses that open up a perspective to the world at large and in this way provide a transition to Zechariah C. After the answer to the initial question about fasting had been given in Zechariah 8:18-19, the prophet concludes with the promise that many Gentiles will in the future join the Jews (or one specific Jew) as they go up to Jerusalem to *worship the Lord. Although this may initially have referred to proselytes who participated in the restored annual pilgrimages to Jerusalem after the exile, it is clear from the perspective of the NT that this prophecy finds an even greater fulfillment in the inclusion of the Gentiles in the church (see Wolters 2006).

7. Zechariah C (Zech 9—14).

Although part C is commonly subdivided into two “oracles,” it is in fact not clear that the heading “oracle” in each case is meant to refer to all of the subsequent three chapters. The component parts of these chapters, although all are predictions (promises and threats) of some sort, are of a very heterogeneous character and are not always clearly related to each other. It is too much to say that these chapters are “a haphazard collection of pieces of prophetic tradition strung together by catchwords” (O’Brien, 231), but it is also true that attempts to discern some overall literary pattern in their arrangement (e.g., Lamarche; Kline; Tidiman) have been unsuccessful.

7.1. The First Oracle (Zech 9—11). A new section is signaled by the phrase (to be repeated in Zech 12:1) “An oracle. The word of the LORD.” The word for “oracle” (mašša’), traditionally translated “burden,” here introduces two chapters dealing with judgment on Israel’s enemies and deliverance for Israel.

7.1.1. The King of Peace amid War (Zech 9). Although this chapter has its own literary unity, perhaps conforming to the pattern of an ancient “Divine Warrior Hymn” (Hanson), it is also a kind of triptych, with two longer panels that describe the Lord’s warfare against Israel’s enemies flanking a shorter central panel that announces the coming of a messianic king who will bring an end to warfare.

7.1.1.1. The Lord’s Campaign from Syria to Jerusalem (Zech 9:1-8c). In a military campaign that moves from the cities of Syria to the cities of the coast, first of Phoenicia and then of Philistia, the divine warrior defeats these traditional enemies of Israel and then moves again inland to protect Jerusalem (see Warfare and Divine Warfare). It often has been pointed out that this trajectory follows closely the campaign of Alexander the Great in 333 BC, which initiated the Hellenistic period of Israel’s history. Especially noteworthy is the description of the conquest of Tyre in Zechariah 9:3-4, which seems to correspond to Alexander’s famous capture of the island fortress.

7.1.1.2. The Divine Peacemaker (Zech 9:8d-10). In an abrupt departure from the martial theme of the first panel of the triptych, the central panel (beginning with Zech 9:8d: “Yes, now I see with my eyes”) envisages the coming of a humble messianic king who will announce peace and destroy the tools of war. In describing the future kingdom of peace the prophet, in Zechariah 9:10, quotes Psalm 72, long regarded in both Jewish and Christian tradition as describing the coming messianic king. A plausible emendation of the MT, supported by all the ancient versions, reads ūmošā^c instead of wēnōšā^c in Zechariah 9:9, so that the coming king is described as “righteous and a Savior,” which in turn is a probable allusion to Isaiah 45:21, “a righteous God and a Savior,” thus implicitly ascribing divinity to the coming king. In the NT Jesus applies this prophecy to himself by deliberately enacting the predicted scenario in his triumphal entry of Jerusalem (Mt 21:1-11 par.).

7.1.1.3. The Lord Wages War Against the Greeks and Promises Prosperity (Zech 9:11-17). In another abrupt change the third panel reverts to the theme of a future divine war and the prosperity that it will introduce. Since it predicts a dramatic military victory of the “sons of Zion” over the “sons of Greece,” followed by a period of peace and prosperity, this passage has long been interpreted as a reference to the Maccabean victory over Antiochus IV in 164 BC, which ended the period of Hellenistic overlordship and introduced the Hasmonean phase of Jewish history. This interpretation finds striking support if the “arrow” of the Lord mentioned in Zechariah 9:14 is taken to refer to Halley’s Comet, which appeared in the sky over Jerusalem precisely at the time when Antiochus IV unexpectedly died and the Jews recaptured and rededicated the temple (see Wolters 1993).

7.1.2. The Lord Remembers His People (Zech 10). After an initial exhortation to seek prosperity, not from deceitful diviners, but only from the Lord (Zech 10:1-2), the Lord himself speaks words of judgment against Israel’s faithless leaders (shepherds), but words of promise to the people (flock) themselves. In an arresting image, he says that he will transform this flock into his magnificent warhorse and will lead them to victory over their enemies (Zech 10:3). He also makes the remarkable promise that he will bring back from foreign lands not only the exiles of Judah, but also those of the erstwhile northern kingdom (designated “Ephraim,” and “Joseph”), who had been deported by the Assyrians some two centuries earlier. In another enigmatic passage with messianic overtones (Zech 10:4), he states that out of Judah will come the cornerstone, the peg, the battle bow and “every ruler together.”

7.2. Two Curses and Two Shepherds (Zech 11). Whereas the two preceding chapters had given a positive message for Israel, Zechariah 11 is starkly negative with respect to Israel’s prospects. It begins and ends with a “curse”—that is, a divine announcement of disaster—against Israel’s leaders, and these two curses frame a central section about two shepherds that describes the Lord’s determination to break his covenant commitment to Israel. This central section (often called the “shepherd allegory”) has the well-deserved reputation of being one of the most difficult pericopes in the entire OT, both exegetically and theologically.

7.2.1. The Forest Curse (Zech 11:1-3). In an artfully constructed initial poem about a devastating forest fire beginning on Mount Lebanon, the reader is initially lulled into believing that the foregoing reassuring announcements of God’s judgment against Israel’s enemies are continuing, with the tall trees of the forest symbolizing the leadership of Gentile *nations. But in the very last words of the poem, “the pride of the Jordan” (i.e., the lush jungle flanking the Jordan before it empties into the Dead Sea), the rhetorical trap is sprung, and the reader realizes that the divine judgment is now directed against Israel itself and has reached even the restricted area of Yehud, where the postexilic Jewish community had settled.

7.2.2. The Two Shepherds (Zech 11:4-16). After the foregoing ominous beginning this section relates how the Lord commands Zechariah on two separate occasions to play the role of a shepherd to God’s flock, a shepherd who in both cases abandons them to their fate. In the case of the first prophetic shepherd impersonation, he is called to tend “the flock destined for slaughter,” and his two staffs, designated “Graciousness” and “Solidarity” (Zech 11:7) and representing respectively God’s covenant (Zech 11:10) and the brotherhood between Judah and Israel (Zech 11:14), are deliberately chopped into pieces (Heb gd^c) by the prophet-shepherd. Through the actions of this shepherd the Lord announces his intention to pity his people no longer and to hand them over to oppressive overlords (Zech 11:6). It should be noted that the covenant represented by the first staff, designated bērit hā’ammim (Zech 11:10), almost certainly refers not to an otherwise unknown covenant with the nations in general, but rather to God’s covenant with the nation of Israel. In abandoning his imagined post, the shepherd suggests and receives the substantial sum of thirty shekels of silver as severance pay, which he then contributes to the temple as a votary offering to the Lord. In Zechariah 11:13 the word ’eder of the MT should be revocalized as the verbal form ’eddor, and the phrase that it introduces should be translated as “I will vow the weight I am worth, and no longer burden them,” representing an uncomplimentary allusion to the worth of a woman compared to that of a man in Leviticus 28. It is this passage that is quoted (and attributed to Jeremiah) in Matthew 27:9, where it is used in a very different context to refer to the thirty pieces of silver paid to Judas. The Lord now calls the prophet to a second shepherd impersonation, explicitly bidding him to be a “foolish shepherd” (rō’eh ’ēwili) who will neglect and abuse the flock (Zech 11:15-16).

7.2.3. The Shepherd Curse (Zech 11:17). The enigmatic chapter concludes with another curse, this time directed against “the worthless shepherd” (rō’i hā’ēlil). This designation could refer to either the just-mentioned “foolish shepherd” or to the ruinous prophet-shepherd in both his roles, despite the fact that in both cases the role was played by divine appointment. The curse is pronounced on the shepherd’s arm and on his right eye, thereby effectively disabling him from doing his job. Presumably, this means that the future evil leaders whose roles the prophet had enacted are now in turn to be punished by God. The many attempts to identify the enacted shepherds of this chapter with known historical personages have been notably unsuccessful.

7.3. The Second Oracle (Zech 12–14). As in Zechariah 9:1, a new section is introduced by the words “An oracle. The word of the LORD.” The three chapters that follow present an alternation of positive and negative predictions, focusing especially on Jerusalem as the symbol of God’s covenant people. These chapters are characterized by the frequent use of the eschatological phrase “on that day,” which sounds like a drum-beat on an average of every two or three verses.

7.3.1. Jerusalem’s Enemies Destroyed (Zech 12:1-9). The Lord, after identifying himself as the creator of both the universe in general and the human spirit in particular, announces that the nations around Jerusalem will only inflict harm upon themselves (Zech 12:2-3). By God’s strength and his active intervention the inhabitants of Jerusalem will defeat their enemies and make their city secure in its place (Zech 12:4-9). There is some suggestion that Jerusalem and Judah (i.e., the Persian province Yehud), although they will fight alongside each other against their common enemy (Zech 12:5-6), will also be in competition with each other to some extent (Zech 12:2), so that the Lord must ensure that the metropolis does not receive more glory than does its hinterland (Zech 12:7). The difficult conclusion of Zechariah 12:2 is best translated as “and it will also be necessary for Judah [to join] the siege of Jerusalem,” suggesting that some inhabitants of Judah had been forced by the enemy to be part of the siege of the capital.

7.3.2. Mourning for the Pierced One (Zech 12:10-14). In another abrupt transition, the Lord now turns to a future event affecting Jerusalem that will be of quite a different kind. It will be a dramatic change in the inward affections of its inhabitants, a change associated with the death of someone closely identified with the Lord himself, whom they have killed by “piercing” him. This change is initiated by God pouring out a “spirit of grace and pleas for grace” (Zech 12:10), and it manifests itself in comprehensive national mourning over this pierced one. This mysterious figure, who was interpreted as the Messiah already in early Judaism, is identified in the NT with Jesus Christ (Jn 19:37).

7.3.3. Sin Cleansed (Zech 13:1-6). The scene changes again. “On that day” a cleansing fountain will be opened up for the inhabitants of Jerusalem (Zech 13:1), and the Lord will forcibly remove *idolatry and false prophecy from the land (Zech 13:2). That it is false prophecy, not prophecy in general, that is in view here is clear from the association of “prophets” and “unclean spirit” in Zechariah 13:2. Anyone who has acted as a prophet, if he is not killed by his own parents (Zech 13:3), will now vehemently deny having prophesied (Zech 13:5-6).

7.3.4. The Fate of the Shepherd and the Flock (Zech 13:7-9). In a passage reminiscent of the second curse of Zechariah 11:17, the Lord now calls on his sword to strike someone described as “my shepherd, my associate.” As with the mysterious “pierced one” of Zechariah 12:10, there is a close identification between this shepherd and the Lord himself, so that in the NT Jesus could apply this verse to himself (Mt 26:13; Mk 14:27). Not only does the Lord wield his sword against his shepherd-associate, but as the now shepherdless flock scatters, he also attacks their undershepherds (Zech 13:7). It should be noted that the phrase “turn my hand to the šō‘ārīm” (Zech 13:7) does not denote a caring gesture for the little ones of the flock, but instead a threatening gesture against the shepherd lads who assisted in tending the flock. The completely leaderless flock is now subjected to a severe trial: two thirds are to be killed (Zech 13:8), and the remaining third will be tested and purified like silver or gold in a crucible (Zech 13:9a). Only then will the covenant relationship with the surviving remnant be restored (Zech 13:9b).

7.3.5. The Lord Comes and Reigns (Zech 14:1-21). In this final dramatic depiction of the coming *Day of the Lord everything is again focused on Jerusalem. Initially, the Lord allows the nations to attack, plunder and terrorize the city, but then he himself turns against its enemies and performs many miraculous works. In many ways, it seems, the natural order of things will be turned upside down. The regular alternation of night and day will cease, and (according to the most plausible meaning of the difficult phrase in Zech 14:6b) “heavy things will float up.” The Lord himself will physically touch down on the Mount of Olives, with the result that it will split in two to form a valley of escape. The surrounding countryside will drop down to the level of the Dead Sea, leaving Jerusalem perched high and safe in its original place. To this Jerusalem the nations of the world will now come to worship the God of the Jews at the annual Feast of Booths. Perhaps most startling of all, in this new Jerusalem the category “Holy to the Lord” will no longer be restricted to the cult; it will be extended to ordinary kitchen utensils and mundane horse tack. No “Canaanite” will be found in the eschatological city.

8. Main Themes.

Despite the obscurity and apparently jumbled character of much of Zechariah, there are broad themes that come through clearly. Among such themes we find the centrality of Jerusalem (“Jerusalem” and “Zion” together occur a total of forty-seven times, quite evenly distributed throughout the book). It is to Jerusalem that the remaining exiles are exhorted to return (Zech 9:12), and it is to Jerusalem that all nations will eventually come to serve Yahweh (Zech 14:16). Other themes are the future inclusion of all nations in Yahweh’s covenant (Zech 2:11; 8:20-23), and the continuity with earlier prophecy (throughout the book). As in so many of the prophets, overshadowing all these themes is the emphasis on the sovereignty of *God in both judgment and grace. Terrible judgment is threatened both against the nations at large (Zech 1:21; 2:9; 6:7-8; 9:1-7; 12:3-4, 9; 14:3, 12) and against God’s own covenant people (Zech 13:8-9). Particularly chilling is the passage in which God commands the prophet to enact a scenario in which two shepherds are sent to rule over his people, both of whom will abandon and ruin them (Zech 11:4-16). But inexplicable grace is the dominant note. It is not only manifested in the present, as God returns in mercy to his people after the severe punishment of the exile (Zech 1:16-17), but also promised for the future (Zech 8:1-5, 12-13; 9:8, 16-17; 10:6). Especially prominent among these promises of grace are the predictions concerning a coming messianic figure, the Semah or Shoot (Zech 3:8; 6:12-13). In addition, the expectation of a future Davidic king continues to be kept alive. Contrary to some scholarly opinion, this expectation is still clearly present in Zechariah C (see Petterson), and in some ways it resonates with Isaiah’s accounts of the Suffering *Servant (Lamarche, 124-47).

9. History of Interpretation.

Much of patristic exegesis—for example, the commentary by Didymus the Blind (fourth-century AD, rediscovered in the mid-twentieth century)—was characterized by an uninhibited allegorical interpretation. The great exception is Didymus’s contemporary Theodore of Mopsuestia, who espoused a more literal and historical interpretation. He and a number of Syriac commentators (notably Ephraem Syrus) interpreted the predictions of Zechariah C as referring primarily to the history of Israel before the coming of Christ, especially the time of the Maccabees. Jerome wrote an influential commentary on two levels: one “literal,” in which he drew on the Hebrew text and Jewish sources, and one “spiritual,” which was heavily dependent on Didymus’s allegorical commentary.

Jerome’s commentary dominated the interpretation of the Latin West until the time of the Reformation. Early modern interpretation was dominated by Protestant exegetes and by a turn away from allegory toward a philological and historical understanding of the Hebrew text. Nevertheless, it was still characterized by great diversity, especially regarding the historical referents of Zechariah 9–14. Zechariah 14, for example, was taken to refer to the church age (Martin Luther), to the centuries between Zechariah and Christ (John Calvin), to the end times preceding the last judgment (John Oecolampadius), and to the period of the Maccabees (Hugo Grotius). Until the late eighteenth century, there nevertheless was broad agreement that the canonical book of Zechariah was a divinely inspired part of Holy Scripture, spoke the truth about future events, and portrayed the coming Messiah in terms that were fulfilled in Jesus Christ. This also applied to those who, on the basis of Matthew 27:9, ascribed some or all of Zechariah C to Jeremiah.

All of this changed with the rise of modern historical criticism, which began to exclude such confessional commitments from biblical scholarship and to focus on hypotheses of multiple authorship and dating. Zechariah C, for example, was attributed to four or even more different authors and was assigned to dates ranging from the eighth to the second century BC. The constituent parts of Zechariah were read with a view to hearing not the voice of God but rather the diversity of human voices, each reflecting its own milieu and agenda and detached from both its immediate and its macrocanonical context. Among confessional interpreters of Scripture in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, the chief innovations have been the detailed defense of traditional positions (e.g., unity of authorship) against the results of historical criticism, and the rise of a dispensationalist hermeneutic. The latter stressed literal fulfillment of Zechariah's prophecies and thus saw many of these as fulfilled not in the church but rather in a future separate group of converted Jews (so Feinberg).

A remarkable development in the tradition of historical criticism has been the recent trend in dating Zechariah C. After a time (most of the nineteenth century) when this part had been almost unanimously assigned a preexilic date, there followed a period (from about 1880 to 1960) when almost all critical scholars assigned it to the Hellenistic period. Since then, a growing consensus has emerged that Zechariah C should be dated to the early postexilic period (e.g., Lamarche; Hanson; Reventlow; Meyers and Meyers 1993; Petersen 1995; Sweeney; O'Brien; Boda). Thus, there is now widespread agreement that the entire book of Zechariah could have been written within or near the lifetime of the sixth-century BC prophet whose name it bears. As a result, there is currently little distance between the mainstream scholarly consensus and the traditional conservative view that the entire book of Zechariah goes back in all essentials to the prophet Zechariah himself, perhaps to different stages of his life.

Other recent trends in the interpretation of Zechariah are a focus on *literary patterns and on *intertextuality, a new assessment of the relationship of Zechariah to *apocalyptic, and the rise of a modified form of dispensationalism. With the literary turn in biblical studies, the last generation or two of scholars has sought to discern various kinds of *rhetorical structures in the book, such as chiasmic patterns structuring the night visions of Zechariah A or all of Zechariah B. Unfortunately, these have not produced a significant scholarly consensus, and a monograph by M. Butterworth on the issue has wisely urged caution. Because Zechariah lived at a time when much of the OT canon was already available, scholars since the nineteenth century (notably E. W. Hengstenberg and B. Stade) have pointed out that he frequently alludes to earlier Scripture. Under the rubric "intertextuality" this emphasis recently has received new impetus, aided by the contemporary possibilities of electronic searching (see, e.g., Stead). Of course, it remains a matter of interpretive judgment to decide whether a verbal parallel between two biblical passages is exegetically significant or merely coincidental. Although all or parts of Zechariah have in the past been described as "apocalyptic," recent discussion of this ambiguous modern category (see esp. Collins) have caused many to conclude that it does not apply to Zechariah at all. Finally, in the dispensationalist camp the rise of "progressive dispensationalism" favors a confessional hermeneutic that does allow for some nonliteral interpretation of prophecy and its partial fulfillment in the church age (Merrill). Alongside these recent trends there continues to be a steady tradition of diachronic analysis that assigns different parts of the book to different redactors and dates, but without forming a critical consensus.

ZEPHANIAH, BOOK OF

The book of Zephaniah contains one of the strongest messages of judgment among the Prophetic Books as it focuses on the impending Day of Yahweh's judgment (see Day of the Lord) on the nation of Judah and its ancient Near Eastern neighbors in the late seventh century BC. Alongside this message of judgment, however, is one of *salvation as the prophecies reveal the emergence of a *remnant from the destruction.

1. Date, Setting, Composition
2. Structure
3. Major Themes
4. Zephaniah in Its Canonical Context

1. Date, Setting, Composition.

1.1. Referential Historical Context. The super-scription that introduces Zephaniah possibly links the prophet to the royal family of Judah (see 2.1 below) and clearly links the prophet to the reign of King Josiah (see Israelite History). Josiah reigned in Judah around the years 640-609 BC. Biblical sources evaluate Josiah's reign positively (2 Kings 22:2; 2 Chron 34:2), identifying it as one of the highest points in the post-Solomonic phase of the monarchy (along with Hezekiah, as well as Joash and Jehoshaphat). These sources also agree, however, that the first part of Josiah's reign was not exemplary, with 2 Kings 22:3 focusing on reforms in the eighteenth year of his reign, and 2 Chronicles 34:3 on reforms in his eighth year. In either case, there was a problematic phase in Josiah's reign, one that probably reflects the enduring impact of two previous generations of spiritual decline in Judah, the legacy of Josiah's father, Amon (ca. 641-640 BC), and grandfather Manasseh (ca. 687-641 BC). Thus, the negative message of Zephaniah would fit the early phase of Josiah's reign (e.g., Roberts; Patterson; Berlin), reflecting the urgency after multiple generations of disobedience and the approaching fulfillment of God's warnings to Hezekiah (2 Kings 20:16-19) and Manasseh (2 Kings 21:10-16), which Josiah's reign successfully averted (2 Kings 23:24-27). However, some scholars have suggested later dates. One suggestion has been shortly after the beginning of the reforms by Josiah (in 632 or 622 BC) due to the presence of Deuteronomistic language in Zephaniah (e.g., Vlaardingerbroek; Robertson). Another places the words of this book during the reign of Jehoiakim due to references in Zephaniah 2:8 to Moab and Ammon, which invaded Judah during Jehoiakim's reign (2 Kings 24:2), and to Nineveh, whose fall in 612 BC is mentioned in Zephaniah 2:13-15 (e.g., Hyatt; Williams). This final position is at odds with the superscription in Zephaniah 1:1 and appears to be based on the assumption that the prophecy concerning Nineveh could not have been given prior to its fall.

Some have focused on a particular setting in the life of Judah at which the speeches of the book of Zephaniah were first delivered, arguing that Zephaniah preached these oracles in Jerusalem during a pilgrimage festival such as the Feast of Tabernacles (e.g., Bennett; Goldingay; Kealy).

1.2. Compositional Historical Context. There is a difference, however, between the setting when the words of Zephaniah were first delivered to Judah and Jerusalem and the setting when these words were drawn together into a prophetic book (O'Brien 2007). Many have distinguished material original or attributed to the prophet Zephaniah from supplementary material added by later editors either at the time the original oral speeches of Zephaniah were gathered together for the first time or at a later point after the first edition of the book of Zephaniah (see review in Sweeney 1999). For example, M. Sweeney believes that Zephaniah should be read in terms of the context of the Babylonian *exile, when Judah had been exiled and the *temple destroyed (Sweeney 2003), while M. Széles identifies exilic and postexilic redactions. Discernment of supplementary material has been focused on what were considered contrastive themes (e.g., eschatology/present, universality/particularity, enemy/diaspora) and styles in the book. Views range from those who see the only addition as the superscription in Zephaniah 1:1 (e.g., Baker), to those who see smaller secondary additions (e.g., Holladay: Zeph 1:14-18; 2:10-11, 12, 15a; 3:8b, 10, 13b; Ben Zvi: Zeph 1:2-3; 2:8-11), to those who see major redactional phases (e.g., Redditt: Zeph 1:2-3; 1:7—2:15, then Zeph 1:1, 4-6; 3:1-13, finally Zeph 3:14-20).

The diversity of opinion concerning the compositional development of the book cautions against simplistic or definitive solutions. One must admit that there are some odd shifts in the flow of the book (e.g., Zeph 2:11 to Zeph 2:12), but this may reflect the challenge of drawing together various oral speeches into a literary whole. The text appears to fit in the main the context identified in the superscription, although one can discern a modulation between universal (generic references to all creation/humanity), international (references to specific *nations) and particular (references to Judah, Jerusalem, Israel) contexts. Generally, the international and particular references would fit the audience to which Zephaniah addressed his oracles, while it is possible that the universal references are part of the literary development as Zephaniah's messages were drawn into a collection by himself, his disciples or later tradents. There are also indications at the end of the book that may reflect broader trends related to the development of the Book of the *Twelve as a collection (Nogalski 2000). Thus, the summons to joy addressed to Daughter *Zion in Zephaniah 3:14-15, which introduces the final section of the book, echoes two key passages in the Haggai-Malachi corpus (Zech 2:10; 9:9-10) that appear to reflect its editorial development. There is a strong possibility then that Zephaniah 3:14-20 was developed as part of a phase in which Haggai-Malachi was brought into a minor prophets collection that eventually became the Book of the Twelve (Boda).

2. Structure.

There have been many proposals for the structure of the book of Zephaniah. A common approach has been to follow what was considered the basic structure of a prophetic book, such as laid out by C. Westermann: (1) judgment speeches to the prophet's own nation; (2) judgment speeches to foreign nations; (3) salvation speeches to the prophet's own nation (Westermann, 95). Thus, for example, J. Roberts identifies Zephaniah 1:2—2:3 as judgment against Judah/Jerusalem, Zephaniah 2:4-15 as judgment against the nations, and Zephaniah 3:1-20 as judgment and deliverance for Jerusalem (cf. Bennett). A creative twist on this approach was suggested by P. House, who claimed that the book is composed in three acts with multiple scenes that unfold a plot from judgment (Day of Yahweh) to words of grace in Zephaniah 3:18-20 (House 1989). However, the traditional tripartite approach has met considerable resistance in recent scholarship (see Sweeney 1991; O'Brien 2007) and has been replaced by approaches that seek for greater sensitivity to the unique flow of thought within Zephaniah as a book (e.g., Ball, who sees in Zeph 2:1-7 the key to the literary components of the book, and Ryou, who discerns a chiasmic arrangement). The result has been greater sensitivity to, for instance, the call to gather and seek God in Zephaniah 2:1-3 and its role within the book and the intertwining of judgment and salvation throughout the book.

There are no major disjunctions within the book, although one can discern smaller units. For instance, although one might consider Zephaniah 2:4-15 as a distinct section comprising prophecies directed against the nations, this section is clearly linked to the preceding section by the causal particle kī (Zeph 2:4), which reveals that it provides the motivation at least for "all the humble of the earth" to seek Yahweh (Zeph 2:3), if not also for the gathered remnant of Judah (Zeph 2:1-2). This section (Zeph 2:4-15) is also linked to the section that follows (Zeph 3:1-7) by the development of the city theme at its conclusion in reference to Nineveh as “exultant city” (Zeph 2:15), which prepares the way for the reference to Jerusalem as “tyrannical city” in Zephaniah 3:1. In addition, the depiction of Jerusalem’s sins in Zephaniah 3:1-7 is clearly linked to the material that follows in Zephaniah 3:8-13 through the particle lākēn (“therefore”), showing how the attack on Jerusalem sets up the call for the faithful to wait for Yahweh to purge the nation and nations.

Although there are reasons to conclude that the material found in the book of Zephaniah has arisen from diverse settings (see Nogalski 1993), the book in its final form is coherent and cohesive. One can discern a modulation in the book between the universal/international and the particular/national, and this shows an intertwining between the fate of all creation, all nations and Judah and Jerusalem. Thus, the initial depiction of divine judgment in Zephaniah 1:2-6 begins with all of creation in view (Zeph 1:2-3) but then focuses on Judah and Jerusalem (Zeph 1:4-6). The announcement of the imminent Day of Yahweh in Zephaniah 1:7-18 begins by focusing on Jerusalem (Zeph 1:7-13) before broadening to the inhabitants of all the earth (Zeph 1:14-18). It is not surprising then that the call to respond in Zephaniah 2:1-3 addresses both of these audiences: Judah (Zeph 2:1-2) and all the humble of the earth (Zeph 2:3), and that the motivation for accepting these invitations is related to an approaching judgment of the nations that will bring a benefit for the remnant of Judah (Zeph 2:4-15). The same dual modulation of universal/particular and international/national can be discerned in the final chapter of Zephaniah, in which groups emerge from the judgment of Yahweh that are both international (Zeph 3:9) and national (Zeph 3:10-13) in character. Binding all of these passages together is the common motif of “the Day” (Zeph 1:7-10, 14-16, 18; 2:2-3; 3:8), when God’s “burning anger” (Zeph 1:15, 18; 2:2-3; 3:8) is unleashed and will produce a purified remnant, over which Yahweh will rejoice.

2.1. Superscription (Zeph 1:1). Zephaniah begins with a superscription that defines the divine and human dimensions of the words in the book that follows. The divine origin of these words is made clear from the outset (the words of Yahweh), but the human agency of Zephaniah is depicted by reference to his social identity (four generations) and historical context (the reign of Josiah). The use of four generations for a prophet is unprecedented in Hebrew tradition and may indicate that Zephaniah himself was of royal lineage traced to King Hezekiah, great-grandfather of Josiah (Berlin, 65; Nogalski 1993, 182-83).

2.2. Depiction of Divine Judgment (Zeph 1:2-6). The initial section of Zephaniah announces judgment by Yahweh, at first universally against the various living components of the created order (Zeph 1:2-3), and then more particularly against Judah and Jerusalem (Zeph 1:4-6). This modulation between the universal and the particular can be discerned throughout Zephaniah.

2.2.1. Judgment on All the Earth (Zeph 1:2-3). Yahweh’s announcement of universal judgment is bracketed by statements identified as declarations of Yahweh that refer to the destruction of elements “from the face of the earth,” first “all things” (Zeph 1:2) and finally “humanity” (Zeph 1:3c). In Zephaniah 1:3a-b “all things” is defined in terms of the various living beings described in connection with the creation of humanity in Genesis 1:26: human (’ādām), beast (bēhēmā), bird of the sky (’ōp-haššamayim), fish of the sea (ḏēgē hayyām) (cf. Job 12:7-8; contrast Gen 1:28; 9:2; Ps 8:7-8; Ezek 38:20; Hos 4:3). The order of destruction is the reverse of the creation account in Genesis 1. The focus, however, is on humanity, which is repeated at the conclusion of the section after a line that characterizes judged humanity as “evil” (Zeph 1:3c). The totality of the destruction is ominous, although, as the book progresses, there are indications that there will be survivors, a remnant comprising those who turn to Yahweh from Judah and the nations (see comments on Zeph 2—3 below).

2.2.2. Judgment on Judah and Jerusalem (Zeph 1:4-6). Yahweh’s first-person announcement of judgment continues into Zephaniah 1:4 as the focus narrows from the earth as a whole to the people of Judah and Jerusalem (Zeph 1:4a). The offenses that have prompted this judgment are listed in Zephaniah 1:4b-6, with this last verse summarizing the basic offense as turning away from following Yahweh and not seeking revelation from Yahweh. The offenses named in Zephaniah 1:4b-5 (idolatry related to Baal, the hosts of heaven and Milcom among clergy and laity alike) are the activities that replaced following and seeking Yahweh. *Idolatry and illicit revelation are commonly connected in the OT (e.g., Zech 13:2), as Israelites sought answers from the heavenly world through illicit means.

2.3. Announcement of the Approaching Day of the Lord (Zeph 1:7-18). The remainder of Zephaniah 1 contains two messages, both of which begin with a declaration that “the day of Yahweh is near” (qārôb yôm yhw̄h [Zeph 1:7, 14]) (see Day of the Lord). The first message (Zeph 1:7-13) depicts Yahweh’s judgment of a particular community who are inhabitants of Jerusalem, while the second message (Zeph 1:14-18) broadens the depiction more universally to encompass “all the earth . . . all the inhabitants of the earth” (Zeph 1:18).

2.3.1. The Approaching Day of the Lord for the Inhabitants of Jerusalem (Zeph 1:7-13). In the first section (Zeph 1:7-13) the day is defined initially in terms of the ritual background of the Day of Yahweh motif—that is, as a festal day of sacrifice (Zeph 1:7b-8)—and judgment is directed at a particular community in Jerusalem. This day, however, will become an opportunity for Yahweh to punish offending elite members of the community who have built fortunes through violence and deceit (Zeph 1:8-9, 13) without regard for accountability to Yahweh (Zeph 1:12). The seriousness of the punishment is suggested by depiction and call to wailing (Zeph 1:10-11) and the revelation that their possessions will be lost and not enjoyed (Zeph 1:13). The call to “silence” (has) often appears in the OT in royal contexts, where it is used to silence (and possibly clear) those gathered around the ruler because he is either moving into or out of the scene (Judg 3:19; Hab 2:20; Zech 2:13 [Mt 2:17]; cf. Amos 6:10; Neh 8:11). Here in Zephaniah 1:7 it is used in conjunction with the Day of Yahweh—that is, his appearing among the people in relation to a festal celebration.

2.3.2. The Approaching Day of the Lord for the Inhabitants of All the Earth (Zeph 1:14-18). In the second section (Zeph 1:14-18) the day is defined initially in terms of the military background of the Day of Yahweh motif, seen especially in the use of terms such as “warrior” (Zeph 1:14), “trumpet,” “battle cry,” “fortified cities” and “high corner towers” (Zeph 1:16) (see Warfare and Divine Warfare). The nearness of the day is emphasized even more at the outset of this section (“near and coming quickly”), and the day is defined in very strong terms in Zephaniah 1:15 (trouble, distress, destruction, desolation, darkness, gloom, clouds, thick darkness). The reason for this divine judgment is identified as the sin of humanity against Yahweh (Zeph 1:17). The depiction of human components (blood, flesh) in terms of valueless items such as dust and dung emphasizes the divine punishment (Zeph 1:17). The final verse (Zeph 1:18) identifies the characteristics of Yahweh that have been incited by the sin of humanity (his *wrath and jealousy) and reveals the qualitative (complete, terrifying) and quantitative (“all the earth . . . all the inhabitants of the earth”) scope of the judgment of this day.

2.4. Responding to the Announcement of the Day of the Lord (Zeph 2:1-15). Following the two judgement sections in Zephaniah 1:2-18, both of which depicted judgment of a universal audience of all the earth and a particular audience of Judah/Jerusalem, Zephaniah 2:1-3 calls these two audiences to respond prior to the day of Yahweh’s anger.

2.4.1. Invitation to Judah (Zeph 2:1-2). The first audience addressed is identified as a “nation without shame” (so the Old Greek) or possibly “nation without desire” (so the MT), most likely referring to Judah because a specific and single nation is in view. This audience is invited to “gather,” using a verb (qšš) usually associated with inanimate objects such as stubble (Ex 5:7, 12) or wood (Num 15:32-33; 1 Kings 17:10, 12), but here with humans gathering together most likely for a day of seeking Yahweh penitentially (see Joel 1:14-15; cf. 2 Chron 20:4). The group that gathers most likely is the “remnant” (šē’ērīt [Zeph 2:7, 9; 3:13]), “remainder” (yeter [Zeph 2:9]), “the people of the LORD of Hosts” (Zeph 2:10), “the dispersed ones” (pūš [Zeph 3:10]) who appear in the rest of Zephaniah.

2.4.2. Invitation to All the Humble of the Earth (Zeph 2:3). The second audience is identified as “all the humble of the earth who have carried out his ordinances,” a more universal audience most likely not limited to Judah and Jerusalem (cf. Ps 76:9). The humble are called to “seek” (bqš Piel) three things: Yahweh, righteousness and humility, with the hope (“perhaps”) that they will be hidden safely on the day of Yahweh’s anger.

2.4.3. Motivation: Judgment on Foreign Nations for the Remnant of Judah (Zeph 2:4-15). The causal particle kî at the beginning of Zephaniah 2:4 links Zephaniah 2:4-15 to the “day of Yahweh’s anger” referred to at the end of the two invitations in Zephaniah 2:1-2 and Zephaniah 2:3. This day will have serious implications for the nations that surround Israel. The review of nations begins with those traditional enemies of Judah to the west (Philistines [Zeph 2:4-7]) and east (Moab/Ammon [Zeph 2:8-10]). The advantage for Judah’s remnant is explicitly noted in relation to the defeat of the Philistines (Zeph 2:7) and the Moabites/Ammonites (Zeph 2:9). The location of the nations in view then shifts further afield, first to those associated with the Mediterranean Sea (Zeph 2:11), then to the Ethiopians (Zeph 2:12), and finally to the Assyrians (Zeph 2:13-15).

2.4.3.1. Judgment on the Philistines (Zeph 2:4-7). Four of the five traditional cities of Philistia are mentioned (Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Ekron), with only Gath left out, a common tradition trend in prophetic lists of the Philistines (cf. Jer 25:20; Amos 1:6-8; Zech 9:5-7) and possibly related to either its early destruction by the Assyrians in 711 bc (cf. Is 20) or the early incorporation of Gath into Israel (cf. 1 Sam 27:1-7; 2 Sam 6:9-12; 15:18-22; 2 Chron 11:5-12). The Philistines were settled along the Mediterranean seacoast of Judah and closely associated in tradition with the Cherethites (Zeph 2:5; cf. Ezek 25:16), most likely a reference to the Cretan origins of the Philistines (Amos 9:7; cf. Deut 2:23; Jer 47:4). The Philistines are also treated as representative of the Canaanites (Zeph 2:5), who here are driven out to give pastureland (Zeph 2:7) to the remnant of Judah.

2.4.3.2. Judgment on the Moabites and Ammonites (Zeph 2:8-10). The focus shifts from west to east of Judah along the Transjordanian Plateau, the traditional lands of Moab and Ammon (as well as further south Edom). The severity of divine judgment is evident in the comparison to Sodom and Gomorrah, which were totally annihilated (cf. Gen 19; Deut 29:23). The cause of this judgment is explicitly identified in Zephaniah 2:10 as their pride, taunting and arrogance against the people of Yahweh. The remnant of Judah will benefit from the defeat of the Moabites and Ammonites by gaining plunder and inheritance (Zeph 2:9).

2.4.3.3. Judgment on the Coastland Nations (Zeph 2:11). Moving further afield, the coastland nations are next in view, most likely a reference to those people groups to the north and northwest who lived along the Mediterranean Sea, whether on the mainland or island (cf. Gen 10:5; Is 11:11; 20:6; 23:2, 6; 24:15; Jer 2:10; 25:22; 47:4; Ezek 27:6-7). These groups will abandon their gods (depriving them of sacrificial sustenance) and offer obeisance to Yahweh in their own lands.

2.4.3.4. Judgment on the Ethiopians (Zeph 2:12). In a short announcement of judgment Yahweh warns the Ethiopians that they will be killed by Yahweh’s sword. As with the Philistines (addressed as Canaan) in Zephaniah 2:5, so the Ethiopians are addressed directly. The Ethiopians, who controlled Egypt at certain points in their history, and the Assyrians, who will follow in Zephaniah 2:13-15, are two key people groups who first butted heads during the Assyrian period (see Is 18:1-7; 20:4, 5; 37:9). It may be that “Ethiopia” is used here as a cipher for “Egypt,” as Zephaniah sees the fulfillment of the earlier prophecies of Isaiah against the Egyptian and Assyrian powers of his day.

2.4.3.5. Judgment on the Assyrians (Zeph 2:13-15). The Assyrians are representative of the nations of “the north” (Mesopotamia)—that is, those nations that typically approached Israel and Judah from the north due to the ancient pathways of the Fertile Crescent. The focus shifts almost immediately to the destruction of Nineveh, Assyria’s capital city, which fell in 612 bc. Animals, both domestic (flocks, beasts in herds) and wild (pelican, hedgehog, birds), will inhabit this once bustling city, reflective of its utter destruction and desertion (Zeph 2:14). So also the contemptuous reaction of those passing by in Zephaniah 2:15b reflects the desperate condition of Nineveh. The city is described as “the exultant city” whose arrogance (“I am, and there is no one besides me”) preceded its fall. This prepares the way for the subsequent pericope, which focuses on another city, Jerusalem, identified as “the tyrannical city,” which also will face the judgment of Yahweh.

2.5. Judgment on Jerusalem and Nations Resulting in Purified Peoples and Remnant (Zeph 3:1-20). The final chapter of Zephaniah shifts the attention back on to Jerusalem, beginning with a focus on its sin (Zeph 3:1-7), but then providing hope for the emergence of a purified remnant consisting of both Gentiles and Israelites (Zeph 3:8-13), a message that will prompt the triumphant joy of Zion and Israel and comfort those who grieve over the state of Zion (Zeph 3:14-20).

2.5.1. The Sin of Jerusalem (Zeph 3:1-7). This section begins with the declaration of woe toward Jerusalem, which is described as rebellious, defiled and tyrannical (Zeph 3:1), linked in the following verses to the city's lack of response to and trust in Yahweh (Zeph 3:2) and the illicit actions of the city's inhabitants—princes, judges, prophets, priests (Zeph 3:3-4)—possibly in connection with injustice. The severity of the city's sin is emphasized by the fact that it was committed in a city inhabited by a righteous and just God (Zeph 3:5), and that it continued in a city that had experienced the discipline of God (Zeph 3:6-7).

2.5.2. Hope Through Purifying Judgment on the Nations and Israel (Zeph 3:8-13). Such sin, even after severe divine discipline, may have discouraged the faithful audience called to gather and seek in Zephaniah 2:1-2, but the message of Zephaniah is one of trust as Yahweh fulfills his plans. The collocation "wait for" (hkh Piel + l) can refer to waiting patiently until Yahweh's judgment has passed (Is 8:17) or until Yahweh's salvation comes (Is 64:4 [MT 64:3]); it is closely related to hope and trust (Ps 33:18-22; Hab 2:3-4). Yahweh's plan is to prompt an international crisis ("nations . . . kingdoms," "all the earth") to bring judgment on the sins of cities such as Nineveh and Jerusalem and their respective nations (Zeph 3:8). The reference to Yahweh's burning anger (hārôn 'ap) reminds the audience of the earlier Day of Yahweh references in Zephaniah 2:1-3. This outpouring of Yahweh's anger will produce a purified group of Gentiles ("peoples" [Zeph 3:9]) and Israelites ("my dispersed ones" [Zeph 3:10]) who will worship Yahweh. The Israelite remnant will undergo even further purging as any remaining proud people will be removed, leaving behind a humble remnant who do no wrong and experience prosperity and security (Zeph 3:11-13).

2.5.3. Joy for Zion and Israel, Comfort for Those Who Grieve (Zeph 3:14-20). The book concludes with an address to *Zion and *Israel, in the form of a summons to joy, which appears regularly throughout the OT to prompt an acknowledgment of a change in fortunes (Is 10:30; 12:6; 23:12; 52:9-10; 54:1; Lam 4:21; Hos 9:1; Joel 2:21-23; Zeph 3:14-15; Zech 2:10; 9:9-10) (Boda). It often is used in relation to a victory in war and is expressed often (as here) by a female voice rejoicing over the safe return of her warriors. The focus of Zephaniah 3:17 is the victorious warrior-king Yahweh, who reciprocates with his own expressions of joy. Zion is depicted as a city ("daughter Jerusalem") in Zephaniah 3:14-17, 18-20, and then the view shifts to her former inhabitants who grieved over her feasts, probably a reference to that faithful remnant who were exiled from the city yet had distanced themselves from the abuses connected with Jerusalem and its temple (see Zeph 1:4-6, 9; 3:5). Yahweh promises to gather this remnant from "all the earth . . . among all the peoples of the earth" and turn their shame to honor.

3. Major Themes.

3.1. The Day of Yahweh. Zephaniah focuses considerable attention on an approaching day related to Yahweh (see King 1995; Bailey, 396). While at times it is simply called "that day" (Zeph 1:9-10, 15; 3:11, 16) or "the day" (Zeph 2:2), it often is identified as "the day of Yahweh" (Zeph 1:7-8, 14, 18; 2:2-3). This day often is linked to Yahweh's anger and wrath (Zeph 1:15, 18; 2:2-3; 3:8), the implications of which are filled out in the detailed list of attributes linked to the word "day" in Zephaniah 1:15-16: "a day of trouble and distress, a day of destruction and desolation, a day of darkness and gloom, a day of clouds and thick darkness, a day of trumpet and battle cry." Twice in Zephaniah a temporal descriptor is employed as the day is identified as "near" (Zeph 1:7, 14). Two settings are associated with the day in Zephaniah. The first is that of the temple cult as the day is identified as "the day of the Yahweh's sacrifice" (Zeph 1:7-8)—that is, a festal day related to the worship of Yahweh. The second is that of the battlefield as the day is identified as "a day of trumpet and battle cry" (Zeph 1:16). Both of these associations can be observed elsewhere in the OT prophetic corpus. The festal connection is evident in Hosea 9:5, which refers to "the day of the appointed festival, the day of the feast of Yahweh" (cf. Lam 2:22) (see Roberts, 177-78; Sweeney 2000, 115). The battlefield connection is even more common throughout the prophetic corpus (e.g., Is 13:6; Joel 2:11), and at times cosmic imagery is employed as Yahweh's military tactics include the use of or impact on various forces of nature (e.g., Joel 1:15; Amos 5:18, 20). Whether connected with cult or war, the Day of Yahweh tradition points to an approaching destructive action of Yahweh either against Israel or foreign nations. It emphasizes Yahweh's sovereign power as he passionately pursues justice within his creation. At the same time, the coming day is designed to protect and produce a purified remnant. The emphasis on imminence (near and coming very quickly [Zeph 1:14]) functions both as a warning to those who think that Yahweh will not hold them accountable (Zeph 1:12) and as a promise to those who must endure unjust conditions (Zeph 3:8).

3.2. The Remnant of Judah and Israel. Whereas Zephaniah 1 is entirely focused on Yahweh's outpouring of wrath and even is bracketed by declarations of total destruction (Zeph 1:2, 18), Zephaniah 2—3 reveals that a group will survive God's wrath (see Anderson; King 1994; Bailey, 402). It is not by accident that the references to a "remnant" related to Yahweh (contrast "the remnant of Baal," which will be destroyed [Zeph 1:4]) occur in Zephaniah only after the imperatives in Zephaniah 2:1-3, which provide a strategy for Jew (Zeph 2:1-2) and Gentile (Zeph 2:3) to avoid the effects of the day. The surviving Jewish group is called "the remnant of the house of Judah" (Zeph 2:7), "my people" (Zeph 2:8), "the remnant of my people" (Zeph 2:9), "the remainder of my nation" (Zeph 2:9), "the people of Yahweh of hosts" (Zeph 2:10), "my worshipers, my dispersed ones" (Zeph 3:10), "the remnant of Israel" (Zeph 3:13), "those who grieve about the feasts" (Zeph 3:18). They will reap benefits from Yahweh's destruction of the nations, as they plunder and inherit the possessions and territory of their enemies (Zeph 2:7, 9), enjoy prosperity and protection from Yahweh (Zeph 3:13), and are honored among the nations (Zeph 3:19-20). Participation in this group appears to be limited to those who gather themselves to seek Yahweh (Zeph 2:1-2), who wait trustingly upon Yahweh (Zeph 3:8), and who come from the nations to bring offerings (Zeph 3:10). This group is one that will be purified by Yahweh as he removes the proud, leaving behind the humble and lowly who trust in Yahweh and speak and act with integrity (Zeph 3:11-12). There will also be a remnant among the Gentiles, a group identified as "all you humble of the earth who have carried out his ordinances" (Zeph 2:3) and as "the peoples" (Zeph 3:9). Participation in this group appears to be limited to those who seek Yahweh, righteousness and humility (Zeph 2:3). After the Day of Yahweh, this group is given purified lips by Yahweh so that they may worship him together (Zeph 3:9).

4. Zephaniah in Its Canonical Context.

4.1. Zephaniah and the Prophets. Many have noted a close relationship between the book of Zephaniah and earlier prophetic traditions, especially Isaiah (Bosshard; Bosshard-Nepustil; Steck; Ahn) and Jeremiah (Achtemeier, 62). Others, however, have focused especially on the role that Zephaniah plays in the overall shape of the Book of the Twelve (House 1990; Nogalski 1993; O'Brien 2007). Zephaniah represents the final preexilic prophet who announces the impending and irreversible judgment on Judah and the nations that would begin in the late seventh century BC and continue throughout most of the sixth century BC as first Egypt and then Babylon wrought destruction throughout the Levant. The book, however, also prepares the reader of the Book of the Twelve for the message of Haggai through Malachi, identifying the character of the remnant that would emerge from the judgment, but also providing a theological foundation for both judgment and salvation related to both Jew and Gentile in Haggai-Malachi.

4.2. Zephaniah and the New Testament. While Zephaniah's Day of Yahweh refers to the judgment that befell Israel and the nations in the late seventh and early sixth centuries BC, its articulation of the Day of Yahweh motif would prove important to the enduring prophetic traditions of Judah, showcased in, for instance, the use of the Day of Yahweh motif throughout Zechariah 9—14 and Malachi (Nogalski 2003). The anticipation of an imminent day when Yahweh would appear to judge and save is an essential component of eschatological expectation throughout the NT and the interpretation of the church. Thus, this day is identified as "the day the Son of Man is revealed" (Lk 17:30), "the day of our Lord Jesus (Christ)" (1 Cor 1:8; 5:5; 2 Cor 1:14), "the day of Christ (Jesus)" (Phil 1:6, 10), "the day of the Lord" (1 Thess 5:2; 2 Thess 2:2) and "the day of God" (2 Pet 3:12). The imminence of this coming day is also emphasized in the NT (Lk 21:34; 1 Thess 5:2; 2 Pet 3:10; Rev 3:3; 16:15), as is its severity. The NT also looks to a remnant that will emerge from the events of the coming day, a group depicted in the book of Revelation as composed of people from every tribe and nation (Rev 5:9; 7:9) who, according to Revelation 19—21, will live forever in a new heaven and earth, a new Jerusalem, a new paradise.

ZION

The term "Zion" (šyyôn) is used throughout the OT Prophetic Books (48x in Isaiah, 17x in Jeremiah, 7x in Joel, 2x in Amos, 2x in Obadiah, 7x in Micah, 1x in Zephaniah, 7x in Zechariah). The terminology of "Zion" and related language is far more prevalent in the prophets than in the Pentateuch, Historical Books or even the Writings (with the exception of the Psalter).

"Zion" is the name of the capital city of Jerusalem in the united and divided monarchies of Israel. Originally the term may have been a descriptor for the small hill just between the Kidron and Tyropoean Valleys in Jerusalem. Prior to David's ascendancy to the throne of Israel (c. 1000 BC), the Jebusites controlled this area. Once David conquered the city, Zion/Jerusalem became the locus of the political power for the new king. It culminates in a powerful political and theological symbol as Solomon built the first *temple to Yahweh in this general locale, just north of the former Jebusite city.

In the prophets "Zion" displays a wide semantic range. The term often refers to the geographical location of the Temple Mount, likely due to Zion's close connection to Yahweh's kingship in Zion (Is 4:5; 8:18; 18:7; 24:23; 29:8; 31:4; 37:32; Joel 2:32; Obad 17, 21; Mic. 4:7). Otherwise, it can identify the city itself (Is 2:3; 4:3; 10:12). In other places "Zion" depicts both a city and its inhabitants. In this designation Zion is personified (Is 1:27; 37:22–29:14; Jer 9:19; Joel 2:23; Mic 4:11; Zeph 3:16) as a woman/mother. The epithet "Daughter Zion" is often found in this construction (Is 10:32; 37:22; 52:2; 62:11; Jer 4:31; 6:2, 23; Mic 4:10; Zeph 3:14; Zech 2:10; 9:9; also Lam 1—2; 4:22).

1. The Zion Tradition.

The term "Zion" (šyyôn) first occurs in 2 Samuel 5:7, and this text relates Zion and the Davidic monarchy. Whether it reveals that Zion is a Davidic concept designed to propagate the authority of the monarchy, however, is debated. So too is the role that Yahwistic religion plays in this relationship. There is no doubt, however, that three elements emerge in any discussion of Zion: the city, Yahwistic religion and kingship. The relationship between these constitutes the discussion of what is known as the "Zion tradition" or sometimes called "Zion theology" (Groves).

It is common to identify the central tenets of this tradition as (1) Zion is the peak of Zaphon, the highest mountain; (2) the river of paradise flows from Zion; (3) Yahweh triumphed over the flood of chaos waters at Zion; (4) Yahweh triumphed over the kings and their nations at Zion (Rohland). A final tenet is the pilgrimage of the nations to worship Yahweh in Zion (Wildberger). These tenets have been used to explore Zion theology even in the prophets where Zion is not mentioned (see Renz), but some or all of them appear in Isaiah, Jeremiah, Joel, Micah, Zephaniah and Zechariah. From these elements, scholars arrive at two central conclusions that impinge upon a Zion theology in the prophets: first, God has chosen Zion for his holy abode; second, Zion is protected by God by virtue of his presence there.

It is important to note that this Zion tradition often constitutes cosmic symbolism rather than an overly literal topographical or geographical description in the prophets. Jerusalem is not the highest mountain in the immediate region, much less in the whole of Canaan. Nor is there particularly a river that runs from Zion, although the Gihon Spring seems to be associated with that tenet in particular texts. What is emphasized in the prophets in relation to Zion is God's cosmic rule and authority, particularly dispensed from a particular place, which is Jerusalem. Still, God's rule often exceeds the geographical boundaries of Zion/Jerusalem in the prophets, so that his divine power supersedes any particular localization of its representation.

2. History of Research.

J. Dekker has provided the most extensive and current survey of research on Zion. He rightly notes that scholars had long understood the importance of Zion in the history and theology of the OT, but E. Rohland's analysis was seminal in that it explored the significance of Israel's election traditions for the eschatological preaching of the prophets. Identification and description of the Zion tradition was a major outcome of his research. Rohland suggested that the tradition originated in Jebusite religious thought. The Jebusites believed that their city was inviolable because their deity was there. Rohland saw latent Zion theology in Jebusite thinking.

But once he captured the Jebusite city, David co-opted and integrated preexisting Jebusite theology into Yahwistic religion for his own political purposes (see von Rad, 1:46-48). By integrating existing Jebusite beliefs concerning the inviolability of the city due to divine election and divine presence, the budding Davidic house could centralize its power and provide a theological rationale for this particular kingship at this particular place against all other rivals.

Scholars thought that the prophets then adapted the Davidic Zion tradition, downplaying the notion that Zion was inviolable and highlighting the notion that Yahweh, as the divine Lord, expected obedience and piety among Zion's inhabitants. Especially Isaiah suggested that Yahweh's presence was not to be taken for granted in the holy city (Is 5:2-20). On this understanding, Zion was indeed God's chosen dwelling place, where he defeats enemies, but this also implies that the inhabitants of Zion must uphold God's standards of *justice and righteousness. Infidelity to Yahweh in Zion leads to a forfeiture of divine protection. Nonetheless, God eventually will provide grace to his holy dwelling and be a refuge for the remaining inhabitants, thwarting the nations that oppose his city and people (see von Rad, 2:158-59). This developmental construal of Zion theology—Jebusite origins, Davidic adoption, prophetic adaptation—influenced a generation.

J. J. M. Roberts critiqued this consensus and argued that Zion theology originated in the Davidic monarchy rather than Jebusite religion (Roberts 1973). David's ascension to the throne provided a sufficient need to develop a theological warrant for his seat of political and religious power in Jerusalem. In Roberts's construal, Zion theology began with (1) Yahweh as the great king of the earth, who (2) has chosen Jerusalem/Zion to exercise his rule, (3) through his human vice-regent the king of Israel, David (Roberts 1983). So Zion theology celebrated Yahweh's rule and simultaneously justified the Davidic throne and cultic center in Jerusalem. Roberts's construal effectively absorbs Rohland's four other tenets of Zion theology (cosmic mountain, river of paradise, defeat of chaos, defeat of kings) within the aims of the Davidic monarchy. Roberts followed his predecessors in arguing that the prophets effectively critiqued the Zion tradition, particularly in regard to the notion that Zion is impregnable due to its divine election and Yahweh's indwelling presence there. What was required for Yahweh to remain in Zion or return there was the city's faithfulness to him (Roberts 1987).

Not all had been comfortable with either Jebusite or Davidic origins of the Zion tradition. In the 1950s O. Eissfeldt suggested that the origins of Zion actually derive from traditions surrounding the ark of the covenant at Shiloh and the divine title "Yahweh Zebaoth." Only later was this adapted by David and then the prophets. Likewise, H. Gese supposes that the Zion tradition is primarily linked to the ark at Shiloh. In so doing, Gese disassociates the close connection between God's election of David and his election of Zion. In Gese's formulation, divine election of Zion takes precedent because it is here that the divine king rules, and only subsequently through the vice-regent David. The prophets, then, use Zion theology to draw upon the primary denotation of Yahweh's kingship in Zion while they simultaneously critique the secondary connotation that links Zion with Davidic kingship.

B. Ollenburger shifts the focus in research by assessing Zion as a theological symbol rather than strictly as a historical tradition in Israel. Like Eissfeldt and Gese, he thinks that the theological symbol of Zion derives from Shiloh ark tradition, which was then expanded upon in subsequent generations. But he moves away from tradition-historical methods to argue that Zion, in the variety in which it appears in the corpus of the OT, reflects a theological conception that is associated with mythical themes, motifs and cultic forms of speech. The central core for the Zion tradition derives from the premise of the kingship of Yahweh from Zion. As the great king, Yahweh protects and defends his people and their dwelling place, wherever that may be. But likewise, as the divine king, Yahweh demands that his people place their complete trust in him to secure them against external threats. This is not a prophetic adaptation of the Zion tradition for Ollenburger, but is a theological reflection derived from the reality of Yahweh's kingship inherent within the (early) theological symbol of Zion (so Gese).

Other scholars have limited their research on Zion to particular books, such as Isaiah (Seitz; Dekker). C. Seitz suggests that Zion's destiny is elucidated by the correlation between Hezekiah's sickness and recovery (Is 36—38), Jerusalem's judgment and potential redemption (Is 1—35), and Zion's final destiny explicated in and through return from *exile and the work of the Suffering *Servant (Is 40—66). So Isaiah is concerned to show God's election of Zion as the place where he will dwell in righteousness and justice, but it is a city that bears the sin of its people and thus suffers on their behalf. On this basis, Isaiah presents the city of Jerusalem as a city that is doomed for destruction due to the sins of its people. And yet, although suffering (in exile), Zion awaits God's salvation and redemption, where Zion will once again be identified as the "faithful city" in which all the peoples of the earth will hear God's instruction and delight in a place of joy and *peace (Is 2:2-5).

Other modern research assessed different aspects of Zion. J. Levenson explored the way Zion, with Sinai, becomes a significant entry point to understanding the whole of the Hebrew Bible. In a distinctive Jewish theology, Levenson argues that Zion becomes the symbol that absorbs Israel's experience with God at Sinai and becomes for Israel the center of the world, time and all of reality. As a symbol, it engenders moral obedience to Yahweh and energizes praise to God. Zion is the place where Eden is remembered and revisualized in every successive generation at the temple.

D. Gowan addresses Zion as a significant eschatological symbol in the OT, particularly in and through the prophetic texts of Isaiah, Ezekiel and Jeremiah. From these and other texts, Zion promotes a vision of a transformed and redeemed society, the essence of a transformed human person, a transformed ecology of new heavens and earth, and a distinctive picture of future hope.

Recent feminist research has paid attention to Zion as a gendered metaphor in the prophets. C. Maier has explored at length the ways the OT personifies Zion as a mother and whore in the prophetic texts. The depiction of Zion as a woman, Maier avers, underscores the prophets' rhetorical message of communal demise and degradation. However, it underscores the prophets' rhetorical message of communal restoration as well. So Zion in the prophets is the afflicted whore and redeemed mother. She is the forlorn mother and fertile wife (Is 49:22-23; 50:1; 54:1-3; 60; 66).

Finally, C. Mandolfo has argued that Zion, particularly through the image of Daughter Zion in Lamentations, becomes a resource to challenge the prophets' depiction of Zion as whore in the prophets. Her dialogic theology uses the insights of M. Bakhtin and blends them with the political edge of feminist criticism. In her analysis, Daughter Zion's voice from Lamentations becomes countertestimony against divine sanction of rape and abuse of Zion as depicted in the prophets. For Mandolfo, Zion, particularly Daughter Zion, becomes an ideological and theological form of protest speech (cf. Boase).

3. Zion and Prophetic Critique.

Typical of prophetic speech is a vacillating message of judgment and redemption. This prophetic message often is revealed in the image of Zion. The prophets emphasize that Zion is the place where God the king reigns in justice. Consequently, God's people are called to live in trust of their divine king. On this basis, the inhabitants of Zion/Jerusalem may be critiqued for their lack of fidelity to God.

3.1. Isaiah. Isaiah especially critiques Zion as a place where God's people are faithless to him. Isaiah upbraids the people of Judah and Jerusalem for foreign alliances and a lack of trust in Yahweh (esp. Is 30:1-5; 31:1-3). The rationale behind this critique lay in Yahweh's kingship in Zion. Zion's inhabitants are to be faithful to their divine king, but Israel has become an unfaithful vassal. The inhabitants of Zion ape at righteousness and justice, faithful cultic ritual, and fidelity to Yahweh, but the verdict of God is that the "faithful city" has become an "adulteress" (Is 1:21; cf. Zeph 3:1). As a result, Zion has become the opposite of the chosen place; it has become an "enemy" that God will vanquish through judgment (Is 1:24-25). Zion becomes the object of prophetic critique due to its inhabitants' sins.

Isaiah calls God's people to *repentance and justice (Is 1:27) so that Zion would be saved from *evil that leads to destruction. Whoever trusts in the Lord will be safe in Zion, but those who do not will experience judgment. Isaiah emphasizes the trust necessary for God to reside in Zion (cf. Is 28:16). Those who make God's justice and righteousness their banner for life will be saved (Is 28:14-19).

Yet in Isaiah God's judgment upon Zion is inescapable. The holy city will be reduced to a "hut" (Is 1:8) by the fires of divine wrath. Isaiah's unique use of the title "Ariel" for Jerusalem is employed in judgment contexts (Is 29:2). In essence, God will fight against, rather than on behalf of, Zion because of the people's sin. Yet this judgment will lead to renewal and restoration by the work of the Lord. So Isaiah can say that those who remain after judgment in Zion will be called "holy" (Is 4:3) and a "holy seed" (Is 6:13).

3.2. Jeremiah. Jeremiah's critique of Zion takes a unique form. His well-known temple sermons excoriate the view that God is obligated to protect his people and city because the temple is there. Rather, Jeremiah exemplifies the desolation of Shiloh to illustrate God's commitment to his just rule rather than his obligation to a geographical locale. Holy sites do not enable Yahweh's presence among his people, but holy people do (Jer 7:3-11; 26:1-6). Thus, the Zion theology advocated in Jeremiah reflects a commitment to a divinely chosen site, but only if God's people remain committed to him in that place.

Jeremiah plays upon the possibility of Zion's repentance and return to God, but holds this in tension with Zion's recalcitrance in the face of upcoming judgment from God. Divine judgment that is made clear in Jeremiah's call (Jer 1:10) and various judgment oracles (Jer 4:5—6:30) is held in tension with the authentic offers of restoration: if God's people would repent, he would heal them (Jer 3:12-23; 4:1-4). The judgment oracles that surround this offer of restoration, however, reveal that Zion will not receive divine healing. Instead of receiving God's call for return, Zion will hear the call of war (Jer 4:6). As a result, Zion personified stretches out her hands and languishes in judgment (Jer 4:31).

3.3. Joel and Micah. Joel depicts coming judgment of God against Zion and combines it with "day of the Lord" language typical in the Book of the Twelve (see Rendtorff). God's people in Zion will raise an alarm for coming invasion on the *Day of the Lord, where God will fight against, rather than on behalf of, Zion (Joel 2:1-11). This judgment is due to Israel's (unidentified) lack of fidelity to the Lord. And as a result, Zion will suffer the plague of invasion, and Zion's prosperity will wither in the day of God's judgment. Micah spends more time detailing the various *sins of God's people, including *idolatry, covetousness, oppression, uncleanness, injustice and greed (Mic 1—3). God's people are led by those "who build Zion with blood and Jerusalem with iniquity" (Mic 3:10). As a result, God will wage war against his people, and Zion will be plowed like a field (Mic 3:12).

4. Zion and Prophetic Consolation.

A message of consolation for Zion matches the prophetic critique against Zion in the prophets. God's commitment to his people and place (Zion) funds this vision of consolation so prevalent in the prophets. This shows that the judgment and restoration of Zion are but two aspects of a single divine redemptive movement (see McConville).

4.1. Isaiah. Isaiah's message of judgment is matched with a call for repentance/return and a proclamation of consolation. Isaiah 2—4 concerns the future restoration of Zion, far removed from the egregious sins of the present. This future Zion will be marked by supreme honor among all other locales in the earth (Is 2:2), international pilgrimage for *worship (Is 2:3), and universal instruction of the Lord's ways among all peoples in Zion (Is 2:3) universal justice and eternal peace (Is 2:4). Further, Isaiah reveals that this vision of future Zion will come after a time of judgment for sin (Is 4:4). These themes occur in other Isaianic pictures of Zion's restoration as well (see Is 11; 25—27; 51—56; 60—66).

After divine judgment, Zion reflects divine glory at both Sinai and the tabernacle in the wilderness (Is 4:5-6; cf. Ex 40:34). Zion becomes the place where God's *presence at Sinai is re-experienced for Israel and the nations (Levenson). The possibility of this experience comes through the judgment and restoration of Zion. Only the select few ("remnant") who live through the judgment will experience restoration in Zion (Is 4:4; cf. Is 35:10; 37:32; 62:12).

Isaiah 25—27 gives a particular vision of this renewal, where *death will no longer be operative (Is 25), peace will be the banner of the city (Is 26) and God's vineyard of delight will produce fruit over the face of the world (Is 27). Further, nations will come and worship at the renewed sanctuary in Zion (Is 27:13; cf. Is 2:2-3). Key to Isaiah 25—26 is the vision of the judged yet restored "mountain of God" and "city"—Zion and Jerusalem.

Distinctive to Isaiah, Zion's renewal takes place in and through the work of the Suffering Servant (see Servant of Yahweh), who is God's agent of salvation and power. God's salvific power via the Suffering Servant is part of the larger theological motif of the "arm of the Lord" in Isaiah (Is 30:30, 32; 40:10; 48:14; 51:9; 52:10; 53:1; 62:8). In Isaiah 51—52 God presents a vision of comfort in the face of *suffering, captivity and judgment. The faithful *remnant of Israel will see the Lord comfort (Is 51:3) and redeem Zion (Is 52:1-7). But this restoration will occur because God appoints the Suffering Servant to mediate on behalf of suffering Israel (Is 53:1-12). The Suffering Servant bears Israel's sin and iniquity (Is 53:4-6). Through his suffering, the storm-tossed and not-comforted Zion (Is 54:11) will be comforted and restored (Is 54:12). The Suffering Servant will bring glorification instead of humiliation (Is 61:1-3). At his work, the ruins of Zion will be rebuilt.

The restoration will also incorporate a festival pilgrimage to Zion by the *nations. Zion will be the place where the nations come and worship the Lord (Is 56:6-8), and God's house will be "a house of prayer for all peoples" (Is 56:7; cf. Is 2:3). Zion's restoration will be a beacon to all peoples that renewed Jerusalem is called "The Redeemed of the Lord" and "A City Not Forsaken" (Is 62:12).

4.2. Jeremiah. Zion's restoration is envisioned rather differently in Jeremiah's so-called Book of Consolation (Jer 30—33). Zion is restored not through the Suffering Servant but rather through the unilateral *salvation of God. The Lord inscribes fidelity on the hearts of the people (Jer 31:33). In his salvation, a new covenant will be established, and the city that was forsaken, Zion itself, will be renewed as "sacred to the LORD" and "shall not be uprooted or overthrown anymore, forever" (Jer 31:40). The theme of safety and security of Zion after judgment permeates Jeremiah 32—33. This is combined with an inward fidelity to the Lord, depicted in God's writing of the law on the hearts of the faithful (Jer 31:33-34). In this divinely orchestrated "restoration of fortunes" (cf. Jer 31:23; 32:44; 33:7, 11, 26), God will instill within Zion fidelity, love and faithfulness not known before in Israel's history. What is called upon for the faithful of God is to await this divinely orchestrated change in penitence, faith and confident expectancy.

4.3. Joel, Micah, Zephaniah, Zechariah. In the face of impending judgment against Zion in the Minor Prophets, an overwhelming vision of consolation is presented as well. Joel juxtaposes its Zion judgment proclamations with salvation oracles in Joel 2:23-32; 3:17-21. In these oracles God comforts and restores Zion's fortunes. Moreover, God will enact judgment against Zion's enemies in the valley of decision (Joel 3:12-16). Through this restoration God will no longer fight against his people and city but rather will dwell in Zion's midst as the divine and just king over creation (Joel 2:27; 3:16, 21). Still, Joel calls its readers to repentance and return in Zion. Instead of a trumpet blast that announces war in Zion (Joel 2:1), a trumpet blast announces a penitential fast (Joel 2:15-17).

Micah too envisions consolation for Zion. Micah especially understands consolation coming in the "latter days" or "last days," when Zion will be established above all other mountains, and the nations will stream to Zion for worship, instruction, justice and peace (Mic 4:1-5; cf. Is 2:2-5). The vision of Zion's restoration is concomitant with an end to warfare and idolatry, for in Zion the faithful of God will "walk in the name of the LORD our God forever and ever" (Mic 4:5). This picture of consolation also brings healing to the poor, discarded and afflicted. God will redeem them in Zion together, where the divine king will rule over them forever (Mic 4:8-10).

In restoration, Zion will rejoice before God and find refuge in the Lord's renewed city. Zephaniah in particular builds upon Micah's vision of all nations going to Zion to receive God's instruction (Zeph 3:9-10). Purified from sin, "The king of Israel, the LORD," will be in the midst of Daughter Zion (Zeph 3:14-15). Because of his presence, fear and timidity will no longer afflict God's people.

This great reversal from oppression and humiliation to liberation and honor is emphasized especially in Zechariah. The judgment that marked Zion in the past is now repealed by God's love, as Zechariah's refrain reveals: "Thus says the LORD of hosts: I am exceedingly jealous for Jerusalem and for Zion" (Zech 1:14; similarly, Zech 8:2). So Zechariah is a book that proclaims especially Zion's restoration. For Zechariah, as with the other prophets, God's indwelling presence in Zion is concomitant to this restoration (Zech 2:10; 8:3), but Zechariah takes the picture of restoration further: God will establish his righteous yet humble king in the faithful city (Zech 9:9-10; cf. Mic 5:2). The installation of this king in Zion is part and parcel of God's renewal.

5. Daughter Zion.

The epithet "Daughter Zion" (bat-šyyôn) appears in the OT, mostly in the Prophetic Books and in Lamentations (in the Prophetic Books: Isaiah 6x; Jeremiah 3x; Micah 4x; Zephaniah 1x; Zechariah 2x). Many scholars understand the title to be a personification of the city of Jerusalem as well as its inhabitants, but some tend to emphasize one or the other.

The reason for the discrepancy arises from the evidence in the prophetic corpus itself. There are instances where emphasis falls on the personification of the city rather than the people in the city. Isaiah 1:8 identifies Daughter Zion as a "besieged city," leading one to think that the term indicates the geographical place of Jerusalem. Further, the phrase "mountain of Daughter Zion" describes the Temple Mount in the midst of the city in Isaiah 16:1 (see Dekker, 269-70). The term also is likely used to describe a geographical locale in Micah 4:8. Still as the term is, at root, a metaphor, we cannot be overly rigid with the classification. So, for instance, Zechariah 2:10 and Zephaniah 3:14 trade upon the restoration of God's people using "Daughter Zion." And when judgment is in view, Micah 4:10 uses "Daughter Zion" to describe God's people going into exile.

Further, some point out that the term functions as a fecund gendered metaphor (see Women and Female Imagery). Some of the prophetic texts use the term to present the city as a "mother" whose inhabitants are her children (Maier). In this way, Daughter Zion is a place of security and well-being that nourishes and cares for her inhabitants/children. And the same term can reinforce a sense of loss and abandonment: a mother/Zion who has lost her children/inhabitants in and through the exile (see Lamentations, Book of). In these instances, the noun "daughter" represents the "children" of a city who belong to the city of "mother/Zion." The benefit of this view is that it takes seriously the normal syntactical form of a Hebrew construct chain (bat-šyyôn) (see Floyd).

In addition to the notion of Daughter Zion as a mother, by using the epithet "daughter," Isaiah and Jeremiah in particular reinforce the notion that Zion is represented as a young marriageable woman. In this gendered metaphor, Daughter Zion is in need of the protection that comes with a husband. Of course, in the OT the protector/husband of Zion is Yahweh. This reinforces the Israelite notion of Yahweh as husband to God's people, and particularly in Zion (Maier).

Rather than press too hard on either the city or the people, it is best to allow individual texts to inform the meaning of the term. When assessed within the prophets, the title "Daughter Zion" is a polyvalent metaphor that is used in complementary but different ways, with emphasis falling sometimes upon the geographical locale of Zion and sometimes upon the inhabitants of Zion. In either case, poetic representation of the Daughter Zion bears interpretative fruit appropriate for each particular context. God's people are always and ever localized within particular places, and the ideal place for them to be is, on the reckoning of the prophets, on God's holy hill in Zion. This is because Zion represents (at least in its eschatological sense) God's people living in God's place under God's rule.

6. Conclusion: Zion in Time and Eternity.

When the prophetic testimony on Zion is taken together, Zion becomes a witness to God's universal dominion in *creation (see Is 60). As a theological symbol, Zion presses the future hope well beyond any former localization in the prophets' presentation of history. Zion, then, absorbs the grandeur of Israel's Sinai theophany into a new vision of God's universal reign in creation (Levenson). Although the Zion tradition may link back to creation theology, in the prophets the vision of "restored Zion" is a picture of creation redivivus (Ollenburger; Wildberger; cf. Gese on “Zion Torah”). In this way, for the prophets Zion becomes a rich theological symbol that depicts the reign of God over his creation in time and eternity. Zion becomes a symbol of new creation and redeemed humanity that lives before God without sin, death or pain because God rules in its midst (cf. Is 2:2-4; 65; Mic 4:1-7).

As a theological symbol, Zion reveals God’s plan for a future hope. In the Minor Prophets Zion regularly appears as a people/city judged (Amos 1:2; 6:1; Mic 3:12) or saved (Obad 17; Mic 4:1-10) by the activity of God. But in the eschatological future, Zion is the locale where God’s kingship will be exercised in creation (Mic 4:7; cf. Pss 95—100). In this way, Zion cannot be relegated for Israel alone. Zion as a symbol intertwines the destiny of Israel with the nations. As those who have been judged and remain, the nations and Israel will find refuge in Zion under the protection of God, the instruction of God, and his appointed king (Mic 4:1-2; Zeph 3:9; Zech 2:10-11; 8:1-23). After purification of sin, Israel and the nations are incorporated into a new humanity—ideal Israel, in Zion (Joel 2:23-32).

Zion in the prophets sets a trajectory that is then received in the NT (see Fuller Dow; Sherwood) (see Prophets in the New Testament). The NT in particular takes a different turn with the concept, for in the OT Yahweh reigns in Zion, whereas the NT interprets the reign of God in Zion christologically. Important to the NT reception of the Zion concept from the OT prophets are Isaiah 28:16; 62:11; Zechariah 9:9. In these texts, the people/city of Zion rejoice over their king who is returning to them to reign (Mt 21:5; Jn 12:15; cf. Zech 9:9; also Is 62:11). In the Gospels, this king is none other than Jesus the Messiah. Further, the Gospels indicate that Zion itself is founded upon Jesus. In this way, both the city and the inhabitants are built into a spiritual house founded upon the “cornerstone” of Zion—that is, Jesus. This is found not least in the Synoptic parable of the wicked tenants (Mt 21:42; Mk 12:10–11; Lk 20:17–18) but also in Romans 9:33 and 1 Peter 2:6. These NT texts draw upon the Zion imagery of Isaiah 28:16 // Ps 118:22 to reinforce the foundation for the church is none other than Christ. So “Zion” refers to the people of God constructed upon the Christ, Zion’s cornerstone. This may be understood as a variation on the theme of the pilgrimage of nations seen in Zion ideology. Pilgrimage to Zion is fulfilled in part as both Israel and nations stream to Christ. Further, those who put their faith in “Zion/Christ” will experience ultimate vindication (even despite present suffering): “they will not be put to shame.” This point carries thematic parallels to the foundational Zion motif of universal vindication of the righteous and judgment on the wicked at Zion. The NT transforms this ideology by finding its focal point in Jesus.

Finally, “Zion” in the NT seems to indicate the place where both God reigns in and through Christ (cf. Rev 14:1) as well as God’s people dwell under his authority forever. This is indeed Zion’s final destiny, a point picked up in Revelation 21:1-5, trading upon Isaiah’s vision of new heaven and new earth. Here, Zion is filled with God’s people (both Israel and the nations [see Sherwood]) under the rule of the appointed king who sits on the throne, Jesus himself. In Zion, Christ makes all things new (Rev 21:5).
